Washington's hands-off stance had nothing to do with the concurrent Suez crisis either. With Suez or without it, the United States had no means available to aid, let alone "liberate," Hungary. For despite all the talk about "liberation" since 1952, neither the National Security Council nor the State Department had devised plans for diplomatic or any other form of assistance. Nor was the CIA ready. When I received permission to study the agency's operational files for my book "Failed Illusions," to be published in September, I was stunned to learn that the CIA had but one official operating in Hungary in 1956. In Austria, as first reported by Evan Thomas a few years ago, the CIA did not have a single Hungarian-speaking agent. The handful of emigres trained for behind-the-lines activity were let go in 1953.

It is time to come clean.

DOJ_NMG_0036640

The president should tell the Hungarians that in the 1950s Congress issued politically inspired "Captive Nations" resolutions and held self-satisfying "prayer breakfasts," while Eisenhower delivered empty promises about "liberation" during presidential campaigns in 1952 and 1956 to please Hungarian (and other Eastern European) ethnics in Ohio and elsewhere -- with no plans to carry them out.

The Hungarians need to hear what happened 50 years ago -- and Americans need to hear that in the future we will not say we seek clearly unattainable goals abroad for political ends at home.

The writer teaches European politics at Johns Hopkins University's Nitze School of Advanced International Studies.

Bush Hopes For WTO Breakthrough On Farm Subsidies (AFP)

AFP, June 21, 2006

US President George W. Bush hopes European leaders will improve their offer on agricultural trade to help bring about a breakthrough in stalled global trade talks, a White House official said.

National security advisor Stephen Hadley told reporters on Air Force One, carrying Bush and other officials to a US-European Union summit, that Bush sees a deal as possible this year on the Doha Round of World Trade Organization talks.

Hadley cited a "bold offer with respect to agricultural subsidies" made by Washington last year, which would slash subsidies by some 60 percent.

"We really need to see a response from the Group of 20 countries and from the Europeans that is comparable to this offer."

The G20 group of developing nations is another key bloc at the WTO talks along with the US and EU.

Hadley said resolving the deadlock on farm subsidies could allow WTO negotiators to strike an overall deal liberalizing trade, which he said offers benefits for all countries.

"If they can move in this direction we are going to be in the sight of getting an agreement by the end of the year and I think we will see the president encourage everyone he talks to on this trip not to miss this terrific opportunity to advance trade and advance development and help raise people out of poverty," the official added.

Members of the WTO are struggling to meet their deadline of year-end 2006 to complete the current, so-called Doha Development Agenda of trade talks, which is supposed to help poor countries.

The Doha round, which was launched in 2001 in the Qatari capital, was meant to have been completed in 2004. Negotiators also missed their last deadline, April 30, for deciding on the mathematics of the final accord.

WTO ministers are next to meet at the headquarters of the free-trade organization's headquarters on June 29 to try to hammer out out an agreement on the framework for further talks on the key subjects of tariffs on agriculture and industrial products.

Plan B For Plurilateralists (WSJ)

By Bernard K. Gordon

The Wall Street Journal, June 21, 2006

The president's trip to Europe this week includes a personal effort to kick-start world trade talks. That should end the idea that he was downgrading U.S. trade goals when Rob Portman was transferred from trade chief to budget director. Instead, the president has made clear the U.S. insists on a genuine big deal for world trade -- or no deal at all. That's in contrast to what some are calling a "modestly ambitious outcome" -- or what Susan Schwab, Mr. Portman's successor as USTR, has rejected as "Doha Lite."

The president laid out what's involved: Europe will "have to make a tough decision on farming," the developing countries will "have to make a tough decision on manufacturing" and the U.S., he said, "is prepared to make a tough decision to go along with them." It's a last-ditch effort, because presidential trade authority expires in a year, and in Congress there's no stomach for half-deals. Indeed Bill Thomas, the powerful chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, has said Washington should end altogether its support for the WTO.

It's the developing nations, led by Brazil and India, which are calling for just a "modest outcome," and it's time to recognize they have too small a stake to make that case. In fact, the world's 50 "least developed" nations account for less than 1% of global trade, and even with India and Brazil added, the total is less than 3%. The economies that are in fact the world's trade leaders are, not surprisingly, in North America, northeast Asia, the EU and the Asia/Pacific region.

If those trade heavyweights cannot close a satisfactory deal this summer, it will be time to start on Plan B, which would be centered on "plurilateral" or less than global-scale trade agreements. These would retain the key elements of the present multilateral system, which means they must exclude all preferences or preferential treatment; be based on full reciprocity; and be open to all who abide by those rules.

DOJ_NMG_0036641

Fortunately the two essential elements to do just that are already in place. One building-block is the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade's Article 24, which was initially drafted to allow for the original European Community. It provides legal cover for groups of nations to establish FTAs, so long as "substantially all trade" is included. The second building-block is in the several "free trade" agreements the U.S. already has signed, and the others on its current agenda. Included are Nafta, the recent agreements with Singapore, Australia and Chile, earlier agreements with Jordan and Israel, and the largely completed Cafta. FTA talks recently begun with Korea and Malaysia have produced encouraging signs (those with Thailand are on hold), and further down the road are several FTAs in the Middle East.

The initial step would be to tie together these separate FTAs into a broader group of nations that share America's free trade goals. Some in Europe are in that category: Britain, the Netherlands, several in Scandinavia and very probably Germany. They seem hardly willing to continue supporting the French-EU insistence on the agricultural policies that have stalled the Doha Round. Yes, Peter Mandelson, EU Trade Commissioner, has said Europe would lose "next to nothing" if the WTO's Doha Round fails, and it's time to test that.

One clue of change in Europe's trade winds came two months ago, when several EU nations wrote Mr. Mandelson to warn him not to make further concessions on agriculture. But those that did not sign the letter included most of the EU's trade heavyweights: Britain, Holland, Germany, Sweden and Denmark. In world trade terms, that's quite a club.

Just as with the existing bilateral and regional FTAs, the new plurilateral free trade group would exist alongside, rather than substitute for, the multilateral system at the heart of the present Doha Round, which has evidently come on hard times. The key advantage of plurilateralism would be to continue the widening of trade liberalization, rather than being stymied by the split between what Robert Zoellick called the "can do" and the "won't do" nations.

But to get the ball rolling the U.S. must return to its traditional position of trade leadership. The whole process started when Cordell Hull, FDR's secretary of state, authored the Reciprocal Trade Act of 1934, and now's the time to resume that role.

Mr. Gordon is emeritus professor of political science at the University of New Hampshire.

Brussels Decries US Protectionism (FT)

By Wolfgang Proissl, Fidelius Schmid And Daniel Dombey

Financial Times, June 21, 2006

A rising tide of protectionism could endanger European investment in the US, the president of the European Commission said ahead of a European Union-US summit in Vienna on Wednesday.

José Manuel Barroso said he had spoken to George W. Bush, US president, several times about the risk of introducing new barriers on investment because of worries about globalisation or terrorism.

“We want to make sure that the security concerns that we respect can be dealt with in a manner that is not detrimental with our overall political relations, specifically on trade and investment,” he told Financial Times Deutschland, the FT’s sister paper.

“We deplore all decisions when there is – because of a security concern – the restriction of the free flow of capital . . . It’s negative for all of us. We believe it’s important to have more cross-border investment.”

He said a backlash against globalisation was also stoking “protectionist tendencies” in the US. and elsewhere.

The US and the EU are each other’s biggest source of foreign direct investment. With a total bilateral investment stock of €1,500bn ($18,871bn), two-thirds of European and US companies’ investment abroad reaches the other side of the Atlantic.

But EU officials believe the failure of Dubai Ports World’s attempt to buy US ports this year showed a willingness by Congress to block foreign investment on grounds unrelated to economic criteria.

The topic is just one of a number of sensitive practical issues on which transatlantic ties will be tested at today’s summit.

Mr Barroso is also worried about Washington’s refusal to grant visa-free access to the US to citizens of “new” EU member states, and the Commission has struggled to meet US demands to provide details of transatlantic air passengers in a way that is compatible with EU law.

But Mr Barroso said that, on broad strategic issues, the Bush administration had moved closer to the EU in recent months.

Mr Barroso said the US’s position on the visa-waiver scheme treated people from new member states “as second-class citizens” even though they hailed from countries that were “very pro-American”.

He put this in the context of “a great improvement in EU-US relations”, shown by the US’s greater appetite for a multilateral approach, notably over Iran.

However, he underlined the EU’s demand for the US to close its detention centre on Guantanamo Bay. “We believe that the moral ground that we have in fighting terrorism should not be changed by any kind of vacuum or break in the respect of human rights,” he said. “We should not lose our soul in our fight against that.”

U.S., EU Are Set To Pressure Russia (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0036642

By John D. McKinnon And Henry J. Pulizzi
The Wall Street Journal, June 21, 2006

VIENNA -- A U.S.-European Union draft declaration raises concerns about Russia's energy policy and erosion of political freedoms, just weeks before that country hosts its first meeting of the Group of Eight powers.

The draft declaration sets the stage for a tussle over energy policy at the coming G-8 summit, where Russia has made energy security the primary agenda item. The Bush administration believes Russia has been seeking to use its vast energy resources as a political weapon, particularly in Central and Eastern Europe.

President Bush arrived here late yesterday for a one-day summit with EU leaders. He travels to Budapest tomorrow to deliver a speech commemorating the 50th anniversary of the Hungarian uprising against the Soviet Union and is likely to raise concerns about the deterioration of democracy in Russia.

The draft states that "we are concerned about some recent developments in Russia and the region," adding that the U.S. and EU "will work with Russia to promote energy security, the application of the rule of law, and independent judiciary and full respect for human rights, including free and independent media and a vibrant civil society." It seeks to soften that criticism by noting that "we attach great importance to our relationship with Russia and are pursuing deeper cooperation on a range of issues of common interest."

On energy, the draft broadly emphasizes the need for diversification of energy sources, supplies and transit routes, implicitly underscoring concerns that Russia has too much control over Europe's gas and oil supplies. While encouraging better dialogue between consumer and producer countries, it also calls for "promoting diversification of energy sources and supply routes world-wide, and notably in the Caspian Sea region," as well as the Middle East, Africa and Latin America.

It also appears to criticize a lack of transparency and open access in Russia, saying the EU and U.S. should "promote market-based energy security policies that ensure competition, transparency, respect for contracts and non-discriminatory trade, transit and access." The U.S. and Russia have been locked in a debate over the G-8 declaration on several of those issues. Russia wants more access to Western retail markets for its state-dominated energy companies, while the U.S. is worried that Russia isn't allowing Western private-sector oil companies to compete for development of its best oil fields.

The declaration also shows the U.S. edging closer to European views on pollution and global warming. It calls for creation of an "EU-U.S. High-Level Dialogue" on climate change and alternative fuels.

U.S., EU Unite To Fight China Over Regulations (WSJ)

By William Echikson
The Wall Street Journal, June 21, 2006

BRUSSELS -- When President Bush meets with European Union leaders in Vienna today, the two sides will try to sidestep their many disputes over how to regulate global business. One thing they can agree on, though: the need to dissuade China from becoming a third global regulatory power.

Businessmen and officials on both sides of the Atlantic said China's desire to set its own regulatory requirements for goods sold there is becoming a big concern, because car makers and other exporters would have to tailor products to meet another set of expensive requirements in order to compete in China's huge market.

"We need to make sure China stays on board and doesn't create separate standards," said Reinhard Schulte-Braucks, director of the European Commission's car-regulation unit. "The Americans share the same fear, and we must work together."

So while the U.S. and EU have been slow to harmonize their regulatory regimes, the prospect of China adding another layer of costly rules is fostering greater interest in trans-Atlantic cooperation. Mr. Bush and leaders from the EU's main institutions are expected in Vienna to approve a deal to form joint task forces to crack down on counterfeiting and other intellectual-property abuses around the globe. Gregor Kreuzhuber, industry spokesman for the EU, said the agreement was directed in large part at Beijing.

The deal is one of the few concrete results expected to emerge from an annual summit designed mainly to show that the world's two biggest economies are working together on areas ranging from efforts to rein in Iran's nuclear program to improving the security of global energy supplies.

Beijing is demanding a Chinese inscription be put on tires in addition to the present international symbol, which is set along with other global standards by a United Nations agency based in Geneva. For tire makers such as Germany's Continental AG or Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co. of the U.S., that would require remaking expensive tire molds.

"We are terribly worried about this Chinese demand and fighting it alongside the Americans, Japanese and everybody else trying to get into the Chinese market," said Fazilet Cinralp, secretary-general of the European Tyre & Rubber Manufacturers' Association. She estimated the annual cost to each major tire company at millions of euros.

DOJ_NMG_0036643

Equally worrying is the "distinct possibility" that China will impose its own crash tests to protect its car makers, Mr. Schulte-Braucks said. China currently has stricter sanitary guidelines on food imports and higher capital requirements on banks, among other things.

Still, domestic political hurdles to harmonizing U.S. and European regulations are often large, and for now regulatory tensions appear to be increasing.

Günter Verheugen, the European Commission's industry chief, recalled that at the previous U.S.-EU summit a year ago, he lobbied Mr. Bush to create a "common regulatory space" across the Atlantic Ocean. As an example, Mr. Verheugen suggested safety and environmental standards for cars. "Do it," Mr. Bush told his aides, Mr. Verheugen recalled.

A year later, U.S. and EU car regulations are as far apart as ever. Car manufacturers still have to run different crash tests and make different models for the two markets to meet requirements for safety, emissions and car lights. The variations add at least 20% to the cost of making a car, according to a spokesman for Volkswagen AG.

Mr. Verheugen also is proceeding with a strict European chemical-testing initiative, much to U.S. annoyance. The legislation would mandate sweeping testing and classification of as many as 30,000 chemical substances. American businesses say most of these are harmless, and the measure could cost the U.S. chemicals industry some $17 billion in exports. "Setting the same standards sounds easy to solve, but not if you get down to the nitty gritty," said Mr. Verheugen's spokesman, Mr. Kreuzhuber.

Pyongyang Asserts 'Right' To Test-fire Missiles (WT)

By Bill Gertz And Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, June 21, 2006

North Korea declared today that it has a right to carry out long-range missile tests, a day after U.S. officials said the Pentagon has activated a new missile defense system and as several countries called for Pyongyang to refrain from launching a missile.

"It is not right for others to tell us what to do about our sovereign rights," Han Song-ryol, the deputy chief of North Korea's mission to the United Nations, told a South Korean news agency, although he also said his country was open to talks with the U.S. on the issue.

"The United States says it is concerned about our missile test launch. Our position is, 'OK then, let us talk about it,' " Mr. Han told Yonhap.

White House officials would not say what the consequences would be if North Korea tested a missile, and officials at the Pentagon and State Department refused to comment on whether the U.S. ground-based interceptor system was up and running, as The Washington Times reported yesterday.

"There are many options, and we are simply not going to tip our hand as to what the possible response should be," White House spokesman Tony Snow told reporters traveling on Air Force One with the president, who landed in Austria yesterday for a meeting with leaders of the European Union today.

National Security Adviser Stephen J. Hadley said the North Koreans "seem to be moving forward towards a launch, but the intelligence is not conclusive at this point."

He said, however, that the rogue nation's moves have unified key U.S. partners in the region, including Japan, which has indicated it might sponsor a United Nations Security Council resolution on the matter.

"A lot of folks are sending messages to the North Koreans this would be a bad idea," Mr. Hadley said.

Poor weather conditions prevailed yesterday over northeastern North Korea, where U.S. intelligence agencies have been monitoring a long-range Taepodong missile being fueled at a base along the east coast, U.S. officials said.

The missile is thought to be a Taepodong-2 capable of hitting part of U.S. territory. The North also claims to have built nuclear weapons.

Bush administration officials said Monday that the new ground-based interceptor missile defense system is operational and that one option being considered if a missile is launched is to shoot it down with one of 11 interceptors deployed at Fort Greeley, Alaska, or Vandenberg Air Force Base in Southern California.

Amid heightened tensions over the North Korean plans, the U.S. military is conducting its largest war games in decades. Three U.S. aircraft carrier battle groups are exercising near the Pacific island of Guam as part of the maneuvers.

The Pentagon's Missile Defense Agency also has planned a sea-based missile defense test from an Aegis cruiser near Hawaii for today.

The North's declaration prompted Japan and South Korea to pledge cooperation to thwart the test plans.

In China, Foreign Ministry spokeswoman Jiang Yu urged "all parties" to act in ways helpful to peace and stability on the Korean Peninsula, but did not publicly call on North Korea to call off its launch.

DOJ_NMG_0036644

"China has taken note of reporting on the possible launch of a missile" by North Korea, she said. "We do not have a complete understanding of the situation. Under the current situation, we hope all sides concerned can put in more effort to do things which are good for calming the situation and good for regional peace and stability."

Yesterday, Japan's Kyodo news quoted North Korean Foreign Ministry official Ri Pyong-dok as saying that North Korea is not bound by the joint declaration at international nuclear disarmament talks last year or a missile-test moratorium agreed to by Tokyo and Pyongyang in 2002. The North had ceased firings since 1999, and leader Kim Jong-il reaffirmed the moratorium in 2004.

But Mr. Han said the moratorium had been respected in times of dialogue with Washington and Japan.

"When we were engaged in hectic dialogue with Washington and Tokyo for rapprochement, we said we would suspend missile test launches for the time when the dialogue was under way in order to help improve the atmosphere," he told Yonhap.

Any launch would be a provocative step and contrary to North Korea's self-imposed ban on missile testing, said U.S. State Department spokesman Adam Ereli. He would not speculate on any consequences of either a launch or a U.S. intercept.

"Our preferred course of action is that there not be a missile launch or a missile test," he said. "And we've made that clear. And we've also made clear that any such action would result in North Korea's further isolation in the international community."

On Capitol Hill, Rep. Duncan Hunter, California Republican and chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, said the North Korean plans highlight the need for U.S. missile defenses.

"Communist North Korea's current actions directly underscore the need for the United States to deploy an effective missile defense system capable of defeating these threats," Mr. Hunter said. "We can't wait around idly while our enemies build and test long-range missiles capable of attacking American cities."

North Korea Disavows Its Moratorium On Testing Of Long-Range Missiles (NYT)

By Helene Cooper And Michael R. Gordon

The New York Times, June 21, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 20 — North Korea said Tuesday that it was not bound by its own moratorium on long-range missile tests, as tension over the country's missile intentions continued to mount.

In Washington, a senior State Department official challenged the interpretation, saying the United States expected the North Korean government to abide by its commitments.

An official of that government's Foreign Ministry told Japanese reporters that a missile test would not be "bound by any statement such as the Pyongyang declaration," the Japanese news agency Kyodo reported. The agency quoted the official, Ri Pyong Dok, as saying: "This issue concerns our autonomy. Nobody has a right to slander that right."

The declaration was signed in 2002 by the North Korean leader, Kim Jong Il, and the Japanese prime minister, Junichiro Koizumi. In it, North Korea pledged to extend a moratorium on its test launchings of longrange ballistic missiles.

But that agreement is something less than a binding treaty.

The North agreed to the moratorium in 1999. Charles Kartman, the United States special envoy who negotiated it with the North Koreans, said the understanding had been worked out on the assumption that the two countries would conduct further talks on an American proposal to ban the testing, production and export of long-range North Korean missiles. But such negotiations have not been held since 2000.

"The moratorium was to be in effect only so long as the two sides were engaged in missile talks," Mr. Kartman said in an interview. "The Bush administration's disinterest in continuing the missile negotiations would have, of course, canceled out the 1999 moratorium."

The North Koreans later agreed to extend the moratorium on missile tests as part of the separate 2002 understanding with the Japanese. In a joint declaration with Japan, North Korea "expressed its will to extend its moratorium on missile tests beyond 2003 in the spirit of the declaration," according to an English-language translation of the declaration.

The Bush administration has taken the position that both moratoriums are still in effect. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Monday that the United States would regard a missile launching as an "abrogation of obligations that North Korea undertook in the moratorium that they signed on to in 1999, that they reiterated in 2002."

A senior State Department official said: "A basic tenet of international relations is that when you say you're going to do something, you do it. You abide by your commitments, and if you don't, well, you are judged accordingly."

He insisted that his name not be used because he was not authorized to speak publicly on the issue.

The issue of the moratorium emerged along with reports that the United States has raised the alert status of its ground-based missile defense system. The Pentagon has deployed 11 missile interceptors in a test status in Alaska and California and has not conducted a successful interception test in four years.

DOJ_NMG_0036645

Nonetheless, the Pentagon has asserted that the missiles could be activated if international events warranted and noted that several tests in which a target is to be intercepted are scheduled for this year and early next year.

Pentagon officials refused to discuss the current status of the system. "We have a limited missile-defense system," said Eric Ruff, the Pentagon spokesman. "We don't discuss the alert status or the specific capabilities." The Washington Times reported Tuesday that the system had been activated.

Missile defense proponents said North Korea's missile preparations would strengthen the case for building more robust missile defenses. "I think the activity by North Korea clearly makes the case that a missile defense is necessary for American security," said Representative Duncan Hunter, the California Republican who is chairman of the House Armed Service Committee.

Critics asserted that the missile defense was an illusory shield against a threat that had yet to materialize.

"The system being declared operational is no more than a scarecrow, incapable of fooling anyone except perhaps some members of the administration who want to pretend to be defending the country against a North Korean missile attack," said Robert G. Gard, a retired Army lieutenant general and a senior fellow at the Center for Arms Control and Nonproliferation.

Diplomatic efforts to stop North Korea from launching what American officials believe is a two-stage Taepodong 2 missile continued on Tuesday. Secretary General Kofi Annan of the United Nations called for a halt to test preparations. "I hope that the leaders of North Korea will listen to and hear what the world is saying," he said. "We are all worried."

[A top North Korean official has offered talks with the United States on the plans for a missile test, indicating that a launching could be put off, Agence France-Presse reported in Seoul, South Korea, on Wednesday. "The United States says it is concerned about our missile test launch," Han Song Ryol, the deputy chief of North Korea's mission to the United Nations, told the Yonhap news agency, according to A.F.P. "Our position is, O.K., then, let's talk about it."]

There has been some concern in the United States that North Korea might seek to justify the missile firing as part of a civilian space program. But American officials say that even such a launching would violate the 2002 moratorium, since the technology used to put satellites into orbit is easily transferable to intercontinental missiles. The North Koreans described their last significant test in 1998 as an effort to launch a satellite.

U.S. Readies System For Missile Detection (WP)

By Thomas E. Ricks And Joohee Cho

The Washington Post, June 21, 2006

The U.S. military yesterday moved ships into position off the coast of North Korea to detect the launch of any long-range ballistic missiles and prepared its new, unproven missile-interception system to attempt a response if necessary.

It was apparently the first time that the U.S. government has readied its rudimentary missile-defense system other than to test it. But officials played down the possibility that the interceptors might be used against a North Korean missile, and the South Korean government expressed doubt that Pyongyang is even preparing a test launch of its first intercontinental missile. It suggested that the government of Kim Jong Il might only be preparing to send a satellite into space.

Han Song Ryol, North Korea's deputy chief of mission at the United Nations, said that Pyongyang has a right to develop and test missiles, but that it would like to ease tensions over the situation through talks, the Yonhap news agency quoted him as saying. "We know that the U.S. is concerned about our missile test launch," the news services quoted Han as having said in a telephone conversation with Yonhap. "Our position is to solve this situation through discussions."

Two U.S. Navy ships with sensors that could swiftly detect and track a missile's flight were operating off the North Korean coast yesterday, a Pentagon official said. They are the USS Curtis Wilbur and the USS Fitzgerald, both Arleigh Burke-class guided-missile destroyers based at Yokosuka, Japan.

Also, as part of a long-planned exercise, the Navy has three carrier battle groups operating near Guam in the western Pacific for the first time since the Vietnam War, along with dozens of aircraft, including several heavy bombers.

Pentagon officials said that steps had been taken to ready the U.S. interceptors in much the same way that they would proceed for a test of the system -- which is still being built -- because of recent satellite imagery indicating that North Korea might be preparing a test launch.

But they declined to confirm a Washington Times story yesterday that said the system had recently been activated, and that the Bush administration is considering shooting down the North Korean missile.

"The United States has a limited missile-defense system, but I'm not going to discuss status or capabilities," said Bryan Whitman, a Pentagon spokesman.

There are nine interceptor missiles based in Alaska and two in California. They are at the core of a complex system that connects launch data from satellites and radars on land and aboard ships, and transmits the data to command-and-control facilities, where senior commanders make decisions about whether to launch interceptors. The system has not successfully intercepted a missile in its current configuration.

DOJ_NMG_0036646

U.S. government officials, speaking on the condition of anonymity, played down the likelihood of the new anti-missile system being used in this situation because, they said, it is not yet clear whether North Korea will send a missile aloft -- or if it does, whether it would head anywhere near U.S. territory. Nor would the U.S. government want to risk an embarrassing failure of its system, they said, and it is possible that the missile could carry a satellite into space, rather than arc back to earth.

In Seoul, a South Korean official said his government is skeptical of U.S. intelligence indicating that North Korea is preparing to launch a new, larger version of the Taepodong-2 missile capable of hitting the West Coast of the United States. He said his government is not particularly alarmed by the situation and "doesn't understand why there is such fuss in other countries on this."

He also said it is too early to tell if the North Koreans are trying to launch a satellite or test a missile.

A South Korean parliamentary panel concluded that North Korea "does not seem" to have completed injecting fuel into the missile, citing information from South Korea's National Intelligence Service.

"The NIS reported that it is hard to believe the missiles have been fully fueled already," Rep. Chung Hyung Keun, secretary of the National Assembly's Intelligence Committee, told reporters in Seoul. The lawmaker made the remark after emerging from a briefing by the NIS. "The 40 fuel tanks spotted at the site do not contain enough to launch a missile that needs 65 tons of liquid fuel," the lawmaker said.

National security adviser Stephen J. Hadley appeared to confirm the South Korean account when he told reporters on Air Force One as President Bush flew to Vienna yesterday that "it's hard to tell" if North Korea has fueled the missile.

"They seem to be moving forward towards a launch, but the intelligence is not conclusive at this point," Hadley said.

U.S officials have examined intelligence that suggests Pyongyang may be preparing to test a Taepodong-2 missile from a remote village on North Korea's northeast coast. They have said U.S. satellites have observed liquid-fuel canisters placed near the missile, but officials said there was no confirmation that the missile had been fueled.

Meanwhile, the United States and Japan began negotiations on a draft resolution at the United Nations that would condemn Pyongyang if it conducts a test. The resolution would also demand that Pyongyang observe a 1999 moratorium on missile tests and resume international negotiations over its nuclear weapons program.

U.S. and Japanese diplomats have been laying the groundwork for the resolution in private meetings with members of the Security Council. But council diplomats said that China, which is hosting the stalled six-nation talks over North Korea's nuclear weapons program, has called on the resolution's chief sponsors to water it down. The United States last attempted to take up the issue of North Korea's nuclear weapons program in 2003, but dropped the effort in the face of Chinese opposition.

An expert on ballistic missile proliferation, Henry D. Sokolski, said U.S. diplomatic efforts are too limited because North Korea is hardly being punished for its actions.

"We must make sure that others see that this is not a model to follow," said Sokolski, a former Pentagon official. "I am sure the Iranians are watching this very, very closely."

North Korea Launch Concerns Mount (LAT)

By Barbara Demick

The Los Angeles Times, June 21, 2006

Defying international pressure, North Korea today defended its right to test-fire a long-range missile under international law.

In Pyongyang's first public comment on the emerging conflict over the missile launch, a North Korean official visiting Tokyo said that the country did not consider itself bound by a 1999 testing moratorium or other agreements.

"This is a matter of national sovereignty, and no one has the right to criticize it," Lee Byung-du, a director at the North Korean Foreign Ministry, was quoted as telling reporters by Japan's Kyodo News Service.

The North Korean did not elaborate on what was occurring at a remote missile base on his country's East Coast, where intelligence satellites have observed the apparent assembling and fueling of a multistage missile.

If anything, North Korea's intentions have become less clear because of a growing controversy over the intelligence data.

South Korean officials today challenged the U.S. assertion that North Korea had completed the fueling process, making a launch both inevitable and imminent.

The National Intelligence Service told the National Assembly today that only 40 fuel canisters were observed around the launch site at the Musudan-ri missile base, and that the number was far too little to fuel what is said to be a 115-foot long, 65-ton multistage missile.

In addition, the South Korean government is questioning whether the missile in question is for military use.

DOJ_NMG_0036647

One government official who had attended a briefing said the nature of the liquid fuel at the site and the way it is being assembled above ground suggested a civilian purpose, such as for launching a satellite.

"We believe it is premature to judge whether this is a missile or a satellite. We are not jumping to conclusions," said the official who asked not to be named.

In 1998, North Korean launched a similar multistage Taepodong I missile over Japan and into the Pacific Ocean. They claimed the missile carried a satellite that was broadcasting North Korean revolutionary hymns, and was contributing to "scientific research for peaceful use of outer space."

The United States and Japan disputed the North Korean assertion.

North Korea signed a missile-testing moratorium in 1999 and renewed the pledge in 2002 during a summit in Pyongyang between North Korean leader Kim Jong Il and Japanese Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi. The North Koreans say that the moratorium expired in 2003.

North Korea Asserts Right To Test-fire Missile (USAT)

By Bill Nichols

USA Today, June 21, 2006

WASHINGTON — North Korea on Tuesday defended its right to test a long-range missile and rejected international calls to stop launch preparations.

North Korean Foreign Minister Ri Pyong Dok said the right to test-launch a ballistic missile "concerns our autonomy," Japan's Kyodo News agency reported. "Nobody has a right to slander that right," Ri told Japanese media.

Ri, while not confirming or denying that North Korea plans a missile launch, said Pyongyang's actions are not bound by international commitments it has made to a missile moratorium. North Korea has abided by a ban on long-range missile tests since 1999.

Ri's words came amid continuing signs that North Korea is preparing to test-launch a Taepodong-2 missile. The multistage missile has a range of 9,320 miles, according to North Korea, and is capable of reaching the USA.

North Korea may have as many as 13 nuclear weapons, according to the Institute for Science and Security, a Washington think tank. The Taepodong-2 is believed to be capable of carrying a nuclear warhead.

National security adviser Stephen Hadley said it was difficult to judge whether North Korea had actually completed fueling a missile in preparation for a test.

"They seem to be moving forward toward a launch, but the intelligence is not conclusive at this point," he said.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice warned North Korea on Monday that such a launch would be a "provocative act."

Six-party talks aimed at persuading North Korea to give up its nuclear program have been stalled since November. The United States has refused one-on-one negotiations.

In other developments Tuesday:

·Rice spoke by telephone to South Korean Foreign Minister Ban Ki Moon, and United Nations Ambassador John Bolton spoke to members of the U.N. Security Council in New York.

U.S. officials would not specify what action might be taken if North Korea conducts a test. "We are simply not going to tip our hand," White House spokesman Tony Snow said.

·International opposition to a missile launch deepened, as France and the United Nations called for a stop in test preparations.

"We are all worried," U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan said in Paris. French Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin said a test by North Korea would prompt a "firm and just" international response.

·Alexander Vershbow, U.S. ambassador to South Korea, said Washington wants to have normal relations with North Korea. He urged Pyongyang not to test a missile and instead return to international nuclear talks.

"We want to achieve a negotiated solution to the nuclear issue," Vershbow said after meeting with former South Korean president Kim Dae Jung, who canceled plans to meet North Korean leader Kim Jong Il next week.

·The Pentagon staged previously scheduled war games near Guam in the Pacific Ocean with 22,000 troops and three aircraft carriers. Cmdr. Mike Brown said the exercises were not aimed at North Korea or "any one nation."

N Korea 'is Not Bound' By Missile Test Ban (FT)

By David Pilling And Demetri Sevastopulo

Financial Times, June 21, 2006

North Korea on Tuesday declared that it was not bound by a moratorium on testing long-range missiles, and increasing fears that it would launch an intercontinental ballistic missile.

DOJ_NMG_0036648

The North Korean threat follows days of escalating tension prompted by evidence that Pyongyang is preparing to test a long-range Taepodong-2 missile that could reach Japan and parts of the continental US.

Ri Pyong Dok, a North Korean foreign ministry official, told Japanese journalists in Pyongyang that a long-range missile test launch "is not bound by any statement such as the Pyongyang Declaration", Kyodo news reported.

Mr Ri was referring to an agreement signed in 2002 between Kim Jong Il, North Korea's leader, and Junichiro Koizumi, Japan's prime minister, in which Pyongyang promised not to test long-range missiles.

John Bolton, US ambassador to the United Nations, said members of the Security Council had begun "preliminary" discussions on how to respond to any test.

"We are discussing a range of things that fall within the Security Council's domain given that this launch would constitute a threat to international peace and security," Mr Bolton said in Washington.

US officials said on Tuesday that the US had activated its missile defence system but some analysts questioned whether the system would be capable of hitting an incoming missile.

Bryan Whitman, Pentagon spokesman, said: "The US does have a limited missile defence system but I'm not going to get into specific alert status or capabilities."

Dominique de Villepin, the French prime minister, on Tuesday said the international community should respond to a North Korean test with a "firm and just" response.

A US official on Monday said Washington believed North Korea had fuelled the Taepodong-2 missile, a procedure that is difficult and dangerous to reverse, suggesting that a missile test could be imminent.

But Stephen Hadley, the White House national security adviser, on Tuesday said the evidence was "not conclusive". But he added that North Korea seems "to be moving forward towards a launch". Some media reports have suggested that bad weather over the missile launch site could be delaying the test.

Pyongyang caused an international crisis in 1998 when it fired an earlier version of the Taepodong missile over Japan into the Pacific.

The event was a catalyst for Tokyo's decision to develop a missile defence shield in conjunction with Washington.

Both Mr Koizumi and Shinzo Abe, Japan's chief cabinet secretary who has made his career being tough on North Korea, said this week that Japan would respond sternly to any missile test.

Few Moves Left With N. Korea (LAT)

By Barbara Demick

The Los Angeles Times, June 21, 2006

SEOUL — The Bush administration has limited options to prevent North Korea from test-firing a multistage missile that could reach U.S. interests in the Pacific.

In many ways, a missile deployment could constitute grounds for a preemptive attack, such as an airstrike against North Korea. But that is unlikely to be considered a serious option given the U.S. entanglement in Iraq and objections from China.

China and Russia's ties to North Korea also make it unlikely that the United Nations Security Council could inflict meaningful punishment on the regime in Pyongyang. South Korea has signaled it would not go along with efforts to economically isolate its estranged neighbor in retaliation for a launch.

The Bush administration already has measures in place to stanch the flow of illicit money to Pyongyang through offshore banks in Macao and to block North Korean shipping. Yet the North Korean regime continues to thumb its nose at the U.S. campaign against weapons of mass destruction.

Since September, it has boycotted six-party talks aimed at dismantlement of its nuclear program, and the coaxing and threatening from the United States have been to little avail.

"Kim Jong Il is calling the Bush administration's bluff," said Daniel Pinkston, a North Korea specialist with the Center for Nonproliferation Studies in Monterey. "The U.S. is already doing everything it can do in terms of economic pressure."

For weeks, U.S., Japanese and South Korean intelligence satellites have observed trucks delivering missile parts and fuel to the Musudan-ri missile base on North Korea's east coast. The North has made no effort to conceal the activities.

The new missile seems to be a souped-up version of the Taepodong 1, which North Korea tested in 1998. That launch demonstrated that the country, despite its impoverishment, had far more sophisticated technology than anyone thought.

The missile — called the Taepodong 2 — is thought to be capable of reaching U.S. bases in Japan, the U.S. territory of Guam and possibly Alaska or Hawaii.

North Korea's nuclear program has been up and running since 2002, when Pyongyang pulled out of the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty. The CIA now believes the country has enough fissile material for eight to 10 nuclear weapons.

DOJ_NMG_0036649

Although North Korea probably cannot yet mount a nuclear warhead on a missile, most experts believe it is working rapidly to develop such capabilities.

"If there ever was a case in which preemption would be logical, it would be this moment — but this is not where the political priorities are of the Bush administration right now," said a U.S.-based North Korea analyst who asked not to be quoted by name.

He contrasted the position of the U.S. and Japan in this situation with the airstrikes Israel made in 1981 to destroy an Iraqi nuclear plant under construction.

"If Japan were Israel, you know what would happen," the analyst said.

But when asked whether the United States would shoot down a missile, J. Thomas Schieffer, the U.S. ambassador to Japan, said in Tokyo today, "The U.S. has options available to it that it did not have in the past, and these options are on the table." He did not elaborate.

The U.S. hesitancy has a lot to do with horrific memories of the 1950-53 Korean War, in which China and the U.S. fought over the Korean peninsula at a cost of more than a million deaths and a ravaged land.

South Koreans are particularly fearful, and officials have had little to say publicly other than bland admonishments against a missile test, while privately downplaying the threat.

"If there is a missile test, the South Koreans will carry on business as usual," said Kim Tae-woo, a South Korean analyst at the Korea Institute for Defense Analyses. "They will not participate in any international effort to isolate North Korea."

North Korean officials have reportedly told the South that the missile is a civilian experiment designed to put a satellite into orbit. They made the same claim in 1998 after a test of a Taepodong 1 missile over Japan.

Although the U.S. is unlikely to buy the story, the ambiguity might be enough to muddle the debate over retaliatory action.

Given the limited options, the Bush administration is stuck taking the same tack it has in the wrangling over North Korea's nuclear program — asking China to lean on Pyongyang.

President Bush is believed to have called Chinese President Hu Jintao at least once over the last month because of the missile test. Almost all of North Korea's trade comes through China, making it the only country with real economic clout in this case.

Tokyo also has limited economic leverage over North Korea, leaving it with little to threaten other than asking for U.N. Security Council sanctions.

Most of Japan's actions appear aimed at voters at home, where there is simmering anger over the kidnappings of Japanese citizens in the 1970s and 1980s by North Korean security services. The Japanese government Friday passed a law requiring economic sanctions against Pyongyang if no progress is made on resolving questions about the fate of those abductees still believed to be missing.

After the 1998 missile launch, many threats were voiced against North Korea with little result.

President Clinton circumvented objections from Congress a few months afterward to fund a program to supply North Korea with heavy fuel oil. When Kim Jong Il agreed to a missile-testing moratorium the following year and again in 2002, North Korea received aid from Japan.

Andrei Lankov, a North Korea scholar based in Seoul, notes that North Korea's missile-testing moratorium has since expired and that there may be little in international law to prevent Pyongyang from doing a test launch.

He advises that the Bush administration's best bet in a no-win situation might be to "ignore the North Koreans."

"Too much of a fuss will only make things worse," Lankov said.

U.S. Missile Defense (WT)

By Peter Huessy

The Washington Times, June 21, 2006

The twin nuclear and missile threats from Iran and North Korea have transformed the missile defense debate. It is no longer "should we deploy," but "how should we deploy?" Policy-makers face a tough decision: How much to invest in some protection now, vs. future, complimentary technologies that offer enhanced protection?

In missile defense, as in finance, the best way to cover risks is not to "put all your eggs in one basket." Instead, assemble a "balanced, diversified portfolio" of short, medium- and long-term technologies that cover the range of risks. In missile defense, current assets are being fielded, such as the Aegis/Standard Missile-3, initially deployed as an air defense weapon, but now upgraded to be a sea-based missile defense. Another is THAAD, the Terminal High-Altitude Air Defense system capable of providing terminal missile defenses for U.S. forces in a regional conflict. And the Alaska and California-based Ground-based Interceptor system (GBI) provides an initial defense for the continental United States against long range rockets.

Each has limits. The sea-based interceptor is limited by its shipboard launch canister. THAAD will always cover a limited area. And GBI is a fixed-site system that covers chiefly Northeast Asia threats.

DOJ_NMG_0036650

Future assets like the Airborne Laser (ABL) and the Kinetic Energy Interceptor (KEI) offer complementary capabilities. ABL, a chemical laser mounted in a 747, requires further technological work to become operational. KEI, a very fast interceptor launched from land or sea, is a solvable engineering challenge. More futuristic capabilities, chiefly in the realm of space-based assets, require engineering successes, and, most of all, a policy commitment to extend interceptors into space.

How "far off" will depend on "when" we decide to move forward. For example, both Polaris and Minuteman intercontinental ballistic missiles were developed in the mid-1950s by the late Air Force Gen. Bernard Schriever in a time frame previously thought undoable. Both technologies have served us well, as the sea- and land-based legs of the U.S. nuclear triad have remained the bed rock upon which U.S. nuclear deterrence rests.

So, today, choosing the right missile defense balance is complicated. Most critics claim only systems that reach perfection should be considered for deployment. For example, many argued that defenses such as the early Patriot and GBI should not be deployed because they have limitations and are not panaceas. (Ironically, these same critics resort repeatedly to reliance on arms control, which does not exactly have a perfect record.)

For example, even as early Patriot action in the 1991 Gulf War resulted in the shootdown of more than 30 percent of all Iraqi Scuds, critics argued the system should not be built. It is true the Patriot deployments were indeed rushed to the Gulf on an emergency basis. In addition, the original technology was not configured for missile intercepts but for airplanes. In part, this was due to congressional prohibitions of missile defense upgrades for the Patriot. Despite these limits, the Patriot was of enormous benefit: It kept the allied coalition together. Today, the currently upgraded Patriot has already protected scores of Americans and coalition forces in the Gulf.

So, too, with missile defenses protecting the American heartland. The GBI systems in California and Alaska, now give some protection from North Korean-launched rockets. But critics charge the system has not been perfected and should be scrapped or delayed. Do they prefer to be naked to possible aggression? Others argue we should have deployed only a system compliant with the ABM treaty (now defunct), which actually prohibited such a defense of the American heartland.

Others argue that the GBI, which intercepts a rocket high above the Earth's surface, is less effective than a boost-phase system -- striking at a rocket in its early stages when it is slow, hot and big. In part this is true, but the systems to get there, such as an upgraded Aegis or KEI or ABL, are not yet in the inventory. There also remains issues of how close to an adversaries's launch area such a system must be.

The Bush administration rightly decided to move quickly to deploy an available shield, even as we seek on an ongoing basis to make it more effective. President Bush concluded leaving the U.S. totally unprotected was simply not an option, although one congressional critic, Rep. Rush Holt, said deploying no defenses at all was the best option.

So, what's the right way to think about missile defenses today? Again the analogy from the world of finance comes in handy. First, you need a long-range "investment strategy" based on a "balanced portfolio" of assets.

Second, you resist the temptation to "unbalance?" your investment strategy by seeing in every test, whether successful or not, a benchmark from which all missile defense decisions should be made. And third, just as in finance, you steer clear of those who tell you, "if there is not a silver bullet, don't buy anything."

As the U.S. now faces imminent threats from North Korean rockets, we should count our lucky stars that we also have an operational missile defense available to protect the American people. To that all I can say is, "Thank you, Mr. President."

Peter Huessy is president of GeoStrategic Analysis.

Missile Defense Test (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, June 21, 2006

As we went to press in the U.S. last night, morning was breaking at the Musudan-ri launch facility in the remote northeast of North Korea. It's possible we'll wake up to the news that Pyongyang has tested the long-range ballistic missile that is fully fueled and which U.S. satellites have monitored for more than a month.

If so, we hope we'll also learn that the U.S. responded, as defense officials said late yesterday it might, by testing its newly operational missile defense system and blowing the Korean provocation out of the sky. What better way to discourage would-be nuclear proliferators than to demonstrate that the U.S. is able to destroy their missiles before they hit our allies, or the U.S. homeland. Even a miss would be a useful learning experience all around.

Consider what's at stake. We've known for years that North Korea has several nuclear weapons at the very least and is developing the missile technology to threaten America. Pyongyang's test missile is believed to be a Taepodong-2. A two-stage version could reach Alaska, Hawaii or the West Coast, according to a study in March by the Center for Nonproliferation at the Monterey Institute of International Studies, while a three-stage model could reach all of the continental U.S.

DOJ_NMG_0036651

North Korea may not yet have the ability to miniaturize a nuclear warhead -- but then again it may. In any event, it's small comfort that the Taepodong-2 is probably inaccurate. If it misses Seattle, that's not necessarily good news for Tacoma or Portland.

The last time North Korea launched a missile that caught the world's attention was in August 1998, when it shot a Taepodong-1 over Japan and into the Pacific. Pyongyang has since tested shorter-range missiles many times, including as recently as March. Its inventory of ballistic missiles totals about 800, including 100-200 Nodongs and Taepodong-1s capable of reaching Japan. North Korea is also developing a land-based mobile missile known as the Taepodong-X, with a range of 4,000 kilometers that could land anywhere in Japan.

Missile exports have also long been a major source of foreign exchange for Pyongyang, with customers in Pakistan (whose "Ghauri" missile is a renamed Nodong) and throughout the Middle East. Its longtime best customer is Iran, which last year was reported to have purchased technology that allowed it to extend the range of its Shahab-3 missile to 3,500 kilometers from 1,500. In the blunt words of the German daily Bild last December, "this means that the 'madmen of Iran' could reach targets in the whole of Germany."

All of which demonstrates once again the need for the missile defenses that the Bush Administration has steadily been developing. The objective of the integrated system -- which U.S. officials stress is "limited" and still under development -- is to provide a "layered" defense, with multiple opportunities to take shots at an incoming missile. The highly complex system depends on swift coordination among elements based on land, at sea, and in the air or space.

On the ground, a key element are the interceptor missiles newly deployed at Fort Greeley, Alaska, and Vandenberg Air Force Base in California. There are also interceptors aboard the Navy's Aegis cruisers, two of which are currently patrolling near North Korea. Sensors are located aboard ships, in space, and at several sophisticated radar stations world-wide.

North Korea clearly intends any launch as an act of intimidation, part of its long-held belief that nuclear threats give it political leverage. Knocking the missile out of the sky, or even trying to, would tell the North that it can't succeed with such tactics. It would also reassure Japan and other U.S. allies that we have the will to protect them from rogue madmen. The demonstration effect would be useful around the world, not least in Iran.

As North Korea weighs a launch, it's a useful moment to recall how we got to this pass: Amid the arms-control era of the Cold War, the U.S. chose to defend itself against attack by plane or ship or ground but not by missile. One reason North Korea -- and Iran -- decided to invest scarce resources into developing nuclear weapons and ballistic-missiles is simply this: The U.S. was vulnerable.

The emerging missile defense system is making that less true, and a North Korean test launch is an ideal time to demonstrate that we are willing and able to defend ourselves.

Right Where He Wants Us (WSJ)

By Chuck Downs

The Wall Street Journal, June 21, 2006

It is no accident that North Korea has allowed U.S. intelligence to take note of its apparent preparations for firing a newer, longer range missile that might be capable of carrying nuclear warheads to U.S. soil. What we have been allowed to observe -- and our alarmed reactions to what we think we have seen -- are part of a strategy North Korea will play out carefully in the months ahead. Even if the Taepodong rocket is never launched, the next few months will see American interests subjected to significant strains.

Pyongyang has created an opportunity to break out of the negotiating deadlock that has stymied the regime for years, dissolve the international consensus on how to deal with the regime's illicit smuggling and counterfeiting activities, and change politics in South Korea and the U.S. And perhaps most importantly, if Kim Jong Il plays his cards right, he will prove to his inner circle that he is the genius he claims to be, renewing his hold on power at a time when he was facing his most severe challenges. * * *

Kim Jong Il is not in charge of what strategists call a "status-quo state"; he does not take comfort in the way things are. Rather he wants an Asia where the U.S. does not guarantee regional security; where Japan is brought to retribution for its historic transgressions; and where North and South Korea are united under a genuinely Korean leader. And he feels that his personal entitlement to rule the peninsula has been denied by American forces. Unfortunately from his perspective, his efforts to do so have been thwarted by an American administration he loathes. The Bush administration has refused to negotiate with him directly, convincing even his Chinese ally to chair a series of feckless meetings that allow five neighbors to complain about North Korea's violations of its international nuclear commitments.

The North Koreans have begrudgingly attended these sessions when the Chinese paid them enough to make it worthwhile, or when the U.S. seemed genuinely inclined to take military action to halt violations of international controls. But these sessions have been used by the Americans to expand international understanding of the regime's criminal activities and human-rights abuses. Efforts to win financial aid from Japan have backfired in political turmoil over North Korea's abductions of Japanese citizens. Last September, the U.S. took action against banks in Macau that had facilitated Pyongyang's overseas activities, and now the international banking community is hesitant to engage with North Koreans.

DOJ_NMG_0036652

The regime feels the pinch. Meanwhile, Pyongyang's inner circles are learning more about the outside world from cell phones and contraband radios; they are beginning to know what they do not have. These difficulties could not come at a worse time, because Kim Jong Il has decided his Western-educated first-born is not fit to replace him, and he keeps everyone guessing whether he's serious that a second son -- seemingly the only soft-hearted member of the clan -- should be his successor. It's enough to make a hungry bureaucrat in Pyongyang quietly doubt whether Kim Jong Il really has the necessary competence.

But Kim Jong Il, in his own mind and propaganda, has both myth and magic. Although he was born in a military camp in Russia, North Korean schoolchildren visit the humble cabin on the side of a mountain considered sacred to all Koreans, where the "Man from Mt. Paektu" destined to unite Korea was officially born. Kim Jong Il is what psychiatrists call a "malignant narcissist," and this means he occasionally has to break out dramatically from the bounds that constrain his egotism, especially when it seems he is on the verge of failure. We are seeing some of this psychology at work now.

The test-firing of a Taepodong over Japanese airspace in 1998 suggests what lies ahead. At the time, the incident revealed how fast North Korea had developed delivery systems for weapons of mass destruction, with three stages to their rocket and a booster capability. This new intercontinental capability put Pyongyang in the global fight-ring as a major contender. The missile could have landed in Japan, causing untold consequences, or killed fishermen when it splashed down in the Pacific, where North Korea did not even issue the routine mariners' warning.

Instead, Japan began to doubt the U.S. security umbrella and invested in independent military and intelligence capabilities. It also decided to risk irritating China by joining in American missile-defense programs. South Korea became fearful of American "overreaction" to North Korean adventures and adopted a more generous and conciliatory approach to Pyongyang. And China began to view North Korea as a more significant regional player that needed to be dealt with, primarily through financial diplomacy. North Korea's interests were advanced, and Kim Jong Il began a series of pogroms and executions to consolidate his control.

In the current phase of the new crisis North Korea has generated, the world has naturally condemned as "provocative" North Korean preparations for a missile launch. And that is just what North Korea wants. Indeed, North Korea's actions are provocative, because they are meant to be. Resolving the tensions he has created can now proceed on terms set by Kim Jong Il himself.

Analysts have, for example, suggested that the possible missile launch calls into question an upcoming trip by former South Korean President Kim Dae Jung to celebrate the anniversary of the historic June 2000 Pyongyang summit. Perhaps. But more likely it affords an opportunity for a dramatic act of legerdemain. What if South Korea's architect of the "sunshine" policy is able to persuade Kim Jong Il to give up, or at least postpone, his provocative launch? What if advocates of a softer line get the reclusive leader to consider a late summer visit to South Korea? Kim Jong Il can always change his mind; but in the meantime that could reverse the political tide in South Korea, where recently soft-liners were overwhelmingly turned out of office by voters in a conservative backlash against the expensive failures of the sunshine policy. It might be just what the government of Roh Moo Hyun, South Korea's embattled president, needs to raise his party's miserable rankings among the electorate.

And if a new spirit of cooperation and problem-solving between Pyongyang and Seoul emerges in the months ahead, North Korea can find opportunities to threaten the U.S. and, at the same time, set Seoul and Washington against each other.

South Korea is naturally more concerned about North Korea's immediate threat to its economy and security than it is to less tangible matters such as international controls on nuclear materials, proliferation and long-range delivery systems. Seoul has lived under the threat of attack for 60 years; a new Taepodong capable of littering Alaska is not necessarily cause for a heightened level of tension on the peninsula. In spite of South Korea's professed support for international standards on errant countries like Iran, Kim Jong Il understands that few South Koreans want to risk hostility over the very same issues closer to home. When Seoul responds to every provocation by calling for a diplomatic resolution, Pyongyang understands the coercive benefits of its threatening weapons. Their threat ensures that our South Korean ally resists most strongly any U.S. action against the regime's adventures.

Moreover, the political consequences of North Korea's break-out extend beyond South Korea. There are upcoming Japanese -- and American -- elections in which Kim Jong Il has also made himself an influence. Already there are candidates in both countries who are saying that North Korea has a sovereign right to test missiles, echoing Pyongyang's position, but urging that rewards be given to the regime for good behavior if it decides not to proceed.

That's a good day's work for a narcissistic dictator on the brink of collapse.

DOJ_NMG_0036653

Mr. Downs, a former Pentagon official and congressional adviser, is the author of "Over the Line: North Korea's Negotiating Strategy" (AEI Press, 1999).

Tested By North Korea (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, June 21, 2006

KIM JONG IL, NORTH KOREA'S dangerously eccentric leader, may succeed where President Bush has not. By stubbornly insisting on its right to test a long-range ballistic missile, North Korea is reinforcing the importance of a unified approach to the crisis on the Korean peninsula.

Images from U.S. intelligence satellites show the North may be preparing to launch a missile with a range of about 9,000 miles, which would be capable of reaching Los Angeles. There is some debate about how ready the missile is, but there is reason to worry. Pyongyang pulled a similar stunt in 1998, sending a missile over Japan and into the Pacific, and a North Korean foreign ministry official said Tuesday that Pyongyang was not bound by a moratorium on testing it signed afterward. There are reports that the U.S. may have activated its missile-defense system.

North Korea's erratic leader, coupled with its nuclear ambitions, have long caused international concern. For the last several years the U.S., China, Japan, Russia and South Korea have participated in intermittent talks with Pyongyang. The basic outlines of a deal are clear: In exchange for food and energy aid, as well as guarantees of its security, the North will give up its nuclear weapons program.

But the rest is a muddle, and not just because Kim and Bush don't get along. North Korea is an unreliable negotiator (in the space of 24 hours last September, North Korea essentially agreed to end its weapons program, then took it back). The Bush administration, meanwhile, has been at times intransigent and bellicose (Bush famously said he "loathes" Kim), and its efforts to convince its allies of North Korea's wickedness have mostly fallen on deaf ears.

So China, given its long border and economic ties to North Korea, has been the primary driver of the discussion, but its view of the North's aims is not as apocalyptic as the Bush administration's. Japan and Russia have typically been reliable supporters of the U.S. position. And South Korea, which views the North as a kind of wayward cousin, has generally been more willing to engage Pyongyang, often to the chagrin of the United States.

One result of these divergent motivations is that talks have been dormant for months. Tuesday's events will not revive them, but they should serve as a bracing reminder of their importance. The five nations have been nearly unanimous in their condemnation of North Korea's plans, while nations such as Australia and France — and U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan — also have expressed concern.

Diplomatic condemnations are easy, of course, and North Korea's plans are worthy of them. But if there is anything good to come of Kim's latest adventure, it will be a renewed sense of urgency among the U.S. and its allies to focus on the peninsula.

Bolton May Turn Into A Pumpkin (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, June 21, 2006

Rumblings are that the White House is looking for ways to keep controversial U.N. Ambassador John R. Bolton in his post well beyond the expiration of his recess appointment at the end of this year.

One possibility is to bring his nomination up for vote in the Senate Foreign Relations Committee next month. Bolton supporters on the Hill first want to pass the defense appropriations bill before they leave for the August recess and say they did everything needed for the troops -- body armor, equipment and such -- before they turned to the nomination. Senate Republicans don't want wait until the fall and risk a potential loss right before the midterm elections.

The White House is said to have sounded out Hill folks, including Sen. George V. Voinovich (Ohio), a key Republican who opposed Bolton last year when the Foreign Relations Committee sent the nomination to the floor without a recommendation.

And how does Voinovich feel now? "The jury remains out, but the senator will continue to monitor the progress made toward critical reform at the U.N.," a spokesman said.

On the other hand, sources on both sides of the aisle say even if Voinovich supports Bolton, it appears most unlikely the nominee would get the 60 votes needed to overcome a Democratic filibuster.

Bolton's recent dust-up with U.N. Deputy Secretary General Mark Malloch Brown , who had criticized the United States for lack of support for the organization, may not have helped the equation. The fight rallied the Senate's conservative base, one source said, but it may have alienated moderates because Malloch Brown is a Brit and a de facto member of the coalition of the willing. Now, if he had been French . . .

DOJ_NMG_0036654

The White House can re-recess-appoint Bolton. But federal law would bar him from being paid. He could work for free, though. And some Bolton supporters are taking a hard look to see if there's wiggle room in the federal law, we hear, along with other alternatives. Seems difficult, some observers say, but don't sell the pro-Bolton forces short.

Hey! What if he got a book contract and an advance to write his memoirs, the way some well-known senators do?

Fox and the News Hounds

Seems a lot of news outlets have taken great pride at being the first to interview White House Chief of Staff Joshua B. Bolten , who finally did a round of sit-downs with reporters last week.

Here's how some noted this fine scoop:

"Mr. Bolten, in his first interview since taking the job, professed . . ."

-- New York Times, June 19

"In his first interview since becoming White House chief of staff in March, Josh Bolten said . . ."

-- Wall Street Journal, June 17

"We'll talk with the man the president has asked to help save his second term, new White House Chief of Staff Josh Bolten, in his first interview . . ."

-- Fox News Sunday, April 30

Let's see . . . April, May, then June.

Never Having to Say Sorry

Here's what White House press secretary Tony Snow actually meant to say when he was asked Monday about the anticipated resignation of Deputy Secretary of State Robert B. Zoellick .

"The president told me he was sorry to lose such a talented and dedicated adviser. Bob was, as you all know, a top official in the Bush 41 administration, at Treasury, State and finally as White House deputy chief of staff.

"Bob was an integral part of the 35-day Florida recount battle, which is what ensured President Bush 's victory. He agreed to serve in the first-term Cabinet as our U.S. trade representative and then continued to serve in a non-Cabinet post as deputy secretary of state, where he was the point man in developing our policies in Darfur and China.

"The president told me: 'I will greatly miss his insights and ability to wax eloquently on any subject. Laura and I wish him all the best in his new job in New York.' "

But this is what Snow actually said when a reporter asked if he had any comment on Zoellick's departure.

"No," said Snow. "He's been wanting to pursue options in the private sector for some time, and now he's going to do it."

Much later, near the end of the gaggle, a reporter tried again.

"On Zoellick, is the president sorry to see him go?"

"I'm sure he is," Snow said. "Look, Bob Zoellick is a guy who served -- he's highly competent, served a number of presidents, but you also know that at a certain juncture in the administration some people have worked very hard for a long time and are going to go back and pursue other opportunities."

Yikes! Talk about not letting the door hit you on the way out.

Bush Gives Frist the Nod -- for Reelection

Bush, speaking to Republicans at the gala President's Dinner on Monday night, encouraged the crowd to support GOP candidates this fall. "If you want your taxes low, keep Denny Hastert and Bill Frist as leaders of the House and the Senate."

Bush later said: "I want to thank you for helping make sure that Denny Hastert and Bill Frist remain in their positions in the Senate and the House. . . ."

Of course, Frist is leaving the Senate in six months.

Iran's Gray Area On Nuclear Arms (WP)

By Karl Vick

The Washington Post, June 21, 2006

TEHRAN -- Iranian officials often assert the peaceful intent of their nuclear program by insisting that the religious law that governs their country expressly prohibits weapons of mass destruction.

A Turkish diplomat, describing a visit in May by the chief Iranian nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, said that Larijani made the religious roots of the proscription clear. "I was in the meeting," said the diplomat, who spoke on condition of anonymity. "He said there is even a fatwa , a religious ruling, since the time of Khomeini, that Iran will not produce any nuclear weapons."

DOJ_NMG_0036655

Yet interviews with a range of clerics and other students of Islamic teachings indicate that while Grand Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini indeed barred Iranian forces from unconventional weapons during the 1980-88 war with Iraq, the religious underpinning for such a ban is regarded as less than absolute, with ample justification available in scriptures for almost any course except first use.

"This question is ambiguous," said Grand Ayatollah Jalalodine Taheri, who was a leading figure in the Iranian government before becoming a sharp critic. Taheri, 80, said during an interview at his bedside in the central Iranian city of Isfahan that "taking weapons of mass destruction as a whole, I'm against it." But he added that religious texts might offer avenues that would allow stockpiling such weapons in the name of deterrence or self-defense.

"It's not clear," Taheri said.

Those arguing for the loopholes include clerics closely identified with the country's most hard-line conservatives, the most ardent defenders of Iran's theocratic system.

"Producing and using WMD is forbidden, just as producing deadly poison or harmful drugs," said Mohsen Gharavian, who teaches Islamic philosophy in the holy city of Qom, south of Tehran. "I think there is no ambiguity here. . . . I have not seen any other type of interpretation" among religious scholars.

"But," he continued, "I have got to add something to this: If any other nation has produced this WMD and has used it against a second nation, the second nation in the name of defending itself has the right to have it and to use WMD."

Gharavian serves as spokesman for Ayatollah Mohammad Taqi Mesbah-Yazdi, an archconservative who strongly supports President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and is suspected of providing religious justification for killings allegedly carried out by Iranian intelligence agents in the late 1990s. Gharavian spoke in an hour-long interview at the Imam Khomeini Institute, which has produced tens of thousands of clerics under Mesbah-Yazdi's tutelage. A number are expected to seek election this fall to the Assembly of Experts, the one body in Iran's theocratic system with the power to remove the supreme leader, the cleric who has ultimate authority.

"About nuclear weapons, there is this principle of all or none," Gharavian said. "If a nation arms itself with such weapons, it is quite logical for other nations to think of defending themselves against these kinds of weapons.

"I believe this is the logic of Islamic morals," Gharavian said, professing himself "100 percent sure" that Khomeini and Iran's current supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, "based on Islamic principles, have the same logic: Islam does not allow anyone to initiate harming a human being."

The same bedrock view and the same caveat about self-defense were offered by an influential cleric aligned with Iran's reformers, members of the relatively liberal movement recently sidelined by hard-line conservatives.

"In the time of the prophet, we didn't have nuclear bombs, so there's not a verse about it in the Koran," said Mohsen Kadivar, who like Gharavian is a middle-ranking cleric. "But we have some verses which say we can't kill anyone who hasn't committed a crime. It's very, very clear."

The faith does accept the concept of retaliation, however, so long as it stops short of injuring innocents. Kadivar said that proviso appears to proscribe actual use of weapons of mass destruction, as would scriptures warning against damaging the environment.

But none of that necessarily bars a government from stockpiling such weapons, the clerics say.

"From all I can see, it's not forbidden, but it's hard to say it's allowed. In jurisprudence these terms are different," Kadivar said. "If your enemies have these bombs, it's not forbidden to have them.

"Don't forget that Israel has these bombs," he added, raising a finger. "It's outside the Non-Proliferation Treaty."

Iranian scholars who argue against nuclear weapons point out that these questions are hardly abstract in Iran. The newly minted government faced severe, real-life tests after Saddam Hussein's troops invaded Iran in 1980. The Iraqi forces used chemical weapons on the battlefield; two decades later, badly wounded survivors still populate hospital wards in Iran.

When Iraq also launched rocket attacks on Tehran and other metropolitan areas, pressure for Tehran to retaliate was intense.

"In the eight-year war with Iraq, this was a very hot debate among all the Islamic teachers, because Iranian cities were being bombarded," said Kazem Mosavi Bojnoordi, who sat on the defense committee of Iran's parliament during part of the war. "The conclusion was that it's not allowed. Never during those eight years do we have one example of Iran bombarding cities."

Bojnoordi, now chief editor of Iran's Center for the Great Islamic Encyclopedia, recalled that after the first salvos from Iraq, a senior Iranian commander declared, "Now we will flatten Baghdad." The comment brought an immediate rebuke from Khomeini, whose fatwa closed the matter for the balance of the war.

"According to Islamic teachings, there's the principle that the goals never justify the means," said Bojnoordi, whose father was a grand ayatollah. "It has not been supported in Islam that you can do whatever you want to defend yourself. You are not allowed to gather weapons that are not allowed by Islam, even against your enemies."

DOJ_NMG_0036656

Senior Iranian officials insist their goal is only electrical power, saving their substantial petroleum deposits to export. Leaders also emphasize the role of pride and technological achievement, which inside Iran conveys the impression of economic development that has largely eluded a population that has grown poorer since the 1979 revolution.

"I believe that by getting high tech we will be getting development," Bojnoordi said. "If we improve the standard of living, that will unite the people, and that will bring security."

Said Kadivar: "I hope that science in my country is so progressive! I hope it's true. Every Iranian wants to have this energy. Every party. The difficulty is we don't have a democratic regime. So we should try to democratize."

If Iran is indeed working to produce nuclear weapons, experts say the program would surely be entrusted to the Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corps. Formed in 1979 by clerics who did not trust Iran's existing army, the Revolutionary Guards have grown into a major force in Iran's economy and political offices. Their insignia, one analyst noted, includes a passage from the Koran that reads, "Prepare any strength you can muster against them, and any cavalry with which you can overawe God's enemy and your own enemy as well, plus others besides them whom you do not know."

Compromise Eases Clash Over Hill Prerogatives (RC)

By Dan Rasmussen

Roll Call, June 21, 2006

The Bush administration has reached a compromise with Congressional leaders on one of the most prickly aspects of the pending U.S.-India nuclear deal, a provision that had rankled key Congressional Republicans and Democrats who worried about its potential to curb Congressional powers.

While much of the public debate over the U.S.-India nuclear deal has revolved around nonproliferation and global security issues, the biggest hang-up for many in Congress was the administration's initial insistence that India be treated as a country in compliance with the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Act of 1978, which it is not.

Considering India to be in compliance meant that the pact would have gone into force unless Congress passed a joint resolution of disapproval within 90 days. Effectively, that meant that both chambers would have needed veto-proof two-thirds majorities to stop its implementation.

By contrast, such deals with noncomplying states would not have gone into effect unless Congress passed a joint resolution of approval — a process that gives Congress significantly more sway over such foreign agreements.

Frustration over the president's initial proposal surfaced in a Senate Foreign Relations Committee hearing in April, when Members of both parties sharply questioned Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice about Congressional oversight issues.

However, it emerged this week that a clash between the executive and legislative branches has been averted. The Bush administration has reached a tentative agreement to only ask Congress to expedite the final approval of the bill by taking an up-or-down vote free of amendments. A public announcement of the procedural agreement is expected from the Undersecretary of State for Political Affairs Nick Burns later this week.

With markups now tentatively scheduled for next week, analysts say they expect Congress, having forced the administration to back off on its procedural demands, will likely leave the substance of the deal largely intact.

This compromise has appeased some in Congress who feared that they would be giving up too much of their input into the final decision, and it signals that Congress — which has already vigorously asserted itself on the substance of the deal — will continue to play an important role in the ongoing negotiations.

Senate Foreign Relations Chairman Dick Lugar (R-Ind.) endorsed the pact on Friday, after intensively scrutinizing the deal. House International Relations Chairman Henry Hyde (R-Ill.) also backs the bill.

A senior Democratic aide on the Foreign Relations Committee said that the skirmish over the approval procedure could be among the first signs that Congress is ending its five-year pattern of being largely tolerant of the administration's bold moves to act unilaterally, without intensive Congressional oversight.

"The administration has really overreached very badly if its forcing Congress to actually do its job," he said, speaking to the frustration provoked by the president's initial proposal. "The administration tossed this thing over and said, 'Look, Congress, why don't you just vote yourselves out of office?'"

"From the beginning, the president went to great lengths to keep Congress out of it," added a senior Republican staff member on the House International Relations Committee. "The strategy has backfired. We will reassert our traditional role on these types of agreements."

Congress' recoiling at the initial Bush procedural demand comes as a sharp rebuke to an administration that analysts say was hoping to maximize its leeway in negotiating the final agreement.

DOJ_NMG_0036657

Under the terms of the deal, the United States could ship nuclear technology and fuel to India, and in exchange, India would submit its 14 civilian nuclear reactors — though not its eight military facilities — to international inspections and safeguards.

Because India does not meet all the requirements for nuclear trade under the 1978 Nuclear Non-Proliferation Act, any nuclear deal would require Congress to both lay the legal groundwork for the deal under section 123 of the Atomic Energy Act and pass a joint resolution of approval on the final pact.

Bush's language essentially asked Congress to treat India as though it met all of the 1978 act's requirements. In effect, Bush was asking Congress to approve the deal before it had seen the final terms of the two major agreements — one between India and the U.S., and the other between India and the International Atomic Energy Agency.

But now that language has been withdrawn.

The apparent accord came after the House International Relations Committee and the Senate Foreign Relations Committee between them held eight hearings on the issue and requested thousands of pages of documents from the State Department. Lugar alone submitted 82 questions to the department.

In perhaps the most heated exchange of the April committee hearing, Sen. Paul Sarbanes (D-Md.) demanded of Rice: "Now, under your proposed legislation, is Congressional action part of the arrangement?" Unsatisfied with Rice's answer, he pressed forward.

"So your solution to that problem is to move Congress out of the decision-making process," he offered. "No, Senator," she replied, before Sarbanes interrupted her. "I mean, except for the one decision right at the outset," he said.

Sens. Lincoln Chafee (R-R.I.) and Russ Feingold (D-Wis.) also expressed their concern over this aspect of the deal. "From us in the Congress, it seems to me we're abdicating a lot of power in these amendments," Chafee said at the hearing.

Rice denied that the bill would strip Congress of prerogative on oversight matters.

"The Congress, of course, has up front — and that's why we're coming to you now — the ability to assess the deal, to look at its upsides and downsides and then to affirm in a vote, yes or no," she said. "We have offered to brief the Congress on where we are in the negotiation of this bilateral deal, which is a technical deal to try and implement the civil nuclear cooperation agreement. So we believe that there is a lot of congressional oversight."

The administration's retreat on the procedural provision suggests that such oversight is not going away. Some senior staff members cast the president's original proposal as an executive power play meant to gut Congressional oversight. They contend that the move has backfired and stirred Congressional leaders to ramp up oversight of the negotiations.

The Senate aide cast the president's proposal as part of a continuing effort to increase executive power at the expense of the legislative branch — a strategy that has worked in the past.

"Instead of just trying to get the deal through, the administration is trying to expand executive prerogative even more," he said. Bush is "really playing hardball on this without looking for something that would actually generate Congressional support."

One business lobbyist said that he still fears that the India deal could go the way of this year's deal for a Dubai-based company to run several U.S. ports — that is, turn into a political firestorm and require a major rewriting before enactment.

"Congress is saying, 'We want to take a look at all the underlying agreements.' They've had eight sets of hearings. All the answers to their questions have required thousands of pages from the State Department," he said. "They're trying to regain prerogative, and I don't think anybody can tell you where the ball is going to roll from here."

Strike In Gaza Kills 3 Children (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, June 21, 2006

JERUSALEM, June 20 -- An Israeli airstrike in the Gaza Strip on Tuesday killed at least three Palestinian children and wounded 14 people, many of them children as well, according to witnesses and Palestinian health officials.

Israeli military officials said the target of the strike, which occurred around 7:30 p.m., was a car carrying gunmen from the al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigades, the armed wing of the Fatah party. Military officials said the men were planning to carry out an unspecified attack, perhaps preparing to fire missiles into southern Israel.

But Palestinian witnesses said the men escaped from the Volkswagen Golf station wagon before the missile struck the car, which was passing through a busy commercial district of Gaza City. The scene turned quickly into an angry rally with demonstrators denouncing the attack and vowing to take revenge on Israel.

Shrapnel from the blast sprayed into a group of bystanders, Palestinian witnesses said. Hospital officials in Gaza said three children -- Mohammed Roqa, 5; Samia al-Shariff, 5; and Belal al-Hessi, 15 -- suffered fatal wounds in the attack.

DOJ_NMG_0036658

"If there were civilian casualties as a result of this, the IDF does regret it, as it always does," said a spokesperson for Israel's army, the Israeli Defense Forces. "But the fact is the terrorist organizations operate within these civilian areas, and the Hamas government has done nothing to stop them."

Hours earlier, the Palestinian leader, Mahmoud Abbas, called on the various armed groups at war with Israel to stop the rocket fire that has frightened and infuriated Israeli communities on the periphery of the Gaza Strip. Among the groups is the military wing of Hamas, the radical Islamic movement now running the Palestinian ministries, although two smaller factions are chiefly responsible for the missile fire.

At least three missiles landed in southern Israel on Tuesday before Abbas made his appeal, although there were no reports of injuries. The missiles are highly inaccurate and have not killed any Israelis since Israel evacuated its settlements in Gaza last year. But the attacks have surged recently, and one Israeli man was gravely injured this month.

The southern city of Sderot, the target of many of the missiles, closed schools, streets and the municipal government Tuesday to protest what residents say is the Israeli government's weak response to the rocket fire. The Israeli military has been using intensive artillery fire and airstrikes to little avail.

The airstrike Tuesday came a week after an Israeli missile attack on a minibus in Gaza City killed at least 10 Palestinians, including eight civilians. The minibus was carrying at least one rocket. Also this month, an explosion on a beach in northern Gaza killed eight Palestinian civilians. Palestinian officials and a human-rights group have said an Israeli artillery shell may have caused the blast. Israel has denied involvement.

Israeli Attack Kills 3 Gaza Children (NYT)

By Ian Fisher

The New York Times, June 21, 2006

JERUSALEM, June 20 — An Israeli aircraft fired Tuesday on a car that officials suspected was carrying armed Palestinian militants in Gaza and killed three children nearby, a 7-year-old girl and two boys, ages 5 and 16, hospital officials and witnesses said.

The airstrike was the third this month to kill civilians, infuriating Palestinians and raising an impassioned debate in Israel about its military response to the firing of homemade rockets from Gaza into Israel.

On June 9, eight civilians — seven from one family — were killed on a beach in Gaza during an Israeli bombardment against militants suspected of launching the rockets, called Qassams. The Israeli military later denied that its munitions caused the deaths, a contention disputed by Palestinians and human rights officials. Four days later, another strike in Gaza killed at least two militants and another eight civilians.

Tuesday's attack, according to an Israeli military official, was aimed at a group affiliated with the Fatah organization of President Mahmoud Abbas that had fired a rocket earlier in the day and was on its way to carry out another attack.

A military spokesman said the missile hit the car, but apparently the militants escaped.

"We are dealing with a cell that was very active in these attacks," said the spokesman, Capt. Jacob Dallal. "While we regret the loss of civilian life, the overall responsibility lies with the Palestinian Authority."

Since the beginning of the month, more than 140 Qassams have been fired from Gaza, seriously injuring one person.

The issue of the rockets and the military response has strained the government.

Residents of Sderot, the Israeli town hardest hit by the rockets, have complained that the government is not doing enough to protect them. Israeli military officials have spoken of stepping up operations in Gaza.

Many other Israelis have said the Qassams do not represent a serious enough threat for so strong a military response, which has included some 6,000 artillery shells in recent months. "Qassams, Shmassams! So what?" the dovish former prime minister Shimon Peres was quoted as saying in the Israeli press.

Red Cross-Red Crescent Deal Threatened (WT)

By Katie Stuhldreher

The Washington Times, June 21, 2006

Last-minute maneuvers may have jeopardized a deal for Israel and the Palestinian territories to enter the International Red Cross and Red Crescent Movement after decades of ostracism, according to officials at a conference in Geneva.

The International Conference of the Red Cross and Red Crescent Societies, at a two-day meeting that began yesterday, had been expected to formally endorse the use of a new religiously neutral emblem facilitating the move.

Israel's national emergency medical service, Magen David Adom (MDA), has never been willing to use either the cross or crescent -- symbolic of Christianity and Islam respectively -- while the movement has been unwilling to allow the use of the Star of David.

DOJ_NMG_0036659

Adoption of the new symbol, a diamond-shaped "red crystal," would end the more than 50-year stalemate. But the deal was thrown into doubt when Pakistan and Tunisia unexpectedly introduced a politically charged amendment to the resolution yesterday.

The action set off alarms in the U.S. government, a long-time supporter of MDA Red Cross membership.

A group called American Friends of MDA abruptly called off a celebratory press conference in Washington, saying the State Department had urged Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, New York Democrat, to call off her plans to participate.

"They thought any public comments might negatively affect the vote," said Daniel Allen, executive vice president of American Friends for MDA.

State Department deputy spokesman Adam Ereli said at yesterday's briefing that he knew nothing about such a request, and Mrs. Clinton's office failed to respond to repeated phone calls. However, Mr. Ereli said the United States has worked "relentlessly" to help integrate Israel into the international human rights community.

The American Red Cross withheld $42 million in overhead dues over a six-year period to protest MDA's exclusion from the group, according to the American Red Cross.

Agence France-Presse, reporting from Geneva, said the amendment proposed by Pakistan and Tunisia would say the movement's rules applied in "all Arab Territories occupied since 1967, namely the Palestinian Territory including East Jerusalem, the Syrian Golan and the Lebanese Shebaa Farms."

Israel said the suggested rewording, which effectually condemned Israel's occupation of territories, was unacceptable, according to Agence France-Presse.

"This political opposition isn't helping anyone. MDA has a lot to offer the community, with our experience in dealing with mass casualty issues and disasters," Mr. Allen said.

"We don't understand what the problem is with allowing a humanitarian organization to join the family of nations here," he said.

The adoption of the red crystal symbol was approved in principle at a meeting of Red Cross Movement member governments in December, despite strong Syrian opposition, by a vote of 98-27 with 10 abstentions. Two-thirds of the governments meeting today in Geneva must approve for the protocol to become official.

In November 2005, MDA signed a memorandum of understanding with the Palestine Red Crescent, which has been unable to become a member because of the Palestinians' lack of recognized statehood. The memorandum stated that the two organizations would seek joint entry, according to the Red Cross.

Mr. Allen said that if MDA's entry to the organization was blocked, it might jeopardize the Palestine Red Crescent's chances as well.

Ian Piper of the International Committee of the Red Cross told the Associated Press that he hoped joint entry would result in an acceptable situation for all parties.

"For us, it's a great advantage that they both be recognized simultaneously, that they are both equal, that they both play by the same rules and are accountable to the same group of peers," he said.

Devorah Goldburg of the American Red Cross said, "We still remain hopeful that a consensus can be reached. We just want to remind everyone that this isn't a political organization and the focus should be on humanitarian concerns."

A Campus For 'Scholars, Not Fighters' On A Settlement Site (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, June 21, 2006

GAZA, June 16 — A Palestinian college is growing from the rubble of an uprooted Israeli settlement.

Nearly a year ago, the Israelis pulled all their 9,000 settlers and military forces out of the Gaza Strip and then took bulldozers and backhoes to what used to be homes, schools, shops and clinics, leaving a few gutted synagogues, a few hundred greenhouses and tons of rubble.

Throughout most of the former settlements, Palestinians have thoroughly mined the debris for metal, wiring, fixtures and almost anything usable or sellable. But despite promises at the time, not an ounce of rubble has been removed or reprocessed, leaving a post-apocalyptic landscape baking in the unforgiving sun.

Except at the site of Neve Dekalim. On nearly 41 acres surrounding what used to be the largest school in what used to be called the Gush Katif bloc, the Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas, decreed a campus. He granted it to Al Aksa University, affiliated with his Fatah party, which lost elections this year to Hamas.

With seed money of $1.5 million from the sheik of Sharjah, one of the United Arab Emirates, the university hired its own security guards, built its own wall and started clearing and rebuilding.

DOJ_NMG_0036660

The first students appeared in March, as construction went on around them, and now some 2,000 men drawn from cramped branches of the overcrowded university all over southern Gaza are taking their exams here. A new classroom building is going up to house 4,000 women, who are taught separately in this conservative society.

Mahmoud al-Shami, the deputy dean of student affairs, said he hoped that the women could be part of the campus by September for at least two days a week as building continued.

Mr. Shami showed off his office, with its satellite Internet connections, new desk, fixtures and fittings. "Now we're focusing on creating scholars, not fighters," he said.

Hosam Abu Zeit, 22, was between exams in the social sciences. "Before, we would be shot if we entered this place," he said of the once heavily guarded settlement. "Now, in less than a year, we've succeeded in studying here. It gives me a sense of pride to be studying in a liberated place."

Previously, he studied in the nearby Khan Yunis refugee camp, less than a mile and a world away across the 15-yard-high cement wall that the Israelis built between the camp and Neve Dekalim.

Al Aksa's campus in Khan Yunis, said Tamim Dheir, the assistant to the president in charge of renovation, was 1.7 acres, about 4 percent of the area of this campus. Classrooms were so scarce that students studied only three days a week, with men alternating days with women.

"We were on top of one another there," Mr. Zeit said, and then, almost giddy, swung his arm in an arc, to indicate a new sense of space. On the walls are a few posters of dead militants considered to be martyrs, like Muhammad Abdel Hadi of the Abu Rish Brigades, but students pass by them this day without a glance.

His friend Wael Balaawi, 21, ran a hand through his gelled hair. "After 38 years of occupation!" he said excitedly.

"We couldn't even come here for a picnic or go to the beach, and we were cramped into the refugee camps, and the settlers had these huge places," he said with some wonder. "Now we can go where we want in a land that's ours."

In Gaza the Israelis largely built on empty sand dunes, displacing few Palestinians. But the network of walls, checkpoints, military sites and Israeli-only roads made it extremely difficult for Palestinians to travel freely. Now a trip from Gaza City to Rafah, which was often impossible, can be made in less than an hour.

Mr. Dheir, in his own freshly painted office, serving tea in new china cups, took out an architect's rendering of what the campus might look like in the future and displayed it proudly. Some of the nicest features were in red.

"It's only a plan," he finally said. "The red means it's part of the 10-year plan." But the intention is to bring the colleges of education, art and science here in their entirety within the next two years.

He added: "This is one of the symbols of freedom after the humiliation imposed on the Palestinians. It's a national project." But as a state university normally financed by the Palestinian Authority, now led by Hamas, the employees here, like Mr. Dheir, have also not received their salaries for the last four months.

"It's very difficult," he said with a sigh. "The whole situation is difficult. It's a big preoccupation for everyone. No one's paying their bills, and everyone is calling for unity and fearing civil war."

When Hamas supporters in Gaza's Islamic University clashed with Fatah supporters in Al Azhar University, there were some fistfights here, but they were quelled. "It nearly touched us, too, but we managed to stop it," Mr. Dheir said. "We said that this is a presidential place and we must have unity."

Still, Fatah flags fly next to the Palestinian one, and Palestinians still call the area by its former Israeli name, Neve Dekalim.

Walking around the campus, Mr. Dheir explained that there had been much salvaging and looting after the Israelis left, when even many of the trees were cut down. But Mr. Abbas soon ordered Fatah security guards to patrol the area and to stop the seizing of land that had taken place in a number of other former settlements, where some clans, militant groups and business interests had taken over what was supposed to be Palestinian Authority land devoted to the interests of Gazans as a whole.

"After we put up the wall, things became easier," said the registrar, Ahmed al-Mabhouh.

The old Neve Dekalim supermarket is being turned into a two-story cafeteria for students and teachers, and a row of shops nearby, one of which used to offer a serviceable espresso, has been remodeled into one large hall for the registrar. But the campus excludes the former synagogues, mostly gutted and firecharred, which remain on the horizon.

A group of students wandered on the repaved walkways, chatting excitedly after finishing a linguistics exam. Almutaz Abu Sittah, 19, tall and handsome, was proud of the campus but dour about the future.

"There's little optimism," he said. "The world is besieging us. And there's no real government, and no real state to govern."

Does he feel freer? "We've grown up," he said, "with vengeance in our hearts."

Armed Clash With Georgia Feared (WT)

By Michael Mainville

The Washington Times, June 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0036661

MOSCOW -- Growing diplomatic tensions, a Russian trade embargo and a massive boost in Georgian arms spending are raising fears of conflict in the volatile Caucasus region along Russia's southern border.

Analysts say a meeting last week between Russian President Vladimir Putin and Georgian President Mikheil Saakashvili failed to defuse the tension and that Russia's open support for the leaders of Georgia's separatist regions of South Ossetia and Abkhazia is pushing the limits of Georgian patience.

The tension is expected to be discussed when Mr. Putin hosts heads of state from the Group of Eight club of wealthy nations in St. Petersburg next month. It also will be discussed in Washington July 5 when Mr. Saakashvili meets with President Bush, who has accused the Kremlin of bullying pro-Western states in the former Soviet Union.

Pavel Felgenhauer, an independent, Moscow-based defense analyst, said Russia and Georgia appear to be laying the groundwork for an armed conflict. "What we've been seeing is an exchange of prewar statements," he said. "We could see military action in the coming weeks and months."

Georgian political analyst Alexander Rondeli agreed by telephone from Tbilisi that Russia-Georgia relations "have become truly bad. ... Russia is treating Georgia as a second- or third-class country through its support of separatist regions."

Mr. Saakashvili has made reunification with Abkhazia and South Ossetia -- which broke away from Tbilisi in the 1990s -- a key goal of his presidency. But Moscow has supported the separatists by installing Russian peacekeeping forces in the region, giving many residents Russian passports and supplementing the regions' budgets.

Georgia tried earlier this month to prevent a fresh rotation of 500 soldiers from entering South Ossetia, saying they were required to have entry visas. But Russia's Foreign Ministry dismissed the demand, saying Georgia had no control over South Ossetia and stressing the region's right to self-determination.

Buoyed by Montenegro's recent independence from Serbia, separatist leaders have stepped up efforts to break away from Georgia. At a meeting last week in the Abkhazian capital Sukhumi, the presidents of Abkhazia, South Ossetia and Moldova's separatist region of Trans-Dniester announced plans to establish a joint security force to defend their independence movements.

Russian officials, meanwhile, accuse Georgia of preparing to retake South Ossetia by force. Defense Minister Sergei Ivanov told reporters on June 13 that a significant increase in Georgian military spending last year caused "unquestionable concern."

In its annual report on global arms buying, released June 12, the Stockholm International Peace Research Institute said Georgian defense spending surged more than 140 percent to $146 million in 2005 -- the biggest increase worldwide last year.

Adding to the tension, Georgian officials on Saturday accused a Russian citizen of plotting to kill an opposition leader in order to discredit Mr. Saakashvili's government. Officials did not blame Russia directly, but accused "foreign secret services" of organizing an attempt on the life of opposition leader Koba Davitashvili.

They said the purported assassin had traveled to Tbilisi through Russian-controlled territory and had fled to Russia when Georgian police uncovered the plot.

Relations between the two countries began deteriorating after Mr. Saakashvili rose to power in Georgia's Rose Revolution, promising to boost relations with the West and to push for Georgian membership in NATO and the European Union.

In a move that critics say was designed to punish Georgia for these aspirations, Russia earlier this year imposed a ban on the country's largest imports, wine and mineral water, citing public health concerns.

Mr. Felgenhauer said Russia's goal is to undermine Mr. Saakashvili's popularity and eventually install a pro-Kremlin leader in Tbilisi.

"They're hoping that if they can destabilize the country it will lead to internal strife and the collapse of the Saakashvili regime," he said.

Amid Competition, India Cools To Expansion By Chinese Firms (WSJ)

By Peter Wonacott

The Wall Street Journal, June 21, 2006

BANGALORE, India -- Some of the world's best-known technology companies are investing billions of dollars to build modern campuses in this traffic-choked city. China's Huawei Technologies Co. wanted to join the rush.

Instead, the Chinese telecommunications-equipment maker is stalled in efforts to spend $164 million on new facilities here and has been forced to stuff 750 staffers into a hotel annex with a worn carpet and uneven light. India's government has rebuffed its efforts to obtain a trading license needed to sell directly to the booming domestic market -- rejecting its application at least nine times since early 2003, according to one senior sales executive briefed on the matter. The given reason: national-security concerns.

DOJ_NMG_0036662

"We have encountered some problems in India," admits George Huang, who runs Huawei's research facility in Bangalore. India's Foreign Investment Promotion Board, which reviews applications for trade licenses, did not respond to requests for comment.

Just as they have in the U.S. and Europe, some of China's big companies have run smack into security concerns and other delays, say industry executives and lawyers. Protracted government reviews have tripped up Chinese forays in telecommunications and infrastructure -- sectors where India generally welcomes foreign capital and expertise.

In part, India's concerns mirror fears in the U.S. and Europe about China's corporate ambitions in the West and Africa, and its growing influence overseas. A year ago, an $18.5 billion bid for Unocal Corp. by China National Offshore Oil Corp., or Cnooc, stoked a political backlash in the U.S. that helped prompt the Chinese to back down. In Europe, China Mobile Communications Corp. is near a $5.3 billion deal to buy Millicom International Cellular SA of Luxembourg in what would be China's biggest-ever corporate acquisition.

But the delays also reflect continuing unease between India and its fast-growing neighbor, as both nations emerge as new economic powers wooing capital and pursuing rapid development. The two have talked of trying to forge a new economic partnership as a counterweight to ties with the U.S., but bitter feelings linger in India from its humiliating defeat in a 1962 border war with China. That past is part of a sharp debate within India's bureaucracy between those who advocate embracing China and those who remain wary of its involvement in strategic industries.

Moreover, after decades of relative separation, India is experiencing China's economic might firsthand, as Chinese goods from refrigerators to Hindu statues flood the nation's markets. "These two countries are trying to figure out how to deal with each other," says Ashok Gurung, director of the India China Institute at the The New School in New York. "It's going to take a while."

Among other companies facing delays, China's ZTE Corp.'s drive to expand its telecom business in India has run into security roadblocks, say industry executives. The Hong Kong port-operating unit of Hutchison Whampoa Ltd., a conglomerate run by pro-Beijing billionaire Li Ka-shing, also has been unable to win security clearance for investments, according to contents of a closed-door cabinet meeting reported in an Indian newspaper.

Another Chinese company, Shenzhen CIMC-Tianda Airport Support Ltd., was turned away from installing air bridges in several Indian airports because of security concerns, despite an offer that was at least 40% lower than the only other bid, which was from a Spanish company, says a CIMC-Tianda lawyer.

"The Indian government is asking China to come and join hands with us," says Sudhir Sajwan, part of a legal team preparing CIMC-Tianda's case for a hearing before India's Supreme Court. "Then the Chinese companies come and they face these kinds of problems."

CIMC-Tianda executives declined to comment on its case. ZTE executives in India acknowledged delays in obtaining government approvals, but refused to elaborate. A spokesman for Hutchison Port Holdings said the company "has not been rejected from participating in any port projects in India for any reason, and we have in fact taken part in previous bids." The spokesman declined to comment on reports of multiple delays in obtaining a security clearance for a recent bid to modernize the Mumbai port.

The Foreign Investment Promotion Board, the Indian agency under the Ministry of Finance that typically reviews applications for trading licenses, was set up in 1991 to pave the way for capital coming into the country. The board also refers some cases to a cabinet-level committee on national security. Besides officials at the board, neither the National Security Advisor nor the Ministry of Finance responded to requests for interviews or to a list of questions about the reviews of Chinese companies.

The security reviews have begun to draw unusual public criticism from Beijing. In remarks to reporters last week, China's Ministry of Commerce warned India not to freeze out the country's low-cost competitors. A spokesman asked why CIMC-Tianda had been allowed to install air bridges at other Indian airports only to encounter security concerns in subsequent bids.

"We couldn't understand the relevant departments of India who set a ban on this company for security reasons," said the ministry's Chong Quan, according to the government-run Xinhua News Agency. "While India speeds up its infrastructure-facility development, Chinese companies experienced in the construction of airports, roads, bridges, power stations and telecommunications can provide services of better quality on a relatively lower price."

Ironically, Indian firms are expanding aggressively in China and apparently encountering few roadblocks. In June 2005, India's Tata Consultancy Services Ltd., or TCS, announced plans to team with Microsoft Corp. and the National Development and Reforms Commission, a powerful government agency, to help turn China into a major outsourcing hub. Drugmaker Ranbaxy Laboratories Ltd. has been adding to its factory in Guangzhou to sell more generic drugs in China.

Those moves are contributing to broader growth in economic ties. In 2007, two-way trade is expected to hit $20 billion, a year ahead of the original target date, said India's foreign-trade minister, Kamal Nath.

As for Huawei, in some ways the Chinese telecom-equipment maker has enjoyed a warm market reception in India. In 2005, it recorded $120 million in local sales, up about 80% from the year before.

DOJ_NMG_0036663

Yet executives say the lack of a trading license has hamstrung its expansion, deterring fresh investment and barring its bids to supply government-backed projects. Lacking security clearance, it recently had to drop an effort to supply wireless network equipment to Bharat Sanchar Nigam Ltd.

Huawei executives say Indian suspicions are misplaced. Although founded by a former soldier of China's People's Liberation Army, Huawei doesn't maintain links to China's military, and today operates as a private company in more than 100 countries, according to Mr. Huang of Huawei Technologies India, its Bangalore-based research arm.

Mr. Huang says he would like to double the 1,500 software engineers he has in India, combining them in a single corporate campus now split between two locations in Bangalore. Instead, he is watching rivals roll out their plans.

In October, Cisco Systems Inc. announced it was investing more than $1 billion in India. The same month, it broke ground for a new research lab here just 10 kilometers from where Huawei wants to build its facility.

U.N. Renews Presence In East Timor (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, June 21, 2006

The Security Council extended its political mission by two months and asked Secretary General Kofi Annan to plan for a "strengthened presence" of the United Nations there in light of recent violence that killed 30 people. The United States voted for the resolution despite a statement by its ambassador, John R. Bolton, questioning the need for returning peacekeepers.

Premier's Ally Faces Arrest In E. Timor (WP)

By Tanalee Smith

The Washington Post, June 21, 2006

DILI, East Timor, June 20 -- East Timorese prosecutors ordered the arrest of the former interior minister Tuesday for supplying weapons to a hit squad tasked with eliminating political opponents of the prime minister, the United Nations said.

International troops, meanwhile, tightened security across the capital as hundreds of protesters gathered to demand the ouster of Prime Minister Mari Alkatiri, some handing out fliers calling him a terrorist and murderer.

Young men mounted a small stage across the street from Alkatiri's office to give speeches criticizing his rule as others chanted, "Step down! Step down!"

"He is a criminal. He divided the Timorese people," said Vidal Gomez, 19.

Many East Timorese say Alkatiri's decision to fire 600 disgruntled soldiers in March was to blame for the subsequent clashes and gang warfare that have left at least 30 people dead. Some also allege he formed a hit squad to kill his political opponents.

"I never provided any weapons to anyone," Alkatiri said in a television interview broadcast nationally Tuesday evening, adding that he welcomed a U.N. investigation into the claims.

But the decision by the country's top prosecutor to issue an arrest warrant for Rogerio Lobato, who resigned as interior minister June 1, added credibility to the allegations.

The indictment accuses Lobato of giving guns to rebel leader Vincente "Railos" da Concecao -- the self-proclaimed leader of a hit squad allegedly commissioned by Alkatiri to silence the opposition -- on at least three occasions in May, according to a U.N. statement.

His alleged aim was to "alter the public order and the democratic rule of law," the statement said.

Lobato, deputy head of Alkatiri's ruling Fretelin party, was at his home in Dili on Tuesday, said Jose Manuel Fernandes, the party's vice secretary general.

Sudan Leader Rejects U.N. Troops In Darfur (USAT)

USA Today, June 21, 2006

Sudanese President Omar al-Bashir said Tuesday that he will never allow United Nations peacekeepers into Darfur, where a U.N. commission has accused the government and its militia allies of human rights violations in suppressing an ethnic minority uprising. “This shall never take place,” al-Bashir said. “We will not accept colonial forces coming into the country.”

The U.N. wants to send troops to replace a 7,000-strong African Union force that has been unable to stop the violence. About 180,000 people have died, many from hunger and disease, and about 2 million have been displaced since the conflict began in 2003.

A U.N.-chartered plane flew former Liberian president Charles Taylor from Sierra Leone to The Hague, Netherlands, to be tried on charges of war crimes.

DOJ_NMG_0036664

Taylor is accused of helping Sierra Leone's Revolutionary United Front rebels, who killed, mutilated and raped civilians during the West African country's civil war from 1991 to 2002. Taylor has been in custody since March. He faces life imprisonment if convicted.

An Israeli missile aimed at suspected Palestinian militants in a car in Gaza killed three children standing nearby. The Israeli military said the car was carrying members of the Al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigade, a terrorist group. Killed in the attack in the Jebaliya refugee camp were a 5-year-old boy and two girls, 7 and 16, Jumma Fatah of Shifa Hospital said. An army spokesman, Capt. Jacob Dallal, said terrorists in the car were involved in firing rockets at Israeli neighborhoods. Dallal blamed the Palestinian government for allowing the attacks.

Santa Park in Finnish Lapland has turned a profit for the first time after cost cuts, including firing the last three full-time elves. Wille Rajala, director of the 8-year-old park, credits a change in philosophy. “We are not open every day, but a couple of months in winter and another couple of months during summer.”

Children can take sleigh rides, talk to Santa and feed the reindeer. The park's website reminds visitors that there are only 186 days until Christmas.

Leader Won't Allow U.N. Force In Darfur (NYT/AFP)

By Agence France-Presse

The New York Times, June 21, 2006

President Omar Hassan al-Bashir voiced strong opposition to the deployment of Western troops in Darfur, vowing his country would not be "recolonized," the state news media reported. "I swear that there will not be any international military intervention in Darfur as long as I am in power," Mr. Bashir was quoted as telling a meeting of his party. "Sudan, which was the first country south of the Sahara to gain independence, cannot now be the first country to be recolonized." The United Nations wants to replace an under-equipped contingent of African troops in Darfur with its own peacekeepers.

Foreign Intervention In Somalia? (CSM)

By Rob Crilly

The Christian Science Monitor, June 21, 2006

NAIROBI, KENYA

The rapid rise of Somalia's Islamist militias has prompted a flurry of diplomatic efforts to stabilize the troubled country in the Horn of Africa.

Earlier this week, the African Union and Western diplomats decided to send officials to Somalia to assess the possibility of deploying a peacekeeping force to a country ripped apart by 15 years of anarchy. That has the backing of President Abdullahi Yusuf, head of Somalia's virtually impotent transitional government, who flew to Ethiopia Tuesday to demand speedy intervention.

Regional powers support intervention out of fear of an Islamic state on their doorsteps, while Western governments are worried the country could become a haven for terrorists.

But rather than promote stability, the move could inflame feelings in the newly dominant Islamic courts movement, which has everything to lose by foreign intervention.

Its leaders say there is no need to invite peacekeepers when Islamist militias have succeeded in pacifying Mogadishu, one of the most dangerous cities on the planet.

"Any sort of AU intervention - which would most likely be a cover for Ethiopian intervention - is most likely to be highly divisive and is likely to derail any attempt at peaceful negotiation between the government and the courts," says Sulieman Baldo, Africa program director of the Brussels-based International Crisis Group. "The [Islamist] courts will be very hostile to any sort of Ethiopian intervention in Somalia."

Ethiopian troops have previously supported President Yusuf in his home state of Puntland where he held off an Islamist challenge during the 1990s. Somalia's neighbor is also thought to have designs on its land.

For the past two weeks, Sheikh Sharif Ahmed, who heads the Islamic Courts Union, has insisted to the watching world that his network of sharia courts - which has imposed strict Islamic law, shut down cinemas, and banned people from celebrating New Year's - has no links to Al Qaeda and has no plans to turn Somalia into an Islamic state.

But at the same time, his militias have swept out of Mogadishu conquering a huge swath of Somalia, imposing sharia law on the strategic town of Jowhar and traveling almost up to the border with Ethiopia.

The courts are the closest thing to a central government the country has seen since President Siad Barre fled in 1991. After his departure, Somalia gradually split into a series of personal fiefdoms administered by a motley combination of gangsters and thugs known as warlords.

DOJ_NMG_0036665

But the rise of the Islamic courts and their militias has ousted the warlords from Mogadishu, where they were allegedly receiving cash from the United States to prevent Al Qaeda from making inroads.

Militias loyal to Sheikh Ahmed are now positioned about 40 miles from the town of Baidoa, where the country's transitional government has sat for four months since being formed in neighboring Kenya.

Earlier this month, its parliament voted to endorse Yusuf's call for peacekeepers to guarantee the survival of the government.

That vote was quickly followed by accusations from the Islamic courts that Ethiopia had sent 300 soldiers across the border to bolster its ally, Yusuf. The charges are denied by Ethiopia, although it is well known that small numbers of Ethiopian troops regularly criss-cross the border as part of its own defenses.

For now, the presence of peacekeepers would also violate an arms embargo imposed by the United Nations on all sides.

Lifting it, says Lt. Col. Harjit Kelley, a consultant to the United Nations Monitoring Group on Somalia, would risk enflaming an already volatile situation by legalizing the flow of guns and ammunition into the country.

He adds that the Islamic courts had strong backing from people living in towns under their control, and that the government, which has the support of much of the international community, has no option but to open a dialogue.

However, Yusuf has previously ruled out talks with the Islamic courts' leadership unless they meet three conditions: withdraw their militias to Mogadishu, recognize his government, and disarm.

Colonel Kelley doubts the Islamists will agree to those conditions, and says Yusuf has next to no leverage over the courts.

"The Islamic courts have the infrastructure, the command and control, that has [allowed them to] take the capital and other towns and then, more important, to hold on to them, so they are a big threat to the TFG," says Kelley.

"The TFG's best chance is to offer them commanding positions - with some real responsibility - in the government."

For now, there is peace in Mogadishu, but no one doubts that much work remains to rebuild the failed state.

Earlier this week, the United Nations' World Food Programme and UNICEF warned that the recent fighting and years of drought had pushed Somalis to their limit, creating the highest rates of malnutrition seen in years.

Mahamud Hassan Ali, the mayor of Mogadishu, says the West had already intervened in his city, funding the warlords and exacerbating the conflict.

Now, he says, it is time for the outside world to help rebuild it.

"My appeal is that the taxes of the world are no longer used for destruction, but instead used to make a difference to the lives of our people."

Former Liberian President In The Hague For Trial (NYT)

By Marlise Simons

The New York Times, June 21, 2006

PARIS, June 20 — Charles G. Taylor, the former president of Liberia and one of West Africa's most feared men, arrived in handcuffs in the Netherlands on Tuesday, and was immediately taken to the jail near The Hague where the former Serbian president, Slobodan Milosevic, spent the last five years of his life.

Mr. Taylor, 58, will be tried in the Netherlands by a specially created outpost of the Special Court for Sierra Leone, the United Nations-backed tribunal that has indicted him on charges of crimes against humanity and war crimes.

The long list of atrocities attributed to Mr. Taylor, a former warlord, includes running a rebel force that killed tens of thousands of civilians and hacked off the limbs of countless others.

A descendant of the returned slaves who founded Liberia, Mr. Taylor became notorious for his use and abuse of children who were pressed into his forces. The children were often brainwashed or drugged into killing their own parents or relatives, prosecutors have said.

Getting Mr. Taylor to The Hague has been a diplomatic headache ever since his capture as he tried to leave Nigeria in March. The Sierra Leone government requested that he be tried outside the country because, it argued, his followers could destabilize the region once again, after more than a decade of war.

Mr. Taylor is accused of financing the rebel force in Sierra Leone.

He will now be tried in The Hague, in a new courtroom at the International Criminal Court. The Dutch government, while agreeing to the trial on its soil, had insisted that Mr. Taylor was not welcome until another nation had committed to taking him into prison if he were convicted.

Britain, the former colonial power in Sierra Leone, whose troops helped end the war there, announced Thursday that Mr. Taylor could serve any sentence he might receive in Britain.

Mr. Taylor will be held in the wing of a Dutch prison, where both the United Nations tribunal for Yugoslavia and the new International Criminal Court have rented a cellblock. He will be tried by judges from the Sierra Leone court, which was created by the United Nations and the local government to try people responsible for atrocities since 1996. The court has nine people in custody.

DOJ_NMG_0036666

It may take some months before Mr. Taylor begins his trial in The Hague. After his arrest, he attended a brief hearing at the Sierra Leone court, where he pleaded not guilty to all 11 charges he faces.

He also declared he was partly indigent, saying he could not pay for defense lawyers. Peter Andersen, the Sierra Leone court spokesman, said Mr. Taylor would be assigned a temporary counsel until the court has finished investigating his financial situation.

Mr. Taylor was known for trading diamonds and tropical hardwood for weapons, and is believed to have stolen millions of dollars from Liberia's coffers.

Liberia's Taylor Flown To The Hague To Face War Crimes Charges (WP)

By Molly Moore

The Washington Post, June 21, 2006

PARIS, June 20 -- Former Liberian president Charles Taylor -- once one of Africa's most feared warlords -- arrived Tuesday in The Hague to face charges of war crimes and allegations that he destabilized West African countries while amassing a fortune from illegal trade in diamonds, guns and timber.

Taylor's trial was moved from Sierra Leone, where he is accused of mass murder, sexual slavery and conscripting children during his support for a rebel movement that killed thousands of people during that country's 1991-2002 civil war.

The U.N. Security Council, which approved the move from Freetown to the facilities of the International Criminal Court in The Hague, cited concerns that trying the case in Sierra Leone could destabilize Liberia, Sierra Leone and neighboring countries.

Taylor's former wife said he knew he would be transferred from a prison in Freetown to The Hague this week, according to news reports. She said he was eager to respond to the allegations, which he denied in a preliminary court appearance in Freetown after his arrest in March.

"Mr. Taylor is in a very reflective and pensive mood," Jewel Taylor, a member of Liberia's Senate, told the BBC Tuesday. "This is his whole life we're talking about." She added, "There is not basis for the charges that have been levied on Mr. Taylor."

The former president, 58, arrived in the Netherlands on a U.N.-chartered jet and was led from the plane in handcuffs. He then was driven to the International Criminal Court's detention center in the suburbs of The Hague. The proceedings will be held in the courtrooms of the international court, although the trial will be conducted by the Special Court for Sierra Leone.

Taylor is the first former African head of state to be brought before a war crimes tribunal, and his case comes at a time when prosecutors have begun making tentative efforts across the continent to hold political leaders accountable for the corruption, genocide and brutality of African conflicts in the final decades of the last century. He served as president of Liberia from 1997 until 2003, when he was forced to resign.

Taylor is charged with sponsoring and aiding a rebel organization in Sierra Leone that chopped off the limbs of its civilian victims and forced women into sexual slavery and children into combat, among other atrocities. While he was actively working to destabilize the region, Taylor built a massive personal fortune from illegal trading.

He had been living comfortably in exile in Nigeria until this spring, when President Olusegun Obasanjo agreed to turn him over to the Liberian government. Taylor attempted to flee and was nabbed at a border post near Cameroon in March. At a court appearance in Freetown in April, Taylor said he was innocent and described the charges against him as "an attempt to continue to divide and rule the people of Liberia and Sierra Leone."

Taylor will be housed in the same prison where former Yugoslav president Slobodan Milosevic was detained.

12 Held In ETA Racketeering Case (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, June 21, 2006

The police in Spain and France arrested 12 people on charges of acting as intermediaries between the armed Basque separatist group ETA and businesses that were forced to pay a "revolutionary tax," the Spanish Interior Ministry said. It said that the unit had been operating for the last 20 years and that extortion was how ETA financed its operations. Among those arrested was Julen de Madariaga, 74, one of ETA's founding members.

Latin America's Choice (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, June 21, 2006

Lima, Peru

DOJ_NMG_0036667

There are a lot of ways to describe Latin America's challenge today. Some will tell you it's the age-old question of overcoming the staggering gap here between rich and poor. Some will tell you it's rooting out corruption and misgovernance. But I come at this issue with my own perspective, and I would describe the big question facing Latin Americans this way: Are they going to emulate India or get addicted to China?

This question was, at least implicitly, a subtext of the recent election here in Peru. But it's true throughout this continent, which has always been better at mining its resources than mining its people.

Let me explain by introducing Gabriel Rozman — a Jewish technologist of Hungarian roots who was raised in Uruguay, educated in America and now heads the Latin American operations of India's biggest software/outsourcing company, Tata Consultancy Services of Mumbai.

Mr. Rozman runs Tata's Latin American business out of Montevideo, where 550 Uruguayan programmers, trained and directed by Indians, are writing code and running the computer systems for companies all across this continent. They are backed up by Tata engineers in India, Hungary, China, Brazil, Chile, Mexico and Argentina. India now thinks Latin America is its backyard, too.

And so does China. China, though, is almost exclusively focused here on extracting natural resources — timber, iron, soybeans, minerals, gas, fish meal — to feed its voracious appetite and keep jobs and factories humming in China. There is nothing wrong about that. America and Spain did the same for years — and often rapaciously. Today, China's appetite is helping to fuel a worldwide boom in commodity prices that is enabling a poor, low-industrialized country like Peru to grow at 5 percent.

But countries that get addicted to selling their natural resources rarely develop their human resources and the educational institutions and innovative companies that go with that. So after the ore has been mined, the trees cut and the oil pumped, their people are actually even more behind.

"Why can't Latin America do what India is doing?" Mr. Rozman asked when I spoke with him in Washington last week. It can, he insists, but only if it changes — fast. "Right now I have 500 job openings I can't fill, and the problem is education. The prestige career to follow in India is engineering, and in Latin America it is [still] law or being a notary public."

"We need more computer courses with real standards and starting at an early age," he said. A lot of higher education in Latin America is modeled on the French/European system, which is better at producing philosophers than programmers. Philosophers are important, but not in bulk.

Latin America also has to do a better job of teaching English, he added, and eliminating the red tape that prevents economic integration in Latin America and makes it very cumbersome to start new businesses here.

"To go from Argentina to Montevideo is only a 20-minute flight," Mr. Rozman explained, but in terms of the economic integration demanded today by global firms, they are 10,000 miles apart. In addition, most of the legal systems in Latin America are designed to promote agriculture and light industry, not intellectual property or innovation. "All the laws were made for another type of society," he said. "If we don't get caught up with the next wave, we're in trouble."

That next wave is called "follow the sun," he said. "We like to start a project in Bangalore or Mumbai, then, as the day moves on, move it to our offices in Eastern Europe and then to Latin American." Tata expects its engineers in each place to be equally trained, speak English and have the computing infrastructure to seamlessly receive and hand off projects. This is a global-scale business.

"We have 50,000 employees in India and are going to 100,000," explained Mr. Rozman. Eventually, Tata will grow to 100,000 in China. "But I can't go to 100,000 in any one country in Latin America, so I have to be able to put [the whole continent] together."

Latin Americans may think that their big choice is between two models of Western capitalism — a European welfare state model and a hyper-competitive U.S. model. But before they divide their pie, they need to expand it — and here their most important choice is between an India example that focuses on developing human resources and a China syndrome that focuses on selling natural resources. Since countries tend to do either one or the other, here's hoping that Latin America discovers India before it gets hooked on China.

Slim Pickings (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, June 21, 2006

The Inter-American Development Bank has been lending money to governments and the private sector in Latin America for almost a half century with little to show for it. So it seems sadly appropriate that one of the main speakers at the bank's anti-poverty conference last week was Mexico's telecom monopolist, Carlos Slim. His topic, believe it or not, was "business models" to help lift majorities out of poverty.

Mr. Slim is the richest man in Latin America and, according to his own resume, one of the 10 richest men in the world. He is also reported to be a generous philanthropist. But Mr. Slim's fortune has come partly at the expense of Mexico's poor and middle class, who have had to suffer more than a decade of monopoly pricing for telecom services under his ownership of Mexico's Telmex. His anti-competitive political machinations are among the biggest obstacles to making Mexico a faster growing and more globally competitive economy.

DOJ_NMG_0036668

Mr. Slim bought Telmex as a private monopoly from the government in 1990. After enjoying monopoly rights for the first six years of the privatization as part of the purchase agreement, Mr. Slim grew so rich and powerful that he became known as the "owner" of all of Mexico. When a scheduled deregulation arrived in 1997, he had the resources to fight it off and has continued to do so.

Today the Slim name is synonymous in Mexico with litigation against deregulatory orders and ferocious lobbying to protect the Telmex advantage. The company retains 95% of the fixed-line market, and telephony prices are high relative to markets that have undergone deregulation. Access in rural areas is sketchy.

Mexico's telecommunications minister, a former Telmex district manager, has vetoed efforts to adopt such simple competition tools as number portability, according to a former commissioner at the telecom regulator. Telmex controls almost all data traffic, and there is next to no consumer choice in broadband, Internet and voice-over-Internet. Telmex's domination in fixed-line services has also damaged competition in the wireless market. All of this has raised the cost of doing business in Mexico and has diminished growth, not to mention the burden it has put on the poor, the people the Inter-American Development Bank (IDB) is supposed to care about.

There is little debate among development economists about the importance of competition to moving people out of poverty. Equality under the law -- from which competition, innovation, and efficient capital allocations derive -- is the basis of such progress. But with special interests blocking market reform in most poor countries, introducing economic competition is an uphill climb.

Helping to overcome these political forces would be a good job for the IDB, but the bank has never been a serious place for development work. It busies itself instead with redistributing wealth; since its founding in 1959, the bank has funneled $140 billion into perpetuating bureaucracies. Now it is helping Mr. Slim build a reputation as an anti-poverty expert.

At last week's anti-poverty conference, Mr. Slim followed the Roman Catholic cardinal of Honduras, who spoke on the "moral dimension" of fighting poverty. To the best of our knowledge, Mr. Slim didn't utter the other 'm' word, monopoly, the one that helped to make him rich and continues to keep his fellow Mexicans poorer than they should be.

DOJ_NMG_0036669

Cook, Elisebeth C

From: Cook, Elisebeth C
Sent: Wednesday, June 21, 2006 10:15 AM
To: Gorsuch, Neil M
Subject: FW: Updated Table of Contents for Neil Gorsuch
Attachments: gorsuch.wpd

Here's a rough TOC (haven't looked at it yet for formatting, etc.)

From: Coehins, Bridget C
Sent: Wednesday, June 21, 2006 10:11 AM
To: Cook, Elisebeth C
Subject: Updated Table of Contents for Neil Gorsuch

Bridget C.Coehins
U.S. Department of Justice
Office of Legal Policy
Room 4233
202-514-2061

LETTERS IN SUPPORT OF
NEIL M. GORSUCH
NOMINEE TO THE TENTH CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS

ATTORNEYS AND OTHER SUPPORTERS

1. William J. Hughes, Jr., Cooper Levenson April Niedelman & Wagenheim, P.A., May 30, 2006

2. Ken Kramer, May 31, 2006

3. Michael Kellogg, Kellogg, Huber, Hansen, Todd, Evans & Figel, P.L.L.C., June 1, 2006

4. Kerry McQueen, Sharp, McQueen, McKinley, McQueen & Dodge, P.A., June 2, 2006

5. Lourdes Lopez-Isa, June 2, 2006

6. Edward C. Stewart & John R. Trigg, WheelerTriggKennedy LLP, June 2, 2006

7. Silvija A. Strikis, Kellogg, Huber, Hansen, Todd, Evans & Figel, P.L.L.C., June 2, 2006

8. Eric A. Prager, Darby & Darby, June 4, 2006

9. D. Michael Trent, June 5, 3006

10. Mark Hansen, Kellogg, Huber, Hansen, Todd, Evans & Figel, P.L.L.C., June 5, 1006

11. James M. Webster III, Kellogg, Huber, Hansen, Todd, Evans, & Figel, P.L.L.C., June 6, 2006

12. Ken Fetterman, Kellogg, Huber, Hansen, Todd, Evans, & Figel, P.L.L.C., June 6, 2006

13. Isaac L. Kiel, For the Firm, Law Offices of Isaac L. Diel, Attorneys at Law, June 6, 2006

14. Hal Kepner, Kepner Company, June 7, 2006

15. Harold S. Handelsman, The Pritzker Organization, LLC, June 8, 2006

16. Christian E. Mammen, Day Casebeer Madrid & Batchelder LLP, June 9, 2006

17. Michael J. Guzman, Kellogg, Huber, Hansen, Todd, Evans & Figel, P.L.L.C., June 12, 2006

18. Sally J. Gardenswartz, June 12, 2006

19. William H. Albright, June 14, 2006

20. Robert W. Hite, Supreme Court, State of Colorado, June 16, 2006

21. Gary L. Christy, June 19, 2006

22. Stephanie W. Fields, Senior Vice President & General Counsel, Classic Residence By Hyatt, June 20, 2006

From: Ames, Andrew
Sent: Wednesday, June 21, 2006 10:26 AM
To: Ames, Andrew; Baxter, Felix (CIV); Blomquist, Kathleen M; Branda, Joyce (CIV); Brett Gerry; Brody, Stephen (CIV); Bucholtz, Jeffrey (CIV); Bukvics, Jennifer (CIV); Claterbos, Barbara (CIV); Cohen, David M. (CIV); Cohn, Jonathan (CIV); Davidson, Jeanne (CIV); Davis, Dan (CIV); Fargo, John (CIV); Fielding, Gabrielle (CIV); Figley, Paul (CIV); Flentje, August (CIV); Frost, Peter (CIV); Garren, Timothy (CIV); Glynn, J.Patrick (CIV); Gorsuch, Neil M; Hertz, Michael (CIV); Hollis, Robert (CIV); Hunt, Jody (CIV); Hussey, Thom (CIV); Jennifer Brosnahan; Jeweler, James (CIV); Katsas, Gregory (CIV); Keisler, Peter D (CIV); Kohn, Chris (CIV); Kopp, Robert (CIV); Letter, Douglas (CIV); Levine, Larry (EOIR); Lindemann, Michael (CIV); Magnuson, Cynthia; McCallum, Robert (SMO); Miller, Charles S; Nichols, Carl (CIV); Nowacki, John; Pyles, Phyllis (CIV); Riley, Sharon (CIV); Rivera, Jennifer (CIV); Roehrkasse, Brian; Schiffer, Stuart (CIV); Scolinos, Tasia; Seidel, Rebecca; Senger, Jeffrey M; Spellberg, Dianne (CIV); Swenson, Lily F; Thirolf, Eugene; Wilson, Karen L; Zwick, Ken (CIV)
Subject: 6/21/06 Civil Division News

Brief says secrecy trumps any wiretap ruling; Government claims an award of damages to plaintiffs would undermine security

U.S., State Reach Accord

Testimony on Bulger probe is disputed

Man Renews 20-Year Battle for Citizenship

Missouri officials demand AT&T records

Supreme Court to Hear 'Partial-Birth' Abortion Cases

Some people never quit

Editorial: Secrecy Mustn't Crush Rule of Law

San Francisco Chronicle

June 21, 2006

Bob Egelko, Chronicle Staff Writer

Brief says secrecy trumps any wiretap ruling; Government claims an award of damages to plaintiffs would undermine security

The Bush administration says its program of clandestine electronic surveillance, and AT&T's alleged participation in it, are secrets so important that a federal judge couldn't consider awarding damages even if he agreed with a lawsuit that accuses the company of breaking the law.

Justice Department lawyers made a sweeping claim of immunity, for both the government and the telecommunications company, in their latest filing seeking dismissal of the lawsuit by customers against AT&T. A hearing is scheduled Friday before Chief U.S. District Judge Vaughn Walker in San Francisco.

The suit, filed in January, accuses AT&T of illegally giving the National Security Agency access to its voice and data network and to its databases of customers' phone calls and e-mails, to be used in a government program of monitoring Americans' contacts with suspected terrorists.

DOJ_NMG_0036673

President Bush has acknowledged authorizing wiretaps of calls between Americans and alleged terrorists abroad without court warrants since shortly after the Sept. 11 attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon. But the administration has refused to discuss allegations of telecommunications company collaboration, the subject of numerous media reports, and has insisted that the subject is too sensitive to be aired in court.

Although the government is not a defendant in the AT&T case, government lawyers have asked Walker to rule that the suit would endanger state secrets and must be dismissed. In its latest filing, the administration said AT&T can't admit or deny participating in the program -- and thus can't fully respond to the plaintiffs' accusations -- because its alleged role is a secret.

Even if Walker, in a closed-door review, "were to find unlawfulness," Justice Department lawyers wrote, he "could not then proceed to adjudicate the very question of awarding damages because to do so would confirm plaintiffs' allegations."

That appeared to refer to the alleged law-breaking by AT&T rather than the overall surveillance program. But the Electronic Frontier Foundation, a privacy-rights organization that represents the plaintiffs, said the government's brief amounts to a claim "that the program is above the law."

"We intend to vigorously oppose this radical assertion of power," the foundation said.

The Bush administration has also invoked state secrets in seeking to dismiss a lawsuit by the American Civil Liberties Union directly challenging the National Security Agency surveillance program on behalf of writers and scholars who believe their calls were intercepted. That case is before a federal judge in Detroit.

Gregory Sisk, a law professor at St. Thomas University in Minnesota who has studied the government's use of state secrets as a legal defense, said courts have occasionally found that an entire federal program -- the alleged wiretapping of dissenters during the Vietnam War, for example -- was immune from judicial review.

"Taking something out of the context of litigation doesn't mean that there aren't checks and balances available," such as congressional action, Sisk said. But he said the government could argue in the current cases that even if the surveillance were found to be illegal, allowing individuals to seek damages would "confirm that their communications have been intercepted, and that would violate national security."

On Tuesday, Walker sent a series of questions to lawyers that indicated he was keeping his options open.

One question was how he could "minimize the conflict between plaintiffs' right to litigate this case and the government's duty to protect state secrets."

He also asked how confirming or denying the existence of the surveillance program, or AT&T's participation, could amount to disclosing a state secret "when the program has been so widely reported in the public sphere."

END

Hartford Courant

June 21, 2006

U.S., State Reach Accord

Robert A. Frahm

The Hartford Courant, Conn.

Jun. 21--Thousands of veteran Connecticut schoolteachers whose qualifications were called into question by a recent U.S. government review will no longer have to worry about undergoing additional training or testing, education officials said Tuesday.

After originally challenging Connecticut's procedures for evaluating teachers, the U.S. Department of Education, on further review, has approved those methods for determining whether teachers meet the federal standards as "highly qualified."

An estimated 13,000 teachers, about 30 percent of the state's public school teaching force, were uncertain of their status after federal monitors conducted a review in January, but the government's latest stance means most of those teachers will meet the standards established under the federal No Child Left Behind Act.

"It's a big relief," state Education Commissioner Betty J. Sternberg said.

Earlier this spring, Sternberg said she feared the federal law might require teachers to undergo testing or further training to demonstrate their competence. Now, however, U.S. officials have agreed that they can establish their qualifications in job reviews conducted by local school districts.

Teacher quality is a key element of the No Child Left Behind Act, the 4-year-old school reform law that is the centerpiece of President Bush's educational agenda.

The law, which calls for a broad expansion of school testing and a shake-up of schools that fail to make adequate progress, requires states to ensure that all teachers are "highly qualified."

What that means is that all teachers - aside from having at least a bachelor's degree and state certification - must demonstrate knowledge in the academic subjects they teach. States failing to meet that goal could risk millions of dollars in federal money.

In its earlier review, federal officials said that Connecticut elementary teachers who were certified before 1988 may not have demonstrated competence to teach core academic subjects such as English, reading, math and science. The state began testing all new teachers, starting in 1988, in subject-matter knowledge.

The federal monitors also had questioned whether a broad general test required of the state's social studies teachers was adequate to measure competence in the specific areas of history, geography, civics and economics.

The issues raised by the monitors potentially affected many older elementary teachers and special education teachers, as well as social studies teachers.

However, state officials submitted a detailed response to the federal review, and U.S. officials determined that the state procedures, including the local job reviews of teachers, met the necessary requirements of No Child Left Behind.

"We commend your excellent work in responding to the concerns raised by the monitoring report," Assistant U.S. Secretary of Education Henry L. Johnson wrote to Sternberg. Nevertheless, because not all teachers will meet the law's standard this school year, the state must submit a revised plan for meeting the standard for the 2006-07 year, Johnson said.

END

Boston Globe

June 21, 206

Testimony on Bulger probe is disputed

By Shelley Murphy, Globe Staff

A retired FBI agent, who went undercover in 1983 to offer bribes to officials, yesterday disputed testimony that the Massachusetts Senate president at the time, William M. Bulger, had been a target of the investigation.

``His name never came up," John ``Jack" Callahan said in a telephone interview with The Boston Globe. ``As far as Bulger being a target of the investigation? Not to my knowledge, and I was the primary and only undercover agent involved in it for four years."

Yesterday, Robert Fitzpatrick, who was second in command of the FBI's Boston office from 1981 to 1986, acknowledged that the FBI did not have any evidence of wrongdoing by Bulger during the 1983 investigation.

But he stood by his testimony on Monday that Bulger was a target of the inquiry.

Fitzpatrick said it was one of nine investigations in his tenure in Boston that he believed had been compromised by leaks to informants, including Bulger's gangster brother, James ``Whitey" Bulger, or others outside the agency.

Fitzpatrick testified Monday in a wrongful-death suit.

The action was brought against the government by the family of a murdered FBI informant who was to ``get" the House majority whip at the time, Vincent Piro ; the House speaker, Thomas W. McGee ; and Bulger.

DOJ_NMG_0036675

Piro, a Somerville Democrat, was recorded on tape in 1983 asking Callahan, who was posing as a mall developer, for $25,000 to ensure legislative approval for liquor licenses for the Assembly Square Mall in Somerville. Piro said he needed $5,000 up front ``to grease a few guys."

But after accepting $5,000 from the undercover agent, Piro returned it three weeks later, saying that he had never taken money before, and that ``I don't want to start now."

Prosecutors said Piro had been tipped off that Callahan was an FBI agent. Piro argued entrapment at the trial; he was acquitted of conspiracy and extortion charges.

A witness testified that Piro had made reference to ``the speaker," but McGee was never charged, and he denied any involvement with the case. Bulger's name did not surface during the trial.

Yesterday, after Fitzpatrick finished testifying in a civil suit in US District Court, he told a reporter that the FBI was ``getting a lot of information about the flow of the money . . . there were allegations that [Bulger] might get money, that he was part of this chain."

Fitzpatrick said that Bulger was known as someone ``who could make deals go through" at the State House, and that the FBI thought Piro might enlist Bulger's help for the liquor licenses.

Fitzpatrick acknowledged, however, that there was no evidence that Bulger ever got any money from Piro.

``The investigation ended quite abruptly," Fitzpatrick said.

A Boston lawyer, R. Robert Popeo , who represented Piro in the criminal case and who represented Bulger on unrelated matters in the 1980s, called Fitzpatrick's claims ``preposterous."

He said that Bulger's name had never surfaced during the case and that the government never produced ``a scintilla of evidence" that there was a leak to Piro.

``It's clearly revisionist history," Popeo said, adding: ``They never had evidence then [of a leak], and they don't have it now."

Fitzpatrick said Monday that after Piro returned the money, the FBI launched a leak inquiry.

In the courthouse hallway yesterday, Fitzpatrick said that he and the US attorney at the time, William F. Weld, who became the governor, interviewed a retired FBI agent, Dennis Condon, about whether he had leaked information about the Piro investigation.

Condon had worked in the organized crime squad of the FBI's Boston office and had had dealings with James ``Whitey" Bulger and his sidekick, Stephen ``The Rifleman" Flemmi, both longtime informants. But, Fitzpatrick said, Condon denied having been involved in leaking information.

Condon's lawyer, Michael B. Meyer , said yesterday that Condon retired from the FBI in May 1977, and that he ``therefore was not in a position to leak, and did not leak, anything."

Yesterday was Fitzpatrick's sixth and final day on the stand in a $50 million wrongful death suit filed against the government by the family of John McIntyre, a Quincy fisherman who was murdered on Nov. 30, 1984.

McIntyre's mother, Emily, and brother, Christopher, have asserted that the government had negligently caused McIntyre's death because of the FBI's mishandling of James ``Whitey" Bulger and Flemmi.

Flemmi testified this month that he and Bulger had killed McIntyre because an FBI agent, John J. Connolly Jr., had warned them that McIntyre was cooperating against them.

END

Los Angeles Times

June 21, 2006

Man Renews 20-Year Battle for Citizenship

John Spano, Times Staff Writer

A man at the center of a long-running immigration legal fight that came to be known as the "L.A. 8" case returned to court\l "l" Tuesday to renew his two-decade-long quest for citizenship.

Aiad Barakat, 45, walked with a pronounced limp to the witness stand in federal court downtown and in halting English fielded a barrage of questions in a bid to avoid deportation.

Almost 20 years ago, federal officials sought to deport Barakat and seven others because of their association with causes promoting Palestinian statehood, such as the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine.

The eight were never accused of an act of terrorism or of any other crime.

Rather, they were targeted for deportation\l "l" on the grounds that they allegedly had raised money for the Popular Front, a group the government suspected of terrorist activities.

The group won a victory in 1989 when a judge struck down as unconstitutional portions of a federal law that allowed deportation to be based on political affiliation and advocacy. The charges against the L.A. 8 have been reworked at least three times since, reflecting changes in immigration and anti-terrorism laws, some of which were tailored to be applied retroactively to this case.

Constitutional questions are not at issue in the current case. The only question in court Tuesday was whether Barakat should be denied citizenship for allegedly lying about his association with Palestinian advocate Ali Kased when he sought U.S. citizenship.

The government plans to introduce an FBI surveillance videotape of a meeting Barakat attended with Kased, described as a prominent Palestinian activist, in 1985 outside of Los Angeles. The meeting purportedly lasted two hours and dealt with Palestinian causes and fundraising.

"Mr. Barakat gave false testimony to obtain an immigration benefit, and thus he is not a person of good moral character," the government asserted in court papers.

Barakat's lawyers insist he had a right to engage in political activity and said he may not have remembered the meeting when questioned by immigration officials. U.S. District Judge Steven V. Wilson is presiding over the case, which is scheduled to continue today.

END

ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH

By Michael D. Sorkin

06/21/2006

Missouri officials demand AT&T records

State regulators in Missouri have issued subpoenas to AT&T, demanding to know whether the company is violating consumer privacy laws by sharing customer phone and Internet records with the government.

The subpoenas set a deadline of July 12. They seek records and company officials to testify under oath.

The subpoenas, along with a growing number of legal challenges here and elsewhere, set the stage for confrontations between civil liberties and national security - and between state and federal governments.

The challenges accuse the government of abusing anti-terrorism laws, and AT&T of allowing government agencies to monitor millions of phone calls and e-mails without legal authority.

For its part, AT&T says it is bound by national security laws not to reveal what it might have done.

Confrontation of some sort seems all but certain. The regulators served their subpoenas Monday after receiving a letter last week from AT&T that says the company cannot and will not answer any questions.

The letter also pointed to New Jersey, where the state attorney general issued subpoenas last week. The Justice Department responded by suing in federal court to block them.

The government asserts that the subpoenas require the phone company to confirm or deny the existence of sensitive information that "cannot be confirmed or denied without causing exceptionally grave harm to the national security."

The subpoenas here and in New Jersey essentially ask whether the phone company is turning over information to the government simply by request - without any court order or search warrant.

In Missouri, Commissioners Steve Gaw and Robert Clayton of the state Public Service Commission have repeatedly written AT&T and its affiliates, asking for the company's legal authority to give the government customer calling information.

AT&T doesn't admit sharing the information - but doesn't deny it, either.

In his letter to the Missouri officials last week, Alfred G. Richter Jr., senior AT&T vice president and general counsel and secretary, said that even advising whether or not the company has provided information to the National Security Agency "could place the company in violation of federal law."

The two Missouri commissioners say they are responding to disclosures in USA Today and The New York Times that AT&T secretly gave the government records revealing who millions of customers have talked to.

In Illinois, a spokeswoman says Attorney General Lisa Madigan's office is watching the controversy but has not decided whether to take action.

Meanwhile, a customer's civil suit filed in St. Louis Circuit Court, seeking damages from AT&T over the issue, is currently in U.S. District Court in St. Louis.

On another front, a federal judge in San Francisco will hear arguments Friday on the government's motion to dismiss the Electronic Frontier Foundation's class-action lawsuit against AT&T.

END

National Public Radio

June 20, 2006

By Julie Rovner

Supreme Court to Hear 'Partial-Birth' Abortion Cases

The Supreme Court has agreed to broaden its look at abortion restrictions in next year's term.

When President Bush signed the Partial Birth Abortion Ban Act in 2003, opponents of the measure filed three separate lawsuits challenging its constitutionality in New York, Nebraska and San Francisco. In all three suits, both district and appeals courts struck down the measure as written.

In February the Supreme Court agreed to hear the Nebraska case, and now it has added the San Francisco case to next year's docket. The two are expected to be merged and heard as one.

Despite the unanimity in the lower courts, however, the case is being watched closely by those on both sides of the abortion dispute. The last decision on the issue, six years ago, was a 5-4 ruling. And one of those voting with abortion-rights advocates was Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. She's now been replaced by Justice Samuel Alito, who's considered likely to rule the other way.

High Court Rejects State Challenge to Medicare Drug Law

June 19, 2006 --The Supreme Court has rejected a suit filed by several states to invalidate a key part of the new Medicare prescription drug law.

DOJ_NMG_0036678

Five states, led by Texas, went directly to the Supreme Court in March. They're challenging a piece of the Medicare law known as the "clawback." The idea is that with the federal government taking over from the states the drug costs of those patients on both Medicare and Medicaid, states would get a windfall. The clawback requires states to return most of those savings to Washington.

But many states say they were doing a better job at holding down drug costs than the new program does, and the clawback will actually cost them money.

The Supreme Court, however, did not rule on the merits of the issue. It simply ruled the suit needs to go through the lower federal courts first.

South Dakota Abortion Ban Faces Ballot

June 19, 2006 -- South Dakota's sweeping abortion ban won't go into effect next month as scheduled. Opponents have gathered enough signatures to force the law to the November ballot.

The secretary of state has certified that a petition drive has resulted in more than the 16,700 signatures needed to force the ban to the ballot. The law signed earlier this spring would ban virtually all abortions in the state.

The legislature purposely went further in the law than the U.S. Supreme Court has allowed under the landmark 1973 ruling Roe v. Wade. The intent was to give the newly configured court a way to revisit abortion rights in general.

But rather than suing, abortion rights advocates instead have so far concentrated on defeating the measure at the ballot box.

END

Manitoba Co-operator

By Ron Friesen

Some people never quit.

The American ranchers group R-CALF will ask the same U.S. Appeal Court which twice before rejected their case against Canadian cattle imports for another hearing.

R-CALF is appealing Montana District Court Judge Richard Cebull's decision in April not to reopen the case.

The group said last week it will ask the U.S. Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals to remand the case against a United States Department of Agriculture (USDA) rule, allowing imports of cattle under 30 months of age from Canada, back to Judge Cebull.

"We remain frustrated that there has never been full consideration of the merits of our case," said Chuck Kiker, R-CALF president, in a June 6 statement.

Cebull originally granted a preliminary injunction in March 2005 against the USDA's UTM (under-30-month) rule. A three-judge Appeal Court panel reversed it in July 2005, saying Cebull failed to give USDA sufficient deference.

R-CALF asked the entire 47-judge Appeal Court to consider the case, but was denied.
The organization went back to Cebull in January 2006 requesting a full hearing into a permanent injunction against cattle from Canada.

In his April 2006 ruling, Cebull said the Appeal Court had instructed him to abide by a "deferential standard" and his "hands are tied."

Now R-CALF is asking the Appeal Court to overrule Cebull's decision not to hold a hearing.

DOJ_NMG_0036679

John Masswohl, international relations director for the Canadian Cattlemen's Association, dismissed R-CALF's latest effort as "a fund-raising gimmick."

Masswohl suggested R-CALF is whipping a dead cow by asking the Appeal Court to hear a case which has already been decided.

"Even if I were in the R-CALF camp, I'd have to wonder why they continue to throw money down a hole," Masswohl said.

"I can't see anything legally wrong with the decision Judge Cebull reached. I can't see that there's been any new information."

Masswohl rejected R-CALF's claim that the courts have never ruled on the merits of the case.
He wondered why R-CALF was taking another run at the case when it issued a statement in April saying the judicial process had come to a halt and it would focus on stopping a second USDA rule to admit cattle over 30 months (OTM) of age from Canada.

The USDA is still developing the long-expected OTM rule, which is not expected until 2007. R-CALF is almost sure to challenge it legally as well when it comes out.

Masswohl said a new Canadian import policy on bluetongue disease may take some wind out of R-CALF's sails. The Canadian Food Inspection Agency says it will remove bluetongue restrictions for cattle and other ruminants imported year-round into Western Canada from the U.S.

U.S. cattle producers have long objected to Canada's import rules for bluetongue, calling them an unfair trade barrier.

Masswohl said a number of American ranchers joined R-CALF because of the bluetongue restrictions. With the limits removed, R-CALF loses one of its reasons to retaliate against Canada, he said.

END

Wired News

Wednesday, June 21, 2006

By Jennifer Granick

Editorial: Secrecy Mustn't Crush Rule of Law

Are there any legal limits to what the executive branch can do in the name of national security, or is it anything goes?

In separate federal lawsuits challenging the warrantless surveillance of American citizens, the Bush administration argues that courts must dismiss cases claiming that the National Security Agency has broken the law because those claims implicate "state secrets."

On Friday of this week, U.S. District Judge Vaughn Walker sitting in San Francisco will hear arguments on the issue in Hepting v. AT&T, a class action claiming that the telecommunications giant has been collaborating with the NSA in illegally eavesdropping on millions of Americans' calls and e-mails. (Disclosures: Last week, professor Susan Freiwald and our Stanford Center for Internet and Society filed a law professors' amicus brief on behalf of the plaintiffs in Hepting. Wired News has also filed motions to intervene in the case and asked the court to make public evidence filed under seal of AT&T's alleged wiretapping activities.)

Later in the month, Judge Anna Diggs Taylor in Detroit will hear similar arguments in ACLU v. National Security Agency (NSA), a case brought against the NSA by journalists claiming the surveillance program has dried up sources and interfered with the plaintiffs' ability to gather news.

The stakes are high, and sight of them should not be lost among the citations to cases from the 1870s or the redacted pleadings referencing classified arguments and evidence lodged in a secure location in Washington, D.C., for sequestered review by the sitting judges.

The way the government has asserted the state-secrets privilege means these courts will do more than answer the already serious question of what protection official secrets deserve in a democratic government. The judges will be deciding whether the rule of law applies to any party, whether an agency of the government or a private company, acting in the realm of national security.

DOJ_NMG_0036680

The government has already been wildly successful in using the state-secrets privilege to completely shield itself from appropriate punishment for shocking and illegal behavior in El-Masri v. Tenet.

Khaled El-Masri was abducted, sodomized and beaten over five months of detention at the hands of CIA agents or their operatives. Eventually, the government realized it had kidnapped the wrong person and, luckily, released him.

El-Masri sued the head of the CIA, claiming the agency authorized his kidnapping and torture as part of the U.S. "rendition program." Though German prosecutors back up El-Masri's story and though the United States has admitted and lauded the practice of rendition, the government successfully moved to dismiss the lawsuit on the grounds of state secrets.

The trial judge dismissed El-Masri's case because litigating it would reveal operational details as to means and methods, persons, companies or governments involved. I suppose we're fortunate the CIA operatives didn't kill El-Masri to protect the world from learning about the "operational details" of rendition. Though if they had, his family would have had no legal recourse against his murderers.

The government is attempting to build on the anomaly of its victory in El-Masri v. Tenet to push for complete dismissal on state-secrets grounds in other cases where it has acted illegally. If this claim prevails, then executive agencies can act with impunity if part of a national intelligence effort, regardless of efforts by Congress, the courts or the international community to set rules of engagement. This Friday, Walker will take the issue up with lawyers from the government, AT&T and the Electronic Frontier Foundation.

In Hepting v. AT&T, the EFF represents a class of plaintiffs comprised of AT&T customers. Based on documents from Mark Klein, a former AT&T employee, the plaintiffs claim that AT&T has been illegally diverting their communications to the NSA.

The United States moved to intervene in the case, arguing that the claims should be dismissed because litigation would disclose intelligence information, sources and methods. The government claims neither it nor AT&T may confirm or deny the existence, scope and potential targets of intelligence activities because there is a reasonable danger that national security would be harmed by the disclosure. If this claim is true, then the court must dismiss the case.

Thus, much of the argument Friday will be about whether the case requires information that is, in fact, secret.

The public knows that telecommunications carriers like AT&T have both the capability and often the legal responsibility to intercept communications, and that the government often asks them to do so. The fact that the government is listening to phone calls and that AT&T is involved is not secret.

The only issue is whether AT&T eavesdropped with court authorization.

But court authorization isn't secret either. It's a piece of paper signed by a judge. Sensitive details contained in that court order can be excised, received under seal, reviewed by the judge in chambers (in camera review) or handled any number of ways that courts use to deal with confidential information.

The public knows this case is a challenge to the government's previously secret program of warrantless surveillance. But the plaintiffs have had to argue they can prove AT&T illegally intercepted its customers' private calls without needing any evidence of the government's surveillance program in order to avoid the state-secrets ax.

It's one of the many Kafkaesque turns in the case, though certainly no more strange than the government's assertion that the court -- even if it were to review the evidence outside of the public eye and find the government acted illegally -- could not then award damages because to do so would confirm the plaintiffs' allegations.

One improvement might be to disfavor claims of state-secrets privilege in cases directly challenging the legality of U.S. conduct in the national-security arena. This rule particularly would make sense when the facts on which the plaintiff is depending to make his case are already available from unclassified sources. El-Masri knows what the CIA did to him, and German authorities back him up. Klein's documents showing AT&T's mass surveillance are in the public record. The only secret is whether the defendant -- the CIA, the NSA or AT&T -- has a legitimate excuse.

This idea arguably goes against case law stating that if "the very subject matter of the action" is a state secret, then the case should be dismissed. That language comes from an 1875 case involving a lawsuit for breach of a contract to pay a secret agent under a government contract for clandestine services, and a 1953 negligence lawsuit brought by widows whose husbands had been killed in the crash of a military airplane carrying electronic surveillance equipment. However, in those cases, the state secret was separate and apart from the plaintiffs' claims of wrongdoing. In El-Masri and the pending surveillance cases, the government's illegal behavior is the very thing it seeks to keep secret.

Perhaps my idea also seems uncomfortably suspicious of national-security claims at a time when international terrorism is on the rise and national security is of pre-eminent importance. The healthier skepticism I suggest does not mean courts will disfavor national-security claims that arise in the normal course of litigation, but only that they will be suspicious of state-secret claims that shield government wrongdoing from judicial review and remedy, particularly when the plaintiffs have made out a case from independent investigation, record collection and expert testimony.

DOJ_NMG_0036681

The judges in the Hepting and ACLU cases have to draw the line between protecting legitimate state secrets and protecting illegal activity connected to the war on terror. Illegal programs like rendition and warrantless wiretapping do not keep America safe. They undermine our democracy by violating civil rights and ignoring the rule of law.

END

DOJ_NMG_0036682

Image not available for this document, ID: 0.7.10316.6365-000001

From: Ames, Andrew
Sent: Thursday, June 22, 2006 10:46 AM
To: Ames, Andrew; Baxter, Felix (CIV); Blomquist, Kathleen M; Branda, Joyce (CIV); Brett Gerry; Brody, Stephen (CIV); Bucholtz, Jeffrey (CIV); Bukvics, Jennifer (CIV); Claterbos, Barbara (CIV); Cohen, David M. (CIV); Cohn, Jonathan (CIV); Davidson, Jeanne (CIV); Davis, Dan (CIV); Fargo, John (CIV); Fielding, Gabrielle (CIV); Figley, Paul (CIV); Flentje, August (CIV); Frost, Peter (CIV); Garren, Timothy (CIV); Glynn, J.Patrick (CIV); Gorsuch, Neil M; Hertz, Michael (CIV); Hollis, Robert (CIV); Hunt, Jody (CIV); Hussey, Thom (CIV); Jennifer Brosnahan; Jeweler, James (CIV); Katsas, Gregory (CIV); Keisler, Peter D (CIV); Kohn, Chris (CIV); Kopp, Robert (CIV); Letter, Douglas (CIV); Levine, Larry (EOIR); Lindemann, Michael (CIV); Magnuson, Cynthia; McCallum, Robert (SMO); Miller, Charles S; Nichols, Carl (CIV); Nowacki, John; Pyles, Phyllis (CIV); Riley, Sharon (CIV); Rivera, Jennifer (CIV); Roehrkasse, Brian; Schiffer, Stuart (CIV); Scolinos, Tasia; Seidel, Rebecca; Senger, Jeffrey M; Spellberg, Dianne (CIV); Swenson, Lily F; Thirolf, Eugene; Wilson, Karen L; Zwick, Ken (CIV)
Subject: 6/22/06 Civil Division News

U.S. claims 'state secrets privilege' in Oregon case

Judge May Deny Bid to End NSA Suit

Feds Want Eavesdropping Suits Combined

Raytheon looking to settle overcharging case

Government makes arguments in renewed effort to deport Palestinian

Former agent says leaks to Bulger not a concern; Account rebuts earlier testimony

American Indian-owned Armor Plant Raided By Federal Agents

Bush: Move all spy cases to D.C.

The Oregonian

June 22, 2006

U.S. claims 'state secrets privilege' in Oregon case

U.S. Justice Department lawyers Wednesday claimed that state secrets would be revealed if a federal judge did not dismiss an Oregon lawsuit challenging a National Security Agency warrantless eavesdropping program.

Government lawyers had promised in earlier court papers that they would assert the "state secrets privilege," which has almost always resulted in dismissal of civil lawsuits during the past 50 years.

The Al-Haramain Islamic Foundation in late February filed a lawsuit claiming that the NSA illegally eavesdropped on phone conversations between one of the group's directors in Saudi Arabia and U.S. attorneys for the Ashland-based charity.

Al-Haramain attorneys filed a sealed document with the court that they claimed was proof of the eavesdropping. The government says the top-secret document was inadvertently given to Al-Haramain attorneys and should be returned, and they have filed secret explanations to the judge.

More than two dozen lawsuits have been filed around the country this year challenging NSA surveillance programs.

DOJ_NMG_0036684

On Monday, the government moved to consolidate them in one courtroom in Washington, D.C. There, federal lawyers say they will seek dismissal on the grounds that the suits threaten to reveal state secrets

END

Los Angeles Times

6/22/06

Judge May Deny Bid to End NSA Suit

The federal government has claimed 'state secrets privilege' in seeking the dismissal of a rights group's domestic spying case against AT&T.

By Joseph Menn
Times Staff Writer

SAN FRANCISCO — A federal judge weighing one of the first lawsuits against the National Security Agency's domestic spying efforts has asked the government how the case should proceed if he refuses authorities' request to dismiss it.

The series of questions U.S. District Judge Vaughn Walker published Tuesday implied that he was reluctant to grant the government motion to end the case under the "state secrets privilege," a powerful argument that usually succeeds in quashing litigation.

"They certainly suggest that he has not been convinced by the government's argument and that he is considering denying the government's motion," said George Washington University law professor Jonathan Turley, who is involved in a separate case related to NSA activities.

Among other things, Walker asked the lawyers whether he should grant an interim request known as an interlocutory appeal "regardless how the court decides" on the motion to dismiss, which is scheduled for a hearing Friday.

That type of appeal would be relevant only if he declined to dismiss the case, said Shane Kadidal, an attorney with the Center for Constitutional Rights, a civil liberties group challenging the NSA elsewhere.

Walker also asked a series of questions about appointing an expert to advise him on the secrecy aspects of specific pieces of evidence, which would make sense only if the case continued.

Another civil liberties group, the Electronic Frontier Foundation, filed the suit against AT&T Corp. on behalf of Internet and phone users, accusing it of violating wiretap and other laws by sharing customer calling records with the NSA.

After the suit was filed, it was bolstered by the participation of former AT&T technician Mark Klein, who provided documents detailing a secured secret room where copies of all e-mails sent through the company's San Francisco hub were collected.

More than 20 suits now address one aspect or another of the NSA's domestic programs, but Walker could become the first judge to rule on the state secrets claim.

An appeal of that ruling is likely.

Also this week, the government asked a judicial panel to consolidate many of the cases in Washington.

Justice Department spokesman Charles Miller said he had no comment. "It's ongoing litigation," he said. "We will be in court on Friday, and we will argue our case."

AT&T spokesman Walt Sharp said the company wouldn't go beyond an earlier statement in which it said that it provides information to authorities "strictly within the law and under the most stringent conditions."

END

Oregon Public Broadcasting

6/22/06

Feds Want Eavesdropping Suits Combined

By Colin Fogarty

PORTLAND, OR

The US Department of Justice is trying to consolidate lawsuits over the Bush administration's domestic eavesdropping program, including a case in Portland. Colin Fogarty reports.

The lawsuit by the defunct Islamic charity Al Haramain is one of more than 20 cases across the country over a program allowing the National Security Agency to listen in on conversations without a warrant.

This week, government attorneys asked the Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation to merge all the cases into one before a judge in Washington DC.

Attorneys for groups suing the administration say the government is just shopping for a more sympathetic venue.

But Department of Justice spokesman Charles Miller says one case would be more efficient than far flung lawsuits across the country.

"Oh it's much more practical than tactical, having everyone in one place, with one judge listening to the same or similar cases."

The government is trying to convince judges to dismiss the lawsuits, arguing they would reveal state secrets.

Attorneys for Al Haramain expect the Justice Department to make that claim in Portland soon.

END

Wichita Eagle (KS)

June 22, 2006

Raytheon looking to settle overcharging case

BY TONY CAPACCIO AND ROBERT SCHMIDT, Bloomberg News

Raytheon Co.' s aircraft unit is negotiating with the U.S. Justice Department over allegations the company charged too much for parts used to build training planes for the Air Force and Navy, people familiar with the talks said.

The possible civil settlement would address findings of a criminal investigation into the activities of Darleen Druyun, the Air Force's former N 2 acquisition official, who was jailed in 2005 for violating conflict-of-interest laws.

The Raytheon contract was awarded by Druyun as part of a $4.5 billion program, one of 11 in which she was involved that have been reviewed by the Defense Department's inspector general.

Jim Cross, a spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office in Wichita, which is handling the settlement talks, declined to comment. Jackie Berger, a spokesman for the Wichita-based aircraft unit of Raytheon, confirmed the existence of the Pentagon probe while also declining to comment on any settlement talks.

Raytheon, the fifth-largest U.S. defense contractor, is "fully cooperating" with the Pentagon probe, Berger said. "We believe the company's actions have been entirely consistent with all legal requirements."

An unreleased Pentagon audit, dated April 12, valued the training-plane contract at $1.56 billion. The audit, which didn't cite specific instances of inflated prices, said the price per aircraft increased 23 percent in a year, to $4.8 million from $3.9 million, in part because the Air Force decided to buy fewer planes.

The contract was awarded in two sections starting in December 2000 and covered production of 349 aircraft, training equipment and technical manuals.

Druyun was sentenced in October 2004 to nine months in prison for discussing a job with Boeing Co. at the same time she was negotiating a now-canceled $23 billion aerial-refueling tanker program with the company.

Druyun, along with other Pentagon officials, advocated a streamlined weapons contracting procedure that required less documentation of costs. Raytheon's contract for the training aircraft exempted the company from a federal purchasing rule that would have required it to provide certified data on costs to back up its charges.

The contract structure increased the Air Force's "risk of paying excessive prices" for the aircraft, the audit said.

Contract changes

Raytheon has agreed to provide certified cost data in the remaining production contracts under negotiation, according to Jim Smith, vice president for government business at Raytheon Aircraft.

Smith, in a telephone interview, denied that Raytheon's prices were inflated. Still, he said he understood why the Air Force wanted to change the contract structure.

A breakdown in communications led to questions on pricing "and, on some parts, the perception of overpricing," he said.

While the new contract demands won't have a financial impact on Raytheon Aircraft, "it's a fairly significant change for us in the way we deal with suppliers," Smith said. "I want to make sure we don't add program costs."

The new procedures to be followed will allow the Air Force to "know the cost of every nut, bolt and component," Smith said. Providing that level of detail "creates a lot more effort on our part."

Raytheon Aircraft generated $493 million in net sales in the first quarter of this year, which accounted for about 9 percent of Raytheon's overall net sales of $5.3 billion in that period. The aircraft unit's sales were up 12 percent from the first quarter in 2005.

The training plane program represents just less than 20 percent of the aircraft unit's business, Smith said.

END

AP

June 22, 2006

Government makes arguments in renewed effort to deport Palestinian

LOS ANGELES_Government lawyers plan to deliver closing arguments in an L-A courtroom today in their effort to deport a a 45-year-old Palestinian they've wanted out of the country for decades.

Aiad Barakat was accused of raising money for the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine. It was accused of terror attacks in the 1970s. But he was never formally accused of terrorism.

Now the government is alleging Barakat lied about his association with political groups in his bid to obtain citizenship.

Government lawyers yesterday showed a tape from a hidden camera that showed Barakat at a meeting of a Palestinian advocacy group's weekend retreat in the San Bernardino Mountains.

They said a statement one participant makes in Arabic about the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine shows Barakat belongs to the group.

But Barakat's lawyers are questioning the government's translations, and say the government's argument infers too much and offers too little proof.

END

DOJ_NMG_0036687

Boston Globe

June 22, 2006

Former agent says leaks to Bulger not a concern; Account rebuts earlier testimony

By Shelley Murphy, Globe Staff

A retired FBI agent testified yesterday that he used ``super caution'' while investigating longtime FBI informants James ``Whitey'' Bulger and Stephen ``The Rifleman'' Flemmi for murder in the early 1980s, but insisted he was never concerned that other agents were leaking information to them.

Gerald T. Montanari , who retired in 1999 after 30 years with the FBI , took the stand yesterday in US District Court as the government launched its defense against a $50 million wrongful death suit brought by the family of a man who was killed in 1984 by Flemmi and, allegedly, Bulger.

Montanari, rebuting earlier testimony by another agent, testified that he never complained in 1982 that then FBI agent John J. Connolly Jr. was rifling his files and leaking information to Bulger and Flemmi.

``The situation with John Connolly was a little awkward, because I knew he had these informants,'' Montanari said. He added that he had no ``specific concerns'' about leaks while investigating claims by Edward ``Brian'' Halloran that Bulger and Flemmi were involved in the 1981 slaying of Roger Wheeler, a Tulsa businessman who owned World Jai Alai.

``Maybe I was more cautious, so at some point if something went wrong, we could say we did everything to protect the information,'' Montanari said.

Something did go wrong.

In May 1982, Halloran was gunned down on Boston's waterfront. Two months later, John Callahan , who had also been implicated by Halloran in the Wheeler slaying, was killed in Miami.

FBI officials in Washington decided to drop Flemmi as an informant in September 1982, but still used Bulger, citing him as an invaluable informant against local Mafia leaders, according to FBI documents filed in court.

They began using Flemmi again in 1986, however.

Montanari defended the FBI's decision to continue using Bulger as an informant, saying that Halloran's allegations were ``all uncorroborated.''

Montanari will resume testifying today in the civil case brought by the family of John McIntyre , a Quincy fisherman. The McIntyres say the FBI's mishandling of Bulger and Flemmi caused McIntyre's killing.

Earlier in the trial, Flemmi testified that he and Bulger killed McIntyre on Nov. 30, 1984, after Connolly told them McIntyre was cooperating against them. Flemmi said they learned McIntyre had implicated them in an unsuccessful plot to ship weapons to the Irish Republican Army aboard the Valhalla, a Gloucester trawler.

Flemmi is serving a life sentence for killing 10 people, including McIntyre, Wheeler, and Callahan. Bulger, who is wanted in 19 murders, has been a fugitive since 1995. Connolly is serving a 10-year prison term for racketeering and helping Bulger evade capture.

Philip Brady , a retired US Customs Service agent, testified yesterday that McIntyre provided ``nothing significant'' against Bulger and Flemmi during his meetings with Customs and the FBI, while focusing mostly on the operation of Charlestown gangster Joseph Murray, who was involved in the Valhalla. McIntyre gave information that led to the seizure of the Ramsland, a freighter smuggling 36 tons of marijuana into Boston Harbor, Brady said.

Brady said McIntyre declined an offer to join the Federal Witness Protection program, even after Murray announced that he knew a member of his crew had told authorities about the Ramsland . ``Murray sat them all down and said, `We know one of you ratted this out and when I found out who, I'm going to kill you,' '' said Brady.

But McIntyre ``didn't think he was in danger,'' said Brady. ``He reported it with a smirk.''

END

The Associated Press

By JAMES MacPHERSON,

Thursday, June 22, 2006

American Indian-owned Armor Plant Raided By Federal Agents

BISMARCK, N.D. -- Federal agents raided an American Indian-owned armor plant based in Fort Totten on Wednesday, confiscating boxes of company records under a search warrant involving questionable business practices.

Assistant U.S. Attorney David Peterson said Sioux Manufacturing Corp. was under investigation by the Justice Department and the U.S. attorney's office for "alleged contract irregularities." He would not elaborate.

"There were some agents at the site" from the Justice Department and the FBI, he said.

FBI special agent Paul McCabe in Minneapolis said one FBI agent participated in the raid.

"We're just assisting in a liaison capacity," he said.

The plant, which opened in 1974, manufactures protective armor for soldiers, tanks, ships and aircraft.

The plant is owned by the Spirit Lake Sioux tribe, on the Spirit Lake reservation in northeastern North Dakota. The tribe, which numbers about 5,000, also owns a casino and other manufacturing businesses on the reservation.

Nearly all employees at the armor plant are American Indians.

Crystal McKay, a receptionist at the tribal office, said the plant had shut down Wednesday during the raid and employees were told to go home. The plant runs three shifts and had been operating nonstop since the war in Iraq began.

Carl McKay, the company's president and chief executive officer, did not immediately return telephone calls left by The Associated Press at his office and at his home in New Rockford.

McKay said last year that the company was on pace to surpass $20 million in revenue for 2005, a record.

The company reported a record $17 million in revenue in 2003. Officials said revenue was down slightly in 2004 because of a shortage of special fibers used for the bulletproof material that protects U.S. troops.

END

The Detroit News

Thursday, June 22, 2006

Bush: Move all spy cases to D.C.

By Gregg Krupa

DETROIT -- The Bush administration is seeking to consolidate all court challenges to domestic spying programs operated by the National Security Agency into one case in Washington, D.C.

If granted, a motion by lawyers for the U.S. Department of Justice, filed in Washington this week, would move a challenge in Detroit by a host of plaintiffs to the federal district court in Washington. The Detroit case is the first in the country to be heard in open court, and a further hearing is scheduled for July 10 before U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs Taylor.

In making the request of the federal Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation, the Justice Department supports an effort by Verizon Communications to try multiple suits challenging the telecommunications giant's purported cooperation with the NSA in one jurisdiction.

The Bush administration, however, seeks to expand the Verizon filing beyond cases involving the NSA's collection of phone records to also include several electronic eavesdropping cases.

"Each of these cases puts at issue alleged foreign intelligence surveillance activities undertaken by the United States government," lawyers for the department asserted in the 22-page memorandum. The unusual issues presented by the diverse cases would be dealt with most efficiently in one court, while protecting "highly sensitive and classified information," they said.

Disclosure of the information "would be harmful to the national security," the lawyers said.

Some legal experts said the consolidation would be unusual in civil liberties cases. But others noted that it is also highly unusual for so many civil liberties cases to be filed at the same time in multiple jurisdictions.

Unanimously, the legal experts also pointed out that the federal bench in Washington is far more considerate of the presidents' assertions of power than other district courts across the country.

"This seems very unprecedented," said Robert Sedler, an expert on constitutional law and a professor at Wayne State University. "Typically, the (multidistrict) panel gets involved when there are claims arising from the same incident, like an airline crash. These are constitutional cases, and the facts differ from case to case."

But Philip Heymann, a professor at Harvard Law School and a former Justice Department official, said that hearing all of the cases in one action makes some sense.

"But anyone who would do it would do it for tactical reasons," Heymann said. "They think the District of Columbia jurisdiction would be a more sympathetic jurisdiction."

Officials at the Department of Justice declined comment, referring only to the legal memorandum on file.

DOJ_NMG_0036690

Image not available for this document, ID: 0.7.10316.6174-000001

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Friday, June 23, 2006 8:06 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Attorney General's News Briefing for Friday, June 23, 2006
Attachments:	agnb060623.pdf; agnb060623.doc

This morning's Attorney General's News Briefing is attached.

Website: You can also read today's briefing, including searchable archive of past editions, at http://www.BulletinNews.com/justice.

Full-text Links: Clicking the hypertext links in our write-ups will take you to the newspapers' original full-text articles.

Interactive Table of Contents: Clicking a page number on the table of contents page will take you directly to that story.

Contractual Obligations and Copyright: This copyrighted material is for the internal use of US Department of Justice employees only and, by contract, may not be redistributed without BulletinNewsâ€™ express written consent.

Contact Information: Please contact us any time at 703-749-0040 or Justice-Editors@BulletinNews.com. Use of this email address will automatically result in your message being delivered to everyone involved with your service, including senior management. Thank you.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: FRIDAY, JUNE 23, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

DOJ Argues For Dismissal Of NSA Surveillance Suit 3
Treasury Secretly Tracks Terror Suspects' Financial Data 3
Guantanamo Documentary Said To Be Flawed 4

Homeland Response:

FBI Raid Nabs Terrorists In Miami 4
Mueller Says US Is Much Safer Now Than Before 9/11 5
Cities Considering Bans On Chemical Rail Shipments 6
Arguments Heard In 9/11 Workers' Toxic Exposure Case 6

War News:

In Budapest, Bush Draws Parallel Between Iraq War, Hungary's Freedom Struggle 6
Top US Officials, GOP Lawmakers Say WMD Found In Iraq 7
Senate Rejects Democratic Measures Calling For US Withdrawal From Iraq 8
Casey Says Iran Helping Iraqi Insurgents 10
Iraqi Police Free 17 Hostages 11
Amnesty Plan Won't Apply To Those Who Have Attacked Iraqis Or "Friends Of Iraq." 11
Professor Says Alleged US Atrocities In Iraq Were Inevitable 11
US Officials Say Taliban Controls One-Third Of Afghanistan 11
Zawahiri Urges Afghans To Rebel Against Government In New Video 12
Stolen Documents Show US Located Top Tier Al Qaeda Terrorists In Pakistan 12

Corporate Scandals:

UT Starcom Examines Allegations Of Bribery 12
SEC Reportedly Probing Big Hedge Fund 13
SEC Says Scientific-Atlanta Aided Adelphia Fraud 13

Criminal Law:

Cheney Says He May Be Called As A Witness In Libby Trial 13
Three Guards In Tallahassee Jail Shootout Denied Bail 14
FBI Says Private Data Brokers Probably Are Breaking The Law 14
Senate Report On Abramoff Could Be Trouble For Reed, Ney, Norquist 14
Man Who Fled Marshals At Chicago Courthouse Captured 15
Aberdeen Proving Grounds Employees Charged With Fraud 16
Sides Argue Over Jury Instructions In Sorich Trial 16
Prosecutors Deny Vindictiveness, Oppose Wecht Motion To Dismiss 16
Mack A No-Show For Surrendering To Authorities 16
"Mob Cops'" Former Lawyers To Testify Defending Their Representation 16
Former Head Of Boston FBI Testifies He Didn't Know About Bulger, Flemmi Investigations 16
Louisiana Teacher Pleads Guilty To Child Porn Charges 17
Virginia Law Requires Checking Of Prospective Students For Sex Offenses 17
Project Safe Neighborhoods Cracks Down On Louisiana Child Porn 17
Map Dealer Pleads Guilty To Thefts 18
Jury Selection Begins In Baltimore Beheadings Case 18
Medical Experts Say Lethal Injection Methods Can Be Made More Humane 18

Civil Law:

Raytheon Reportedly Discussing Settlement Of Contracting Charges 18
McCain-Feingold Seen As Having Positive Impact 19

Civil Rights:

DOJ Clears Austin, TX, Officer In Fatal 2003 Shooting 19
Justices Sets Wider Standards For Worker Discrimination Suits 19
Pennsylvania Moves Toward Constitutional Amendment Banning Gay Marriage 20

House GOP Said To Show True Colors On Voting Rights Act 20
WNBA Player Decries Education Department Change In Title IX Policy..... 20

Antitrust:

DOJ Approves Exelon's Acquisition Of PSEG 21
US, UK Antitrust Agencies Probing Alleged Airline Price-Fixing 21
EU Has Received No Complaint By Adobe About Microsoft Office 22
SCOTUS Dismisses Closely Watched Patent Case..... 22
Bolloré Will Not Pursue Merger With Aegis 23
Mittal May Boost Bid For Arcelor 23
Univision Auction Draws Little Interest 23
WSJournal Criticizes FCC Extension Of Universal Service Fund To Internet..... 23
LATimes Criticizes Move To Regulate Internet Based On Network Neutrality 24

Environment:

US Charges Puerto Rico Utility With Environmental Crimes .. 24
California Supreme Court Denies Review Of Lead Paint Case..... 24
Senate Adds $4 Billion In Emergency Aid For Farmers 24
National Research Council Says Earth Warmest Since 1600 25
Increasing US Reliance On Coal Seen As Unwise..... 26

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Technical Mistake Reveals Conte As Reporter's Source In BALCO Probe..... 26
Defendants In Heroin, Fentanyl Case Face Conspiracy Charges..... 26
New Orleans Police Promise "Massive Presence" Amidst Drug Turf War 27
FBI Announces Arrest Of Drug Ring Members 27
Drug Suspect Arrested Nine Months After Faking His Death . 28
In Florida, Defense Attorneys Seek Dismissal Of Drug Cartel Case..... 28
Texas Woman Gets Life Sentence In Drug Conspiracy Case 28

Immigration:

High Court Decision Clears Way For Summary Deportations 28
House GOP Leaders Deny They Plan To Thwart Immigration Bill..... 29

Tax:

House Votes To Cut Estate Taxes..... 30

Congress-Administration:

House Approves Line-Item Veto..... 31
Rumsfeld Considering Replacements For Abizaid, Jones 31
FTC Computer Stolen 31
Hacker Obtains Information On USDA Employees, Retirees, Contractors 31
Votes Cast In CBP Union Election..... 31
Duvall Says Bush "Much Less Intellectual" Than Clinton, But "Very Bright." 32

Other News:

Economy Expected To Slow In Coming Months 32
Nevada High Court Reviewing Conflict, Favoritism Charges Against Three Judges..... 32
Duncan Drops Out Of Maryland Governor's Race 32
Lieberman Votes On Iraq Troop Withdrawals Could Help Primary Opponent 33
Edwards Calls For Eliminating Poverty By 2036..... 33
Study Finds Stewart's "Daily Show" Promotes Cynicism 33
Rumsfeld, Hadley Say Bush Could Order Shoot-Down Of North Korean Missile 33
Cheney, Rice, Burns Lead India Nuclear Deal Lobbying Effort 34
Bush Support Raises Hope For WTO Deal 35
Olmert And Abbas Meet, Agree To Continue Dialogue 35
Survey Finds Deep Division Between Views Of Muslims, Westerners..... 36
Former DIA Analyst Pleads Guilty To Giving Top Secret Information To China..... 36
NRA Prompts Letter-Writing Protest Of UN Forum On Firearms..... 37
Somali Government, Islamic Faction Sign Ceasefire..... 37
Lack Of Security Could Undercut Congolese Election..... 37
Lopez-Obrador Proposes "New Deal" Building Program 37
Venezuela's Security Council Bid Seen As Linked To Iran Crisis 37
NYTimes Says UN Human Rights Council Membership Rules Flawed 37
Krauthammer Says Australia's Alliance With US "Heartfelt." ... 38

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages 38

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington 39

DOJ_NMG_0036694

TERRORISM NEWS:

DOJ Argues For Dismissal Of NSA Surveillance Suit. The AP (6/23, Kravets) reports, "A lawsuit challenging the Bush administration's domestic spying program must be dismissed because it threatens to reveal state secrets and jeopardize the war on terror, the government says." The AP continues, "The Bush administration plans to make that argument Friday before a San Francisco federal judge, who will hear a case that tests the reach of the president's powers. … The administration argues in legal briefs that the courts cannot decide the constitutionality of the president's asserted wartime powers to eavesdrop on Americans without warrants." The AP adds, "The government is invoking the so-called 'state secrets privilege' in a federal lawsuit filed by a privacy group against communications giant AT&T Inc. over the telecom's alleged involvement in Bush's surveillance program adopted after the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks. … 'Resolution of those legal issues depends entirely on facts that, in light of their highly classified nature, cannot be made the subject of litigation,' the Justice Department wrote in a brief to U.S. District Judge Vaughn Walker. … The legal tactic of state secrets privilege, first recognized by the U.S. Supreme Court in a McCarthy-era lawsuit, has been increasingly and successfully invoked by federal lawyers seeking to shield the government from scrutiny by the courts, from espionage cases and patent disputes to routine employment discrimination lawsuits."

Specter Grills AT&T CEO Over NSA Surveillance Program. ABC World News Tonight (6/22, story 6, 1:40, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The CEO of AT&T appeared before the Senate Judiciary Committee today. Committee Chairman Arlen Specter tried to find out if" stories that "giant phone companies like AT&T were supplying information on their customers' calls to the government" were true. It was a "confrontation that became rather tense." In a sample of the back and forth, Specter asked, "Does your company provide information to the Federal Government or any law enforcement information about customers?" Whitacre: "If it's legal and we're requested to do so, of course we do." Sen. Specter: "Have you?" Whitacre: "Senator, all I'm going to say is we follow the law." Specter concluded by saying, "Well, I think that answer is contemptuous of this committee." Gibson: "The AT&T Chairman did eventually say he couldn't answer because it's classified information to which Senator Specter said, they'd discuss that privately."

AT&T Changes Privacy Policy On Data-Sharing. The AP (6/23) reports, "AT&T Inc. is changing its privacy policy for Internet and television customers to specify that account information is a business record the company owns and can be disclosed to government and law enforcement and to protect the company's 'legitimate business interests.'" The AP continues, "AT&T said that the account information, which includes the customer's name, address, telephone number and e-mail address as well as information about the customer's services, constitute business records and are owned by AT&T. The company said account information doesn't include usage information, such as how a person uses the Web or what programs a person using the company's television service watches." The AP adds, "The company may disclose customer information 'in response to subpoenas, court orders, or other legal process, or to establish or exercise our legal rights or defend against legal claims,' the company said in the policy update, which was sent to 7 million Internet and television customers. … The new policy takes effect Friday."

Treasury Secretly Tracks Terror Suspects' Financial Data. Stories about the Terrorist Finance Tracking Program appeared on the front pages of major US newspapers. The Wall Street Journal (6/23, A1, Simpson, 2.11M) reports, "Since shortly after the Sept. 11, 2001 terrorist attacks, the U.S. Treasury Department has been secretly tracking suspected terrorist financing through a far-reaching program that gives it access to records from" Swift, the network that handles nearly all international financial transfers. The Terrorist Finance Tracking Program "operates under a series of broad U.S. subpoenas." Although "U.S. officials said few American citizens would have financial data that fall under the program, because they are unlikely to engage in international money transfers," the "disclosure of its existence may be controversial in Europe and other parts of the world and within the global banking industry." Treasury Secretary John W. Snow "called the program an 'essential tool' for fighting terror and said it had effective oversight and safeguards," adding, "It is not 'data mining.'" Stuart Levey,

DOJ_NMG_0036695

Treasury's top counter-terrorism official, also said "the data isn't subjected to controversial data-mining techniques."

The New York Times (6/23, A1, Lichtblau, Risen, 1.19M) adds, "Among the safeguards, government officials said, is an outside auditing firm that verifies that the data searches are based on intelligence leads about suspected terrorists." Levey also noted that "one person had been removed from the operation for conducting a search considered inappropriate." In 2003, after Swift executives and some board members "met with Mr. Greenspan, Robert S. Mueller III, the F.B.I. director, and Treasury officials, among others, in what one official described as 'a full-court press'" the Administration "pledged to impose tighter controls" in exchange for continued access to the data.

Notably, "Intelligence officials were so eager to use the Swift data that they discussed having the C.I.A. covertly gain access to the system." The Times calls the program "a significant departure from typical practice in how the government acquires Americans' financial records." Several officials said "access to large amounts of confidential data was highly unusual…and stirred concerns inside the administration about legal and privacy issues." Even one former senior counterterrorism official who considers the program valuable said that "While tight controls are in place…'the potential for abuse is enormous.'" Some current and former government officials also "expressed reservations about the program, saying that what they viewed as an urgent, temporary measure had become permanent nearly five years later without specific Congressional approval or formal authorization."

The Los Angeles Times (6/23, Meyer, Miller, 958K) notes "Current and former U.S. officials say the effort has been only marginally successful against al-Qaida," but the program is valuable for "tracking lower- and mid-level terrorist operatives and financiers who believe they have not been detected and militant groups, such as Hezbollah, Hamas and Palestinian Islamic Jihad, that also operate political and social welfare organizations." The Times calls the program "part of an arsenal of aggressive measures the government has adopted since the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks that yield new intelligence, but also circumvent traditional safeguards against abuse and raise concerns about intrusions on privacy." The Times notes "a former senior Treasury official expressed concern that the SWIFT program allows access to vast quantities of sensitive data that could be abused without safeguards" and "questioned what becomes of the data, some of it presumably related to innocent banking customers."

Administration Asked NYTimes Not To Publish Article. The New York Times (6/23, A1, Lichtblau, Risen, 1.19M) reports "Administration officials…asked The New York Times not to publish" the article on the program and "enlisted several current and former officials, both Democrat and Republican, to vouch for its value." Dana Perino, deputy White House press secretary, said "The president is concerned that once again The New York Times has chosen to expose a classified program that is working to protect our citizens."

Guantanamo Documentary Said To Be Flawed. The Wall Street Journal (6/23, Morgenstern, 2.11M) reviews the documentary "The Road to Guantanamo," calling it "filmmaking with the potential to mold public opinion." But "no facts are to be found here, only personal narratives that may or may not be factual, and remarkably skillful re-creations that invoke twin powers of the film medium -- to dramatize, and to propagandize." USA Today (6/23, 2.31M) also reviews the film, saying it "falls short of greatness by not providing enough insight into the characters. It is mostly intent on inciting a sense of outrage in the viewer, and it succeeds." In his Washington Post (6/23, 744K) review of the movie, Stephen Hunter writes, "Where's the love? There isn't any in any military prison and there hasn't been for 4,000 years. But is this torture? You must make your own call."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

FBI Raid Nabs Terrorists In Miami. CNN (9/22, Cooper) reported that the FBI and state and local police conducted anti-terrorism raids In Miami Thursday. CNN added, "Now at this point, seven people are under arrest. Law enforcement officials tell CNN the individuals being detained are suspected of plotting terrorist attacks inside the United States. According to at least one law enforcement source, some of the possible targets may have included the Sears Tower in Chicago and Miami's FBI offices. Those just two possible targets, according to one law enforcement source telling CNN."

The Washington Post (6/23, A26, Whoriskey, Eggen, 744K) reports that the "suspects were described as supporters of militant Islam but not members of al-Qaeda."

DOJ_NMG_0036696

FBI Special Agent Richard J. Kolko said the "operation was a 'terrorist-related matter' but that 'the individuals arrested posed no immediate threat to the U.S.,'" and law enforcement officials said "the plotting was in its early stages." Also, "as of 9:15 p.m. no weapons or explosives had been seized from the searched locations." The New York Times (6/23, 1.19M) adds that a law-enforcement official, speaking on condition of anonymity, "said the investigation had been going on for more than a year."

The Miami Herald (6/23, Benn, 323K) adds that an anonymous official said "Five of those arrested are U.S. citizens, one is a legal U.S. resident and one is an illegal alien." The source added that "the group thought that they 'were doing (the attacks) in conjunction with al Qaeda' but were really dealing with undercover law enforcement." MSNBC (6/23) adds, "An FBI informant infiltrated the group, the sources say, neutralizing the threat."

The Chicago Tribune (6/23, Tackett, Zeleny, 643K) reports that a senior law-enforcement official said, "They talked about belonging to an Islamic army. They wanted to raise an army in the U.S.... But they didn't have the means to do this." The Wall Street Journal (6/23, A6, Squeo, 2.11M) notes that this is the "kind of home-grown threat that U.S. officials have feared since the London subway bombings last year." Still, CNN (6/23) reports that law enforcement sources said "that at least one had taken 'an al Qaeda oath.'"

The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (6/23, Nolin, Holland, 249K) adds, "The suspects are being held in the federal detention center in downtown Miami and will appear in magistrate court this morning." The AP (6/26) notes, "Managers of the Sears Tower, the nation's tallest building, said in a statement that they speak regularly with the FBI and local law enforcement about terror threats and that Thursday 'was no exception.'" The AFP (6/23) adds, "Another person was arrested in Atlanta, Georgia as well, according to television reports." The Washington Times (6/23, 90K) and UPI (6/23) also cover this story.

CNN.com (6/23) reports, "Federal law enforcement sources said five of the seven men were Americans, one was an illegal immigrant from Haiti whose visa had expired and the seventh was a resident alien. ... Sources told CNN that the arrests culminated a monthslong undercover operation. The suspects believed they were dealing with an al Qaeda operative but the person was actually a government informant, the sources said."

The AP (6/23, Kennedy) reports, "Miami U.S. Attorney R. Alexander Acosta said in a statement that more details about the probe would be released Friday. ... 'There is no imminent threat to Miami or any other area because of these operations,' said Richard Kolko, spokesman for FBI headquarters in Washington. He declined further comment."

Mueller Says Miami Operation Should Be Concluded Tomorrow. FBI Director Robert Mueller was asked on CNN's Larry King Live (6/22) about today's anti-terror operation in Miami. Mueller said, "I can tell you that we do have an ongoing operation in Miami. We are conducting a number of arrests and searches and we'll have more about that when the operation is concluded, probably tomorrow morning."

Mueller Says US Is Much Safer Now Than Before 9/11. FBI Director Robert Mueller said on CNN's Larry King Live (6/22), "I think we have taken substantial measures to protect the country. I will say we're not -- we're much safer than we were before September 11th. We're not totally safe, but because we've taken off a number of the leaders of al Qaeda around the world with the CIA and with our counterparts overseas, they don't have the same leadership they had in the past. We took away the sanctuary of Afghanistan. But if you look at what happened in London the last year, you look at what happened in Canada, we have to be concerned those who espouse the same philosophy."

Mueller Says FBI, NYPD Addressed Threat Described By Suskind. FBI Director Robert Mueller was asked on CNN's Larry King Live (6/22) about author Ron Suskind's report that a terror cell came within weeks of striking New York's subway with poison gas. Mueller said, "I'm familiar with the incident that Ron Suskind describes. And there was a threat back then that -- we had information about a possible strike against the subways in New York. We worked with the New York Police Department to address that threat. And went to the public now and I can tell you we had addressed that threat. ... Meaning it is no longer a threat."

Mueller Announces Mason As FBI's Assistant Director For Investigations. The Washington Times (6/23, Seper, 90K) reports that FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III announced "FBI veteran Michael A. Mason, who formerly headed the bureau's Washington field office, has been named the bureau's executive assistant director for investigations." Mueller "said Mr. Mason has 'the knowledge and experience' with both criminal investigations and administrative matters 'to ensure that the criminal programs receive strategic guidance and support,'" adding, "I have no doubt the FBI will maintain its unparalleled level of excellence in criminal investigations."

DOJ_NMG_0036697

Cities Considering Bans On Chemical Rail Shipments. USA Today (6/23, 1A, Hall, 2.31M) reports in a front page article that at least six US cities may follow Washington, DC, in placing "a ban or limit on rail shipments of deadly chemicals in an effort to prevent terrorists from turning tank cars into weapons of mass destruction." Fred Millar, an environmentalist, "who helped" with the passage of Washington's ban last year, said he "cannot imagine an easier way for al-Qaeda to fulfill its goal than to take out a (chlorine-filled) tank car." Meanwhile, DHS' William Flynn "says security assessments have been conducted along tracks in five cities. Flynn acknowledges the measures may not stop a terrorist attack. 'We can reduce risk,' he says. 'We can't eliminate it.'"

Arguments Heard In 9/11 Workers' Toxic Exposure Case. The New York Times (6/23, Depalma, 1.19M) reports a federal district court judge in Manhattan "heard oral arguments yesterday on the city's motion to dismiss a lawsuit brought on behalf of more than 8,000 firefighters, police officers and construction workers who say they were harmed by exposure to toxic substances while working at ground zero." Though NYC "lawyers have argued that the city cannot be sued because it has legal immunity under a state civil defense law," lawyers for the workers say "that Congress would never have established a $1 billion insurance fund in 2003 if it believed that the city was immune from negligence lawsuits. … The city has argued that it will be handicapped in responding to any future disasters if the possibility of negligence lawsuits is left hanging."

WAR NEWS:

In Budapest, Bush Draws Parallel Between Iraq War, Hungary's Freedom Struggle. ABC World News Tonight (6/22, story 5, Gibson, 8.78M) reported President Bush "invoked the Iraq war while visiting Hungary today. He was there to mark 50 years since Hungary's failed uprising against communism. And he drew parallels between that long struggle and the fight for democracy in Iraq." The President was shown saying, "Iraq's young democracy still faces determined enemies. Defeating these enemies will require sacrifice and continued patience. The kind of patience the good people of Hungary displayed after 1956." ABC was the only network to cover Bush's trip last night.

The Washington Post (6/23, A18, Abramowitz, 744K) reports Bush "hailed Hungary's resistance as a story that 'inspires all who love liberty,'" and "sought to draw parallels between Hungary's transition from dictatorship to democracy and the US enterprise in Iraq." In Budapest, Bush "consulted Thursday with" President Laszlo Solyom and Prime Minister Ferenc Gyurcsany "about the Balkans, Iran, energy and a dispute over visa policy." Bush's "symbolic gestures here appeared likely to be appreciated by many Hungarians, who perhaps with some ambivalence lined the streets for a glimpse of the American president on his first visit to Budapest."

The Financial Times (6/23, Condon, Alden) adds, "A day after working to repair ties with European leaders dismayed by US foreign policy," Bush "returned to more assertive rhetoric on Thursday while paying tribute to the fallen heroes of Hungary's 1956 anti-Soviet uprising. … The confident tone of the president's remarks contrasted with the softer approach he used to mend relations with leaders from western Europe."

The New York Times (6/23, Stolberg, 1.19M) says the Budapest stop "was largely ceremonial, with themes of freedom and democracy sprinkled throughout. … But tensions surfaced amid the pomp." Leaders in eastern Europe are pressing Mr. Bush for their countries to be included in a waiver program that allows foreigners to visit the United States for three months without a visa."

The Los Angeles Times (6/23, Gerstenzang, 958K) reports, "During the day, Bush also viewed the Holy Crown of St. Stephen, the king who resolved to make Hungary a Christian kingdom. The crown fell into US hands at the end of World War II. President Carter approved its return to Hungary in 1978 to recognize improving respect here for human rights despite continued Communist domination." And Bush "placed a bouquet at a dark gray granite monument, built 10 years ago, to those who died in the 1956 uprising."

The Washington Times (6/23, Dinan, 90K) notes Bush "travels next month to the Group of Eight summit in St. Petersburg where he will be under pressure to take a harsh stance on Russian President Vladimir Putin's backsliding on democracy. White House officials had said yesterday's speech was not a message to Mr. Putin, but the Russian leader could certainly see it that way. … The president mentioned the Soviets' role three times, and specifically blamed 'the communists in Moscow' for the brutality."

DOJ_NMG_0036698

USA Today (6/23, Jackson, 2.31M) reports, "This trip had a different feel from ones around the time of the Iraq invasion in March 2003, when European leaders split sharply with the Bush administration and blocked an invasion resolution in the United Nations. One sign of reduced tension: fewer protesters. Hundreds were seen at Wednesday's EU summit in Vienna, as opposed to thousands in past years." During this trip, "Bush and European leaders said disputes over Iraq are behind them. While the war there still rages, Europeans support the emergence of a democratic government in Baghdad, and leaders chose instead to focus on areas where they agree, such as stopping the spread of nuclear weapons in Iran and North Korea."

Bush Seen As Having Taken "Milder Line" On Russia Than Did Cheney. The AP (6/23, Loven) reports Putin "has been irritated by Bush's attention and visits to former Soviet states." Bush "talked with Hungarian officials about how to reassure Putin that promoting democracy and freedom among Russia's neighbors 'is not some kind of effort to encircle Russia but is, in fact, a good thing for Russia because democratic states make good and peaceful neighbors,'" said National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley, traveling with Bush.

The Wall Street Journal (6/23, Harwood, 2.11M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column that President Bush took a "milder line in Europe than Cheney last month in Lithuania. His commemoration of Hungary's 1956 uprising signals continued displeasure over Putin's antidemocratic moves, but aides concede they have little leverage. White House will send low-ranking State official to pre-G8 gathering of Russian opposition figures, disappointing Putin critics. But 2008 Republican contender McCain and Clinton ex-adviser Albright plan joint Washington appearance denouncing Russian autocracy."

Hungarian Economy In Deep Trouble. USA Today (6/23, Lynch, 2.31M), meanwhile, says Bush "was in Hungary on Thursday to talk politics. But for his hosts, economics are more urgent. Once an impressive post-communist success, Hungary now finds itself a leading contender to become the next emerging-markets disaster. The Budapest stock market has plunged more than 22% since May 5 as global investors reawakened to the risk involved in developing nations. Towering twin deficits in both its government budget and current account make Hungary especially vulnerable."

LATimes Says Comparison Between '56 Uprising And Iraq War "Troubling." The Los Angeles Times (6/23, 958K) editorializes that "by drawing a direct link between Hungary's quashed anti-communist rebels of 1956 and Iraq's struggling leaders of 2006," Bush "offered a troubling reminder that his administration continues to confuse the Cold War with the vastly dissimilar war on terrorism -- while refusing to acknowledge any limitations on the use of American power." The Times concludes that "staking a nation's foreign policy on Iraq resembling Hungary is a recipe for disappointment -- or something much worse."

Top US Officials, GOP Lawmakers Say WMD Found In Iraq. Fox News' Special Report (6/22, Hume) reported, "Top administration officials said today that chemical and biological weapons have indeed been found in Iraq and they now worry what this could suggest about other hidden weapons there and the possible dangers to US troops." Fox (Angle) added, "US intelligence officials believe the weapons were made prior to the Gulf War in 1991 and officials say they have seriously degraded over time. But the declassified report says they are still lethal and Secretary Rumsfeld said that is a concern for all those in Iraq."

Most reports are treating the significance of the finding skeptically. NBC Nightly News (6/22, story 3, 2:15, Reid, 9.87M) reported on a "battle brewing over weapons of mass destruction and at the center of it all, Republican Senator Rick Santorum. The story begins Wednesday afternoon with the release of a one-page summary of a Pentagon report stating that '…approximately 500 weapons munitions which contain degraded mustard or sarin nerve agent' have been found in Iraq since 2003. Republican Pennsylvania Senator Rick Santorum rushes out a press release and heads for the Senate floor…" Sen. Santorum: "This is an incredibly significant document." NBC added that late yesterday, "the Secretary of Defense weighed in. He said that those 500 shells are 'weapons of mass destruction.' But he was not asked and he did not comment on whether that they're the kinds of weapons of mass destruction that justified invading Iraq."

The Washington Post (6/23, A10, Pincus, 744K) titles its report "Democrats Criticize Claim On Iraqi Arms," and says, "The assertion by two Republican lawmakers that a new intelligence study proves that chemical weapons were found in Iraq has triggered sharp criticism from Democrats that the GOP is distorting intelligence for political purposes." The Army finding "was seized on by Rep. Peter Hoekstra (R-Mich.) chairman of the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence," and Santorum, "a strong supporter of the war who is trailing his Democratic opponent in his reelection bid."

DOJ_NMG_0036699

Under the headline "For Diehards, Search For Iraq's W.M.D. Isn't Over," the New York Times (6/23, Shane, 1.19M) reports that after Santorum's announcement, "American intelligence officials hastily scheduled a background briefing for the news media on Thursday to clarify" that the Army report "that described roughly 500 munitions containing 'degraded' mustard or sarin gas, all manufactured before the 1991 gulf war and found scattered through Iraq since 2003. Such shells had previously been reported and do not change the government conclusion, the officials said."

Senate Rejects Democratic Measures Calling For US Withdrawal From Iraq. The CBS Evening News (6/22, story 5, 2:00, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "The Republican-led Senate today defeated two Democratic proposals for withdrawing US forces from Iraq, though the Pentagon reportedly is considering a small cut in troop strength involving a few thousand troops." ABC World News Tonight (6/22, story 3, 2:35, Gibson, 8.78M) said senators "voted 86-13 against requiring a pullout of combat forces by July 2007. Then, voted 60-39, to defeat a measure that simply urged President Bush to start pulling out troops this year." USA Today/AP (6/23, Sidoti) notes "Rhode Island Sen. Lincoln Chafee, who also is up for re-election, was the only Republican supporter of the troop withdrawal resolution."

Most media coverage last night and this morning focuses on which party emerges from the debate in a stronger position on the Iraq issue. There is no clear consensus on who "won" the debate, although a number of media outlets describe the Democratic caucus as divided. The Christian Science Monitor (6/23, Feldmann, Chaddock, 61K) headlines its story "In Iraq War Vote, Democrats Fail," and says "the Republicans appeared intent on portraying the Democrats in two negative ways -- first, as divided (read: weak) on how to proceed in the war, and second, as quitters wanting to 'cut and run.' Whether the debate, and one held last week in the House, will affect public opinion on the war remains to be seen. But as a piece of political strategy, analysts saw Republicans taking a weak hand -- a war that has become chronically unpopular -- and making the most of it." Knight Ridder (6/23, Kuhnhenn) also says the debate "exposed divisions among Democrats."

The Washington Post (6/23, A1, Babington, 744K) says the GOP displayed the "cohesion that has eluded Democrats," and adds the votes "underscored the Democratic constituency's split between staunchly antiwar activists and those who are frustrated but less fervent." The Post also reports, "The GOP solidarity was a vote of confidence in the White House and a gamble that the situation in Iraq will stabilize, or at least not worsen, between now and November. The administration worked hard to reassure nervous Republicans, having the Pentagon send them a thick binder of talking points about the war's progress and the need to stay the course until Iraqis can maintain order in their country."

The Washington Times (6/23, Fagan, 90K) notes Republicans "used yesterday's vote for political points, too. The National Republican Senatorial Committee quickly sent out an e-mail yesterday bashing Sen. Robert Menendez, a Democrat running for re-election in New Jersey, for supporting Mr. Kerry's plan. A spokesman said it 'puts him not just on the fringe of American politics, but also on the fringe of the Democrat Party.'" Democrats "were split yesterday."

The Wall Street Journal (6/23, Rogers, 2.11M) reports "the recent killing of terrorist leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi and the formation of the new government in Baghdad have increased Republican confidence about the Iraq venture. And whatever their remaining doubts, Republicans have chosen to project unity, hoping to shift attention from the war itself and focus on the splits among Democrats."

The New York Times (6/23, Zernike, 1.19M) reports Republicans "lined up squarely behind President Bush," and adds "Democrats, believing that polls show a majority of Americans want troops to begin coming home, mocked Republicans after the vote as being a 'rubber stamp' for Mr. Bush."

NBC Nightly News (6/22, story 2, 2:00, Reid, 9.87M) reported that "in typical Washington fashion, both sides are claiming victory here today. The Republicans say they are united behind their stay the course position. They say the Democrats are divided and appear weak on national security. Democrats, though, say they may have differences on timing, but they say they agree on a fundamental point and that is that there needs to be a major course change in Iraq and a focus on getting the troops home and they say that is closer to how the American people feel about Iraq." CNN's The Situation Room (6/22, King) reported Democrats are "hoping to change the story line of the debate from Democrats are divided to Democrats are united."

DOJ_NMG_0036700

The Los Angeles Times (6/23, Reynolds, 958K) says the votes were "less an attempt to legislate than a test of Democratic unity on an issue that could prove decisive in November's congressional elections and the 2008 presidential race." The Times adds that "in a sign of the attitudes among this constituency, Democratic senators earned only measured praise Thursday from Tom Andrews, national director of Win Without War, a coalition of liberal groups opposed to the war." Andrews "lauded those who voted for the Kerry measure. He said war opponents would likely view the strong Democratic support for the Levin-Reed proposal as 'a half-step in the right direction, but it's only a half-step.'"

Casey Considering Small, Gradual Troop Reduction In Iraq. CNN's The Situation (6/22, King) reported, "In the midst of a political war over bringing the troops home, there's growing pressure on the Pentagon to reduce force levels. Military sources tell CNN the commanding general in Iraq, George Casey, is considering recommending a small and gradual troop reduction in Iraq. Sources say this would amount to, at most, some 6,000 to 10,000 troops."

Cheney Makes Case Against Timetables For Troop Withdrawal. Vice President Dick Cheney said on CNN's The Situation Room (6/22) that calls from Senate Democrats to set a timetable for US troops to leave Iraq are "wrong in many respects," adding, "We are making significant progress. We have had major success on the political front in terms of three national elections last year by the Iraqis. They've stood up a brand new government under a new constitution for the first time ever. We have got a quarter of a million Iraqis now in uniform, equipped, trained, in the fight. So there has been significant progress made with respect with what's going on in Iraq." Later in the interview, Cheney expanded on his point, noting, "You're not going to complete the mission if we follow the Democrats' advice. And, in fact, we will have set up the situation in which the al Qaeda types can win." They are betting that the US does not "have the stomach for the fight, and we can not afford to validate that strategy. We can win -- we are winning -- but we've got to stay at it."

ABC World News Tonight (6/22, story 3, 2:35, Stephanopoulos, 8.78M) reported on Cheney's CNN interview. Cheney was shown saying, "The worst possible thing we could do is what the Democrats are suggesting. Packing it in. Going home, persuading and validating the theory that we don't have the stomach for this fight."

US Soldiers React To Debate. ABC World News Tonight (6/22, story 4, 1:10, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "As George said right at the end, the debate in the Senate was a preview of arguments about the war that will be raised in this fall's congressional elections. How voters react is important. But what do the soldiers in Iraq think about the debate? They were very aware it was going on. And we were struck by some of the voices we heard on NPR this morning. NPR's Phillip Reeves is embedded with the 506th Infantry Regimen in Iraq." Sgt. Britt Ruble: "It's easy for somebody in an air-conditioned office, back in the states to state their opinion. Unless you've done the deed, spilled blood with your men on the dirt, you really can't talk about it intelligently because you don't know what's going on." Spc. Roger Sanchez: "Everything happens out here from mortars to IEDs to RPGs being shot at us. Weapons being shot at us. I wasn't expecting all this. I don't guess anybody can imagine what exactly it is like unless they're in it." Sgt. Britt Ruble: "If we pull out too early and go home, and we don't finish it, that means that all those guys have done it for naught. And I don't want to see that happen. I want to do it and do it right. So when we go home, we can say, hey, look what we've done."

The Washington Times (6/23, Gertz, Scarborough, 90K) reports in its "Inside the Ring" column, "Army officers back from Iraq express frustration with what they consider the drift of the Democratic Party back to the left-wing days of the 1960s and '70s. The officers say that a definite departure date for U.S. troops from Iraq, which some Democrats are embracing, would be a clear victory for al Qaeda."

Reed Says Democrats Had A "Strong Showing" On Iraq Amendments. Sen. Jack Reed said on MSNBC's Hardball (6/22), "We got a strong showing from the Democratic Caucus. This is a very difficult issue. I don't think anyone assumes that it should be one that is completely unanimous, but we had a very strong showing. And I think we enunciated a policy that is not only the best policy, but it's a policy that appears to be one being advocated by General Casey, who is today talking about troop reductions this year, and also by the Iraqi national security adviser, who predicts that before the end of this year, we'll reduce troops."

DOJ_NMG_0036701

Bond Says Timetables Have More To Do With Election Than Iraq Mission. Sen. Kit Bond said on MSNBC's Hardball (6/22), "What these amendments did, both the Kerry and the Reed-Levin bill did, was to say that it's not going to be the generals there on the ground looking at it who decide when the security forces of Iraq are adequate to take over. It's going to be a political timetable. Unfortunately, there is a suspicion that that political timetable has more to do with November 7th's general election than whether we complete our mission in Iraq."

Casey Says Iran Helping Iraqi Insurgents.

The CBS Evening News (6/22, story 5, 2:00, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported "American forces in Iraq apparently facing a potent new enemy: Iran." CBS (Cowan) added, "For US Soldiers fighting insurgents just south of Baghdad tonight, the news from the Pentagon is sobering. Iran has joined the war. According to the commanding general in Iraq, they're helping to plant some of the roadside bombs like the ones that killed at least four US Marines just this week." Gen. George Casey, Commander, Multi-National Force, Iraq: "We are quite confident that the Iranians through their covert special operations forces are providing weapons, IED technology and training to Shi'a extremist groups in Iraq." Cowan: "General Casey went so far as to point his finger directly at the government of Iran." Gen. Casey: "Now you would assume that they're not doing that independently, that there is some central direction from somebody in Tehran." Cowan: "And that was enough for the Secretary of Defense to reason it was too soon to talk openly about US troop withdrawals." Secretary Rumsfeld: "It very likely will go down and up and down and up depending on the circumstances and depending on the needs."

The Washington Post (6/23, A19, Ricks, 744K) reports, "Iran's actions are a major concern not only because of attacks on US forces, but also because the durability of the new Iraqi government depends in part on the willingness of Iraqi's Sunni minority to accept the government." The Sunnis "will be unlikely to do so if the Iranian government is perceived as playing a major role in supporting and even arming violent Shiite factions." The Washington Times (6/23, Scarborough, 90K) runs a similar story under the headline "Casey Cites Iran Hand In Attacks By Iraqi Shi'ites."

Hadley Says Administration Is Losing Patience With Iran. CNN's The Situation Room (6/22, Malveaux) reported that National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley said the Administration's patience with Iran "is wearing thin. Hadley says the US and it's European allies are getting mixed messages from Iran as to when it will respond to a package of incentives offered to convince the regime to abandon its nuclear ambitions. While Hadley said it would be helpful to get a response before a series of scheduled meetings among the industrial nations, the first one slated for June 29th, Hadley ruled out trying to do this through an arbitrary set of deadlines."

Annan Says Tehran's Answer Will Be Delayed. The AP (6/23, Higgins) reports UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan met with Iranian Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki, after which Annan told reporters "Iran will not respond to incentives to halt its nuclear program before mid-July, at least two weeks past the date sought by the U.S. and its partners. … The U.S. has said that" Secretary Rice "and diplomats from the other five nations offering Iran the incentives agreed by phone that they expect an answer around the time of a meeting of G-8 foreign ministers on June 29 in Moscow. The United States reiterated that Iran should respond by next week." Annan called his meeting with Mottaki "very useful," and the AP notes Mottaki will meet with German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier in Berlin tomorrow. While the Administration "is reluctant to set a specific deadline," NSA Hadley "said that it would be 'helpful and useful if we could get a response and know where the Iranians are' before the June 29 meeting." Ambassador Bolton "said that June 29 would be 'an ample period of time, very reasonable time in which Iran could respond. I think we've made it clear that if the Iranians don't choose the path that's been presented to them, the alternative path is one of increasing isolation -- that we'd be prepared to move very quickly in the Security Council,' Bolton said."

Iran Could Be Seeking To Emulate North Korean Tactics. The Christian Science Monitor (6/23, LaFranchi, 61K) reports, "There may be no such thing as a North Korea playbook for would-be nuclear proliferators." But "many Western leaders suspect Iran of trying to emulate North Korea's secretive development of nuclear weapons. And as both nations continue to command international attention for their nuclear programs, it's clear the two countries watch each other for 'how to' lessons in nuclear diplomacy."

Former FBI Director Criticizes US History Of Handling Of Iran On Terrorism. Louis J. Freeh, FBI director from 1993-2001, writes in an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (6/23, 2.11M), "Ten years ago this Sunday, acting under direct orders from senior Iranian government leaders, the Saudi Hezbollah detonated a 25,000-pound TNT bomb that killed 19 U.S. airmen in their dormitory at Khobar Towers in Dhahran, Saudi Arabia," and "two of the primary leaders of the attack, Ahmed Ibrahim al-Mughassil and Abdel Hussein Mohamed al-Nasser, are living comfortably in Iran with about as much to fear from America as Osama bin Laden had prior to Sept. 11." President Clinton "had no interest in confronting the fact that Iran had blown up the Towers," as he "was set on 'improving' relations with what it mistakenly perceived to be a moderate Iranian president." It took years and a call to former President George H.W. Bush to get interviews with the bombers, who were in Saudi custody. Those "obtained direct evidence of Iran's complicity," yet it took the current President's administration to lead to an indictment. This is "just one example of how successive U.S. governments have mishandled Iran." In the current negotiations, "will we ultimately ignore justice and buy a separate peace with our enemy?"

DOJ_NMG_0036702

More Commentary. David Ignatius writes in the Washington Post (6/23, A25, 744K), "Sometime in the next several months, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice or a senior colleague is likely to sit down at a negotiating table with representatives of the Islamic Republic of Iran. As she prepares for these meetings, I suspect Rice is reviewing the most famous instance of America talking to an enemy: Henry Kissinger's secret opening to China in the early 1970s. … Thinking about Kissinger's opening to China, it seems to me that one clear lesson for the Bush administration is that it shouldn't be overly cautious in its engagement with Iran. It's time to talk, and if the Iranians will agree to the West's appropriate precondition that they halt enrichment of uranium, then all issues should be on the table. … Here's the pitch that you can imagine Kissinger making: Iran's hopes of becoming a major power can be achieved only by halting its nuclear program and working with the United States to stabilize Iraq and the wider Middle East. I hope Secretary Rice is preparing a similar presentation."

Iraqi Police Free 17 Hostages. The New York Times (6/23, Burns, 1.19M) reports, "A day after a large group of gunmen seized scores of Iraqis from a factory, a police raid freed 17 of them, but 34 hostages remained unaccounted for, the industry minister said Thursday. The abduction, involving 40 or 50 gunmen, some wearing police uniforms, represented a sharp intensification of a tactic that has become increasingly common."

Mass Abduction Said To Show Clampdown Not Working. The Los Angeles Times (6/23, 958K) reports the "brazen" abduction of 50 workers near Baghdad "sent a reminder that the violence in this country, and particularly the capital, has not been curbed by a major security clampdown put in place June 14 with much fanfare." The Times says the mass abduction was "as brazen an act" as a June 5 incident in which "men wearing police uniforms descended on a Baghdad bus depot and kidnapped about 50 people."

Amnesty Plan Won't Apply To Those Who Have Attacked Iraqis Or "Friends Of Iraq." The Washington Post (6/23, A19, Partlow, 744K) reports, "Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's new plan to promote reconciliation among Iraq's rival factions will offer amnesty to Iraqis who have 'carried weapons' but not to those who have committed serious crimes, according to Iraqi politicians who have read the proposal." Deputy Prime Minister Barham Saleh, an ethnic Kurd from President Jalal Talabani's Patriotic Union of Kurdistan, said of the plan, "It says that the government will issue an amnesty for all those who have not committed crimes against the people of Iraq and the friends of Iraq. … Those who attack U.S. forces are not immune from legal consequences. An attack on Iraqi forces or multinational forces are seen legally...as the same thing from the perspective of the government."

Professor Says Alleged US Atrocities In Iraq Were Inevitable. In a New York Times (6/23, 1.19M) op-ed, Hendrix College English professor Alex Vernon, a veteran of the first Gulf War, writes, "It's impossible to imagine the frustration and stress on American soldiers in Iraq today -- impossible, or maybe it's simply not something we willingly work to imagine. Then the news breaks. My first thought on hearing about the alleged atrocities at Haditha -- and of the announcement this week that murder charges are being brought against eight American servicemen for killing an Iraqi civilian at Hamdania in April -- was 'Duh.' If we didn't know this day was coming, we were fools."

US Officials Say Taliban Controls One-Third Of Afghanistan. NBC Nightly News (6/22, story 6, 2:20, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The United States has 23,000 troops in Afghanistan at this very moment. And while they fully expected the Taliban's so-called spring offensive, this season has been especially fierce, causing the US military to conduct a staggering 340 airstrikes in Afghanistan, that is just in the last three months alone." NBC (Maceda) added, "US officials say the Taliban Islamist fighters, numbering in the thousands, now control at least a third of Afghanistan. How did it happen? First, the Taliban's tactics have improved. Roadside and suicide bombs, techniques borrowed from Iraq, are on the rise. Also improved, the Taliban's command and control. Local leaders are now in charge. To counter the Taliban offensive, a second massive operation launched last week called Mountain Thrust – some 10,000 US, Coalition, and Afghan troops sweeping into the south, while Operation Mountain Lion continues in the east."

DOJ_NMG_0036703

Four US Soldiers Killed In Afghanistan. ABC World News Tonight (6/22, lead story, 3:45, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Four US Soldiers have died in Afghanistan today. The loss of American forces there often gets overlooked." The New York Times (6/23, Gall, 1.19M) also reports the story.

Zawahiri Urges Afghans To Rebel Against Government In New Video. NBC Nightly News (6/22, story 6, 2:20, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The latest video by al Qaeda's number two, Ayman al-Zawahiri, who urged Afghans to step up the fight against the US and what he called other occupying forces."

The Washington Post (6/23, A18, Constable, 744K) reports a "new videotape from al-Qaeda's second-in-command urging Afghans to rise up against their government and foreign military forces was vehemently denounced by Afghan President Hamid Karzai on Thursday but had little immediate impact on the Afghan public." In the "3 1/2 -minute videotape, made available on a Web site early Thursday, Ayman al-Zawahiri said in Arabic, 'I am calling on the Muslims in Kabul in particular and in all Afghanistan in general and for the sake of God to stand up . . . in the face of the infidel forces that are invading Muslim lands.' He wore a white turban and posed with an assault rifle." Karzai, "meeting with journalists Thursday morning on the shaded grounds of his fortified palace, denounced the Egyptian-born Zawahiri as an outlaw who had caused bloodshed in Afghanistan for years."

The New York Times (6/23, Gall, 1.19M) reports Zawahiri, "who is believed to be in hiding along the Afghan-Pakistani border, called on 'the young men of Islam, in the universities and schools of Kabul, to carry out their duties in defense of their religion, honor, land and country.'" President Karzai "urged other nations to reassess their approach to curbing terrorism in Afghanistan, saying that the deaths of hundreds of Afghans in fighting with American-led forces was 'not acceptable,' news agencies reported."

Stolen Documents Show US Located Top Tier Al Qaeda Terrorists In Pakistan. ABC World News Tonight (6/22, lead story, 3:45, Ross, 8.78M) reported US documents on a flash drive, stolen from the US Air Force Base in Bagram and sold in the bazaar, "show the US knows or knew the locations of some of the most-wanted terrorists. They are in Pakistan. And the documents name prominent figures, including President Karzai's brother, thought in the military to be of the pay of druglords." The US targeting assessment "produced in January of last year" reflects "US frustration with Pakistan's 'political and military inertia' in going after terror targets. One map shows infiltration routes and locations of four al Qaeda training camps in Pakistan, marked 'AQ' and a location in Pakistan for al Qaeda's number two, Ayman al Zawahiri. In total, the documents list 16 senior-level al Qaeda and Taliban leaders, including Mullah Omar, as hiding in Pakistan, where US troops cannot operate. US officials say the information has been provided to the government of Pakistani President Musharraf. But the tier one targets tonight to operate inside Pakistan." But Osama bin Laden's "name does not appear anywhere in this targeting memorandum. Clearly, they don't have a very good idea where he is."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

UTStarcom Examines Allegations Of Bribery. The AP (6/23) reports, "UTStarcom Inc. reported it is investigating allegations of improper payments to officials in India and Mongolia by people connected to the company." The AP continues, "The Alameda, Calif.-based networking company said it is in contact with the Department of Justice and the Securities and Exchange Commission about the probe. … UTStarcom disclosed that payments may have been made in those countries that violated the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act, a law aimed at curtailing bribery of foreign officials." The AP adds, "The company made the disclosure in its quarterly report on Thursday, and had previously discussed the matter in its annual report filed on June 1. … The Mongolia allegations involve alleged improper payments made by an agent of the company's joint venture in that country. The U.S. Embassy in Mongolia informed the company of the matter in December 2005, and said it had referred the allegations to the SEC and Justice Department, the company said."

DOJ_NMG_0036704

SEC Reportedly Probing Big Hedge Fund. The New York Times (6/23, Bogdanich, Morgenson) reports, "One of the nation's most prominent hedge funds, Pequot Capital Management, is under investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission for possible insider trading, according to government officials briefed on the case." The Times continues, "The S.E.C. declined to confirm or deny that it was investigating Pequot, a $7 billion fund overseen by Arthur J. Samberg, 65, a leading money manager and philanthropist. But a lawyer who once led the agency's investigation has told Congress that the fund's trading had repeatedly aroused suspicion among stock exchange officials, prompting them on 18 occasions to refer cases to the S.E.C. for further investigation, records show." The Times adds, "In one instance, Pequot made $18 million by investing in companies that soon after announced a major corporate merger, in July 2001, the lawyer told Congress. … The investigation has not resulted in any charges against Pequot, and the fund has denied any wrongdoing. … At the same time, the S.E.C.'s handling of the Pequot inquiry has itself come under scrutiny by Congress and the Office of Special Counsel, a federal agency that examines whistle-blower complaints. These officials are examining charges by Gary J. Aguirre, the S.E.C. lawyer who ran the Pequot investigation until last summer, that senior S.E.C. officials had backed his inquiry — including the issuance of scores of subpoenas — until he sought the testimony of an influential Wall Street executive."

SEC Says Scientific-Atlanta Aided Adelphia Fraud. USA Today (6/23, Smith) reports, "Scientific-Atlanta and two executives paid Adelphia Communications $43 million disguised as marketing allowances in 2000 and 2001 to help the cable operator falsely meet Wall Street earnings expectations, the Securities and Exchange Commission said Thursday." USA continues, "In a civil complaint, the SEC accused Scientific-Atlanta, a supplier of digital television set-top boxes, of abetting a larger financial fraud at Adelphia that culminated in the cable operator's June 2002 collapse in bankruptcy court and criminal convictions against three members of the controlling Rigas family. … Scientific-Atlanta, now part of Cisco, settled the SEC complaint by giving up $20 million in profit from its dealings with Adelphia. The executives, former chief financial officer Wallace Haislip, 56, and former controller Julian Eidson, 65, consented to cease-and-desist orders without admitting, or denying, wrongdoing." USA adds, "Cisco spokeswoman Penelope Bruce called the settlement 'reasonable' and said the company is 'pleased that it resolves the SEC's concerns.' Bruce said Scientific-Atlanta appeared also to have satisfied a related Justice Department investigation, though an investor lawsuit remains outstanding. Haislip and Eidson remain employed in non-financial roles."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Cheney Says He May Be Called As A Witness In Libby Trial. Vice President Dick Cheney was asked on CNN's The Situation Room (6/22) about the case against Lewis 'Scooter' Libby. Cheney said, "I am not going to comment on the case. I may be called as a witness. Scooter Libby, obviously, one of the finest men I've ever known, he's entitled to the presumption of innocence. And I have not made any comments on the case up until now, and I won't."

The AP (6/23) reports "Cheney's state of mind is directly relevant to whether Libby lied to FBI agents and a federal grand jury about how Libby learned CIA officer Valerie Plame's identity and what he later told reporters, Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald has said in recently filed court papers." Fitzgerald "has revealed that Cheney was upset because Plame's husband -- former U.S. Ambassador Joseph Wilson -- had accused the Bush administration of manipulating prewar intelligence to exaggerate the Iraqi threat from weapons of mass destruction."

Cheney's Position In White House Said To Be Undiminished. Knight Ridder (6/23, Douglas) reports, "He accidentally shot a hunting buddy. His job-approval rating is abysmal. His former chief of staff was charged with lying to a grand jury. And he remains an unapologetic cheerleader for the unpopular war in Iraq. None of it cramps Vice President Dick Cheney's style." Knight Ridder adds, "Cheney remains Cheney, a quiet, stoic force at the heart of the Bush administration. Despite rumors earlier this year that President Bush might ask him to resign, he still has Bush's ear, and his fingerprints still turn up on all manner of policy decisions, from war and domestic spying to spending 'earmarks' for allies. … Recent White House meetings on Iraq with members of Congress left no doubt where Cheney ranks: right beside the president, sitting silently, listening intently."

DOJ_NMG_0036705

Three Guards In Tallahassee Jail Shootout Denied Bail. The New York Times (6/23, Goodnough, 1.19M) reports, Magistrate Judge William C. Sherrill Jr. "ordered Alfred Barnes, Gregory Dixon and Alan Moore held without bail" after their arrest on charges of being part of a prison sex ring, which sparked a shootout in a Tallahassee jail and ended with two fatalities. Robert Davis, a government prosecutor, "said that Mr. Dixon and Mr. Moore tried to evade arrest after the shootings, and that Mr. Dixon ignored a federal agent's order to get out of his car, and that he tried to drive away." Sherrill also "ordered Mr. Barnes held without bail because he 'appeared more substantially involved' in the alleged conspiracy than his co-defendants." The other two guards, "Vincent Johnson and E. Lavon Spence, could go free until trial, but ordered them put under curfew and said they must wear electronic monitoring devices part of the time." Notably, Judge Sherrill "singled out Mr. Johnson, the only guard not accused of having sex with inmates, for praise after the man's lawyer, Robert Morris, said he had triggered an alarm just after the shooting, helped staunch the bleeding of an injured prison lieutenant and provided cover for a federal agent in the line of fire."

The Miami Herald (6/23, Fineout, 323K) elaborates that Johnson "moved an FBI agent away from the gun battle, shielding her until the shooting stopped." While "an FBI shooting-review team arrived Thursday from Washington to sort through the details of the firefight,…the FBI released no new information and did not say when the team would wrap up its work or whether the findings would be made public."

Bureau Of Prisons To Consider Searching Guards. USA Today (6/23, 4A, Johnson, 2.31M) reports, "Carla Wilson, spokeswoman for the federal Bureau of Prisons, "said the incident has encouraged officials to re-examine the security policy for federal prison employees, who have not been subject to the type of screening that visitors face." In 2002, "the Bureau of Prisons rejected a recommendation by the Justice Department's inspector general that called for searches of prison staff members to help reduce the flow of drugs and other contraband into such facilities." Wilson explained, "We believed that such searches were not necessary and could undermine our staff morale," but added that guards' misconduct "caused us to reconsider this issue." The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (6/23, Kleindienst, Hollis, 249K) adds, "It was not immediately clear how soon policies would change in the federal prison system."

Sexual Abuse Of Female Inmates By Male Guards Called "Chronic." The AP (6/23, Kallestad) reports that the shootout "raised new questions about whether men should be assigned to guard women's facilities" and "put a spotlight on the chronic problem of male guards having sex with inmates at federal, state and local institutions." A 2004 federal Bureau of Justice Statistics study of more than 2,700 correctional facilities for men and women found "charges of sexual misconduct by employees were made in all but one state prison surveyed."

FBI Says Private Data Brokers Probably Are Breaking The Law. The AP (6/23) reports that senior FBI lawyer Elaine N. Lammert, told lawmakers, "There are compelling reasons for the government to believe that" private data brokers' gathering Americans' private telephone records without warrants or subpoenas "violate federal law." He added, "the bureau was still surveying agents around the U.S. but so far has found no 'systemic' use of data brokers by the FBI seeking telephone records or other information without warrants or subpoenas." However, "A federal agent who acknowledged requesting phone records from data brokers without warrants or subpoenas told AP that he learned about such services from FBI investigators, who vouched for their use."

Senate Report On Abramoff Could Be Trouble For Reed, Ney, Norquist. The Wall Street Journal (6/23, Cummings, 2.11M) reports the Senate Indian Affairs Committee report on "the Jack Abramoff influence-peddling scandal suggests further trouble for Ohio Rep. Bob Ney and high-profile Republicans Ralph Reed, the former Christian Coalition leader, and Grover Norquist, the antitax activist." The panel "urged the Senate Finance Committee to continue the probe by investigating the transfer of payments by Indian tribes through multiple charities apparently to hide their original sources." The final report "includes detailed accounts of how money was funneled to Mr. Reed's political-consulting firm through Mr. Norquist's advocacy group, Americans for Tax Reform, and other tax-exempt organizations. The transactions effectively hid the conservative Christian leader's efforts on behalf of the tribes." In exchange "for the use of ATR's accounts, Mr. Norquist took $25,000 from the payment and turned it into a donation to his group, according to the report. Indian tribal officials testified to Senate investigators that they never intended or authorized a donation to the antitax group."

DOJ_NMG_0036706

The AP (6/23, Sherman) says the Senate report shows Rep. Ney "told Senate investigators he made no effort to help a client of disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff, despite extensive evidence to the contrary." Ney said "he was not even familiar with the Tigua tribe of El Paso, Texas, which was seeking legislation that would allow it to reopen its shuttered casino, according to the Senate Indian Affairs Committee report." Yet the report "says Ney assured tribal leaders of his support for the legislation on two occasions in 2002, once in person and once via telephone." Another person "under federal investigation who also is mentioned in the report is former deputy Interior Secretary Steven Griles, who has denied giving Abramoff or his clients preferential treatment." The committee "was 'unable to arrive at any definitive conclusions as to the veracity of Griles' testimony,' the report said."

The Washington Post (6/23, A1, Schmidt, 744K) reports on the front page that Ney's "comments to the panel could add to his problems with the Justice Department. Federal prosecutors have secured guilty pleas from Abramoff and three former associates implicating Ney in a string of official acts allegedly performed in exchange for favors such as a golf trip to Scotland and campaign contributions." A spokesman for Ney "said yesterday that in his interview with the Senate committee, the congressman did not initially recognize the name of the tribe." Ney's statements "to the committee have been contradicted by others as well, including his former longtime chief of staff, Neil G. Volz, in admissions he made this year as part of his guilty plea to corruptly seeking to influence Ney on the Tigua issue."

The New York Times (6/23, Shenon, 1.19M) says the Senate report "documented more than $5.3 million in payments to Ralph Reed, the former director of the Christian Coalition and a leading Republican Party strategist, from an influence-peddling operation run by the corrupt lobbyist Jack Abramoff on behalf of Indian tribe casinos." The report "portrayed Mr. Reed, now a candidate for the Republican nomination for lieutenant governor in his home state of Georgia, as a central figure in Mr. Abramoff's lobbying operation, the focus of a criminal investigation by the Justice Department." In a statement "issued through his campaign office in response to the report, Mr. Reed portrayed the report as a vindication. He said that while 'it is now clear with the benefit of hindsight that this is a piece of business I should have declined,' the report 'confirms that I have not been accused of any wrongdoing.'"

Senate Report Details Former Tribe Official's Ties To Abramoff. The AP (6/23, Thomas) reports, "Christopher Petras, the former legislative director for the Saginaw Chippewa Indian Tribe, served as the point man in helping disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff and his colleague land lucrative contracts with the Michigan tribe, a Senate report said Thursday." The AP continues, "The Senate Indian Affairs Committee said in the 373-page report that it's 'concerned about the veracity' of Petras' 2004 testimony to the panel. Petras told senators that he didn't recall many of the details about his communications with Abramoff and his associate Michael Scanlon." The AP adds, "But the committee, led by Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., said its investigation showed Petras helped Abramoff and Scanlon become enmeshed in tribal elections to help maximize their chances of getting hired by new tribal leaders. … 'Serving as Abramoff and Scanlon's primary point of contact with the Tribe, Petras proved to be their key to access to the Saginaw Chippewa,' the report said. … The committee report was entitled 'Gimme Five,' a reference to what Abramoff and Scanlon called their secret fee-splitting arrangement. Through e-mails and testimony, it describes Petras' ties to the men as they reaped millions of dollars from the Mount Pleasant, Mich.-based tribe, operator of one of the biggest Indian casinos in the nation."

Man Who Fled Marshals At Chicago Courthouse Captured. The AP (6/23, Burghart) reports, "A man whose flight from the federal courthouse caused the building to be locked down for more than three hours Thursday was later arrested near his aunt's home, authorities said." The AP continues, "The U.S. Marshals Service said Larnell Rogers - who fled the building after learning an arrest warrant had been issued for him - was taken into custody by Chicago police about 3 1/2 miles west of the courthouse. He was not carrying a weapon and the arrest was uneventful, said U.S. Marshal Kim Widup." The AP adds, "Officials had closed the courthouse and sealed courtrooms, offices and bathrooms to search for Rogers, who is accused of lying to a federal agent. … Rogers was scheduled to appear at 10:30 a.m. for a status hearing on charges he lied to the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives. When he did not appear, U.S. District Judge Samuel Der-Yeghiayan issued a bench warrant for his arrest, Widup said, adding Rogers showed up after the hearing was over. … No federal marshal was in the courtroom where Rogers was supposed to appear because he was not in their custody, Widup said. But a deputy marshal was in a stairwell when he overheard a man saying 'basically something to the effect of, "We've got to get out of here, the marshals are looking for us,"' Widup said, quoting the deputy marshal."

DOJ_NMG_0036707

Aberdeen Proving Grounds Employees Charged With Fraud. The Washington Post (6/23, B2, Rich, 744K) reports, "Three civilian employees at the U.S. Army's Aberdeen Proving Ground conspired with a company's sales representative to defraud the government through a purchasing scam that spanned nearly two years, a federal indictment alleges." They "bought equipment on behalf of the Army at inflated prices, arranging for some of it to be described incorrectly on invoices and delivered directly to their homes." The Army employees -- Douglas Atwell, Gerard Yursis, and Ellis Lonabaugh -- and salesman Wayne Silbersack "appeared yesterday in federal court in Baltimore but did not enter pleas."

Sides Argue Over Jury Instructions In Sorich Trial. The Chicago Tribune (6/23, Bush, Mihalopoulos, 643K) reports, "Prosecutors and defense attorneys negotiated Thursday afternoon on how to instruct jurors on the law in the trial of Mayor Richard Daley's former patronage chief Robert Sorich." Sorich's attorney "filed a 20-page list of proposed instructions and verdict forms," including "a key theory of his defense," that the government had, "at best, proven only a violation by the City of Chicago of the 1983 Shakman Consent Decree, a civil rather than a criminal violation." Prosecutors "sought to instruct jurors that they 'should not speculate' about why they won't be asked to reach a verdict on count one of an eight-count indictment against the defendants," which the judge dismissed.

Prosecutors Deny Vindictiveness, Oppose Wecht Motion To Dismiss. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (6/23, 261K) reports, "Federal prosecutors yesterday said the 84-count indictment against former Allegheny County Coroner Dr. Cyril Wecht is based on violations of federal law and not 'vindictiveness,' as Dr. Wecht's lawyers have asserted" in their motion to dismiss the case. "Assistant U.S. Attorney Stephen Stallings said Dr. Wecht 'has utterly failed to meet his burden of proof of showing any malevolence, ill will, or vindictiveness on the part of the government.'"

Mack A No-Show For Surrendering To Authorities. The San Francisco Chronicle (6/23, Lee) reports that FBI most wanted fugitive Darren Roy Mack "failed to surrender today at an agreed meeting place in Mexico" arranged after he "contacted Washoe County District Attorney Dick Gammick on Monday and offered to surrender." The AP (6/23) adds that the surrender offer "had been the most significant break in an international manhunt for Mack since the attacks on Charla Mack and Judge Chuck Weller." Reno Police Chief Michael Poehlman said "investigators last communicated with Mack on Wednesday, and they believed he was in Mexico based on comments he made and information from the FBI."

"Mob Cops'" Former Lawyers To Testify Defending Their Representation. The New York Times (6/23, Feuer, 1.19M) reports, "Bruce Cutler and Edward Hayes, two of the city's most flamboyant defense lawyers," have been subpoenaed by Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa, their former clients, "to appear in court and answer charges that they bungled their defense." The "hearing could get ugly," as, "In what has been described by everyone involved as an unprecedented hearing, Mr. Hayes and Mr. Cutler are expected to address that accusation on the witness stand — in their own defense."

The New York Newsday (6/23, Destefano) adds that while "Both defendants want their racketeering convictions overturned and to have new trials, in part because they claim their former lawyers were ineffective," Judge Jack B. Weinstein "in earlier court proceedings…expressed skepticism over the idea of questioning Cutler's and Hayes' conduct as lawyers" and appears to be holding the hearing "in an apparent effort to make a complete record for any appeal."

Former Head Of Boston FBI Testifies He Didn't Know About Bulger, Flemmi Investigations. The Boston Globe (6/23, Murphy, 484K) reports when "the FBI was investigating its own informants -- James 'Whitey' Bulger and Stephen 'The Rifleman' Flemmi -- as suspects in four murders by 1983 and had been told they were involved in cocaine and marijuana trafficking," James Greenleaf , "the head of the FBI's Boston office at the time…testified yesterday that nobody ever told him" about it. He also said "he never reviewed the office's informant files, which were replete with references to the alleged involvement of Bulger and Flemmi in murder, drugs, and other crimes." The Globe calls the testimony "striking because he indicated that no one in the Boston FBI office thought it important to inform the man running the office about serious allegations of criminal activity by the two gangsters." The federal trial judge also "quizzed Greenleaf about whether he had concerns about Bulger and Flemmi after learning that they were being targeted by three other law enforcement agencies." Greenleaf replied, "I don't think I really focused on that."

DOJ_NMG_0036708

Columnist Says Greenleaf Was Compelling Witness – For McIntyres. Peter Gelzinis writes in his column in the Boston Herald (6/23, 220K) that James Greenleaf, the special agent in charge of Boston "while the two 'Top Echelon' gangsters were extracting teeth and tongues from doomed people, who were then dropped into holes." Testified "he was clueless about all of it," that "never bothered to read the informant files and no underling bothered to mention what was in them." Gelzinis adds, "This lanky, old federal hack may well turn out to be the most compelling witness the McIntyres could ever have hoped for," and "the crazy thing is" that he "wasn't on the McIntyre family's witness list. The Department of Justice civil liability lawyers dragged him off some golf course to, theoretically, help torpedo this case."

Louisiana Teacher Pleads Guilty To Child Porn Charges. The New Orleans Times-Picayune (6/23, Filosa, 257K) reports that Russell Counterman, a former teacher at Taylor Academy, "pleaded guilty to possession of child pornography this week and faces up to 10 years in prison for downloading hundreds of sexually explicit images from the Internet, including some that FBI agents found in his classroom." In a search of his home and classroom computer that he consented to, the FBI "found three thumb-drives and the laptop."

Virginia Law Requires Checking Of Prospective Students For Sex Offenses. The AP (6/23, Gelineau) reports, "A new law requiring Virginia's colleges to hand over prospective students' personal information to police for cross-checking against sex offender lists is coming under fire from privacy advocates and education leaders." The AP continues, "Under the law, which takes effect July 1, public and private college officials must send state police the names, Social Security identification numbers and birth dates of all students accepted to their schools. … Proponents say the law will help protect students from sex offenders and state police are confident the personal information will be secure. But critics are raising concerns about privacy rights and risks that the data could be misused or stolen. … Privacy law experts believe it is the first time a U.S. state has ever imposed such a requirement." The AP adds, "The new requirement was part of a unanimously approved bill that makes sweeping changes to Virginia's sex offender laws, including tougher punishments and better monitoring of offenders once they are released from prison. Police expect to have guidelines in place for most schools by the fall. … Although the federal Family Educational Rights and Privacy Act protects the personal information of enrolled students, it does not apply to those who have merely been accepted. The law does not bar sex offenders from entering college but provides a way to keep track of them."

Project Safe Neighborhoods Cracks Down On Louisiana Child Porn. The Baton Rouge Advocate (6/23, Burgess) reports, "Federal and state officials announced Thursday a joint initiative to combat child pornography and exploitation, launching the statewide effort with the announcement of 10 arrests." The Advocate continues, "The Justice Department's Project Safe Childhood Initiative aims to marshal forces for a 'much more aggressive attack' on a problem made worse in recent years by the Internet, U.S. Attorney Donald Washington said. ..'There was a time when you could come home and lock your doors … Because of the Internet, the predators can get past the locks and into your home,' said David Dugas, U.S. attorney for the Baton Rouge-based Middle District. … Dugas, Washington and state Attorney General Charles Foti Jr. announced the joint effort." The Advocate adds, "The Project Safe Childhood Initiative mirrors a similar federal project dubbed Project Safe Neighborhoods, which pulled together state and federal agencies to combat gun violence. … Washington said the Safe Childhood program will include law-enforcement components as well as training and outreach programs to educate parents and children on how to identify Internet predators and risky online situations."

DOJ_NMG_0036709

Map Dealer Pleads Guilty To Thefts. The New York Times (6/23, Cowan) reports, "A map dealer who specialized in finding elusive treasures for rich collectors admitted in federal court on Thursday to having stolen 97 antique maps worth more than $3 million from more than a half-dozen universities and libraries over the last seven and a half years." The Times continues, "One of the hardest-hit institutions was the New York Public Library, which lost 32 maps, but rare book collections in Boston, Chicago and London were also victims, according to federal prosecutors." The Times adds, "The admissions by the map dealer, Edward Forbes Smiley III, came roughly one year after he was caught with five rare maps in his briefcase and tweed jacket minutes after leaving Yale University's rare-book library. A video surveillance system showed him removing a map valued at $150,000 from a book. .. The New Haven police arrested Mr. Smiley and charged him with larceny, but federal prosecutors and the Federal Bureau of Investigation launched their own investigation to determine whether Mr. Smiley might also be responsible for missing maps at other institutions. … Mr. Smiley's arrest last June rattled many institutions that had allowed him to visit their collections. But the scope of his pillaging was not fully appreciated until his back-to-back guilty pleas in federal and state court in New Haven on Thursday." The Times notes, "Though he pleaded guilty to one count of theft of a major artwork in federal and three counts of larceny in state court, he admitted in plea agreements with prosecutors to having stolen 97 maps from seven institutions, including the 5 maps he was caught with last June after leaving Yale's Beinecke Library."

Jury Selection Begins In Baltimore Beheadings Case. The Washington Times (6/23, Summers) reports, "Jury selection began yesterday in the retrial of two men accused of beheading three young relatives." The Times continues, "The defendants -- Adan Canela, 19, and Policarpio Espinoza Perez, 24 -- are charged in the May 27, 2004, killings of Ricardo Espinoza Jr., 9; his sister, Lucero Espinoza, 8; and their male cousin, Alexis Espejo Quezada, 10." The Times adds, "Prosecutors say Mr. Perez, the victims' uncle, and Mr. Canela, their cousin, beat the children with an aluminum baseball bat, choked them and slashed their throats with a boning knife in their Northwest Baltimore apartment. … The first trial, which included more than 300 pieces of evidence and five weeks of testimony from about two dozen witnesses, ended in August 2005 in a hung jury after 10 days of deliberations." The Times notes, "The trial attracted so much press attention that Baltimore Circuit Judge David B. Mitchell yesterday expressed concern about intimate details of the case and its evidence tainting potential jurors. … Attorneys in the case said jury selection might take several days and expect the trial to start no earlier than the middle of next week."

Medical Experts Say Lethal Injection Methods Can Be Made More Humane. The New York Times (6/23, Grady, 1.19M) reports a "flood of lawsuits challenging lethal injection as cruel and unusual has stalled executions in some states and may prompt others to abandon them. And a Supreme Court ruling last week made it easier for death-row prisoners to file such suits." But "medical experts say the current method of lethal injection could easily be changed to make suffering less likely. Even the doctor who devised the technique 30 years ago says that if he had it to do over again, he would recommend a different method." Switching to "an injection method with less potential to cause pain could undercut many of the lawsuits. But so far, in this chapter of the nation's long and tangled history with the death penalty, no state has moved to alter its lethal injection protocol."

CIVIL LAW:

Raytheon Reportedly Discussing Settlement Of Contracting Charges. The Bloomberg (6/23, Capaccio, Schmidt) reports, "Raytheon Co.'s aircraft unit is negotiating with the U. S. Justice Department over allegations the company charged too much for parts used to build training planes for the Air Force and Navy, people familiar with the talks said." Bloomberg continues, "The possible civil settlement would address findings of a criminal investigation into the activities of Darleen Druyun, the Air Force's former No. 2 acquisition official, who was jailed in 2005 for violating conflict-of-interest laws. … The Raytheon contract was awarded by Druyun as part of a $ 4. 5 billion program, one of 11 in which she was involved that have been reviewed by the Defense Department's inspector general." Bloomberg adds, "Jim Cross, a spokesman for the U. S. attorney's office in Wichita, Kan., which is handling the settlement talks, declined to comment. Jackie Berger, a spokesman for the Wichitabased aircraft unit of Waltham, Mass.-based Raytheon, confirmed the existence of the Pentagon investigation while also declining to comment on any settlement talks. … Raytheon, the fifth-largest U. S. defense contractor, is 'fully cooperating' with the Pentagon investigation, Berger said. 'We believe the company's actions have been entirely consistent with all legal requirements.'"

DOJ_NMG_0036710

McCain-Feingold Seen As Having Positive Impact. In a Washington Post op-ed (6/23, A25), former FEC Commissioner Trevor Potter says when the McCain-Feingold campaign finance legislation "was being debated four years ago, Sen. Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) told his colleagues that it would 'eviscerate the national party committees' because of its ban on unlimited 'soft money' donations." But in 2004, "the parties raised more funds than ever before. In response, critics explained that it was a presidential election year, and an exceptionally motivating one at that; funds would surely dry up in 2006. Yet numbers recently released by the Federal Election Commission (FEC) show that the $555.2 million raised by both parties so far this cycle is ahead of 2004 totals by 5 percent." The law "has been an undisputed success in combating the corruption of huge soft-money contributions and an apparent success in re-energizing grass-roots supporters." McCain-Feingold "was a necessary -- but not sufficient -- start."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

DOJ Clears Austin, TX, Officer In Fatal 2003 Shooting. The Austin American-Statesman (6/23, Plohetski) reports, "A federal investigation has concluded that Austin police officer Scott Glasgow did not violate Jesse Lee Owens' civil rights when the officer fatally shot Owens during a 2003 traffic stop in East Austin, authorities said Thursday." The A-S continues, "Glasgow will not face federal charges for his actions during the stop, which began when he pulled Owens over for driving a car that had been reported stolen. … The U.S. Department of Justice's civil rights division, the FBI and the U.S. attorney's office said in a written statement that the 'government could not prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the victim's death was the result of more force than was necessary . . . The department is closing this matter.' … The federal inquiry was the last open investigation into Glasgow's actions during the June 14, 2003, incident."

KXAN-TV, Austin, TX (6/23) reports, "The attorney for Jesse Owens' family says he will appeal the decision from the Department of Justice. The higher court will be the 5th Circuit Court of Appeals out of New Orleans. … Attorney Bobby Taylor says he will spend his own money to try and get justice for the Owens family, and that will include an immediate appeal. … On the other side of that coin, the police union says it's satisfied with the vindication of Officer Glasgow, but at the same time acknowledges, this was a tragic incident."

Justices Sets Wider Standards For Worker Discrimination Suits. NBC Nightly News (6/22, story 8, 1:05, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "An important ruling today from the US Supreme Court, one that could potentially affect every American worker, especially women. It came in a case involving a woman forklift operator who said her boss illegally retaliated against her when she complained she was the target of sex discrimination." NBC (P. Williams) added, "The court today clarified what counts as retaliation and said it can be something much more subtle than denying a promotion, cutting pay, or outright firing. … Today's decision said it is illegal discrimination, retaliation, to give employees who complain about discrimination less desirable jobs or to suspend them without pay, even if they eventually get the money back."

The Wall Street Journal (6/23, Bravin, Ben Winograd, 2.11M) reports, "A unanimous Supreme Court sent a warning to employers: Be careful how you treat workers who file discrimination complaints. … Employee advocates said the decision would help ensure that antidiscrimination laws have teeth." The Washington Post (6/23, A16, Lane, 744K) notes the decision "had the full support of eight justices." Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. "agreed with the result but differed from the majority reasoning."

The Financial Times (6/23, Waldmeir) says the court "gave US workers more power in employment discrimination lawsuits, making it easier for employees to fight back if punished by employers for lodging job-bias complaints. … The decision set out new standards for what kind of action, and the severity of that action, qualifies as retaliation under federal civil rights law." The Christian Science Monitor (6/23, Richey, 61K) runs a similar report under the headline "High Court Eases Path For Workers' Discrimination Suits," while USA Today (6/23, Biskupic, 2.31M) titles its story "Court Eases Worker Lawsuits."

The AP (6/23, Locy) reports, "By a 9-0 vote, justices said that Sheila White was improperly punished with a suspension for 37 days over a Christmas holiday and was transferred from operating the forklift to doing more physical work as a yard worker. … Justice Stephen Breyer wrote that White did receive back pay. But he said she and her family had to live 37 days without any income. … 'Many reasonable employees would find a month without a paycheck to be a serious hardship,' Breyer wrote, adding that 'an indefinite suspension without pay could well act as a deterrent, even if the suspended employee eventually received back pay.'" The AP adds, "The high court's ruling tilts the balance of power in employment settings toward employees by establishing a broader legal standard for retaliation claims, an area of litigation that has exploded in recent years. … Under the high court's standard, employers are liable for unlawful retaliation if their actions 'interfere with an employee's efforts' to ensure that he or she is not discriminated against in the workplace, Breyer wrote."

DOJ_NMG_0036711

The Legal Times (6/23, Mauro) reports, "The decision in Burlington Northern & Santa Fe Railway Co. v. White ends disarray among lower courts on the standard required to assess retaliation claims, but employment lawyers say it will trigger a wave of new litigation to determine what kind of employer actions constitute illegal retaliation. … 'This decision is huge -- hugely bad for me as a defense lawyer,' says Daniel Westman, a partner at Morrison & Foerster and the author of a book on retaliation litigation. 'It really makes it a lot easier for employees to make out a case.' … Civil rights groups, for their part, applauded the decision. 'The Burlington Northern opinion is an emphatic statement that employees should be able to raise a good-faith complaint of discrimination without fear of retaliation from their employers,' says Gillian Thomas, lawyer for the women's rights group Legal Momentum."

Pennsylvania Moves Toward Constitutional Amendment Banning Gay Marriage. The AP (6/23) reports, "Lawmakers took another step toward putting a constitutional amendment to ban gay marriage on the ballot in Pennsylvania. … The state Senate approved the proposed amendment 38-12 on Wednesday." The AP continues, "Pennsylvania already has a law defining marriage as between a man and a woman. But Senator Jane Orie and other Republicans warned that without a constitutional amendment, a judge could act on a legal challenge and effectively legalize gay marriage or civil unions. … Opponents questioned the need to guard against a hypothetical challenge. 'Mind your own business, stay out of the bedroom,' said Senator Vincent J. Fumo, a Democrat." The AP adds, "Amending the state constitution requires approval by the House and Senate in successive two-year sessions of the General Assembly and then the approval of voters in a statewide referendum. … Senators must now work out differences with a version passed by the House, which also prohibits civil unions."

House GOP Said To Show True Colors On Voting Rights Act. In his Washington Post column (6/23, A25), Eugene Robinson says, "Wednesday we had one of those rare high-definition moments, when the House Republican caucus defied its leaders and refused to back renewal of the Voting Rights Act. That tells you about all you need to know, doesn't it?" Speaker Dennis Hastert "was ready to move forward with a feel-good, election-year extension of the landmark 1965 act that guaranteed voting rights for African Americans disenfranchised by Jim Crow law and custom in Alabama, Mississippi, Georgia, Louisiana, South Carolina and Virginia." Hastert "understood that reauthorizing the act would be useful in efforts to convince voters that the Republican Party as presently constituted is just ultraconservative, not actually racist. But Hastert was sandbagged by fellow Republicans who rebelled in a private caucus meeting Wednesday. The renewal probably could have won easy approval on the House floor, since Democrats would have voted for it, but Hastert's policy is to not bring out any bill that lacks majority support from Republicans, so he had no choice but to yank it. So much for the erstwhile 'party of Lincoln.'"

WNBA Player Decries Education Department Change In Title IX Policy. In a USA Today op-ed (6/23), Tamika Catchings of the Indiana Fever in the WNBA says, "Largely as a result of Title IX, women's participation in athletics has increased more than 400% at the college level and more than 800% in high schools since 1972." But "this march forward has reached a potential roadblock. About 15 months ago, the Department of Education quietly issued a new Title IX policy that lowers the bar for what schools must do to provide equal sports opportunities for women. Schools now can show compliance with the law simply by sending all female students an e-mail survey gauging their athletic interests. Schools can claim that any failure to respond indicates a lack of interest in additional opportunities." The Education Department "should reverse this policy. Preserving Title IX is simply the right thing to do."

DOJ_NMG_0036712

ANTITRUST:

DOJ Approves Exelon's Acquisition Of PSEG. The AP (6/23) reports, "The U.S. Department of Justice on Thursday approved a deal to create the nation's largest power generation company, but it ordered Exelon Corp. and Public Service Enterprise Group to first divest six electricity generating plants." The AP continues, "The department said more competition was needed because the merger, as originally proposed, would have sparked higher prices for wholesale electricity and, ultimately, hiked rates for millions of customers in the mid-Atlantic region. … The deal, which was announced in 2004, still requires approval from New Jersey regulators. The final decision on whether to continue with the merger will rest with the boards of both Exelon and PSEG after the terms and conditions of regulatory requirements are known."

The Wall Street Journal (6/23, Smith) reports, "The federal antitrust enforcers didn't order nuclear-plant divestitures, a move that might have caused Exelon to abandon the stock-swap transaction. Exelon faces one more hurdle: regulatory approval from the state of New Jersey. Exelon Chief Executive John Rowe said he hopes the agreement with the Justice Department creates 'positive momentum' that will lead to resolution with the state." The Journal adds, "The demand by the Justice Department shows that antitrust regulators are willing to order significant divestitures to prevent the formation of giant utility companies that could push up electricity prices in deregulated markets. In its findings, the agency said the transaction 'as originally proposed, would have caused higher prices for...millions of electricity consumers in the mid-Atlantic region.' … Some consumer advocates said the Justice Department didn't go far enough. To nip unfair market power and improve market function, Exelon should be ordered to divest 6,300 megawatts to 9,600 megawatts, said the New Jersey Public Interest Research Group. That would amount to a significant portion of a portfolio starting at about 43,000 megawatts, before any divestitures."

The Chicago Tribune (6/23, Miller) reports, "The Chicago-based utility holding company's accord with the Justice Department will reduce the economic value Exelon reaps from the planned purchase through a one-time hit of $500 million to $600 million, most of it tax-related. … But it also leaves Commonwealth Edison's parent with just one regulatory hurdle left to clear: The deal, first announced in December 2004, still needs approval of New Jersey's Board of Public Utilities. The merger has met with vocal opposition from some citizen groups, however." The Tribune adds, "Through its antitrust division, the Justice Department evaluates proposed mergers to ensure that the combination of two industry rivals won't damage competition by creating a company with excessive 'market power.' … The transaction as originally proposed 'would have caused higher prices for wholesale electricity, ultimately increasing prices paid by millions of electricity consumers in the mid-Atlantic region,' the department noted Thursday. … That's because, it said, with Exelon's existing Pennsylvania properties, the combined company would have owned nearly half the generating capacity in the densely populated area of eastern Pennsylvania, New Jersey, the District of Columbia, and parts of Maryland and Virginia."

The Newark Star-Ledger (NJ) (6/23, Ovide) reports, "Analysts said the green light from the Justice Department was crucial to finalize a deal Exelon and Public Service announced with fanfare 18 months ago, but which since has been delayed by regulatory concerns and scorned by some skeptical investors. … With the government agreement, the proposed merger faces one final regulatory hurdle -- approval by the New Jersey Board of Public Utilities."

MarketWatch (6/23, Cassidy) reports, "The merged company would serve 7.2 million electric customers in a patchwork of service territories in Illinois, Pennsylvania and New Jersey. It will also serve just more than 2 million natural-gas customers, primarily in New Jersey and Pennsylvania. … But the DOJ antitrust division said that the companies would own nearly half of the electricity generating capacity in the densely populated area encompassing eastern Pennsylvania, New Jersey and the District of Columbia, as well as parts of Maryland and Virginia. … 'The combination of their assets would enhance the incentive and ability of the merged firm to raise wholesale electric prices,' the government added."

Bloomberg (6/23, Seeley, Polson) reports that FERC "approved the acquisition a year ago on the conditions that Exelon sells plants with a capacity of 4,000 megawatts," and "sell 2,600 megawatts of nuclear-plant output to competitors under long-term contracts."

US, UK Antitrust Agencies Probing Alleged Airline Price-Fixing. The New York Times (6/23, Timmons) reports, "British and United States agencies are investigating a possible conspiracy to illegally fix the amounts of fuel surcharges imposed on passengers on long-distance flights to and from Britain." The Times continues, "Most major airlines flying between the United States and Heathrow, London's main international airport, charge passengers about £35 ($64) each way in fuel surcharges. … The Justice Department and the Office of Fair Trade in Britain have contacted British Airways, Virgin Atlantic Airways, United Airlines and American Airlines and may be talking to others in connection with the investigation. Violation of price-fixing laws could carry civil and criminal penalties."

DOJ_NMG_0036713

The Dallas Morning News (6/23, Maxon) reports, "The extent of the investigation remained a mystery. … No other airline stepped forward to say it also faced accusations, although several others disclosed that they've been contacted by investigators." The News adds, "American Airlines Inc., British Airways' partner across the Atlantic and in the Oneworld airline alliance, said it received a federal grand jury subpoena Tuesday as part of a U.S. Department of Justice investigation. … The Times of London quoted analysts as saying that the investigators seem to be looking into airlines that fly into London's Heathrow Airport, particularly on the lucrative New York-London route."

Bloomberg (6/23, Fletcher) reports, "With oil prices near record highs, airlines have been able to cover 15 percent to 20 percent of their additional costs with supplemental charges, according to the International Air Transport Association. … British Airways' non-fare revenue, which includes fuel surcharges, increased 65 percent in the fourth quarter to 340 million pounds, the airline said on May 19. British Airways in April raised the fuel surcharge on long-haul flights by 17 percent to 35 pounds. The cost of a one-way business class ticket to New York from London Heathrow on July 6 is 2,563.50 pounds including taxes, according to the airline's Web site." Bloomberg adds, "The U.S. Justice Department 'is investigating the possibility of anticompetitive practices involving surcharges and rates for passenger fares and air cargo shipments,' agency spokeswoman Gina Talamona said in a statement."

The AP (6/23, Wagner) reports, "Two BA executives -- commercial director Martin George and head of communications Iain Burns -- have been given leaves of absence. BA declined to provide any information beyond its brief statement, including whether George and Burns were asked to leave or ordered out." The AP adds, "High fuel prices have led airlines to raise the surcharge that passengers pay on long-haul flights. For instance, BA customers now pay a 70 pound ($129) surcharge on a round-trip ticket from London to New York, the airline said."

United Press International (6/23) also reports on the probe.

EU Has Received No Complaint By Adobe About Microsoft Office. The AP (6/23) reports, "The European Commission said Thursday that software company Adobe Systems Inc. has not made any complaints so far about Microsoft Corp.'s plans to ship its new Office software without Adobe's PDF file reader." The AP continues, "In an ongoing dispute with Adobe, Microsoft said earlier this month that it had canceled plans to include an automatic way to save documents in the popular Portable Document Format in Office 2007, due out to consumers in January. Instead, users will have to download separate, free software to save documents created in Office products such as Word and Excel as PDFs." The AP adds, "European Union spokesman Jonathan Todd said EU antitrust regulators were in contact with Microsoft to discuss concerns about how the new Windows Vista operating system will treat PDF-type documents, but had not received a complaint about Office from Adobe. … The spat with Adobe, which developed the popular PDF technology, comes as Microsoft prepares to launch its own competing format for saving documents that cannot be easily modified."

SCOTUS Dismisses Closely Watched Patent Case. The Legal Times (6/23, Mauro) reports, "The Supreme Court on Thursday dismissed from its docket a closely watched patent case, saving for another day a decision on whether a naturally occurring scientific relationship can be patented." The Times continues, "The Court's surprise action came in Laboratory Corp. v. Metabolite Laboratories, a dispute over the patentability of a correlation between blood composition and a vitamin deficiency. The dismissal came without explanation. But an unusual dissent by Justice Stephen Breyer hinted that the high court had dismissed the case because the patentability issue was not squarely raised before the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit, which ruled on the case in 2004." The Times adds, "Breyer, joined by Justices John Paul Stevens and David Souter, said he would have ruled on the case anyway, in part because physicians could become unwitting patent infringers whenever they make the same connection between the presence of a certain amino acid in a patient's blood and vitamin B deficiency that was included in Metabolite's patent. … A decision in the case could have had an effect on not only medical or scientific developments but also certain 'business method' patents that have been challenged as unpatentable. … But with the Court ending the case as it did, 'it became a nonevent,' says Michael Barclay, a patent specialist at Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati. Even though the net result of the high court's action is to let the federal circuit ruling stand, he says, that circuit ruling has no broad importance because the Supreme Court believes the patentability issue went undecided."

DOJ_NMG_0036714

Bolloré Will Not Pursue Merger With Aegis. The Wall Street Journal (6/23, Patrick) reports, "Vincent Bolloré, the French corporate raider who is also chairman of French advertising concern Havas, said yesterday that he wants rival Aegis to remain independent, rebutting months of talk in the ad world about a possible merger of the two companies. … However, Mr. Bolloré, who in recent months has become Aegis's biggest shareholder, outlined his plans to seek 'links' between Havas and Aegis in one of the hottest areas in advertising: media buying and planning." The Journal continues, "Media buyers and planners purchase TV, newspaper and other advertising space and work out where to best place ads on behalf of marketers. The rapid growth of the Internet, computer games and other entertainment has made it harder for advertisers to reach consumers. And the services of media buyers and planners are in greater demand. … But Havas lacks the international scale that clients are increasingly demanding. By linking with London-based Aegis on specific accounts or in particular regions, for example, Havas could offer clients a broader menu."

Mittal May Boost Bid For Arcelor. The Wall Street Journal (6/23, Glader, Singer) reports, "Mittal Steel Co. is in advanced talks with rival steelmaker Arcelor SA about improving its €23.93 billion ($30.1 billion) hostile takeover bid to forge a friendly deal, according to people close to the matter." The Journal continues, "Mittal is considering increasing its bid for a second time, either with more cash, more stock or both, these people said. Under terms being discussed, Arcelor shareholders could end up with more than half of the combined company's shares, control much of a newly formed board of nonexecutive directors, and even keep current Arcelor Chief Executive Officer Guy Dollé in the same role, they said." The Journal adds, "Talks are continuing and terms could change, these people said. The parties are locked in tense negotiations in advance of Sunday's meeting of Arcelor's board, when it will consider any new proposals by Mittal Steel as well as an updated merger proposal by Russian steelmaker OAO Severstal. … The new proposal from London-based billionaire Lakshmi Mittal, chairman and CEO of Mittal, would likely value Arcelor above €40 a share, these people said. Mittal's current cash and stock offer values Arcelor at €36.04 a share. In Paris, Arcelor's shares stood at €35.02 before trading was suspended pending resolution of the matter. Mittal's shares ended trading in Amsterdam yesterday at €25.99, down four European cents."

Univision Auction Draws Little Interest. The Wall Street Journal (6/23, Marr, Berman, Lyons) reports, "The high-profile auction of Univision Communications Inc. descended into turmoil yesterday, raising questions about the appeal of a Spanish-language media business that in recent years has been coveted for its ability to reach the growing ranks of Hispanic consumers in the U.S." The Journal continues, "With the dominant Spanish-language TV network in the U.S. and a collection of other assets, Univision was expected to be an unusually attractive media property. But as a deadline for bids came and went this week, it became apparent that there were few interested parties -- especially at the price Univision wanted." The Journal adds, "Univision's chairman, Hollywood veteran A. Jerrold Perenchio, may yet sell -- if he can coax a somewhat higher price out of the private-equity investors circling the company. One group, led by Mexican TV giant Grupo Televisa SA, was scrambling to present a bid last night after its original coalition fell apart. Some partners in that group, which initially included Kohlberg Kravis Roberts, Blackstone Group and Carlyle Group, have been smarting about the price they had to pay as well as the power-sharing arrangement with Televisa. U.S. law prohibits a foreign company from owning more than 25% of a U.S. broadcaster."

WSJournal Criticizes FCC Extension Of Universal Service Fund To Internet. The Wall Street Journal (6/23, 2.11M) says in an editorial that the Federal Communications Commission has "voted to require Internet telephone companies to contribute to the Universal Service Fund (USF). The move means higher phone bills for Internet telephone service as providers pass this new cost on to customers. But it also means that a Republican-run regulatory agency is expanding a federal subsidy that should have been phased out long ago." The USF "has become a tool for redistributing wealth from urban phone customers to their rural counterparts, says Randolph May, a former FCC lawyer who now heads the Free State Foundation think tank."

DOJ_NMG_0036715

LATimes Criticizes Move To Regulate Internet Based On Network Neutrality. The Los Angeles Times (6/23, 958K) says in an editorial, "The debate over regulating high-speed Internet providers has unleashed a rare apocalyptic synchronicity. Both sides make the same dire warning: The future of the Internet is at stake. And both respond in the wrong way." At issue "is whether broadband providers will be able to offer websites and services a faster route into their customers' homes and offices. Some want to prioritize traffic on the last mile for a fee. This way, they say, Web-based companies can ensure the quality of the movies, music and other services they deliver online. It also would help broadband providers raise the money they say they need to keep up with the growing demand for space on their networks." This "kind of prioritizing scares some high-tech firms and advocacy groups, which worry about phone and cable companies picking winners and losers online. Such interference, they say, would stifle innovation by making it harder for start-ups and interest groups to compete with well-funded media powerhouses. They want Congress to preserve 'network neutrality' by banning network operators from prioritizing data in a discriminatory way." But "the best protection for websites and Internet users is to have more broadband providers competing with the phone and cable companies." The Internet is "a hotbed of innovation largely because there are no barriers to entry on the last mile. Broadband providers should be free to experiment as they add capacity, but not at the expense of the Internet access they deliver to customers today."

ENVIRONMENT:

US Charges Puerto Rico Utility With Environmental Crimes. AFP (6/23) reports, "The US government has indicted a Puerto Rico utility company for 'environmental crimes', and sealed a deal with the utility which will see it pay a record nine million dollar fine for partly polluting US waters." AFP continues, "The US Justice Department and the US Environmental Protection Agency said in a joint statement that the Puerto Rico Aqueduct and Sewer Authority (PRASA) has agreed to plead guilty to the indictment relating to Clean Water Act violations. … The criminal fine of nine million dollars is the largest ever paid by a utility for violating the act." AFP adds, "The indictment from the administration of President George W. Bush against the US island territory in the Caribbean follows the discharge of 'millions of gallons of inadequately treated sewage and raw sewage through illegal discharges,' the statement said. … The Bush administration has been fiercely criticized by environmental groups for rolling-back environmental protections and failing to penalize polluters."

California Supreme Court Denies Review Of Lead Paint Case. The California Recorder (6/23, McKee) reports, "After years of litigation, eight major paint manufacturers may be on the verge of having to get the lead out -- of countless public and private buildings around California, that is." The Recorder continues, "The California Supreme Court on Wednesday refused to review a ruling that OK'd a suit seeking to force manufacturers, such as Atlantic Richfield Co. and Sherwin-Williams Co., to cover the costs of abating lead paint inside and outside all types of structures." The Recorder adds, "The original suit was filed by 12 Bay Area counties, cities and public agencies -- including San Francisco, Oakland and Santa Clara County -- intent on forcing paint makers to fund cleanup costs that plaintiffs lawyer Bruce Simon, a partner in Burlingame, Calif.'s Cotchett, Pitre, Simon & McCarthy, estimated at "potentially billions of dollars." … 'You just have to imagine how many hospitals, schools and public buildings were built prior to 1978,' he said. That was the year the federal government banned lead paint for residential use. … The government entities sued the paint manufacturers on behalf of the public in March 2000, long after the industry had pulled lead paint from the market, but only two years after scientific studies showed that even low-level exposure could cause serious physical harm."

Senate Adds $4 Billion In Emergency Aid For Farmers. The AP (6/23, Quaid) reports the Senate Agriculture Committee Thursday "revived a $4 billion aid measure for farmers struggling with high fuel prices and drought, despite opposition from President Bush and the House." Earlier this month, negotiators "dumped" the farm disaster aid from a spending bill for the war in Iraq and hurricane relief. The White House "disliked the farm aid because it raised the bill's price," the AP says. Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns contended the money "would not give energy relief to every farmer."

DOJ_NMG_0036716

CQ (6/23, Richert) says the committee approved nearly $4.2 billion, including $18.2 billion in discretionary spending, for the Agriculture Department and Food and Drug Administration. Agriculture Appropriations Subcommittee Chairman Robert Bennett (R-UT) warned that the funding "would likely be cut again." Also, in a move CQ says "threatens to draw a veto threat from the Bush administration," the committee adopted an amendment that would license farmers to travel to Cuba to sell their products.

National Research Council Says Earth Warmest Since 1600. The CBS Evening News (6/22, lead story, 3:00, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "Well, it is getting hot here on Earth. How hot? Well, maybe hotter than it has been in 2,000 years and it is our fault, humans, that is. That in layman's language is the conclusion of a panel of prestigious scientists working for the National Academy of Science that was released today and it could spell serious trouble for the future." CBS (Whitaker) added, "Scientists with the National Research Council concluded with a high degree of confidence that the rise in temperatures the last few decades of the 20th century was unprecedented, adding to the general science of the consensus that much of the temperature up tick is due to human activity." The debate "over global warming is as much political as scientific. The Bush Administration insists the threat is not grave enough to warrant stringent pollution controls and risk American jobs. But Republican Congressman Sherwood Boehlert, who called for the national research council report, says it should put the debate to rest." Rep. Sherwood Boehlert, Chairman, Science Committee, New York: "I welcome the conclusions because nothing in the report raised any doubts about the broad scientific consensus on global climate change."

NBC Nightly News (6/22, lead story, Bazell, 9.87M) reported, "Congress asked the nation's top science body to study the issue after a widely publicized 1998 study concluding the 90s were the hottest decade in a thousand years. The Academy decided the thousand-year comparison may be true, but it said since 1600, the data are absolutely reliable. The evidence – it includes historical records of weather observations, the buildup of coral and reefs which indicates ocean warming, soil and ice samples from cores drilled deep into the Earth, tree ring growth, the wider the ring, the warmer the year, and the size of glaciers; as for the cause of the warming, Dr. Kurt Cuffey of the University of California." Dr. Cuffey: "This information is certainly consistent with the prevailing view that climate is warming due to human influences and will continue to do so in the future."

ABC World News Tonight (6/22, story 8, :25, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Congress got a weather report today that caught our attention. It was told the earth's temperature is warmer than it's been in 400 years, possibly the last 2,000 years."

The Washington Post (6/23, A3, Eilperin, 744K) reports the National Academy of Sciences report "on the 'hockey stick graph' -- a much-discussed chart showing a sudden rise in temperatures in the Northern Hemisphere since the Industrial Revolution began -- voiced less confidence about the graph's conclusion that the climate is hotter now than it has been in 1,000 years. As a result, the academy report is not likely to resolve the fierce debate over the extent to which human-generated greenhouse gas emissions are responsible for warming the earth."

The Los Angeles Times (6/23, Maugh, Kaplan, 958K) reports, "Coupled with a report last month from the Bush administration's Climate Change Science Program that found 'clear evidence of human influences on the climate system,' the new study from the council, part of the National Academy of Sciences, signals a growing acceptance in Washington of widely held scientific views on the causes of global warming."

Friedman Says Global Warming Hurts Developing Countries Most. In his New York Times column (6/23), Thomas Friedman says, "For many Americans, combating climate change is at best a cause for green do-gooders and at worse something to be debated. But in a developing country like Peru, where many people live on the land and close to the edge, climate change is neither a hobby nor a question for debate." Peru's "plant and animal species are also being affected. The Andes region is one of the world's most mega-diverse hot spots, home to unique plant and animal species. Its rain forests, mountains and varied terrain create microclimates that provide habitats for endemic species, which have evolved in isolation from one another. As climate change shifts the boundaries between these zones, species found nowhere else in the world are threatened and disappearing."

DOJ_NMG_0036717

Increasing US Reliance On Coal Seen As Unwise. In a New York Times op-ed (6/23), author Jeff Goodell says According to a recent report by the National Coal Council, an advisory board to the Department of Energy that is dominated by coal executives, if America invested $211 billion in coal-to-liquids refineries over the next 20 years, we could make 2.6 million barrels of diesel per day, enhancing the American oil supply by 10 percent. A number of coal-to-liquids plants are on the drawing boards in the United States, and China is eagerly pursuing this technology too." But "let's consider the wisdom of substituting one fossil fuel for another. We already burn a billion tons of coal a year — it generates more than half the electricity in the United States. But thanks in part to ever bigger, more powerful equipment, mining is destroying vast swaths of Appalachia while providing fewer well-paying jobs."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Technical Mistake Reveals Conte As Reporter's Source In BALCO Probe. The San Francisco Chronicle (6/23, Egelko, Writer) reports, "Federal prosecutors say Victor Conte, founder of the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative, gave a Chronicle reporter information about the proceedings of a grand jury that was investigating BALCO for supplying performance-enhancing drugs to star athletes." The Chronicle continues, "The government's assertions, contained in portions of a federal court filing on Wednesday that were meant to be sealed from public view, stop short of accusing Conte of being the source of grand jury transcripts of testimony by Barry Bonds and other athletes reported in Chronicle articles and in a book by two Chronicle reporters." The Chronicle adds, "The government has subpoenaed the reporters, Mark Fainaru-Wada and Lance Williams, and The Chronicle to identify their source of the transcripts, which had been sealed by a federal judge's protective order. … Prosecutors cite numerous e-mail exchanges about grand jury testimony between Conte and Fainaru-Wada, including a purported offer by Conte to turn over a CD containing the testimony."

The New York Times (6/23, Liptak) reports, "About eight pages of a 51-page government brief filed in federal court in San Francisco on Wednesday were electronically blacked out to protect what prosecutors said was sensitive material concerning a grand jury's investigation into steroid use in baseball. … But the secret passages can be viewed by simply pasting the document into a word processing program. The passages open a window onto a particularly aggressive government leak investigation, one that seeks to force two San Francisco Chronicle reporters to reveal the identity of a confidential source. They also help explain why prosecutors are pursuing the matter so vigorously." The Times adds, "Phil Bronstein, the editor of The Chronicle, said the government might have taken more care to protect the blacked-out passages in light of the nature of its investigation. 'It's a little surprising and ironic in this case in particular,' Mr. Bronstein said, 'that this information which the government filed is somehow available to the public.' … Eve Burton, vice president and general counsel of the Hearst Corporation, which owns The Chronicle, said that prosecutors may be guilty of the very thing they are investigating. 'It is our hope,' she said, 'that the government did not leak the document.'"

The New York Sun (6/23, Gerstein) reports, "Those portions detail e-mail correspondence between Mr. Fainaru-Wada and the founder of a drug lab implicated in the probe, Victor Conte Jr. According to the filing, Conte broached the possibility of giving the reporter a CD containing grand jury transcripts, but added 'Just Kidding.' Mr. Fainaru-Wada pursued the possibility and suggested moving the conversation to a 'pay phone or cell or even meeting that would provide more comfort.' Three days after that exchange in June 2004, the Chronicle published a story detailing testimony about steroid use by a sprinter, Tim Montgomery."

Defendants In Heroin, Fentanyl Case Face Conspiracy Charges. The Chicago Tribune (6/23, Coen) reports two dozen people "charged in this week's takedown of the Mickey Cobras street gang appeared at the Dirksen U.S. Courthouse on Thursday for a reading of the drug conspiracy charges filed against them. Federal prosecutors have charged 47 members and associates of the gang in a sweeping complaint that accuses the Mickey Cobras of selling heroin and fentanyl at the Dearborn Homes housing project. … Christopher Hoyt, special agent with the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, said 32 of the 47 charged in the complaint were in custody Thursday."

The AP (6/23) reports a Chicago police officer "swept up in the crackdown on the Mickey Cobras' street gang appeared in federal court Thursday and arranged to post $10,000 bond. Tashika Sledge, 29, was among 47 people charged Wednesday with conspiracy to possess and distribute heroin and other drugs. Federal prosecutors contend the officer had a personal relationship with a top gang leader and fed him information about police activity."

DOJ_NMG_0036718

UPI (6/22) reports a Chicago policewoman "is among 47 people arrested in a major gang-operated heroin distribution ring run out of a Chicago public housing complex. … The 213-page federal complaint alleges… Tashika Sledge helped the gang leaders by giving access to the police database to determine which members were under surveillance, and enabling them to check vehicle license plates to determine who was following them."

The Detroit News (6/22) reports that in Detroit, DEA spokeswoman Carolyn Gibson "said officials believe the tainted heroin sold in Detroit is linked with the Chicago heroin. Still, 'I cannot confirm at this time that that particular gang is connected,' Gibson said."

Accused Drug Dealer Said To Be Career Criminal. The Detroit News (6/22) reports, "A drug dealer accused of running a dope house where a 17-year-old Birmingham high school student overdosed was a career criminal and a fugitive on numerous parole violations that could have sent him to prison years ago, records show. A toxicology report completed Wednesday confirmed that Lauren Jolly of Bloomfield Township died last month from a lethal dose of fentanyl, a painkiller that has been mixed with heroin and is believed to have killed at least 79 people in Metro Detroit. Donald Edwin Cunningham, 26, with whom Jolly spent the last hours of her life at the house on Keating Street, according to police, violated terms of his parole at least nine times since he was sent to prison in April 2001."

Local TV Coverage. WFLD-TV, Chicago (6/22, 7:00 a.m.) reported, "Federal authorities say more arrests could be coming in connection with yesterday's sweeping gang crackdown. Drug agents swarmed the Dearborn Homes arresting several people they say were dealing drugs for the gang, the Mickey Cobras. The drugs include cocaine, marijuana, heroin laced with fentanyl and among those arrested was a Chicago police officer. Tashiqua Sledge was accused of feeding information to her boyfriend who is an alleged gang member. Police say they have been watching Sledge for months."

WGN-TV, Chicago (6/22, 8:00 a.m.) reported, "Chicago police and federal agents have shut down a major operation that sold killer drugs. Authorities staged a morning raid at the Dearborn Homes complex and charged 47 people in a conspiracy to market heroin laced with the painkiller fentanyl. Most of the suspects belong to the Mickey Cobras gang."

WBBM-TV, Chicago (6/22, 5:00 a.m.) reported, "Officials call it a significant victory in the war on drugs. Federal agents arrested nearly four dozen gang members who sold several types of drugs, the Mickey Cobras ran their operation out of the Dearborn Homes and eventually sold crack cocaine, marijuana, heroin and the potentially lethal prescription pain killer fentanyl."

New Orleans Police Promise "Massive Presence" Amidst Drug Turf War. The New Orleans Times-Picayune (6/23, Varney, 257K) reports that New Orleans Police Department said that, "augmented by the arrival of National Guard and State Police reinforcements," it "will begin deploying a 'massive physical presence' in Central City, Algiers and parts of Uptown," even as Federal law enforcement officials "vowed Thursday to bring federal cases whenever possible against suspects charged with violent offenses, yanking them out of a crippled state criminal justice system struggling to cope with a surge in crime and arrests." According to a recent FBI intelligence dossier, the "resurgence of crime in the city" is due to "a turf war among rival gangs that controlled the narcotics trade before Hurricane Katrina and have moved back into the city." Jim Bernazzani, special agent in charge of the FBI's New Orleans field office, said the report "shows that nine family or neighborhood-based drug organizations have returned to New Orleans and most have taken up residence in and around Central City."

FBI Announces Arrest Of Drug Ring Members. The Philadelphia Inquirer (6/23, Mason, 423K) reports that the FBI said "A drug task force has arrested three people suspected of distributing a deadly combination of heroin and a powerful painkiller." Louis "Bardo" Morales, Osvaldo "Valdi" Seda and Adam J. "Kekito" Torres-Ojeda were held after "the task force seized what agents called 'a large quantity' of heroin in predawn raids" at Morales' and at Torres-Ojeda's homes. "Jerri Williams, an FBI spokeswoman, said the drugs are being tested for fentanyl, a powerful painkiller that increases the odds of taking an overdose," but "declined to provide details of the arrests or seizures until the warrants are unsealed." Still, Chester narcotics Sgt. Joseph Bail said "the Morales organization is believed to be 'a major heroin distribution ring in the city.'"

DOJ_NMG_0036719

Drug Suspect Arrested Nine Months After Faking His Death. The AP (6/23) reports that nine months after Kevin Klarell Washington faked this own death, "federal authorities found the 32-year-old Savannah man alive in Orlando, Fla., and arrested him on charges of distributing crack cocaine stemming from an investigation before Washington vanished." Authorities "had gotten a big break in March, when Washington's wife renewed his Georgia driver's license," but William Kirkconnell, the FBI's supervisory senior special agent in Savannah, notes, "'Based on the timing of his alleged drowning, law enforcement was skeptical at best' of his death."

In Florida, Defense Attorneys Seek Dismissal Of Drug Cartel Case. The St. Petersburg Times (6/22) reports arguments were scheduled to conclude yesterday in a hearing regarding Joaquin Valencia-Trujillo, a Colombian businessman "described by federal prosecutors as a kingpin in the Cali drug cartel. Valencia-Trujillo's attorneys asked U.S. Magistrate Judge Elizabeth A. Jenkins to take the dramatic step of dismissing the case against their client. They say the government's actions, which include detaining a defense investigator as he returned from Colombia and seizing his records, have irreparably harmed Valencia-Trujillo's ability to receive a fair trial."

Texas Woman Gets Life Sentence In Drug Conspiracy Case. The Houston Chronicle (6/23, Rendon) reports a Texas City woman "convicted of conspiracy to distribute crack is headed to federal prison for life without parole, the mandatory sentence after prosecutors presented evidence of prior drug convictions. Carol Denise Richardson, 38, was convicted of conspiracy and several other federal drug charges in March. U.S. District Judge Keith P. Ellison sentenced her June 16. … Prosecutors sought a sentencing enhancement based upon Richardson's prior drug convictions, which raised the mandatory minimum sentence to life without parole."

IMMIGRATION:

High Court Decision Clears Way For Summary Deportations. The Washington Times (6/23, Seper, 90K) reports, "The Supreme Court yesterday upheld the deportation of an illegal alien who lived here for more than 20 years, started a business, married a US citizen and fathered a child -- delivering what immigration specialists said was a setback to other longtime illegal residents who might seek legal status." The Washington Post (6/23, A16, Lane, 744K) says that by a vote of 8 to 1, "the court ruled that the US government properly sent Utah truck driver Humberto Fernandez-Vargas back to Mexico in 2004 because he returned to the US illegally in 1982 after having been previously deported."

The Christian Science Monitor (6/23, Richey, 61K) reports, "Under the 1996 Illegal Immigration Reform and Immigrant Responsibility Act, anyone who sneaks back into the US after being deported is barred from applying to become a legal resident. The law says the old deportation order must be immediately reinstated and carried out, again. In his lone dissent, Justice John Paul Stevens says the law does not apply to those who entered the US prior to its passage - and creates an improper retroactive effect upon illegal immigrants." The ruling "will make it easier for immigration officials to enforce the law. But such enforcement will also jeopardize extensive family, work, and community ties forged by large numbers of illegal immigrants who have led productive lives in the US for decades."

The AP (6/23) reports, "By an 8-1 vote, justices said that Humberto Fernandez-Vargas, who was deported several times from the 1970s to 1981, is subject to a 1996 law Congress passed to streamline the legal process for expelling aliens who have been deported at least once before and returned. … After his last deportation in 1981, Fernandez-Vargas returned to the United States, fathered a child, started a trucking company in Utah and eventually married his longtime companion, a U.S. citizen. … But by the time he applied for legal status - after his marriage in 2001 - Congress had passed the Illegal Immigration and Immigrant Responsibility Act, which revoked the right to appeal to an immigration judge an order of removal."

The Houston Chronicle (6/23, Reinert) reports, "Making it more difficult for longtime illegal immigrants to remain in the United States, the U.S. Supreme Court on Thursday upheld the deportation of a Mexican national who lived in the United States for 20 years and is married to a U.S. citizen." The Chronicle continues, "Of the nine justices, only John Paul Stevens sided with Humberto Fernandez-Vargas, who has been trying to return to his wife and child in Utah since being deported in 2004." The Chronicle adds, "Lawyers for Fernandez-Vargas had argued that the federal Illegal Immigration and Immigrant Responsibility Act — which Congress passed in 1996 to speed up the removal of those who illegally re-enter the country after being deported at least once — did not apply to him because he had last re-entered 15 years before the law took effect. … Stevens said Fernandez-Vargas, who is in his 50s, rightly complained that the U.S. government 'changed the rules midgame.' Under previous law, the justice said, the best chance of eventually becoming a legal resident or U.S. citizen was to do exactly what Fernandez-Vargas did: Remain in the country at least seven years, start a business, stay out of trouble and build a U.S. family. … Stevens said the new law had an 'undeniably harsh retroactive effect' that Congress did not intend."

DOJ_NMG_0036720

House GOP Leaders Deny They Plan To Thwart Immigration Bill. The Chicago Tribune (6/23, James, 643K) reports House GOP leaders, "stung by charges in recent days that they were trying to thwart congressional efforts at immigration reform," said yesterday "they still hoped to get a bill to President Bush this year." They "pointed the finger at the Republican-controlled Senate for delays in Congress's further consideration of immigration legislation, claiming that the Senate hadn't followed the proper legislative procedures that would allow the House to act." But the House leaders "also made clear that their re-election strategy this year includes blaming Senate Democrats for the perceived flaws in legislation passed by the Senate even though it passed last month with broad bipartisan support." Speaker Dennis Hastert said, "Let me be clear, our goal is to send an immigration bill to the president that is a strong bill on immigration that protects our borders and protects the American people. …We can send an immigration bill to the president this year." The Tribune adds House leaders "made every effort Thursday to link the bill to Senate Democrats, particularly Sen. Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts and Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada."

The New York Times (6/23, Hulse, 1.19M) reports House Republicans "announced on Thursday a series of summer hearings on immigration policy to be held in California, Arizona and Texas and challenged the view that the sessions were intended to delay new immigration legislation." Sessions "are planned in San Diego and Laredo, Tex., on July 5 and July 7, respectively, on border vulnerabilities and international terrorism; hearings on English as the official language and enforcement of current immigration laws are planned for mid-July; and hearings are planned in Arizona in mid-August on costs to the government resulting from gaps in border control."

CNN's The Situation Room (6/22, Koppel) reported, "House Republican leaders and other committee members, some of the top committee members in the House, flanked the speaker, Dennis Hastert, this afternoon, as the Speaker made clear that the House wasn't going to compromise on immigration reform just because it's an election year. Dennis Hastert also said that the House wanted to get an immigration bill to President Bush by the end of this year."

NBC Nightly News (6/22, story 7, 2:35, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Republican leaders insisted today they want an immigration reform bill this year, but the House and Senate bills are so different, the republicans in charge admit it will all be very hard to reconcile. So, the situation on the border will likely continue, at least for now."

WPost, WSJournal Criticize House GOP On Immigration. The Washington Post (6/23, A24, 744K) says in an editorial that House Republican leaders "have refused to open talks to bridge the gaps between" the House and Senate immigration reform bills and "have decided that ironing out the differences within their own party is too onerous. Instead, House leaders have branded the Senate package as a liberal 'Kennedy bill' and promised to run against it in the coming midterm elections. Despite the fact that Congress has already held hearings on immigration for two years, lawmakers plan to hold yet more hearings around the country -- especially in the Southern border states where the House's draconian enforcement approach is electorally potent. This is irresponsible."

The Wall Street Journal (6/23, 2.11M) says in an editorial House Republicans "have decided that the key to saving their majority is not to solve the immigration problem they've spent the last year building into a 'crisis.' Give them credit for novelty, if not for wisdom." This is "the only way to read House Speaker Denny Hastert's decision this week to delay a House-Senate conference on immigration reform, and instead to stage a summer anti-immigration road show. Republicans plan to use the events to further raise the false alarm of 'amnesty,' which means further attacking their own President's immigration policy. We realize this year's immigration debate long ago left the rational world and is now driven entirely by political fear. But even as political strategy, this is the equivalent of snake-handling; it will be diverting to watch, unless the snake bites back."

DOJ_NMG_0036721

Border Patrol Agents Increasingly Face Violence. NBC Nightly News (6/22, story 7, 2:35, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "There are 12,000 border Patrol agents, with another 6,000 to be added over the next two years time." NBC (Teague) added, "After five months of training that covers everything from Spanish classes to high-speed chases, graduates of the Border Patrol Academy enter one of the most dangerous jobs in law enforcement. There were nearly 800 violent assaults against Border Patrol agents last year, a 108% increase from the year before. One reason -- smugglers and others crossing the Mexican border are increasingly armed."

Cannon Faces Tough Primary Challenge Over Immigration. The Washington Times (6/23, Hurt, 90K) reports Rep. Chris Cannon "is a loyal Republican" but he "faces a tough challenge in next week's Republican primary because, his opponent," businessman John Jacob says, he's not tough enough on illegal immigration." Both sides "agree that the election will turn on the issue of immigration and Mr. Cannon has plenty to worry about. In May, Mr. Jacob beat Mr. Cannon at Utah's Republican convention in a 52-48 surprise upset. Because neither candidate collected 60 percent of the convention vote, the nominee will be picked in the Republican primary next week." Cannon is haunted by "a four-year-old quote he made before an audience at the Mexican American Legal Defense and Educational Fund dinner, where he was accepting an 'Excellence in Leadership' award for helping children of illegal aliens get tuition breaks at public universities." Cannon said, "We love immigrants in Utah and we don't oftentimes make the distinction between legal and illegal. In fact, I think Utah was the first state in the country to legislate the ability to get a driver's license based on the matricula consular and of that I am proud." The Times adds Cannon "insists, he's not soft on illegal immigration."

Local Virginia Authorities Lack Authority To Arrest Illegals For Immigration Status. The Washington Times (6/23, Bomey, 90K) reports local Northern Virginia authorities "say they can't stop a van full of illegal aliens that's on its way from Ohio to Manassas, Va., because they don't have the authority to detain them." A sheriff's deputy "in Belmont County, Ohio, detained the aliens for about two hours early Tuesday after stopping the van on Interstate 470 for a traffic violation. A passenger in the van told deputies that they were illegal aliens and heading to Manassas to find work." The deputies "released the group after federal immigration authorities said via telephone they could not interview the aliens." Officials "with the Manassas Police Department and the Prince William County Sheriff's Department said they can't arrest the illegals even if they spot the van in their jurisdictions. Local police in Virginia don't have the authority to make arrests solely on the basis of a person's immigration status."

TAX:

House Votes To Cut Estate Taxes. The AP (6/23, Dalrymple) reports, "The House voted Thursday to cut taxes on inherited estates and relieve thousands of heirs from paying tax collectors beginning next decade. The 269-156 vote, just a few months before an election with control of Congress at stake, saw majority Republicans temporarily setting aside their ambition to abolish the tax." Instead, they "voted to exempt from taxation individual estates up to $5 million and couple's estates up to $10 million, while also blunting the impact on even richer families. The compromise measure now goes to the Senate."

Bloomberg (6/23, Newton-Small, Donmoyer) says that in the Senate, "some Democrats said it is unlikely the House legislation can draw enough support to attract swing votes in their party. Negotiations have begun among some Democrats for a compromise that would cost less to the Treasury than the House legislation, which has been estimated at about 75 percent of the cost of a full repeal."

The Wall Street Journal (6/23, Mullins, 2.11M) reports, "The decision by Republican congressional leaders to seek something less than full repeal reflects the changing political dynamic in Washington. After 12 years in control of Congress, Republicans worry that Democrats could win a majority in the House or Senate after November's congressional elections." The Journal adds, "With Democrats in control -- or even if they just pick up a few more seats in the Senate -- estate-tax repeal would face even longer odds. So, after four years of failed attempts to eliminate the tax, opponents of the estate tax decided to try at least to settle the issue and reduce its bite from what would happen if Congress didn't act at all." The Washington Post (6/23, A6, Weisman, 744K) also says "the estate tax bill -- which would cut but not eliminate taxes on inheritances -- marked a significant turnaround for House Republicans." The Washington Times (6/23, DeBose, 90K) runs a similar report.

DOJ_NMG_0036722

NYTimes Criticizes Measure, GOP Priorities. The New York Times (6/23, 1.19M) editorializes, "Two weeks ago, the Senate killed an effort to repeal the federal estate tax on multimillion-dollar fortunes. The 'no' votes were a stand for budget sanity and basic fairness. But the pro-repeal camp doesn't want to take no for an answer. Yesterday, the House of Representatives passed an estate-tax cut that is a repeal in everything but name. The so-called compromise would exempt more than 99.5 percent of estates from tax, slash the tax rates on the rest and cost at least $760 billion during its first full decade. … No lawmaker who voted for the compromise gets any points for moderation."

A second New York Times editorial (6/23) says that "at the same time that Republicans are fighting to exempt the richest estates from taxes, they are blocking a raise for the nation's poorest workers. … Just 23 percent of Americans approve of the job Congress is doing, according to a recent New York Times/CBS News poll. These dismal ratings are no surprise when Congress's highest economic priority is handing out tax cuts to millionaires and oil companies, and its one point of fiscal restraint is protecting employers from having to pay a decent wage to factory workers and waiters."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

House Approves Line-Item Veto. The AP (6/23, Taylor) reports, "President Bush would receive greater power to try to kill 'pork barrel' spending projects under a bill passed Thursday by the House." Lawmakers "voted to give Bush and his successor a weaker version of the line-item veto law struck down by the Supreme Court in 1998, despite a recent series of lopsided votes in which they've rallied to preserve each other's back-home projects. The new power would expire after six years." The AP adds, "The House passed the bill by a 247-172 vote. Thirty-five Democrats joined with most Republicans in voting for the bill; 15 Republicans opposed the measure and others voted for the bill despite private reservations." The measure "must still pass the Senate, and that's by no means a certainty."

Rumsfeld Considering Replacements For Abizaid, Jones. The Wall Street Journal (6/23, Harwood, 2.11M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column that Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld is weighing "replacements for key commanders. Army Gen. Craddock of U.S. Southern Command might succeed Abizaid as senior Middle East commander. Air Force chief of staff Moseley is rumored front-runner to succeed Marine Gen. Jones as head of European Command."

The Washington Times (6/23, Gertz, Scarborough, 90K) reports in its "Inside the Ring" column, "Gen. Abizaid and Mr. Rumsfeld have agreed that the general will stay through the summer. But the question is open about whether he will remain at CentCom after that."

FTC Computer Stolen. The Wall Street Journal (6/23, Conkey, 2.11M) reports, "The Federal Trade Commission, the primary regulator enforcing privacy laws, said a laptop containing sensitive consumer data was stolen, adding to a string of disclosures that has exposed lax security practices in government." FTC officials "said a laptop storing the Social Security numbers or other personal data of 110 people was stolen from a vehicle being used by its attorneys last week. The information on it was password-protected but not encrypted. The agency said the individuals who were affected are involved in a continuing legal case, which it declined to identify."

Hacker Obtains Information On USDA Employees, Retirees, Contractors. The Washington Post (6/23, A23, Goldfarb, 744K) reports, "A hacker breached the Agriculture Department's computer system and may have taken personal information on 26,000 employees, retirees and contractors, the department said, making it the latest federal agency to have had personal data compromised." The Post adds, "The potential loss is less dramatic than the one that occurred last month with the theft of a laptop computer and hard drive containing personal information on up to 26.5 million veterans and military personnel from the home of a Department of Veterans Affairs employee." The Agriculture Department "said those affected will receive a year of free credit monitoring. VA announced a similar plan Wednesday after weeks of criticism for its failure to safeguard private data."

Votes Cast In CBP Union Election. In its Federal Diary column, the Washington Post (6/23, D4, Barr, 744K) reports "yesterday was the deadline for casting votes" in the election of a union "to negotiate on behalf of employees at Customs and Border Protection." In petitioning for the election, which set up "a showdown between the American Federation of Government Employees, which represented immigration employees, and the National Treasury Employees Union, which represented customs employees," the agency "contended that the Homeland Security merger had raised a series of union jurisdiction issues."

DOJ_NMG_0036723

Duvall Says Bush "Much Less Intellectual" Than Clinton, But "Very Bright." USA Today (6/23, 2.31M) reports actor Robert Duvall, his wife, "and friends spent an evening at the White House recently, invited by President and Laura Bush for a screening of Broken Trail. Bush, he says, is 'much less intellectual' than President Clinton, with whom he once spent two hours at a dinner, but 'a very bright guy, very focused — and he'll excuse himself and go to bed at 9 o'clock.'" And there's "something special about a visit to the White House, no matter who the occupant is, Duvall says."

OTHER NEWS:

Economy Expected To Slow In Coming Months. The CBS Evening News (6/22, story 6, 0:20, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "A report out today suggests the US economy will weaken somewhat in coming months. The Index of Leading Economic Indicators fell 0.6% in May to its lowest level since October. That drove down stocks on wall street. The Dow lost about 60 points [to close at 11,019.11], the NASDAQ 18 [to close at 2,122.98]." NBC Nightly News (6/22, story 9, 0:10, Williams, 9.87M) also reported the stock numbers, as did the Wall Street Journal (6/23, McKay, 2.11M), among other sources.

Meanwhile, the Wall Street Journal (6/23, McAuley, Ives-Halperin, 2.11M) reports US "jobless claims rose last week, reversing a recent two-week downward trend, and indicating the labor market, though generally sound, may have some slack." Initial jobless claims "increased by 11,000 to a seasonally adjusted 308,000 in the week ending June 17, the Labor Department said Thursday. New claims for the week ending June 10 were 297,000, revised from a previously reported 295,000."

Increase In Fed Funds Rate Urged. William A. Niskanen, chairman of the Cato Institute and a member and acting chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers under President Reagan, writes in the Wall Street Journal (6/23, 2.11M), "Ben Bernanke and the Fed face a critical test at the Federal Open Market Committee meeting next week that will demonstrate whether they are serious about constraining inflation. … Should the FOMC continue to increase the Fed funds rate in order to reduce the inflation rate? Or should it pause for a while, given the selective signs of a slowing economy and a concern by many about the potential effects on the mid-term congressional elections this fall? My vote is for another 25-basis-point increase in the Fed funds rate."

Nevada High Court Reviewing Conflict, Favoritism Charges Against Three Judges. The Los Angeles Times (6/23, Woutat) reports, "The Nevada Supreme Court has asked three Las Vegas judges to respond to reports that they have engaged in conflicts of interest, favoritism and other questionable practices." The Times continues, "Based on the responses of those senior judges and a review of the allegations, first detailed in the Los Angeles Times, the state Supreme Court will decide whether to take action, Chief Justice Robert E. Rose said." The Times adds, "In an interview, Rose also called for beefing up the state agency responsible for investigating judges, and for making it easier to remove senior judges from cases." The Times notes, "The Times articles, published this month, detailed what appeared to be widespread conflicts of interest, favoritism and violations of judicial canons by Las Vegas judges. … The reports focused on eight current or former district court judges and a sitting federal judge. The Supreme Court's inquiry is the first known step toward investigating the allegations. … News media and political commentators in Las Vegas have condemned the behavior described in the reports, and numerous Nevada lawyers praised the disclosures as a step toward reform."

Duncan Drops Out Of Maryland Governor's Race. CNN's The Situation Room (6/22, King) reported that Democrat Doug Duncan says he is dropping out of the Maryland gubernatorial race "because he's suffering from depression. That clears the way for Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley to win the Democratic nomination and challenge Republican incumbent Robert Ehrlich this fall."

WPost Says Duncan Announcement Is Disappointment. The Washington Post (6/23, A24, 744K) editorializes, "Duncan's surprise announcement is a disappointment, and not only because hard-fought primary contests are a sign of robust health for any political party. For almost 12 years as the chief executive of Montgomery County, he has been a capable, decisive manager of the state's largest and most economically vibrant locality, overseeing a period of staggering growth, immigration and demographic change that left the county stronger and more vital."

DOJ_NMG_0036724

Lieberman Votes On Iraq Troop Withdrawals Could Help Primary Opponent. The Washington Post (6/23, A11, Cillizza, 744K) reports Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (D-Conn.) "further inflamed his party's liberal base yesterday by opposing two Senate measures seeking to limit the scope of the war in Iraq." Lieberman "may have further jeopardized his chances of defeating businessman Ned Lamont in the state's Aug. 8 primary. Lamont, a political unknown until a few months ago, has drawn national attention and rising poll numbers at home in recent weeks -- especially after he drew support from a third of the delegates at a recent state party convention." Lamont spokeswoman Liz Dupont-Diehl said, "This is further evidence of why a lot of people call Joe Lieberman 'George Bush's favorite Democrat." The Post adds Lieberman "was one of six Democrats to vote against both resolutions offered by his Senate colleagues. Of that group, Sens. Ben Nelson (Neb.) and Bill Nelson (Fla.) are the only ones other than Lieberman standing for reelection this fall."

Edwards Calls For Eliminating Poverty By 2036. Knight Ridder (6/23, Funk) reports Sen. John Edwards, "Fresh from his first-place showing among possible presidential contenders in a poll of Iowa Democrats," yesterday spoke "to a roomful of pundits and national reporters, road-testing the big themes he hopes to ride into the White House in 2008." Edwards' "biggest" theme is to "eliminate poverty in the United States by 2036. Edwards, who heads the Center on Poverty, Work and Opportunity at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill, has made no secret of his itch to run for president again as long as his wife's health holds out." Edwards said his wife, Elizabeth, who "was diagnosed with breast cancer in late 2004," is "now cancer-free." In "his speech before the National Press Club to about 150 people, Edwards covered several issues, proposing an immediate pullout of 40,000 U.S. troops from Iraq and calling for a bolder Democratic Party, one with 'big ideas and backbone.'" But "mostly he talked about setting a national goal to eradicate poverty over the next 30 years. He proposes to end it not with a rehash of the 'Great Society,' President Lyndon Johnson's string of federal programs in the 1960s, but by ushering in what Edwards called his 'Working Society.'"

The Washington Post (6/23, A9, Balz, 744K) reports Edwards said "the nation should set a goal of eliminating poverty over the next three decades and seek to reclaim the moral high ground internationally by starting to withdraw forces from Iraq." Edwards had "sharp words for his party, saying Democrats must stand for big ideas, backbone and leadership. 'I do not believe in a party obsessed with incrementalism, half-measures, positions based on yesterday's polls,' he said." Edwards said "wiping out poverty would cost $15 billion to $20 billion a year, which he said he would pay for by rolling back President Bush's tax cuts for the wealthiest Americans and preserving the estate tax, which the Republicans are seeking to eliminate."

Study Finds Stewart's "Daily Show" Promotes Cynicism. The Washington Post (6/23, A2, Morin, 744K) reports Jon Stewart "and his hit Comedy Central cable show may be poisoning democracy. Two political scientists found that young people who watch Stewart's faux news program, 'The Daily Show,' develop cynical views about politics and politicians that could lead them to just say no to voting." The finding is "particularly dismaying news because the show is hugely popular among college students, many of whom already don't bother to cast ballots." Jody Baumgartner and Jonathan S. Morris of East Carolina University "said previous research found that nearly half -- 48 percent -- of this age group watched 'The Daily Show' and only 23 percent of show viewers followed 'hard news' programs closely."

Celebrities Under Pressure To Be Activists, Philanthropists. USA Today (6/23, Freydkin, 2.31M) reports Bono, Angelina Jolie and Oprah Winfrey "set the gold standard when it comes to celebrity activism. Bono has been instrumental in raising awareness of global poverty and the AIDS epidemic with his ONE campaign, which has gotten stars such as George Clooney, Matt Damon and Brad Pitt on board." After "initial skepticism, politicians from House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., to Sen. Rick Santorum, R-Pa., now wax poetic about the U2 singer, lauding his understanding of the issues." Celebrities "of all stripes find themselves under pressure to use their fame for a higher purpose. With the high-profile examples set by Jolie and Bono, there may come a time, observers say, when a star's lack of charity work will be a liability."

Rumsfeld, Hadley Say Bush Could Order Shoot-Down Of North Korean Missile. The

DOJ_NMG_0036725

Washington Times (6/23, Dinan, 90K) reports Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley said the US "is set to shoot down any North Korean missile launch that threatens the United States." Rumsfeld told reporters that Bush "has the power to order a shootdown, using one of 11 ground-based interceptors now located in Alaska and California," while Hadley said the US "has a missile defense system with 'limited operational capability' that could be used to try to shoot down" a missile. Hadley added that US officials "were vigorously pursuing a diplomatic push to head off a test launch by Pyongyang."

NBC and CBS reported on the missile standoff. On NBC Nightly News (6/22, story 5, 0:45, 9.87M), Brian Williams said the story was "rather urgently reported earlier this evening," but "I'm not sure how urgent it is." NBC (Miklaszewski) added, "Military officials tell NBC News that the Pentagon has issued an execution order which officially puts the US missile defense system on alert to shoot down a North Korean missile but only if it poses a direct threat to the US."

The CBS Evening News (6/22, story 3, 2:45, Schieffer, 7.66M) ran a much longer report focusing on how Russia and China have joined the US "in urging North Korea to call off its preparations to test-fire a long-range missile with the capability to reach the West Coast. No one really believes that if the North Koreans do fire it, they will aim it there, but Administration officials made it clear today that if it does appear it is headed our way, they'll try to shoot it down." CBS (Martin) added, "Orders have been issued to the fledgling missile defense system to be prepared to shoot down the North Korean missile if it is launched in a direction to land on American soil. That includes the Pacific island of Guam, site of a growing US military base. Defense Secretary Rumsfeld said today the decision to fire would be up to the President."

Cheney, Hadley Reject Pre-Emptive Strike Advice. The Financial Times (6/23, Sevastopulo, Alden) reports Vice President Cheney rejected a call by two Clinton Administration Pentagon officials for a "US pre-emptive strike to prevent North Korea from testing an intercontinental ballistic missile." Responding to a Thursday Washington Post op-ed, Cheney "Cheney suggested that the US should not try to destroy the North Korean missile with a pre-emptive strike." Cheney said, "At this stage, we are addressing the issue in a proper fashion. Obviously, if you're going to launch strikes at another nation, you'd better be prepared to not just fire one shot." The Washington Post (6/23, A21, Kessler, 744K) reports others in the Administration, including Hadley, also rejected the advice from ex-Defense Secretary William Perry and ex-Assistant Secretary Ashton Carter.

Knight Ridder (6/23, Landay) says the White House "has little leverage to use on North Korea" despite a US "threat of severe consequences." The US "has no diplomatic or economic ties with North Korea, the rudimentary U.S. missile-defense system is untested in real-world conditions and Pyongyang is regarded as having a right to test missiles, making any American attack to forestall a launch an act of war with potentially explosive consequences."

Ex-Envoy Also Rejects Strike Suggestion. In a Washington Post (6/23, A25, 744K) op-ed, Charles L. "Jack" Pritchard, a former special US envoy for negotiations with North Korea, calls the ex-officials' advice an "egregious suggestion," asking, "If you were Kim Jong Il and saw a buildup of American forces on the Korean Peninsula before an announced preemptive airstrike, would you be thinking that it would be only a limited strike and not the start of an effort to bring down your regime?"

Cheney, Rice, Burns Lead India Nuclear Deal Lobbying Effort. The Financial Times (6/23, Daniel) reports the Administration "set out its strongest defence of the civilian nuclear assistance agreement with India, when" Vice President Cheney "called it 'one of the most important strategic foreign policy initiatives of our government.' His remarks are part of an aggressive campaign to address scepticism ahead of the mark-up of the draft bill next Tuesday in the House international relations committee and on Wednesday by the Senate foreign relations committee." Undersecretary Burns "spent the last two days briefing members on Capitol Hill." Secretary Rice "will make further calls on Friday." Burns, who "addressed fears that the agreement created a double standard by treating India's nuclear ambitions differently from Iran's and North Korea's," is quoted saying, "The message is that [that] country . . . plays by the rules and wants to invite the inspectors in. If India wants to do that, it is a good message for Iran and North Korea." Furthermore, Burns "expected amendments to be introduced next week, but warned that some of them 'could effectively kill the agreement.' He expressed confidence that the House and Senate would agree on 'one piece of legislation' that could be voted on after the July 4 recess." Cheney "also urged Congress to make sure 'that amendments or delays on the US side do not risk wasting this critical opportunity,' and encouraged the leaders of the Indian-American Caucus…to 'use their leadership role to help usher through a critical agreement.'"

DOJ_NMG_0036726

The Washington Times (6/23, Stuhldreher, 90K) notes that "under legislation introduced in March, an exemption for India would depend upon several conditions: India would have to present a plan to segregate its civilian and military nuclear facilities, negotiate a treaty limiting the production of fissile material, adopt IAEA safeguards, and work to prevent the spread of technology that could assist other states in developing weapons." Additionally, "the 45 nations of the Nuclear Suppliers Group would have to reach a consensus to endorse the deal."

Bush Support Raises Hope For WTO Deal. The Financial Times (6/23, Beattie, Alden) reports the "troubled" Doha round of global trade talks is "witnessing the most serious attempt yet by the European Union, the US and developing countries" to reach a deal. Ahead of a "crucial" meeting of trade ministers in Geneva next week, President George W. Bush's "signal of strong political support for the talks has raised hopes the US will accept more constraints on its farm subsidies and will moderate its demands for access to foreign agricultural markets," the Times writes. A spokesman for EU trade commissioner Peter Mandelson said he had been "impressed" with Bush's "determination during the EU-US summit this week to get a deal done."

The New York Times (6/23, Landler, 1.19M) reports, "A month after he warned that the five-year negotiations for a global trade agreement were in the 'red zone,' the head of the World Trade Organization, Pascal Lamy, said Thursday that he had grown considerably more optimistic about the odds of a deal." Lamy attributed his "confidence to a change in the tone of the United States." While it was not clear whether the United States planned to make any new proposals next week, Lamy said Bush's words this week suggested that Washington was open to a compromise. "Until yesterday, the US side of the triangle had remained locked," Lamy said. "The good news yesterday was that suggestions of flexibility were given by the US, notably by Bush," he added.

EU Trade Chief Urges WTO Talks On Energy. The Wall Street Journal (6/23, A6, Champion, Von Reppert-Bismark, 2.11M) reports EU trade commissioner Peter Mandelson said Thursday he wants a new round of global trade talks that will focus on energy, with the goal of subjecting trade in oil and gas to the same "ordinary rules" as other goods. In an interview, Mandelson said "bringing energy trade and investment under the rules and enforcement procedures of the World Trade Organization would, among other things, require that producers provide free access to transit of such resources." However, the Journal says extending the WTO's reach over energy "would also face enormous hurdles. For one thing, producers are likely to see little to gain in opening up distribution networks to competition."

WSJournal Says Farm Subsidies Distort Global Trade. In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (6/23, 2.11M) says this week's US-EU summit "did little to end the finger-pointing over who is more at fault for endangering the Doha trade talks by refusing to budge on farm subsidies." According to a report released this week by the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development "shows that developed countries continue to prop up uncompetitive farmers, to the tune of $280 billion in 2005." These subsidies, the Journal says, "most distort global trade and punish poor farmers in the developing world" and "raise prices for domestic consumers." Farm liberalization, the newspaper continues, "shouldn't hinge on whether or how much other nations lower their barriers to Western goods. The people of Europe, America and Japan would benefit from any move to free up agricultural trade, even a unilateral one."

Olmert And Abbas Meet, Agree To Continue Dialogue. The New York Times (6/23, Erlanger, 1.19M) reports Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert "held informal and inconclusive talks over breakfast here on Thursday, their first meeting since Mr. Olmert became prime minister. They embraced and promised to accelerate preparations for a substantive meeting in the next few weeks, both men said afterward." The Times says the "reluctant" meeting "was orchestrated" by King Abdullah of Jordan and author Elie Wiesel. "Neither the Israelis nor the Palestinians wanted a rushed meeting that 'would produce no concrete agreements and could worsen the situation,' said the Israeli deputy prime minister, Shimon Peres, who also attended the breakfast." Olmert "made it clear on Thursday that substantive negotiations on a final peace agreement could not take place while Hamas…remains in control of the Palestinian Authority." He "praised Mr. Abbas as sincere, but said Israel had preconditions before opening such negotiations." Also, Olmert "apologized for the deaths of Palestinian civilians in

DOJ_NMG_0036727

Israeli military efforts to stop the firing of Qassam rockets from Gaza into Israel. The Financial Times (6/23, Morris) leads its coverage with Olmert's apology, saying he told Abbas that "he regretted the deaths of Palestinian civilians in recent air strikes on the Gaza Strip."

The AP (6/23, Halaby) says the two leaders "kissed and embraced Thursday in the first meeting between Israeli and Palestinian leaders in more than a year, and Olmert made a rare apology for Palestinian civilian deaths in recent Israeli airstrikes. Despite the icebreaker," Olmert "said peace talks are unlikely unless the Palestinians' Hamas-led government changes its stripes, and he pledged to keep up attacks against militants."

Survey Finds Deep Division Between Views Of Muslims, Westerners. Knight Ridder (6/23, Latifi) reports, "Muslims and Westerners remain sharply at odds in the way they view each other, according to a 13-country poll released Thursday. Among the findings: Majorities of Muslims in several countries don't think Arabs were responsible for the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. Majorities of Westerners in countries surveyed don't think Muslims respect women." Knight Ridder adds, "On the bright side, support for Osama bin Laden is declining among Muslims, and most Muslims believe that democracy can work in Islamic countries."

The Washington Post (6/23, A19, Schrank, 744K) reports that "for the second year running, the survey shows increasing opposition among Muslim populations to violence targeting civilians in the name of Islam. About 71 percent of polled Muslim Indonesians said such violence is never justified, compared with 66 percent last year; in Pakistan, the figure was 69 percent, up from 46 percent; Jordan has had the steepest rise in the proportion of people opposed to extremist violence, up from 11 percent last year to 46 percent. But 'a sizeable number of adherents,' particularly among sampled Nigerian Muslims, still believe that violence against civilians is justifiable in defense of Islam, the survey found."

USA Today (6/23, Page, 2.31M) reports, "The poll by the Pew Research Center found that many Americans and Europeans view Muslims as fanatical and violent. By wider margins, most Muslims in the Middle East and Asia see Westerners as selfish, arrogant and violent. … In an example of conflicting views, about six of 10 of those surveyed in the USA and Western Europe blame 'Muslim intolerance' for the protests and violence this year that followed publication of Danish cartoons depicting the prophet Mohammed. Nearly nine of 10 of those surveyed in Jordan, Egypt, Indonesia and Turkey blame the furor on 'Western disrespect' of Islam. Islam forbids the depiction of Mohammed's image."

The New York Times (6/23, Bortin, 1.19M) says "majorities in every country surveyed except Pakistan expressed pessimism about Muslim-Western relations, with Germany most strongly viewing the situation as bad (70 percent), followed by France (66 percent), Turkey (64 percent), Spain and Britain (61 percent), and Egypt (58 percent)." Pew surveyed 14,030 people from March 31 to May 14 "in Britain, Egypt, France, Germany, India, Indonesia, Jordan, Nigeria, Pakistan, Russia, Spain, Turkey and the United States."

Albright, Danforth, Kohut Discuss Poll. The Christian Science Monitor (6/23, Cook, 61K) reports former Secretary of State Madeleine Albright, former Sen. John Danforth, and Pew Research Center pollster Andrew Kohut discussed a new study by the Pew Global Attitudes Project that examines Muslim public opinion about the US and the West. At a Monitor breakfast, Kohut said, "A real divide does exist between peoples. Muslims and Westerners are generally convinced that relationships are not good these days. Westerners see Muslims as fanatical, violent and not tolerant. Muslims see Westerners as selfish, immoral and greedy.... One of the most startling findings here, most Muslims remain unconvinced that Arabs carried out the September 11 attacks." Sen. Danforth said, "The leaders of Islam have been less than forthcoming in expressing strong views on matters of terrorism.... [Western religious leaders] have not been strong in any respect about how their religion relates to the world beyond themselves." Albright said the US government has "not fully engaged, or have not engaged enough, in what I consider the battle of ideas."

Former DIA Analyst Pleads Guilty To Giving Top Secret Information To China. The Washington Times (6/23, Gertz, 90K) reports former Defense Intelligence Agency analyst Ronald N. Montaperto "has pleaded guilty to illegally holding classified documents and admitted in a plea agreement to passing 'top secret' information to Chinese intelligence officials." Montaperto, "who held a security clearance as a China specialist at a U.S. Pacific Command research center until 2004, pleaded guilty to one count of unlawful retention of national defense information, according to court papers and law officials familiar with the case, who spoke on the condition of anonymity."

DOJ_NMG_0036728

NRA Prompts Letter-Writing Protest Of UN Forum On Firearms. The Washington Times (6/23, Pisik, 90K) reports UN officials "have received more than 100,000 letters, many of them generated by a National Rifle Association campaign, protesting a U.N. forum on illicit small arms that starts Monday and runs through July Fourth." The form letter to UN Secretary General Kofi Annan available on the NRA Website says, "The 4th of July is America's most revered national holiday. Yet, you have nevertheless chosen that day to meet at the U.N., on American soil, in your drive to ban civilian firearm ownership worldwide. In doing so, you have placed the U.N. squarely on the side of freedom's enemies."

Somali Government, Islamic Faction Sign Ceasefire. The Washington Post/AP (6/23, A20) reports Somalia's "interim government and the Islamic faction that controls the country's capital signed an agreement Thursday that calls for an immediate cease-fire and confers mutual recognition on the warring parties." The secretary general of the Arab League, Amr Moussa, said "the delegation from the Islamic Courts Union, the militia that controls Mogadishu, the capital, and most of southern Somalia, agreed to recognize the legitimacy of the interim government, which is based in Baidoa, 155 miles northwest of Mogadishu."

Lack Of Security Could Undercut Congolese Election. The New York Times (6/23, Polgreen, 1.19M) reports the Congo "presidential and parliamentary elections in July will be the first moment of self-determination for most Congolese; the last multiparty election was in 1965." Since former leader Mobuto Sese Seko "was deposed in 1997, the nation, renamed the Democratic Republic of the Congo, has been caught in the murderous grip of rival militias, both homegrown and backed by neighboring countries. The war has officially been over since a peace agreement between the factions was signed four years ago, but the transition to peace has yet to come." The election is "meant to draw a line between that chaotic past and a more hopeful future. But the process of preparing for the election has been extraordinarily difficult in the troubled and violent eastern regions, where militias have battled government troops over control of lucrative industries like diamond and copper mining, and in the short term the election may cause as many problems as it solves."

Lopez-Obrador Proposes "New Deal" Building Program. The Washington Post (6/23, A18, Roig-Franzia, 744K) reports Mexican presidential candidate Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador, "who is often compared with South American leftists, has found a model in an icon from the north: Franklin Delano Roosevelt." Lopez-Obrador's "economics team has developed a blueprint for what they call the 'Mexican New Deal.' Their modern version of Depression-era populism is an ambitious program to create millions of jobs and stem migration by undertaking huge public works projects, including a railroad network, vast housing developments, ports and timber replanting."

Venezuela's Security Council Bid Seen As Linked To Iran Crisis. In her Wall Street Journal column (6/23), Mary Anastasia O'Grady says, "In Latin America, the competition between Guatemala and Venezuela for the U.N. Security Council seat that Argentina will vacate at the end of this year is of particular importance." Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez "has made it clear that when it comes to geopolitics, his preferences lie with hostile states like Iran, Cuba, Sudan and North Korea. A seat on the Security Council, where the presidency also rotates monthly, would give the Venezuelan strongman ways to make those preferences operational at the multilateral level." Guatemala has "the solid backing of the more serious democracies in the region -- such as Colombia and Mexico -- and insists that it will not withdraw its candidacy. That means that in all likelihood the vote will probably go to the General Assembly. Guatemala believes it can win that ballot. Let's hope so. If not, Latin America will have handed Iran a victory that is likely to threaten world peace."

NYTimes Says UN Human Rights Council Membership Rules Flawed. The New York Times (6/23, 1.19M) says in an editorial, "The Bush administration was right to hold out for high principle when the ground rules for membership on the new United Nations Human Rights Council were being debated earlier this year. Unfortunately, the United States lost that fight, and the council's opening session this week was tarnished by the participation of Pakistan, Saudi Arabia and Cuba, all flagrant abusers themselves and poorly suited to judge the human-rights performance of other nations. Other questionable members include China and Russia, which not only circumscribe the rights of their own citizens but also use their clout regularly to defend the indefensible behavior of allies like Uzbekistan or Sudan."

DOJ_NMG_0036729

Krauthammer Says Australia's Alliance With US "Heartfelt." In his Washington Post column (6/23, A25), Charles Krauthammer says, "When Australian ambassadors in Washington express support for the United States, it is heartfelt and unalloyed, never the 'yes, but' of the other allies, perfunctory support followed by a list of complaints, slights and sage finger-wagging. Australia understands America's role and is sympathetic to its predicament as reluctant hegemon. That understanding has led it to share foxholes with Americans from Korea to Kabul. They fought with us at Tet and now in Baghdad. Not every engagement has ended well. But every one was strenuous, and many quite friendless. Which is why America has such affection for a country whose prime minister said after Sept. 11, 'This is no time to be an 80 percent ally' and actually meant it."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Secret U.S. Program Tracks Global Bank Transfers."
"New Gypsy Vision For The Future."
"Shyamalan Book Tells Of Breakup With Disney."
"Villaraigosa's Plan For L.A. Unified Faces Opposition In Classrooms."
"U.S. Panel Backs Data On Global Warming."
"Mexico's Cartels Escalate Drug War."
"American Dream Still Out Of Reach."

USA Today:
"Court Eases Worker Lawsuits."
"Celebrity Activists Put Star Power To Good Use."
"Cities May Ban Trains With Chemicals."
"Study: 25% Of Americans Have No One To Confide In."

New York Times:
"Bank Data Sifted In Secret By U.S. To Block Terror."
"S.E.C. Is Reported To Be Examining A Big Hedge Fund."
"Senate Rejects Calls To Begin Iraq Pullback."
"In Congo, Hunger And Disease Erode Democracy."
"Doctors See Way To Cut Risks Of Suffering In Lethal Injection."

Washington Post:
"Duncan Drops Bid For Governor, Pitting O'Malley Vs. Ehrlich In Md."
"For The Love Of Ballou."
"Senate's Abramoff Report Disputes Rep. Ney."
"Court Expands Right To Sue Over Wrongs At Work."
"Senate Rejects Democrats' Calls For Iraq Timetable."

Washington Times:
"Senate Rejects Iraq Troop Pullout."
"U.S. Set To Down Korean Missile."
"Duncan Ends Campaign For Governor."
"Ex-DIA Analyst Admits Passing Secrets To China."
"Letters Against Gun Meeting Swamp U.N."
"Free Ride To Manassas And No Stopping Them."
"Putting Dinner On The Table."

Detroit Free Press:
"Car Incentive Wars To Heat Up."
"Cops Nab Fentanyl Suspect."
"UAW Springs For Fun, Perks."
"Feeling Cut Off."
"Secret U.S. Program Spies On Bank Records."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Few Water Police Guard Taps."
"Violent Crime, Guard Return To New Orleans."
'Metro Law Agencies Tune Up Radio Links For Security Crises."
"It's Not Age Before Duty."

Houston Chronicle:
"U.S. Secretly Scours Bank Data In War On Terror."
"He Lost The Game But Not The Magic."
"7 Held In Plot On Sears Tower."
"Feeling Alone? You're Not The Only One."
"'In A Lot Of Ways, I Still Am Suffering.'"

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Afghanistan-Stolen Documents; Iraq-US KIAs; Iraq-Senate Debate; Iraq-US Troops' Opinion; Bush-Hungary; Senate-NSA Surveillance Program; Merck-Zocor Patent; Global Warming; Arizona Wildfire; World Cup-US Out; Petite Women-Clothing.
CBS: Global Warming; Western Wildfires; North Korea Missile; US KIAs; Iraq-Iran Influence; US Economy Forecast;

DOJ_NMG_0036730

Social Networking Websites; Military Credit Monitoring; Faith-Based Health Care; World Cup-US Out.

NBC: Global Warming Report; Iraq-Senate Debate; Santorum-WMDs; Iraq-Iran Influence; North Korea Missile; Afghanistan-Taliban Offensive; Border Patrol Training; Supreme Court-Sexual Harassment; Stock Markets; World Cup-US Out; American Airlines-Cost-Cutting.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:

ABC: Miami-Terror Arrests; Afghanistan-US Computer Disk Stolen; House-Line Item Veto.

CBS: Miami-Terror Arrests; Treasury-Terror Financing; Pentagon-Missile Interceptor Test; North Korea-Missile Test; Iraq-US KIA; AZ-Wildfire.

NPR: Senate-Iraq; North Korea-Missile Test; Economic Indicators Index; Wall Street; Treasury-Terror Financing; World Cup.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Attends White House Tee Ball Game, South Lawn.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — Speaks on the economy, Chicago Mercantile Exchange Auditorium, 20 South Wacker Drive; speaks at a luncheon for congressional candidate Dave McSweeney, Hilton Chicago.

US Senate: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 11 a.m. FLOOR SCHEDULE _ Reconvenes for morning business only.

1 p.m. FOREIGN RELATIONS _ Full Committee. Closed briefing on overseas cooperation between the Defense and State departments. State Department counselor Philip Zelikow; Undersecretary of Defense Eric Edelman. Location: Room S-407, Capitol.

US House: No Scheduled Events.

Other: COUNCIL ON BIOETHICS _ President's Council on Bioethics conference. Location: St. Regis Hotel.

NDN MEETING _ NDN holds its 2006 annual meeting, ``What Comes Next: A New Politics for America." Highlights: 8:30 a.m. Rep. Rahm Emanuel. 9 a.m. Sen. Hillary Clinton. 9:30 a.m. Session on ``Progressive Idea-Making in the 21st Century, with Jonathan Alter, Senior Editor and columnist at Newsweek; Rep. Artur Davis; Markos Moulitsas, Internet pioneer; Michael Tomasky, Editor, The American Prospect. 11 a.m. Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack and NDN President Simon Rosenberg. 12 p.m. Luncheon on ``What's Next for Globalization," with former Mexican Foreign Minister Jorge Castaneda and Loral Space and Communications CEO Bernard Schwartz. Location: Mayflower Hotel.

POW/MIA FAMILIES _ 37th annual convention of the National League of POW/MIA Families. Location: Hilton Crystal City, 2399 Jefferson Davis Highway, Arlington.

AMERICAN FOR DEMOCRATIC ACTION _ Americans for Democratic Action holds its 2006 conference on convention. Highlights: 9 a.m. Session on building a liberal majority, with Reps. Diane Watson, Pete STark, Mike Honda, Rush Holt and Lynn Woolsey. 10:30 a.m. Keynote address: ADA President Rep. Jim McDermott. 11 a.m. Session on a road map for liberal victories, with economist Jeff Faux, Rev. Lennox Yearwood, United Steelworkers President Leo Gerard, others. 12:15 p.m. Luncheon speaker - Rep. Raul Grijalva. 3:30 p.m. Session on governing, with Reps. Barney Frank and Jerrold Nadler, others. 7 p.m. Banquet with honorees John Connolly of AFTRA, Helen Thomas, and Fred Azcarate of Jobs with Justice. Location: Gallaudet University.

LIBYAN DEMOCRACY-CONFERENCE _ American Libyan Freedom Alliance holds conference on ``Working Toward the Return of the Constitutional Legitimacy to Libya. Highlights: 8:45 a.m. Opening remarks by Adel Mekraz, ALFA executive director. 9 a.m. Session 1 topics: ``Libya's struggle for constitutional rule" and ``The political forces behind the 1951 Libyan Constitution." 10:45 a.m. Session 2 Topics: ``The 1969 coup and economic impact of rule by fiat" and ``Libyan civil society and challenges under Totalitarianism." 1:30 p.m. Session 3 Topic: ``US foreign policy and the restoration of constitutional rule in Libya." 3 p.m. Session 4 Topics: ``Writing a new Libyan constitution" and ``The Libyan Experience: Lessons in Law." 4:15 p.m. Concluding remarks by ALFA director Mekraz. Location: HC-5, US Capitol.

RURAL AMERICA _ 8:30 a.m. - 3 p.m. The National Center for Food and Agricultural Policy and USDA hold a workshop, ``Growing Up and Growing Old in Rural America." Highlights: 8:45 a.m. Deputy Agriculture Secretary Chnuck Conner. 9:15 a.m. Rep. Rosa DeLauro. Location: Room 325, Russell.

LIBYA _ 8:45 a.m. - 2 p.m. The Middle East Institute, others, sponsor the first U.S.-Libya Business Association's annual policy conference. Highlights: 9:15 a.m. Keynote address - Rep. Tom Lantos. 10:10 a.m. Session on the diplomatic outlook, with Assistant Secretary of State David

DOJ_NMG_0036731

Welch, and Libyan Amb. Ali Aujali. 11:35 a.m. Session on commercial prospects in Libya, with Deputy USTR Douglas Bell, Deputy Assistant Commerce Secretary Matthew Borman. 12:45 p.m. Luncheon panel on economic reforms in Libya, with Taher El Jehaimi, Secretary of the General People's Committee for Planning, others. Location: Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, 1779 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

PAKISTAN-ENERGY _ 8:45 a.m. - 5:30 p.m. Wilson Center program on ``Meeting Pakistan's Energy Needs in the 21st Century." Participants include: Ziad Alahdad, World Bank Institute; Mukhtar Ahmed, Energy Advisor to the Prime Minister of Pakistan; Shahid Javed Burki, former Pakistan finance minister; John Hammond, United States Energy Association; and officials from the Karachi Stock Exchange; Canadian International Development Agency; elsewhere. Location: Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars, 6th Floor Auditorium; Ronald Reagan Building and International Trade Center; 1300 Pennsylvania Ave., NW.

MIDEAST _ 9 a.m. - 2 p.m. The Middle East Institute holds a forum on ``U.S.-Libya Re-Engagement: The Path Forward," with Taher El Jehaimi, Secretary of the General People's committee for Planning. Location: Carnegie Endowment for International Peace.

SUPREME COURT _ 9 a.m. The Washington Legal Foundation holds a discussion to review the 2005 Supreme Court term. Location: Murdock Center for Free Enterprise, 2009 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

SEMICONDUCTOR INDUSTRY-DEFENSE _ 9 a.m. - 10:30 a.m. The Center for Strategic and International Studies (CSIS) will hold a session on the national defense implications of U.S. competitiveness with a particular focus on the semiconductor chip industry. Location: CSIS, 1800 K St. NW.

FIGHTING TERRORISM _ 10 a.m. The Heritage Foundation holds a panel discussion on ``24 and America's Image in Fighting Terrorism: Fact, Fiction or Does it Matter?" with Homeland Security Secretary Chertoff, talk show host Rush Limbaugh, David Heyman of CSIS, James Carafano of the foundation, ``24" Executive Producers Howard Gordon and Joel Surnow, plus ``24 cast members. Location: Reagan Trade Center.

PALESTINE _ 10 a.m. The Council for the National Interest holds a discussion on ``Politics of Starvation: The Humanitarian Crisis in Palestine," with Timothy Rothermel, former UNDP Chief in Jerusalem, and Laila El Haddad, Al-Jazeera International Correspondent. Location: Room SC-6, Capitol.

SMITH _ 10 a.m. Conservative author Mark Smith gives a lecture on a new conservative battle plan for the courts. Location: National Press Club.

JUSTICE-TERRORISM _ 11 a.m. Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty hosts a pen-and-pad (no cameras) roundtable regarding DOJ efforts to prosecute terrorists after 9/11. Location: Room 4111, main Justice.

ENERGY _ 11:30 a.m. Agriculture Secretary Johanns and Energy Secretary Bodman hold a telephone briefing to discuss their departments' renewable energy efforts. Notes: Callin number: 888-455-0060; passcode: 6761983.

PORT SECURITY _ 12:30 a.m. Kurt Nagle, president of the American Association of Port Authorities, speaks on ``Security, Globalization and American Ports" at monthly Transportation Table lunch. Location: National Press Club, 14th and F Sts. NW.

PRESCRIPTION DRUGS _ 12:15 p.m. The Commonwealth Fund and the Alliance for Health Reform hold a briefing on prescription drug coverage and practices at several health systems. Location: Room G-50, Dirksen.

SARBANES-OXLEY _ 12:30 p.m. The Heritage Foundation holds a seminar on the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, with Alex Pollock of AEI, David John of Heritage, others. Location: 4th floor, Capitol Hill Club, 300 1st St. SE.

USTR-UAE _ 2:15 p.m. USTR Susan Schwab meets with the MAE Minister of Economy and commerce Shikha Luban Al Qasimi. Photo op only. Location: USTR offices, 600 17th St. NW.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: FRIDAY, JUNE 23, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

DOJ Argues For Dismissal Of NSA Surveillance Suit 3
Treasury Secretly Tracks Terror Suspects' Financial Data 3
Guantanamo Documentary Said To Be Flawed 4

Homeland Response:

FBI Raid Nabs Terrorists In Miami 4
Mueller Says US Is Much Safer Now Than Before 9/11 5
Cities Considering Bans On Chemical Rail Shipments 5
Arguments Heard In 9/11 Workers' Toxic Exposure Case 5

War News:

In Budapest, Bush Draws Parallel Between Iraq War, Hungary's Freedom Struggle 5
Top US Officials, GOP Lawmakers Say WMD Found In Iraq 7
Senate Rejects Democratic Measures Calling For US Withdrawal From Iraq 7
Casey Says Iran Helping Iraqi Insurgents 9
Iraqi Police Free 17 Hostages 10
Amnesty Plan Won't Apply To Those Who Have Attacked Iraqis Or "Friends Of Iraq." 10
Professor Says Alleged US Atrocities In Iraq Were Inevitable 10
US Officials Say Taliban Controls One-Third Of Afghanistan 10
Zawahiri Urges Afghans To Rebel Against Government In New Video 11
Stolen Documents Show US Located Top Tier Al Qaeda Terrorists In Pakistan 11

Corporate Scandals:

UTStarcom Examines Allegations Of Bribery 11
SEC Reportedly Probing Big Hedge Fund 11
SEC Says Scientific-Atlanta Aided Adelphia Fraud 12

Criminal Law:

Cheney Says He May Be Called As A Witness In Libby Trial 12
Three Guards In Tallahassee Jail Shootout Denied Bail 12
FBI Says Private Data Brokers Probably Are Breaking The Law 13
Senate Report On Abramoff Could Be Trouble For Reed, Ney, Norquist 13
Man Who Fled Marshals At Chicago Courthouse Captured 14
Aberdeen Proving Grounds Employees Charged With Fraud 14
Sides Argue Over Jury Instructions In Sorich Trial 14
Prosecutors Deny Vindictiveness, Oppose Wecht Motion To Dismiss 14
Mack A No-Show For Surrendering To Authorities 14
"Mob Cops'" Former Lawyers To Testify Defending Their Representation 15
Former Head Of Boston FBI Testifies He Didn't Know About Bulger, Flemmi Investigations 15
Louisiana Teacher Pleads Guilty To Child Porn Charges 15
Virginia Law Requires Checking Of Prospective Students For Sex Offenses 15
Project Safe Neighborhoods Cracks Down On Louisiana Child Porn 15
Map Dealer Pleads Guilty To Thefts 16
Jury Selection Begins In Baltimore Beheadings Case 16
Medical Experts Say Lethal Injection Methods Can Be Made More Humane 16

Civil Law:

Raytheon Reportedly Discussing Settlement Of Contracting Charges 16
McCain-Feingold Seen As Having Positive Impact 17

Civil Rights:

DOJ Clears Austin, TX, Officer In Fatal 2003 Shooting 17
Justices Sets Wider Standards For Worker Discrimination Suits 17
Pennsylvania Moves Toward Constitutional Amendment Banning Gay Marriage 18
House GOP Said To Show True Colors On Voting Rights Act 18
WNBA Player Decries Education Department Change In Title IX Policy 18

Antitrust:

DOJ Approves Exelon's Acquisition Of PSEG 18
US, UK Antitrust Agencies Probing Alleged Airline Price-Fixing . 19
EU Has Received No Complaint By Adobe About Microsoft Office 20
SCOTUS Dismisses Closely Watched Patent Case 20
Bolloré Will Not Pursue Merger With Aegis 20
Mittal May Boost Bid For Arcelor 20
Univision Auction Draws Little Interest 21
WSJournal Criticizes FCC Extension Of Universal Service Fund To Internet 21

LATimes Criticizes Move To Regulate Internet Based On Network Neutrality ... 21

Environment:

US Charges Puerto Rico Utility With Environmental Crimes ... 21
California Supreme Court Denies Review Of Lead Paint Case ... 21
Senate Adds $4 Billion In Emergency Aid For Farmers ... 22
National Research Council Says Earth Warmest Since 1600 ... 22
Increasing US Reliance On Coal Seen As Unwise ... 23

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Technical Mistake Reveals Conte As Reporter's Source In BALCO Probe ... 23
Defendants In Heroin, Fentanyl Case Face Conspiracy Charges 23
New Orleans Police Promise "Massive Presence" Amidst Drug Turf War ... 24
FBI Announces Arrest Of Drug Ring Members ... 24
Drug Suspect Arrested Nine Months After Faking His Death ... 24
In Florida, Defense Attorneys Seek Dismissal Of Drug Cartel Case ... 25
Texas Woman Gets Life Sentence In Drug Conspiracy Case ... 25

Immigration:

High Court Decision Clears Way For Summary Deportations ... 25
House GOP Leaders Deny They Plan To Thwart Immigration Bill 25

Tax:

House Votes To Cut Estate Taxes ... 27

Congress-Administration:

House Approves Line-Item Veto ... 27
Rumsfeld Considering Replacements For Abizaid, Jones ... 27
FTC Computer Stolen ... 28
Hacker Obtains Information On USDA Employees, Retirees, Contractors ... 28
Votes Cast In CBP Union Election ... 28
Duvall Says Bush "Much Less Intellectual" Than Clinton, But "Very Bright." ... 28

Other News:

Economy Expected To Slow In Coming Months ... 28
Nevada High Court Reviewing Conflict, Favoritism Charges Against Three Judges ... 28
Duncan Drops Out Of Maryland Governor's Race ... 29
Lieberman Votes On Iraq Troop Withdrawals Could Help Primary Opponent ... 29
Edwards Calls For Eliminating Poverty By 2036 ... 29
Study Finds Stewart's "Daily Show" Promotes Cynicism ... 29
Rumsfeld, Hadley Say Bush Could Order Shoot-Down Of North Korean Missile ... 30
Cheney, Rice, Burns Lead India Nuclear Deal Lobbying Effort ... 30
Bush Support Raises Hope For WTO Deal ... 31
Olmert And Abbas Meet, Agree To Continue Dialogue ... 31
Survey Finds Deep Division Between Views Of Muslims, Westerners ... 32
Former DIA Analyst Pleads Guilty To Giving Top Secret Information To China ... 32
NRA Prompts Letter-Writing Protest Of UN Forum On Firearms 32
Somali Government, Islamic Faction Sign Ceasefire ... 32
Lack Of Security Could Undercut Congolese Election ... 33
Lopez-Obrador Proposes "New Deal" Building Program ... 33
Venezuela's Security Council Bid Seen As Linked To Iran Crisis 33
NYTimes Says UN Human Rights Council Membership Rules Flawed ... 33
Krauthammer Says Australia's Alliance With US "Heartfelt." ... 33

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages ... 33

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington ... 34

DOJ_NMG_0036734

TERRORISM NEWS:

DOJ Argues For Dismissal Of NSA Surveillance Suit. The AP (6/23, Kravets) reports, "A lawsuit challenging the Bush administration's domestic spying program must be dismissed because it threatens to reveal state secrets and jeopardize the war on terror, the government says." The AP continues, "The Bush administration plans to make that argument Friday before a San Francisco federal judge, who will hear a case that tests the reach of the president's powers. … The administration argues in legal briefs that the courts cannot decide the constitutionality of the president's asserted wartime powers to eavesdrop on Americans without warrants." The AP adds, "The government is invoking the so-called 'state secrets privilege' in a federal lawsuit filed by a privacy group against communications giant AT&T Inc. over the telecom's alleged involvement in Bush's surveillance program adopted after the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks. … 'Resolution of those legal issues depends entirely on facts that, in light of their highly classified nature, cannot be made the subject of litigation,' the Justice Department wrote in a brief to U.S. District Judge Vaughn Walker. … The legal tactic of state secrets privilege, first recognized by the U.S. Supreme Court in a McCarthy-era lawsuit, has been increasingly and successfully invoked by federal lawyers seeking to shield the government from scrutiny by the courts, from espionage cases and patent disputes to routine employment discrimination lawsuits."

Specter Grills AT&T CEO Over NSA Surveillance Program. ABC World News Tonight (6/22, story 6, 1:40, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The CEO of AT&T appeared before the Senate Judiciary Committee today. Committee Chairman Arlen Specter tried to find out if" stories that "giant phone companies like AT&T were supplying information on their customers' calls to the government" were true. It was a "confrontation that became rather tense." In a sample of the back and forth, Specter asked, "Does your company provide information to the Federal Government or any law enforcement information about customers?" Whitacre: "If it's legal and we're requested to do so, of course we do." Sen. Specter: "Have you?" Whitacre: "Senator, all I'm going to say is we follow the law." Specter concluded by saying, "Well, I think that answer is contemptuous of this committee." Gibson: "The AT&T Chairman did eventually say he couldn't answer because it's classified information to which Senator Specter said, they'd discuss that privately."

AT&T Changes Privacy Policy On Data-Sharing. The AP (6/23) reports, "AT&T Inc. is changing its privacy policy for Internet and television customers to specify that account information is a business record the company owns and can be disclosed to government and law enforcement and to protect the company's 'legitimate business interests.'" The AP continues, "AT&T said that the account information, which includes the customer's name, address, telephone number and e-mail address as well as information about the customer's services, constitute business records and are owned by AT&T. The company said account information doesn't include usage information, such as how a person uses the Web or what programs a person using the company's television service watches." The AP adds, "The company may disclose customer information 'in response to subpoenas, court orders, or other legal process, or to establish or exercise our legal rights or defend against legal claims,' the company said in the policy update, which was sent to 7 million Internet and television customers. … The new policy takes effect Friday."

Treasury Secretly Tracks Terror Suspects' Financial Data. Stories about the Terrorist Finance Tracking Program appeared on the front pages of major US newspapers. The Wall Street Journal (6/23, A1, Simpson, 2.11M) reports, "Since shortly after the Sept. 11, 2001 terrorist attacks, the U.S. Treasury Department has been secretly tracking suspected terrorist financing through a far-reaching program that gives it access to records from" Swift, the network that handles nearly all international financial transfers. The Terrorist Finance Tracking Program "operates under a series of broad U.S. subpoenas." Although "U.S. officials said few American citizens would have financial data that fall under the program, because they are unlikely to engage in international money transfers," the "disclosure of its existence may be controversial in Europe and other parts of the world and within the global banking industry." Treasury Secretary John W. Snow "called the program an 'essential tool' for fighting terror and said it had effective oversight and safeguards," adding, "It is not 'data mining.'" Stuart Levey, Treasury's top counter-terrorism official, also said "the data isn't subjected to controversial data-mining techniques."

The New York Times (6/23, A1, Lichtblau, Risen, 1.19M) adds, "Among the safeguards, government officials said, is an outside auditing firm that verifies that the data searches are based on intelligence leads about suspected terrorists." Levey also noted that "one person had been removed from the operation for conducting a search considered inappropriate." In 2003, after Swift executives and some board members "met with Mr. Greenspan, Robert S. Mueller III, the F.B.I. director, and Treasury officials, among others, in what one official described as 'a full-court press'" the Administration "pledged to impose tighter controls" in exchange for continued access to the data.

DOJ_NMG_0036735

Notably, "Intelligence officials were so eager to use the Swift data that they discussed having the C.I.A. covertly gain access to the system." The Times calls the program "a significant departure from typical practice in how the government acquires Americans' financial records." Several officials said "access to large amounts of confidential data was highly unusual…and stirred concerns inside the administration about legal and privacy issues." Even one former senior counterterrorism official who considers the program valuable said that "While tight controls are in place…'the potential for abuse is enormous.'" Some current and former government officials also "expressed reservations about the program, saying that what they viewed as an urgent, temporary measure had become permanent nearly five years later without specific Congressional approval or formal authorization."

The Los Angeles Times (6/23, Meyer, Miller, 958K) notes "Current and former U.S. officials say the effort has been only marginally successful against al-Qaida," but the program is valuable for "tracking lower- and mid-level terrorist operatives and financiers who believe they have not been detected and militant groups, such as Hezbollah, Hamas and Palestinian Islamic Jihad, that also operate political and social welfare organizations." The Times calls the program "part of an arsenal of aggressive measures the government has adopted since the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks that yield new intelligence, but also circumvent traditional safeguards against abuse and raise concerns about intrusions on privacy." The Times notes "a former senior Treasury official expressed concern that the SWIFT program allows access to vast quantities of sensitive data that could be abused without safeguards" and "questioned what becomes of the data, some of it presumably related to innocent banking customers."

Administration Asked NYTimes Not To Publish Article. The New York Times (6/23, A1, Lichtblau, Risen, 1.19M) reports "Administration officials…asked The New York Times not to publish" the article on the program and "enlisted several current and former officials, both Democrat and Republican, to vouch for its value." Dana Perino, deputy White House press secretary, said "The president is concerned that once again The New York Times has chosen to expose a classified program that is working to protect our citizens."

Guantanamo Documentary Said To Be Flawed. The Wall Street Journal (6/23, Morgenstern, 2.11M) reviews the documentary "The Road to Guantanamo," calling it "filmmaking with the potential to mold public opinion." But "no facts are to be found here, only personal narratives that may or may not be factual, and remarkably skillful re-creations that invoke twin powers of the film medium -- to dramatize, and to propagandize." USA Today (6/23, 2.31M) also reviews the film, saying it "falls short of greatness by not providing enough insight into the characters. It is mostly intent on inciting a sense of outrage in the viewer, and it succeeds." In his Washington Post (6/23, 744K) review of the movie, Stephen Hunter writes, "Where's the love? There isn't any in any military prison and there hasn't been for 4,000 years. But is this torture? You must make your own call."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

FBI Raid Nabs Terrorists In Miami. CNN (9/22, Cooper) reported that the FBI and state and local police conducted anti-terrorism raids In Miami Thursday. CNN added, "Now at this point, seven people are under arrest. Law enforcement officials tell CNN the individuals being detained are suspected of plotting terrorist attacks inside the United States. According to at least one law enforcement source, some of the possible targets may have included the Sears Tower in Chicago and Miami's FBI offices. Those just two possible targets, according to one law enforcement source telling CNN."

The Washington Post (6/23, A26, Whoriskey, Eggen, 744K) reports that the "suspects were described as supporters of militant Islam but not members of al-Qaeda." FBI Special Agent Richard J. Kolko said the "operation was a 'terrorist-related matter' but that 'the individuals arrested posed no immediate threat to the U.S.,'" and law enforcement officials said "the plotting was in its early stages." Also, "as of 9:15 p.m. no weapons or explosives had been seized from the searched locations." The New York Times (6/23, 1.19M) adds that a law-enforcement official, speaking on condition of anonymity, "said the investigation had been going on for more than a year."

The Miami Herald (6/23, Benn, 323K) adds that an anonymous official said "Five of those arrested are U.S. citizens, one is a legal U.S. resident and one is an illegal alien." The source added that "the group thought that they 'were doing (the attacks) in conjunction with al Qaeda' but were really dealing with undercover law enforcement." MSNBC (6/23) adds, "An FBI informant infiltrated the group, the sources say, neutralizing the threat."

The Chicago Tribune (6/23, Tackett, Zeleny, 643K) reports that a senior law-enforcement official said, "They talked about belonging to an Islamic army. They wanted to raise an army in the U.S…. But they didn't have the means to do this." The Wall Street Journal (6/23, A6, Squeo, 2.11M) notes that this is the "kind of home-grown threat that U.S. officials have feared since the London subway bombings last year." Still, CNN (6/23) reports that law enforcement sources said "that at least one had taken 'an al Qaeda oath.'"

The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (6/23, Nolin, Holland, 249K) adds, "The suspects are being held in the federal detention center in downtown Miami and will appear in magistrate court this morning." The AP (6/26) notes, "Managers of the Sears Tower, the nation's tallest building, said in a statement that they speak regularly with the FBI and local law enforcement about terror threats and that Thursday 'was no exception.'" The AFP (6/23) adds, "Another person was arrested in Atlanta, Georgia as well, according to television reports." The Washington Times (6/23, 90K) and UPI (6/23) also cover this story.

DOJ_NMG_0036736

CNN.com (6/23) reports, "Federal law enforcement sources said five of the seven men were Americans, one was an illegal immigrant from Haiti whose visa had expired and the seventh was a resident alien. … Sources told CNN that the arrests culminated a monthslong undercover operation. The suspects believed they were dealing with an al Qaeda operative but the person was actually a government informant, the sources said."

The AP (6/23, Kennedy) reports, "Miami U.S. Attorney R. Alexander Acosta said in a statement that more details about the probe would be released Friday. … 'There is no imminent threat to Miami or any other area because of these operations,' said Richard Kolko, spokesman for FBI headquarters in Washington. He declined further comment."

Mueller Says Miami Operation Should Be Concluded Tomorrow. FBI Director Robert Mueller was asked on CNN's Larry King Live (6/22) about today's anti-terror operation in Miami. Mueller said, "I can tell you that we do have an ongoing operation in Miami. We are conducting a number of arrests and searches and we'll have more about that when the operation is concluded, probably tomorrow morning."

Mueller Says US Is Much Safer Now Than Before 9/11. FBI Director Robert Mueller said on CNN's Larry King Live (6/22), "I think we have taken substantial measures to protect the country. I will say we're not -- we're much safer than we were before September 11th. We're not totally safe, but because we've taken off a number of the leaders of al Qaeda around the world with the CIA and with our counterparts overseas, they don't have the same leadership they had in the past. We took away the sanctuary of Afghanistan. But if you look at what happened in London the last year, you look at what happened in Canada, we have to be concerned those who espouse the same philosophy."

Mueller Says FBI, NYPD Addressed Threat Described By Suskind. FBI Director Robert Mueller was asked on CNN's Larry King Live (6/22) about author Ron Suskind's report that a terror cell came within weeks of striking New York's subway with poison gas. Mueller said, "I'm familiar with the incident that Ron Suskind describes. And there was a threat back then that -- we had information about a possible strike against the subways in New York. We worked with the New York Police Department to address that threat. And went to the public now and I can tell you we had addressed that threat. … Meaning it is no longer a threat."

Mueller Announces Mason As FBI's Assistant Director For Investigations. The Washington Times (6/23, Seper, 90K) reports that FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III announced "FBI veteran Michael A. Mason, who formerly headed the bureau's Washington field office, has been named the bureau's executive assistant director for investigations." Mueller "said Mr. Mason has 'the knowledge and experience' with both criminal investigations and administrative matters 'to ensure that the criminal programs receive strategic guidance and support,'" adding, "I have no doubt the FBI will maintain its unparalleled level of excellence in criminal investigations."

Cities Considering Bans On Chemical Rail Shipments. USA Today (6/23, 1A, Hall, 2.31M) reports in a front page article that at least six US cities may follow Washington, DC, in placing "a ban or limit on rail shipments of deadly chemicals in an effort to prevent terrorists from turning tank cars into weapons of mass destruction." Fred Millar, an environmentalist, "who helped" with the passage of Washington's ban last year, said he "cannot imagine an easier way for al-Qaeda to fulfill its goal than to take out a (chlorine-filled) tank car." Meanwhile, DHS' William Flynn "says security assessments have been conducted along tracks in five cities. Flynn acknowledges the measures may not stop a terrorist attack. 'We can reduce risk,' he says. 'We can't eliminate it.'"

Arguments Heard In 9/11 Workers' Toxic Exposure Case. The New York Times (6/23, Depalma, 1.19M) reports a federal district court judge in Manhattan "heard oral arguments yesterday on the city's motion to dismiss a lawsuit brought on behalf of more than 8,000 firefighters, police officers and construction workers who say they were harmed by exposure to toxic substances while working at ground zero." Though NYC "lawyers have argued that the city cannot be sued because it has legal immunity under a state civil defense law," lawyers for the workers say "that Congress would never have established a $1 billion insurance fund in 2003 if it believed that the city was immune from negligence lawsuits. … The city has argued that it will be handicapped in responding to any future disasters if the possibility of negligence lawsuits is left hanging."

WAR NEWS:

In Budapest, Bush Draws Parallel Between Iraq War, Hungary's Freedom Struggle. ABC World News Tonight (6/22, story 5, Gibson, 8.78M) reported

DOJ_NMG_0036737

President Bush "invoked the Iraq war while visiting Hungary today. He was there to mark 50 years since Hungary's failed uprising against communism. And he drew parallels between that long struggle and the fight for democracy in Iraq." The President was shown saying, "Iraq's young democracy still faces determined enemies. Defeating these enemies will require sacrifice and continued patience. The kind of patience the good people of Hungary displayed after 1956." ABC was the only network to cover Bush's trip last night.

The Washington Post (6/23, A18, Abramowitz, 744K) reports Bush "hailed Hungary's resistance as a story that 'inspires all who love liberty,'" and "sought to draw parallels between Hungary's transition from dictatorship to democracy and the US enterprise in Iraq." In Budapest, Bush "consulted Thursday with" President Laszlo Solyom and Prime Minister Ferenc Gyurcsany "about the Balkans, Iran, energy and a dispute over visa policy." Bush's "symbolic gestures here appeared likely to be appreciated by many Hungarians, who perhaps with some ambivalence lined the streets for a glimpse of the American president on his first visit to Budapest."

The Financial Times (6/23, Condon, Alden) adds, "A day after working to repair ties with European leaders dismayed by US foreign policy," Bush "returned to more assertive rhetoric on Thursday while paying tribute to the fallen heroes of Hungary's 1956 anti-Soviet uprising. … The confident tone of the president's remarks contrasted with the softer approach he used to mend relations with leaders from western Europe."

The New York Times (6/23, Stolberg, 1.19M) says the Budapest stop "was largely ceremonial, with themes of freedom and democracy sprinkled throughout. … But tensions surfaced amid the pomp." Leaders in eastern Europe are pressing Mr. Bush for their countries to be included in a waiver program that allows foreigners to visit the United States for three months without a visa."

The Los Angeles Times (6/23, Gerstenzang, 958K) reports, "During the day, Bush also viewed the Holy Crown of St. Stephen, the king who resolved to make Hungary a Christian kingdom. The crown fell into US hands at the end of World War II. President Carter approved its return to Hungary in 1978 to recognize improving respect here for human rights despite continued Communist domination." And Bush "placed a bouquet at a dark gray granite monument, built 10 years ago, to those who died in the 1956 uprising."

The Washington Times (6/23, Dinan, 90K) notes Bush "travels next month to the Group of Eight summit in St. Petersburg where he will be under pressure to take a harsh stance on Russian President Vladimir Putin's backsliding on democracy. White House officials had said yesterday's speech was not a message to Mr. Putin, but the Russian leader could certainly see it that way. … The president mentioned the Soviets' role three times, and specifically blamed 'the communists in Moscow' for the brutality."

USA Today (6/23, Jackson, 2.31M) reports, "This trip had a different feel from ones around the time of the Iraq invasion in March 2003, when European leaders split sharply with the Bush administration and blocked an invasion resolution in the United Nations. One sign of reduced tension: fewer protesters. Hundreds were seen at Wednesday's EU summit in Vienna, as opposed to thousands in past years." During this trip, "Bush and European leaders said disputes over Iraq are behind them. While the war there still rages, Europeans support the emergence of a democratic government in Baghdad, and leaders chose instead to focus on areas where they agree, such as stopping the spread of nuclear weapons in Iran and North Korea."

Bush Seen As Having Taken "Milder Line" On Russia Than Did Cheney. The AP (6/23, Loven) reports Putin "has been irritated by Bush's attention and visits to former Soviet states." Bush "talked with Hungarian officials about how to reassure Putin that promoting democracy and freedom among Russia's neighbors 'is not some kind of effort to encircle Russia but is, in fact, a good thing for Russia because democratic states make good and peaceful neighbors,'" said National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley, traveling with Bush.

The Wall Street Journal (6/23, Harwood, 2.11M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column that President Bush took a "milder line in Europe than Cheney last month in Lithuania. His commemoration of Hungary's 1956 uprising signals continued displeasure over Putin's antidemocratic moves, but aides concede they have little leverage. White House will send low-ranking State official to pre-G8 gathering of Russian opposition figures, disappointing Putin critics. But 2008 Republican contender McCain and Clinton ex-adviser Albright plan joint Washington appearance denouncing Russian autocracy."

Hungarian Economy In Deep Trouble. USA Today (6/23, Lynch, 2.31M), meanwhile, says Bush "was in Hungary on Thursday to talk politics. But for his hosts, economics are more urgent. Once an impressive post-communist success, Hungary now finds itself a leading contender to become the next emerging-markets disaster. The Budapest stock market has plunged more than 22% since May 5 as global investors reawakened to the risk involved in developing nations. Towering twin deficits in both its government budget and current account make Hungary especially vulnerable."

LATimes Says Comparison Between '56 Uprising And Iraq War "Troubling." The Los Angeles Times (6/23, 958K) editorializes that "by drawing a direct link between Hungary's quashed anti-communist rebels of 1956 and Iraq's struggling leaders of 2006," Bush "offered a troubling reminder that his administration continues to confuse the Cold War with the vastly dissimilar war on terrorism -- while refusing to acknowledge any limitations on the use of American power." The Times concludes that "staking a nation's foreign policy on Iraq resembling Hungary is a recipe for disappointment -- or something much worse."

DOJ_NMG_0036738

Top US Officials, GOP Lawmakers Say WMD Found In Iraq. Fox News' Special Report (6/22, Hume) reported, "Top administration officials said today that chemical and biological weapons have indeed been found in Iraq and they now worry what this could suggest about other hidden weapons there and the possible dangers to US troops." Fox (Angle) added, "US intelligence officials believe the weapons were made prior to the Gulf War in 1991 and officials say they have seriously degraded over time. But the declassified report says they are still lethal and Secretary Rumsfeld said that is a concern for all those in Iraq."

Most reports are treating the significance of the finding skeptically. NBC Nightly News (6/22, story 3, 2:15, Reid, 9.87M) reported on a "battle brewing over weapons of mass destruction and at the center of it all, Republican Senator Rick Santorum. The story begins Wednesday afternoon with the release of a one-page summary of a Pentagon report stating that '…approximately 500 weapons munitions which contain degraded mustard or sarin nerve agent' have been found in Iraq since 2003. Republican Pennsylvania Senator Rick Santorum rushes out a press release and heads for the Senate floor…" Sen. Santorum: "This is an incredibly significant document." NBC added that late yesterday, "the Secretary of Defense weighed in. He said that those 500 shells are 'weapons of mass destruction.' But he was not asked and he did not comment on whether that they're the kinds of weapons of mass destruction that justified invading Iraq."

The Washington Post (6/23, A10, Pincus, 744K) titles its report "Democrats Criticize Claim On Iraqi Arms," and says, "The assertion by two Republican lawmakers that a new intelligence study proves that chemical weapons were found in Iraq has triggered sharp criticism from Democrats that the GOP is distorting intelligence for political purposes." The Army finding "was seized on by Rep. Peter Hoekstra (R-Mich.) chairman of the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence," and Santorum, "a strong supporter of the war who is trailing his Democratic opponent in his reelection bid."

Under the headline "For Diehards, Search For Iraq's W.M.D. Isn't Over," the New York Times (6/23, Shane, 1.19M) reports that after Santorum's announcement, "American intelligence officials hastily scheduled a background briefing for the news media on Thursday to clarify" that the Army report "that described roughly 500 munitions containing 'degraded' mustard or sarin gas, all manufactured before the 1991 gulf war and found scattered through Iraq since 2003. Such shells had previously been reported and do not change the government conclusion, the officials said."

Senate Rejects Democratic Measures Calling For US Withdrawal From Iraq. The CBS Evening News (6/22, story 5, 2:00, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "The Republican-led Senate today defeated two Democratic proposals for withdrawing US forces from Iraq, though the Pentagon reportedly is considering a small cut in troop strength involving a few thousand troops." ABC World News Tonight (6/22, story 3, 2:35, Gibson, 8.78M) said senators "voted 86-13 against requiring a pullout of combat forces by July 2007. Then, voted 60-39, to defeat a measure that simply urged President Bush to start pulling out troops this year." USA Today/AP (6/23, Sidoti) notes "Rhode Island Sen. Lincoln Chafee, who also is up for re-election, was the only Republican supporter of the troop withdrawal resolution."

Most media coverage last night and this morning focuses on which party emerges from the debate in a stronger position on the Iraq issue. There is no clear consensus on who "won" the debate, although a number of media outlets describe the Democratic caucus as divided. The Christian Science Monitor (6/23, Feldmann, Chaddock, 61K) headlines its story "In Iraq War Vote, Democrats Fail," and says "the Republicans appeared intent on portraying the Democrats in two negative ways -- first, as divided (read: weak) on how to proceed in the war, and second, as quitters wanting to 'cut and run.' Whether the debate, and one held last week in the House, will affect public opinion on the war remains to be seen. But as a piece of political strategy, analysts saw Republicans taking a weak hand -- a war that has become chronically unpopular -- and making the most of it." Knight Ridder (6/23, Kuhnhenn) also says the debate "exposed divisions among Democrats."

The Washington Post (6/23, A1, Babington, 744K) says the GOP displayed the "cohesion that has eluded Democrats," and adds the votes "underscored the Democratic constituency's split between staunchly antiwar activists and those who are frustrated but less fervent." The Post also reports, "The GOP solidarity was a vote of confidence in the White House and a gamble that the situation in Iraq will stabilize, or at least not worsen, between now and November. The administration worked hard to reassure nervous Republicans, having the Pentagon send them a thick binder of talking points about the war's progress and the need to stay the course until Iraqis can maintain order in their country."

The Washington Times (6/23, Fagan, 90K) notes Republicans "used yesterday's vote for political points, too. The National Republican Senatorial Committee quickly sent out an e-mail yesterday bashing Sen. Robert Menendez, a Democrat running for re-election in New Jersey, for supporting Mr. Kerry's plan. A spokesman said it 'puts him not just on the fringe of American politics, but also on the fringe of the Democrat Party.'" Democrats "were split yesterday."

DOJ_NMG_0036739

The Wall Street Journal (6/23, Rogers, 2.11M) reports "the recent killing of terrorist leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi and the formation of the new government in Baghdad have increased Republican confidence about the Iraq venture. And whatever their remaining doubts, Republicans have chosen to project unity, hoping to shift attention from the war itself and focus on the splits among Democrats."

The New York Times (6/23, Zernike, 1.19M) reports Republicans "lined up squarely behind President Bush," and adds "Democrats, believing that polls show a majority of Americans want troops to begin coming home, mocked Republicans after the vote as being a 'rubber stamp' for Mr. Bush."

NBC Nightly News (6/22, story 2, 2:00, Reid, 9.87M) reported that "in typical Washington fashion, both sides are claiming victory here today. The Republicans say they are united behind their stay the course position. They say the Democrats are divided and appear weak on national security. Democrats, though, say they may have differences on timing, but they say they agree on a fundamental point and that is that there needs to be a major course change in Iraq and a focus on getting the troops home and they say that is closer to how the American people feel about Iraq." CNN's The Situation Room (6/22, King) reported Democrats are "hoping to change the story line of the debate from Democrats are divided to Democrats are united."

The Los Angeles Times (6/23, Reynolds, 958K) says the votes were "less an attempt to legislate than a test of Democratic unity on an issue that could prove decisive in November's congressional elections and the 2008 presidential race." The Times adds that "in a sign of the attitudes among this constituency, Democratic senators earned only measured praise Thursday from Tom Andrews, national director of Win Without War, a coalition of liberal groups opposed to the war." Andrews "lauded those who voted for the Kerry measure. He said war opponents would likely view the strong Democratic support for the Levin-Reed proposal as 'a half-step in the right direction, but it's only a half-step.'"

Casey Considering Small, Gradual Troop Reduction In Iraq. CNN's The Situation (6/22, King) reported, "In the midst of a political war over bringing the troops home, there's growing pressure on the Pentagon to reduce force levels. Military sources tell CNN the commanding general in Iraq, George Casey, is considering recommending a small and gradual troop reduction in Iraq. Sources say this would amount to, at most, some 6,000 to 10,000 troops."

Cheney Makes Case Against Timetables For Troop Withdrawal. Vice President Dick Cheney said on CNN's The Situation Room (6/22) that calls from Senate Democrats to set a timetable for US troops to leave Iraq are "wrong in many respects," adding, "We are making significant progress. We have had major success on the political front in terms of three national elections last year by the Iraqis. They've stood up a brand new government under a new constitution for the first time ever. We have got a quarter of a million Iraqis now in uniform, equipped, trained, in the fight. So there has been significant progress made with respect with what's going on in Iraq." Later in the interview, Cheney expanded on his point, noting, "You're not going to complete the mission if we follow the Democrats' advice. And, in fact, we will have set up the situation in which the al Qaeda types can win." They are betting that the US does not "have the stomach for the fight, and we can not afford to validate that strategy. We can win -- we are winning -- but we've got to stay at it."

ABC World News Tonight (6/22, story 3, 2:35, Stephanopoulos, 8.78M) reported on Cheney's CNN interview. Cheney was shown saying, "The worst possible thing we could do is what the Democrats are suggesting. Packing it in. Going home, persuading and validating the theory that we don't have the stomach for this fight."

US Soldiers React To Debate. ABC World News Tonight (6/22, story 4, 1:10, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "As George said right at the end, the debate in the Senate was a preview of arguments about the war that will be raised in this fall's congressional elections. How voters react is important. But what do the soldiers in Iraq think about the debate? They were very aware it was going on. And we were struck by some of the voices we heard on NPR this morning. NPR's Phillip Reeves is embedded with the 506th Infantry Regimen in Iraq." Sgt. Britt Ruble: "It's easy for somebody in an air-conditioned office, back in the states to state their opinion. Unless you've done the deed, spilled blood with your men on the dirt, you really can't talk about it intelligently because you don't know what's going on." Spc. Roger Sanchez: "Everything happens out here from mortars to IEDs to RPGs being shot at us. Weapons being shot at us. I wasn't expecting all this. I don't guess anybody can imagine what exactly it is like unless they're in it." Sgt. Britt Ruble: "If we pull out too early and go home, and we don't finish it, that means that all those guys have done it for naught. And I don't want to see that happen. I want to do it and do it right. So when we go home, we can say, hey, look what we've done."

The Washington Times (6/23, Gertz, Scarborough, 90K) reports in its "Inside the Ring" column, "Army officers back from Iraq express frustration with what they consider the drift of the Democratic Party back to the left-wing days of the 1960s and '70s. The officers say that a definite departure date for U.S. troops from Iraq, which some Democrats are embracing, would be a clear victory for al Qaeda."

DOJ_NMG_0036740

Reed Says Democrats Had A "Strong Showing" On Iraq Amendments. Sen. Jack Reed said on MSNBC's Hardball (6/22), "We got a strong showing from the Democratic Caucus. This is a very difficult issue. I don't think anyone assumes that it should be one that is completely unanimous, but we had a very strong showing. And I think we enunciated a policy that is not only the best policy, but it's a policy that appears to be one being advocated by General Casey, who is today talking about troop reductions this year, and also by the Iraqi national security adviser, who predicts that before the end of this year, we'll reduce troops."

Bond Says Timetables Have More To Do With Election Than Iraq Mission. Sen. Kit Bond said on MSNBC's Hardball (6/22), "What these amendments did, both the Kerry and the Reed-Levin bill did, was to say that it's not going to be the generals there on the ground looking at it who decide when the security forces of Iraq are adequate to take over. It's going to be a political timetable. Unfortunately, there is a suspicion that that political timetable has more to do with November 7th's general election than whether we complete our mission in Iraq."

Casey Says Iran Helping Iraqi Insurgents. The CBS Evening News (6/22, story 5, 2:00, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported "American forces in Iraq apparently facing a potent new enemy: Iran." CBS (Cowan) added, "For US Soldiers fighting insurgents just south of Baghdad tonight, the news from the Pentagon is sobering. Iran has joined the war. According to the commanding general in Iraq, they're helping to plant some of the roadside bombs like the ones that killed at least four US Marines just this week." Gen. George Casey, Commander, Multi-National Force, Iraq: "We are quite confident that the Iranians through their covert special operations forces are providing weapons, IED technology and training to Shi'a extremist groups in Iraq." Cowan: "General Casey went so far as to point his finger directly at the government of Iran." Gen. Casey: "Now you would assume that they're not doing that independently, that there is some central direction from somebody in Tehran." Cowan: "And that was enough for the Secretary of Defense to reason it was too soon to talk openly about US troop withdrawals." Secretary Rumsfeld: "It very likely will go down and up and down and up depending on the circumstances and depending on the needs."

The Washington Post (6/23, A19, Ricks, 744K) reports, "Iran's actions are a major concern not only because of attacks on US forces, but also because the durability of the new Iraqi government depends in part on the willingness of Iraqi's Sunni minority to accept the government." The Sunnis "will be unlikely to do so if the Iranian government is perceived as playing a major role in supporting and even arming violent Shiite factions." The Washington Times (6/23, Scarborough, 90K) runs a similar story under the headline "Casey Cites Iran Hand In Attacks By Iraqi Shi'ites."

Hadley Says Administration Is Losing Patience With Iran. CNN's The Situation Room (6/22, Malveaux) reported that National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley said the Administration's patience with Iran "is wearing thin. Hadley says the US and it's European allies are getting mixed messages from Iran as to when it will respond to a package of incentives offered to convince the regime to abandon its nuclear ambitions. While Hadley said it would be helpful to get a response before a series of scheduled meetings among the industrial nations, the first one slated for June 29th, Hadley ruled out trying to do this through an arbitrary set of deadlines."

Annan Says Tehran's Answer Will Be Delayed. The AP (6/23, Higgins) reports UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan met with Iranian Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki, after which Annan told reporters "Iran will not respond to incentives to halt its nuclear program before mid-July, at least two weeks past the date sought by the U.S. and its partners. … The U.S. has said that" Secretary Rice "and diplomats from the other five nations offering Iran the incentives agreed by phone that they expect an answer around the time of a meeting of G-8 foreign ministers on June 29 in Moscow. The United States reiterated that Iran should respond by next week." Annan called his meeting with Mottaki "very useful," and the AP notes Mottaki will meet with German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier in Berlin tomorrow. While the Administration "is reluctant to set a specific deadline," NSA Hadley "said that it would be 'helpful and useful if we could get a response and know where the Iranians are' before the June 29 meeting." Ambassador Bolton "said that June 29 would be 'an ample period of time, very reasonable time in which Iran could respond. I think we've made it clear that if the Iranians don't choose the path that's been presented to them, the alternative path is one of increasing isolation -- that we'd be prepared to move very quickly in the Security Council,' Bolton said."

Iran Could Be Seeking To Emulate North Korean Tactics. The Christian Science Monitor (6/23, LaFranchi, 61K) reports, "There may be no such thing as a North Korea playbook for would-be nuclear proliferators." But "many Western leaders suspect Iran of trying to emulate North Korea's secretive development of nuclear weapons. And as both nations continue to command international attention for their nuclear programs, it's clear the two countries watch each other for 'how to' lessons in nuclear diplomacy."

Former FBI Director Criticizes US History Of Handling Of Iran On Terrorism. Louis J. Freeh, FBI director from 1993-2001, writes in an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (6/23, 2.11M), "Ten years ago this Sunday, acting under direct orders from senior Iranian government leaders, the Saudi Hezbollah detonated a 25,000-pound TNT bomb that killed 19 U.S. airmen in their dormitory at Khobar Towers in Dhahran, Saudi Arabia," and "two of the primary leaders of the attack, Ahmed Ibrahim al-Mughassil and Abdel Hussein Mohamed al-Nasser, are living comfortably in Iran with about as much to fear from America as Osama bin Laden had prior to Sept. 11." President Clinton "had no interest in confronting the fact that Iran had blown up the Towers," as he "was set on 'improving' relations with what it mistakenly perceived to be a moderate Iranian president." It took years and a call to former President George H.W. Bush to get interviews with the bombers, who were in Saudi custody. Those "obtained direct evidence of Iran's complicity," yet it took the current President's administration to lead to an indictment. This is "just one example of how successive U.S. governments have mishandled Iran." In the current negotiations, "will we ultimately ignore justice and buy a separate peace with our enemy?"

DOJ_NMG_0036741

More Commentary. David Ignatius writes in the Washington Post (6/23, A25, 744K), "Sometime in the next several months, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice or a senior colleague is likely to sit down at a negotiating table with representatives of the Islamic Republic of Iran. As she prepares for these meetings, I suspect Rice is reviewing the most famous instance of America talking to an enemy: Henry Kissinger's secret opening to China in the early 1970s. … Thinking about Kissinger's opening to China, it seems to me that one clear lesson for the Bush administration is that it shouldn't be overly cautious in its engagement with Iran. It's time to talk, and if the Iranians will agree to the West's appropriate precondition that they halt enrichment of uranium, then all issues should be on the table. … Here's the pitch that you can imagine Kissinger making: Iran's hopes of becoming a major power can be achieved only by halting its nuclear program and working with the United States to stabilize Iraq and the wider Middle East. I hope Secretary Rice is preparing a similar presentation."

Iraqi Police Free 17 Hostages. The New York Times (6/23, Burns, 1.19M) reports, "A day after a large group of gunmen seized scores of Iraqis from a factory, a police raid freed 17 of them, but 34 hostages remained unaccounted for, the industry minister said Thursday. The abduction, involving 40 or 50 gunmen, some wearing police uniforms, represented a sharp intensification of a tactic that has become increasingly common."

Mass Abduction Said To Show Clampdown Not Working. The Los Angeles Times (6/23, 958K) reports the "brazen" abduction of 50 workers near Baghdad "sent a reminder that the violence in this country, and particularly the capital, has not been curbed by a major security clampdown put in place June 14 with much fanfare." The Times says the mass abduction was "as brazen an act" as a June 5 incident in which "men wearing police uniforms descended on a Baghdad bus depot and kidnapped about 50 people."

Amnesty Plan Won't Apply To Those Who Have Attacked Iraqis Or "Friends Of Iraq." The Washington Post (6/23, A19, Partlow, 744K) reports, "Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's new plan to promote reconciliation among Iraq's rival factions will offer amnesty to Iraqis who have 'carried weapons' but not to those who have committed serious crimes, according to Iraqi politicians who have read the proposal." Deputy Prime Minister Barham Saleh, an ethnic Kurd from President Jalal Talabani's Patriotic Union of Kurdistan, said of the plan, "It says that the government will issue an amnesty for all those who have not committed crimes against the people of Iraq and the friends of Iraq. … Those who attack U.S. forces are not immune from legal consequences. An attack on Iraqi forces or multinational forces are seen legally...as the same thing from the perspective of the government."

Professor Says Alleged US Atrocities In Iraq Were Inevitable. In a New York Times (6/23, 1.19M) op-ed, Hendrix College English professor Alex Vernon, a veteran of the first Gulf War, writes, "It's impossible to imagine the frustration and stress on American soldiers in Iraq today -- impossible, or maybe it's simply not something we willingly work to imagine. Then the news breaks. My first thought on hearing about the alleged atrocities at Haditha -- and of the announcement this week that murder charges are being brought against eight American servicemen for killing an Iraqi civilian at Hamdania in April -- was 'Duh.' If we didn't know this day was coming, we were fools."

US Officials Say Taliban Controls One-Third Of Afghanistan. NBC Nightly News (6/22, story 6, 2:20, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The United States has 23,000 troops in Afghanistan at this very moment. And while they fully expected the Taliban's so-called spring offensive, this season has been especially fierce, causing the US military to conduct a staggering 340 airstrikes in Afghanistan, that is just in the last three months alone." NBC (Maceda) added, "US officials say the Taliban Islamist fighters, numbering in the thousands, now control at least a third of Afghanistan. How did it happen? First, the Taliban's tactics have improved. Roadside and suicide bombs, techniques borrowed from Iraq, are on the rise. Also improved, the Taliban's command and control. Local leaders are now in charge. To counter the Taliban offensive, a second massive operation launched last week called Mountain Thrust – some 10,000 US, Coalition, and Afghan troops sweeping into the south, while Operation Mountain Lion continues in the east."

DOJ_NMG_0036742

Four US Soldiers Killed In Afghanistan. ABC World News Tonight (6/22, lead story, 3:45, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Four US Soldiers have died in Afghanistan today. The loss of American forces there often gets overlooked." The New York Times (6/23, Gall, 1.19M) also reports the story.

Zawahiri Urges Afghans To Rebel Against Government In New Video. NBC Nightly News (6/22, story 6, 2:20, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The latest video by al Qaeda's number two, Ayman al-Zawahiri, who urged Afghans to step up the fight against the US and what he called other occupying forces."

The Washington Post (6/23, A18, Constable, 744K) reports a "new videotape from al-Qaeda's second-in-command urging Afghans to rise up against their government and foreign military forces was vehemently denounced by Afghan President Hamid Karzai on Thursday but had little immediate impact on the Afghan public." In the "3 1/2 -minute videotape, made available on a Web site early Thursday, Ayman al-Zawahiri said in Arabic, 'I am calling on the Muslims in Kabul in particular and in all Afghanistan in general and for the sake of God to stand up . . . in the face of the infidel forces that are invading Muslim lands.' He wore a white turban and posed with an assault rifle." Karzai, "meeting with journalists Thursday morning on the shaded grounds of his fortified palace, denounced the Egyptian-born Zawahiri as an outlaw who had caused bloodshed in Afghanistan for years."

The New York Times (6/23, Gall, 1.19M) reports Zawahiri, "who is believed to be in hiding along the Afghan-Pakistani border, called on 'the young men of Islam, in the universities and schools of Kabul, to carry out their duties in defense of their religion, honor, land and country.'" President Karzai "urged other nations to reassess their approach to curbing terrorism in Afghanistan, saying that the deaths of hundreds of Afghans in fighting with American-led forces was 'not acceptable,' news agencies reported."

Stolen Documents Show US Located Top Tier Al Qaeda Terrorists In Pakistan. ABC World News Tonight (6/22, lead story, 3:45, Ross, 8.78M) reported US documents on a flash drive, stolen from the US Air Force Base in Bagram and sold in the bazaar, "show the US knows or knew the locations of some of the most-wanted terrorists. They are in Pakistan. And the documents name prominent figures, including President Karzai's brother, thought in the military to be of the pay of druglords." The US targeting assessment "produced in January of last year" reflects "US frustration with Pakistan's 'political and military inertia' in going after terror targets. One map shows infiltration routes and locations of four al Qaeda training camps in Pakistan, marked 'AQ' and a location in Pakistan for al Qaeda's number two, Ayman al Zawahiri. In total, the documents list 16 senior-level al Qaeda and Taliban leaders, including Mullah Omar, as hiding in Pakistan, where US troops cannot operate. US officials say the information has been provided to the government of Pakistani President Musharraf. But the tier one targets tonight to operate inside Pakistan." But Osama bin Laden's "name does not appear anywhere in this targeting memorandum. Clearly, they don't have a very good idea where he is."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

UTStarcom Examines Allegations Of Bribery. The AP (6/23) reports, "UTStarcom Inc. reported it is investigating allegations of improper payments to officials in India and Mongolia by people connected to the company." The AP continues, "The Alameda, Calif.-based networking company said it is in contact with the Department of Justice and the Securities and Exchange Commission about the probe. … UTStarcom disclosed that payments may have been made in those countries that violated the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act, a law aimed at curtailing bribery of foreign officials." The AP adds, "The company made the disclosure in its quarterly report on Thursday, and had previously discussed the matter in its annual report filed on June 1. … The Mongolia allegations involve alleged improper payments made by an agent of the company's joint venture in that country. The U.S. Embassy in Mongolia informed the company of the matter in December 2005, and said it had referred the allegations to the SEC and Justice Department, the company said."

SEC Reportedly Probing Big Hedge Fund. The New York Times (6/23, Bogdanich, Morgenson) reports, "One of the nation's most prominent hedge funds, Pequot Capital Management, is under investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission for possible insider trading, according to government officials briefed on the case." The Times continues, "The S.E.C. declined to confirm or deny that it was investigating Pequot, a $7 billion fund overseen by Arthur J. Samberg, 65, a leading money manager and philanthropist. But a lawyer who once led the agency's investigation has told Congress that the fund's trading had repeatedly aroused suspicion among stock exchange officials, prompting them on 18 occasions to refer cases to the S.E.C. for further investigation, records show." The Times adds, "In one instance, Pequot made $18 million by investing in companies that soon after announced a major corporate merger, in July 2001, the lawyer told Congress. … The investigation has not resulted in any charges against Pequot, and the fund has denied any wrongdoing. … At the same time, the S.E.C.'s handling of the Pequot inquiry has itself come under scrutiny by Congress and the Office of Special Counsel, a federal agency that examines whistle-blower complaints. These officials are examining charges by Gary J. Aguirre, the S.E.C. lawyer who ran the Pequot investigation until last summer, that senior S.E.C. officials had backed his inquiry — including the issuance of scores of subpoenas — until he sought the testimony of an influential Wall Street executive."

DOJ_NMG_0036743

SEC Says Scientific-Atlanta Aided Adelphia Fraud. USA Today (6/23, Smith) reports, "Scientific-Atlanta and two executives paid Adelphia Communications $43 million disguised as marketing allowances in 2000 and 2001 to help the cable operator falsely meet Wall Street earnings expectations, the Securities and Exchange Commission said Thursday." USA continues, "In a civil complaint, the SEC accused Scientific-Atlanta, a supplier of digital television set-top boxes, of abetting a larger financial fraud at Adelphia that culminated in the cable operator's June 2002 collapse in bankruptcy court and criminal convictions against three members of the controlling Rigas family. … Scientific-Atlanta, now part of Cisco, settled the SEC complaint by giving up $20 million in profit from its dealings with Adelphia. The executives, former chief financial officer Wallace Haislip, 56, and former controller Julian Eidson, 65, consented to cease-and-desist orders without admitting, or denying, wrongdoing." USA adds, "Cisco spokeswoman Penelope Bruce called the settlement 'reasonable' and said the company is 'pleased that it resolves the SEC's concerns.' Bruce said Scientific-Atlanta appeared also to have satisfied a related Justice Department investigation, though an investor lawsuit remains outstanding. Haislip and Eidson remain employed in non-financial roles."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Cheney Says He May Be Called As A Witness In Libby Trial. Vice President Dick Cheney was asked on CNN's The Situation Room (6/22) about the case against Lewis 'Scooter' Libby. Cheney said, "I am not going to comment on the case. I may be called as a witness. Scooter Libby, obviously, one of the finest men I've ever known, he's entitled to the presumption of innocence. And I have not made any comments on the case up until now, and I won't."

The AP (6/23) reports "Cheney's state of mind is directly relevant to whether Libby lied to FBI agents and a federal grand jury about how Libby learned CIA officer Valerie Plame's identity and what he later told reporters, Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald has said in recently filed court papers." Fitzgerald "has revealed that Cheney was upset because Plame's husband -- former U.S. Ambassador Joseph Wilson -- had accused the Bush administration of manipulating prewar intelligence to exaggerate the Iraqi threat from weapons of mass destruction."

Cheney's Position In White House Said To Be Undiminished. Knight Ridder (6/23, Douglas) reports, "He accidentally shot a hunting buddy. His job-approval rating is abysmal. His former chief of staff was charged with lying to a grand jury. And he remains an unapologetic cheerleader for the unpopular war in Iraq. None of it cramps Vice President Dick Cheney's style." Knight Ridder adds, "Cheney remains Cheney, a quiet, stoic force at the heart of the Bush administration. Despite rumors earlier this year that President Bush might ask him to resign, he still has Bush's ear, and his fingerprints still turn up on all manner of policy decisions, from war and domestic spying to spending 'earmarks' for allies. … Recent White House meetings on Iraq with members of Congress left no doubt where Cheney ranks: right beside the president, sitting silently, listening intently."

Three Guards In Tallahassee Jail Shootout Denied Bail. The New York Times (6/23, Goodnough, 1.19M) reports, Magistrate Judge William C. Sherrill Jr. "ordered Alfred Barnes, Gregory Dixon and Alan Moore held without bail" after their arrest on charges of being part of a prison sex ring, which sparked a shootout in a Tallahassee jail and ended with two fatalities. Robert Davis, a government prosecutor, "said that Mr. Dixon and Mr. Moore tried to evade arrest after the shootings, and that Mr. Dixon ignored a federal agent's order to get out of his car, and that he tried to drive away." Sherrill also "ordered Mr. Barnes held without bail because he 'appeared more substantially involved' in the alleged conspiracy than his co-defendants." The other two guards, "Vincent Johnson and E. Lavon Spence, could go free until trial, but ordered them put under curfew and said they must wear electronic monitoring devices part of the time." Notably, Judge Sherrill "singled out Mr. Johnson, the only guard not accused of having sex with inmates, for praise after the man's lawyer, Robert Morris, said he had triggered an alarm just after the shooting, helped staunch the bleeding of an injured prison lieutenant and provided cover for a federal agent in the line of fire."

The Miami Herald (6/23, Fineout, 323K) elaborates that Johnson "moved an FBI agent away from the gun battle, shielding her until the shooting stopped." While "an FBI shooting-review team arrived Thursday from Washington to sort through the details of the firefight,…the FBI released no new information and did not say when the team would wrap up its work or whether the findings would be made public."

Bureau Of Prisons To Consider Searching Guards. USA Today (6/23, 4A, Johnson, 2.31M) reports, "Carla Wilson, spokeswoman for the federal Bureau of Prisons, "said the incident has encouraged officials to re-examine the security policy for federal prison employees, who have not been subject to the type of screening that visitors face." In

DOJ_NMG_0036744

2002, "the Bureau of Prisons rejected a recommendation by the Justice Department's inspector general that called for searches of prison staff members to help reduce the flow of drugs and other contraband into such facilities." Wilson explained, "We believed that such searches were not necessary and could undermine our staff morale," but added that guards' misconduct "caused us to reconsider this issue." The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (6/23, Kleindienst, Hollis, 249K) adds, "It was not immediately clear how soon policies would change in the federal prison system."

Sexual Abuse Of Female Inmates By Male Guards Called "Chronic." The AP (6/23, Kallestad) reports that the shootout "raised new questions about whether men should be assigned to guard women's facilities" and "put a spotlight on the chronic problem of male guards having sex with inmates at federal, state and local institutions." A 2004 federal Bureau of Justice Statistics study of more than 2,700 correctional facilities for men and women found "charges of sexual misconduct by employees were made in all but one state prison surveyed."

FBI Says Private Data Brokers Probably Are Breaking The Law. The AP (6/23) reports that senior FBI lawyer Elaine N. Lammert, told lawmakers, "There are compelling reasons for the government to believe that" private data brokers' gathering Americans' private telephone records without warrants or subpoenas "violate federal law." He added, "the bureau was still surveying agents around the U.S. but so far has found no 'systemic' use of data brokers by the FBI seeking telephone records or other information without warrants or subpoenas." However, "A federal agent who acknowledged requesting phone records from data brokers without warrants or subpoenas told AP that he learned about such services from FBI investigators, who vouched for their use."

Senate Report On Abramoff Could Be Trouble For Reed, Ney, Norquist. The Wall Street Journal (6/23, Cummings, 2.11M) reports the Senate Indian Affairs Committee report on "the Jack Abramoff influence-peddling scandal suggests further trouble for Ohio Rep. Bob Ney and high-profile Republicans Ralph Reed, the former Christian Coalition leader, and Grover Norquist, the antitax activist." The panel "urged the Senate Finance Committee to continue the probe by investigating the transfer of payments by Indian tribes through multiple charities apparently to hide their original sources." The final report "includes detailed accounts of how money was funneled to Mr. Reed's political-consulting firm through Mr. Norquist's advocacy group, Americans for Tax Reform, and other tax-exempt organizations. The transactions effectively hid the conservative Christian leader's efforts on behalf of the tribes." In exchange "for the use of ATR's accounts, Mr. Norquist took $25,000 from the payment and turned it into a donation to his group, according to the report. Indian tribal officials testified to Senate investigators that they never intended or authorized a donation to the antitax group."

The AP (6/23, Sherman) says the Senate report shows Rep. Ney "told Senate investigators he made no effort to help a client of disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff, despite extensive evidence to the contrary." Ney said "he was not even familiar with the Tigua tribe of El Paso, Texas, which was seeking legislation that would allow it to reopen its shuttered casino, according to the Senate Indian Affairs Committee report." Yet the report "says Ney assured tribal leaders of his support for the legislation on two occasions in 2002, once in person and once via telephone." Another person "under federal investigation who also is mentioned in the report is former deputy Interior Secretary Steven Griles, who has denied giving Abramoff or his clients preferential treatment." The committee "was 'unable to arrive at any definitive conclusions as to the veracity of Griles' testimony,' the report said."

The Washington Post (6/23, A1, Schmidt, 744K) reports on the front page that Ney's "comments to the panel could add to his problems with the Justice Department. Federal prosecutors have secured guilty pleas from Abramoff and three former associates implicating Ney in a string of official acts allegedly performed in exchange for favors such as a golf trip to Scotland and campaign contributions." A spokesman for Ney "said yesterday that in his interview with the Senate committee, the congressman did not initially recognize the name of the tribe." Ney's statements "to the committee have been contradicted by others as well, including his former longtime chief of staff, Neil G. Volz, in admissions he made this year as part of his guilty plea to corruptly seeking to influence Ney on the Tigua issue."

The New York Times (6/23, Shenon, 1.19M) says the Senate report "documented more than $5.3 million in payments to Ralph Reed, the former director of the Christian Coalition and a leading Republican Party strategist, from an influence-peddling operation run by the corrupt lobbyist Jack Abramoff on behalf of Indian tribe casinos." The report "portrayed Mr. Reed, now a candidate for the Republican nomination for lieutenant governor in his home state of Georgia, as a central figure in Mr. Abramoff's lobbying operation, the focus of a criminal investigation by the Justice Department." In a statement "issued through his campaign office in response to the report, Mr. Reed portrayed the report as a vindication. He said that while 'it is now clear with the benefit of hindsight that this is a piece of business I should have declined,' the report 'confirms that I have not been accused of any wrongdoing.'"

Senate Report Details Former Tribe Official's Ties To Abramoff. The AP (6/23, Thomas) reports, "Christopher Petras, the former legislative director for the Saginaw Chippewa Indian Tribe, served as the point man in helping disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff and his colleague land lucrative contracts with the Michigan tribe, a Senate report said Thursday." The AP continues, "The Senate Indian Affairs Committee said in the 373-page report that it's 'concerned about the veracity' of Petras' 2004 testimony to the panel. Petras told senators that he didn't recall many of the details about his communications with Abramoff and his associate Michael Scanlon." The AP adds, "But the committee, led by Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., said its investigation showed Petras helped Abramoff and Scanlon become enmeshed in tribal elections to help maximize their chances of getting hired by new tribal leaders. … 'Serving as Abramoff and Scanlon's primary point of contact with the Tribe, Petras proved to be their key to access to the Saginaw Chippewa,' the report said. … The committee report was entitled 'Gimme Five,' a reference to what Abramoff and Scanlon called their secret fee-splitting arrangement. Through e-mails and testimony, it describes Petras' ties to the men as they reaped millions of dollars from the Mount Pleasant, Mich.-based tribe, operator of one of the biggest Indian casinos in the nation."

DOJ_NMG_0036745

Man Who Fled Marshals At Chicago Courthouse Captured. The AP (6/23, Burghart) reports, "A man whose flight from the federal courthouse caused the building to be locked down for more than three hours Thursday was later arrested near his aunt's home, authorities said." The AP continues, "The U.S. Marshals Service said Larnell Rogers - who fled the building after learning an arrest warrant had been issued for him - was taken into custody by Chicago police about 3 1/2 miles west of the courthouse. He was not carrying a weapon and the arrest was uneventful, said U.S. Marshal Kim Widup." The AP adds, "Officials had closed the courthouse and sealed courtrooms, offices and bathrooms to search for Rogers, who is accused of lying to a federal agent. … Rogers was scheduled to appear at 10:30 a.m. for a status hearing on charges he lied to the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives. When he did not appear, U.S. District Judge Samuel Der-Yeghiayan issued a bench warrant for his arrest, Widup said, adding Rogers showed up after the hearing was over. … No federal marshal was in the courtroom where Rogers was supposed to appear because he was not in their custody, Widup said. But a deputy marshal was in a stairwell when he overheard a man saying 'basically something to the effect of, "We've got to get out of here, the marshals are looking for us,"' Widup said, quoting the deputy marshal."

Aberdeen Proving Grounds Employees Charged With Fraud. The Washington Post (6/23, B2, Rich, 744K) reports, "Three civilian employees at the U.S. Army's Aberdeen Proving Ground conspired with a company's sales representative to defraud the government through a purchasing scam that spanned nearly two years, a federal indictment alleges." They "bought equipment on behalf of the Army at inflated prices, arranging for some of it to be described incorrectly on invoices and delivered directly to their homes." The Army employees -- Douglas Atwell, Gerard Yursis, and Ellis Lonabaugh -- and salesman Wayne Silbersack "appeared yesterday in federal court in Baltimore but did not enter pleas."

Sides Argue Over Jury Instructions In Sorich Trial. The Chicago Tribune (6/23, Bush, Mihalopoulos, 643K) reports, "Prosecutors and defense attorneys negotiated Thursday afternoon on how to instruct jurors on the law in the trial of Mayor Richard Daley's former patronage chief Robert Sorich." Sorich's attorney "filed a 20-page list of proposed instructions and verdict forms," including "a key theory of his defense," that the government had, "at best, proven only a violation by the City of Chicago of the 1983 Shakman Consent Decree, a civil rather than a criminal violation." Prosecutors "sought to instruct jurors that they 'should not speculate' about why they won't be asked to reach a verdict on count one of an eight-count indictment against the defendants," which the judge dismissed.

Prosecutors Deny Vindictiveness, Oppose Wecht Motion To Dismiss. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (6/23, 261K) reports, "Federal prosecutors yesterday said the 84-count indictment against former Allegheny County Coroner Dr. Cyril Wecht is based on violations of federal law and not 'vindictiveness,' as Dr. Wecht's lawyers have asserted" in their motion to dismiss the case. "Assistant U.S. Attorney Stephen Stallings said Dr. Wecht 'has utterly failed to meet his burden of proof of showing any malevolence, ill will, or vindictiveness on the part of the government.'"

Mack A No-Show For Surrendering To Authorities. The San Francisco Chronicle (6/23, Lee) reports that FBI most wanted fugitive Darren Roy Mack "failed to surrender today at an agreed meeting place in Mexico" arranged after he "contacted Washoe County District Attorney Dick Gammick on Monday and offered to surrender." The AP (6/23) adds that the surrender offer "had been the most significant break in an international manhunt for Mack since the attacks on Charla Mack and Judge Chuck Weller." Reno Police Chief Michael Poehlman said "investigators last communicated with Mack on Wednesday, and they believed he was in Mexico based on comments he made and information from the FBI."

DOJ_NMG_0036746

"Mob Cops'" Former Lawyers To Testify Defending Their Representation. The New York Times (6/23, Feuer, 1.19M) reports, "Bruce Cutler and Edward Hayes, two of the city's most flamboyant defense lawyers," have been subpoenaed by Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa, their former clients, "to appear in court and answer charges that they bungled their defense." The "hearing could get ugly," as, "In what has been described by everyone involved as an unprecedented hearing, Mr. Hayes and Mr. Cutler are expected to address that accusation on the witness stand — in their own defense."

The New York Newsday (6/23, Destefano) adds that while "Both defendants want their racketeering convictions overturned and to have new trials, in part because they claim their former lawyers were ineffective," Judge Jack B. Weinstein "in earlier court proceedings…expressed skepticism over the idea of questioning Cutler's and Hayes' conduct as lawyers" and appears to be holding the hearing "in an apparent effort to make a complete record for any appeal."

Former Head Of Boston FBI Testifies He Didn't Know About Bulger, Flemmi Investigations. The Boston Globe (6/23, Murphy, 484K) reports when "the FBI was investigating its own informants -- James 'Whitey' Bulger and Stephen 'The Rifleman' Flemmi -- as suspects in four murders by 1983 and had been told they were involved in cocaine and marijuana trafficking," James Greenleaf , "the head of the FBI's Boston office at the time…testified yesterday that nobody ever told him" about it. He also said "he never reviewed the office's informant files, which were replete with references to the alleged involvement of Bulger and Flemmi in murder, drugs, and other crimes." The Globe calls the testimony "striking because he indicated that no one in the Boston FBI office thought it important to inform the man running the office about serious allegations of criminal activity by the two gangsters." The federal trial judge also "quizzed Greenleaf about whether he had concerns about Bulger and Flemmi after learning that they were being targeted by three other law enforcement agencies." Greenleaf replied, "I don't think I really focused on that."

Columnist Says Greenleaf Was Compelling Witness – For McIntyres. Peter Gelzinis writes in his column in the Boston Herald (6/23, 220K) that James Greenleaf, the special agent in charge of Boston "while the two 'Top Echelon' gangsters were extracting teeth and tongues from doomed people, who were then dropped into holes." Testified "he was clueless about all of it," that "never bothered to read the informant files and no underling bothered to mention what was in them." Gelzinis adds, "This lanky, old federal hack may well turn out to be the most compelling witness the McIntyres could ever have hoped for," and "the crazy thing is" that he "wasn't on the McIntyre family's witness list. The Department of Justice civil liability lawyers dragged him off some golf course to, theoretically, help torpedo this case."

Louisiana Teacher Pleads Guilty To Child Porn Charges. The New Orleans Times-Picayune (6/23, Filosa, 257K) reports that Russell Counterman, a former teacher at Taylor Academy, "pleaded guilty to possession of child pornography this week and faces up to 10 years in prison for downloading hundreds of sexually explicit images from the Internet, including some that FBI agents found in his classroom." In a search of his home and classroom computer that he consented to, the FBI "found three thumb-drives and the laptop."

Virginia Law Requires Checking Of Prospective Students For Sex Offenses. The AP (6/23, Gelineau) reports, "A new law requiring Virginia's colleges to hand over prospective students' personal information to police for cross-checking against sex offender lists is coming under fire from privacy advocates and education leaders." The AP continues, "Under the law, which takes effect July 1, public and private college officials must send state police the names, Social Security identification numbers and birth dates of all students accepted to their schools. … Proponents say the law will help protect students from sex offenders and state police are confident the personal information will be secure. But critics are raising concerns about privacy rights and risks that the data could be misused or stolen. … Privacy law experts believe it is the first time a U.S. state has ever imposed such a requirement." The AP adds, "The new requirement was part of a unanimously approved bill that makes sweeping changes to Virginia's sex offender laws, including tougher punishments and better monitoring of offenders once they are released from prison. Police expect to have guidelines in place for most schools by the fall. … Although the federal Family Educational Rights and Privacy Act protects the personal information of enrolled students, it does not apply to those who have merely been accepted. The law does not bar sex offenders from entering college but provides a way to keep track of them."

Project Safe Neighborhoods Cracks Down On Louisiana Child Porn. The Baton Rouge Advocate (6/23, Burgess) reports, "Federal and state officials announced Thursday a joint initiative to combat child pornography and exploitation, launching the statewide effort with the announcement of 10 arrests." The Advocate continues, "The Justice Department's Project Safe Childhood Initiative aims to marshal forces for a 'much more aggressive attack' on a problem made worse in recent years by the Internet, U.S. Attorney Donald Washington said. ..'There was a time when you could come home and lock your doors … Because of the Internet, the predators can get past the locks and into your home,' said David Dugas, U.S. attorney for the Baton Rouge-based Middle District. … Dugas, Washington and state Attorney General Charles Foti Jr. announced the joint effort." The Advocate adds, "The Project Safe Childhood Initiative mirrors a similar federal project dubbed Project Safe Neighborhoods, which pulled together state and federal agencies to combat gun violence. … Washington said the Safe Childhood program will include law-enforcement components as well as training and outreach programs to educate parents and children on how to identify Internet predators and risky online situations."

DOJ_NMG_0036747

Map Dealer Pleads Guilty To Thefts. The New York Times (6/23, Cowan) reports, "A map dealer who specialized in finding elusive treasures for rich collectors admitted in federal court on Thursday to having stolen 97 antique maps worth more than $3 million from more than a half-dozen universities and libraries over the last seven and a half years." The Times continues, "One of the hardest-hit institutions was the New York Public Library, which lost 32 maps, but rare book collections in Boston, Chicago and London were also victims, according to federal prosecutors." The Times adds, "The admissions by the map dealer, Edward Forbes Smiley III, came roughly one year after he was caught with five rare maps in his briefcase and tweed jacket minutes after leaving Yale University's rare-book library. A video surveillance system showed him removing a map valued at $150,000 from a book. .. The New Haven police arrested Mr. Smiley and charged him with larceny, but federal prosecutors and the Federal Bureau of Investigation launched their own investigation to determine whether Mr. Smiley might also be responsible for missing maps at other institutions. … Mr. Smiley's arrest last June rattled many institutions that had allowed him to visit their collections. But the scope of his pillaging was not fully appreciated until his back-to-back guilty pleas in federal and state court in New Haven on Thursday." The Times notes, "Though he pleaded guilty to one count of theft of a major artwork in federal and three counts of larceny in state court, he admitted in plea agreements with prosecutors to having stolen 97 maps from seven institutions, including the 5 maps he was caught with last June after leaving Yale's Beinecke Library."

Jury Selection Begins In Baltimore Beheadings Case. The Washington Times (6/23, Summers) reports, "Jury selection began yesterday in the retrial of two men accused of beheading three young relatives." The Times continues, "The defendants -- Adan Canela, 19, and Policarpio Espinoza Perez, 24 -- are charged in the May 27, 2004, killings of Ricardo Espinoza Jr., 9; his sister, Lucero Espinoza, 8; and their male cousin, Alexis Espejo Quezada, 10." The Times adds, "Prosecutors say Mr. Perez, the victims' uncle, and Mr. Canela, their cousin, beat the children with an aluminum baseball bat, choked them and slashed their throats with a boning knife in their Northwest Baltimore apartment. … The first trial, which included more than 300 pieces of evidence and five weeks of testimony from about two dozen witnesses, ended in August 2005 in a hung jury after 10 days of deliberations." The Times notes, "The trial attracted so much press attention that Baltimore Circuit Judge David B. Mitchell yesterday expressed concern about intimate details of the case and its evidence tainting potential jurors. … Attorneys in the case said jury selection might take several days and expect the trial to start no earlier than the middle of next week."

Medical Experts Say Lethal Injection Methods Can Be Made More Humane. The New York Times (6/23, Grady, 1.19M) reports a "flood of lawsuits challenging lethal injection as cruel and unusual has stalled executions in some states and may prompt others to abandon them. And a Supreme Court ruling last week made it easier for death-row prisoners to file such suits." But "medical experts say the current method of lethal injection could easily be changed to make suffering less likely. Even the doctor who devised the technique 30 years ago says that if he had it to do over again, he would recommend a different method." Switching to "an injection method with less potential to cause pain could undercut many of the lawsuits. But so far, in this chapter of the nation's long and tangled history with the death penalty, no state has moved to alter its lethal injection protocol."

CIVIL LAW:

Raytheon Reportedly Discussing Settlement Of Contracting Charges. The Bloomberg (6/23, Capaccio, Schmidt) reports, "Raytheon Co.'s aircraft unit is negotiating with the U. S. Justice Department over allegations the company charged too much for parts used to build training planes for the Air Force and Navy, people familiar with the talks said." Bloomberg continues, "The possible civil settlement would address findings of a criminal investigation into the activities of Darleen Druyun, the Air Force's former No. 2 acquisition official, who was jailed in 2005 for violating conflict-of-interest laws. … The Raytheon contract was awarded by Druyun as part of a $ 4. 5 billion program, one of 11 in which she was involved that have been reviewed by the Defense Department's inspector general." Bloomberg adds, "Jim Cross, a spokesman for the U. S. attorney's office in Wichita, Kan., which is handling the settlement talks, declined to comment. Jackie Berger, a spokesman for the Wichitabased aircraft unit of Waltham, Mass.-based Raytheon, confirmed the existence of the Pentagon investigation while also declining to comment on any settlement talks. … Raytheon, the fifth-largest U. S. defense contractor, is 'fully cooperating' with the Pentagon investigation, Berger said. 'We believe the company's actions have been entirely consistent with all legal requirements.'"

DOJ_NMG_0036748

McCain-Feingold Seen As Having Positive Impact. In a Washington Post op-ed (6/23, A25), former FEC Commissioner Trevor Potter says when the McCain-Feingold campaign finance legislation "was being debated four years ago, Sen. Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) told his colleagues that it would 'eviscerate the national party committees' because of its ban on unlimited 'soft money' donations." But in 2004, "the parties raised more funds than ever before. In response, critics explained that it was a presidential election year, and an exceptionally motivating one at that; funds would surely dry up in 2006. Yet numbers recently released by the Federal Election Commission (FEC) show that the $555.2 million raised by both parties so far this cycle is ahead of 2004 totals by 5 percent." The law "has been an undisputed success in combating the corruption of huge soft-money contributions and an apparent success in re-energizing grass-roots supporters." McCain-Feingold "was a necessary -- but not sufficient -- start."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

DOJ Clears Austin, TX, Officer In Fatal 2003 Shooting. The Austin American-Statesman (6/23, Plohetski) reports, "A federal investigation has concluded that Austin police officer Scott Glasgow did not violate Jesse Lee Owens' civil rights when the officer fatally shot Owens during a 2003 traffic stop in East Austin, authorities said Thursday." The A-S continues, "Glasgow will not face federal charges for his actions during the stop, which began when he pulled Owens over for driving a car that had been reported stolen. … The U.S. Department of Justice's civil rights division, the FBI and the U.S. attorney's office said in a written statement that the 'government could not prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the victim's death was the result of more force than was necessary . . . The department is closing this matter.' … The federal inquiry was the last open investigation into Glasgow's actions during the June 14, 2003, incident."

KXAN-TV, Austin, TX (6/23) reports, "The attorney for Jesse Owens' family says he will appeal the decision from the Department of Justice. The higher court will be the 5th Circuit Court of Appeals out of New Orleans. … Attorney Bobby Taylor says he will spend his own money to try and get justice for the Owens family, and that will include an immediate appeal. … On the other side of that coin, the police union says it's satisfied with the vindication of Officer Glasgow, but at the same time acknowledges, this was a tragic incident."

Justices Sets Wider Standards For Worker Discrimination Suits. NBC Nightly News (6/22, story 8, 1:05, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "An important ruling today from the US Supreme Court, one that could potentially affect every American worker, especially women. It came in a case involving a woman forklift operator who said her boss illegally retaliated against her when she complained she was the target of sex discrimination." NBC (P. Williams) added, "The court today clarified what counts as retaliation and said it can be something much more subtle than denying a promotion, cutting pay, or outright firing. … Today's decision said it is illegal discrimination, retaliation, to give employees who complain about discrimination less desirable jobs or to suspend them without pay, even if they eventually get the money back."

The Wall Street Journal (6/23, Bravin, Ben Winograd, 2.11M) reports, "A unanimous Supreme Court sent a warning to employers: Be careful how you treat workers who file discrimination complaints. … Employee advocates said the decision would help ensure that antidiscrimination laws have teeth." The Washington Post (6/23, A16, Lane, 744K) notes the decision "had the full support of eight justices." Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. "agreed with the result but differed from the majority reasoning."

The Financial Times (6/23, Waldmeir) says the court "gave US workers more power in employment discrimination lawsuits, making it easier for employees to fight back if punished by employers for lodging job-bias complaints. … The decision set out new standards for what kind of action, and the severity of that action, qualifies as retaliation under federal civil rights law." The Christian Science Monitor (6/23, Richey, 61K) runs a similar report under the headline "High Court Eases Path For Workers' Discrimination Suits," while USA Today (6/23, Biskupic, 2.31M) titles its story "Court Eases Worker Lawsuits."

The AP (6/23, Locy) reports, "By a 9-0 vote, justices said that Sheila White was improperly punished with a suspension for 37 days over a Christmas holiday and was transferred from operating the forklift to doing more physical work as a yard worker. … Justice Stephen Breyer wrote that White did receive back pay. But he said she and her family had to live 37 days without any income. … 'Many reasonable employees would find a month without a paycheck to be a serious hardship,' Breyer wrote, adding that 'an indefinite suspension without pay could well act as a deterrent, even if the suspended employee eventually received back pay.'" The AP adds, "The high court's ruling tilts the balance of power in employment settings toward employees by establishing a broader legal standard for retaliation claims, an area of litigation that has exploded in recent years. … Under the high court's standard, employers are liable for unlawful retaliation if their actions 'interfere with an employee's efforts' to ensure that he or she is not discriminated against in the workplace, Breyer wrote."

DOJ_NMG_0036749

The Legal Times (6/23, Mauro) reports, "The decision in Burlington Northern & Santa Fe Railway Co. v. White ends disarray among lower courts on the standard required to assess retaliation claims, but employment lawyers say it will trigger a wave of new litigation to determine what kind of employer actions constitute illegal retaliation. … 'This decision is huge -- hugely bad for me as a defense lawyer,' says Daniel Westman, a partner at Morrison & Foerster and the author of a book on retaliation litigation. 'It really makes it a lot easier for employees to make out a case.' … Civil rights groups, for their part, applauded the decision. 'The Burlington Northern opinion is an emphatic statement that employees should be able to raise a good-faith complaint of discrimination without fear of retaliation from their employers,' says Gillian Thomas, lawyer for the women's rights group Legal Momentum."

Pennsylvania Moves Toward Constitutional Amendment Banning Gay Marriage. The AP (6/23) reports, "Lawmakers took another step toward putting a constitutional amendment to ban gay marriage on the ballot in Pennsylvania. … The state Senate approved the proposed amendment 38-12 on Wednesday." The AP continues, "Pennsylvania already has a law defining marriage as between a man and a woman. But Senator Jane Orie and other Republicans warned that without a constitutional amendment, a judge could act on a legal challenge and effectively legalize gay marriage or civil unions. … Opponents questioned the need to guard against a hypothetical challenge. 'Mind your own business, stay out of the bedroom,' said Senator Vincent J. Fumo, a Democrat." The AP adds, "Amending the state constitution requires approval by the House and Senate in successive two-year sessions of the General Assembly and then the approval of voters in a statewide referendum. … Senators must now work out differences with a version passed by the House, which also prohibits civil unions."

House GOP Said To Show True Colors On Voting Rights Act. In his Washington Post column (6/23, A25), Eugene Robinson says, "Wednesday we had one of those rare high-definition moments, when the House Republican caucus defied its leaders and refused to back renewal of the Voting Rights Act. That tells you about all you need to know, doesn't it?" Speaker Dennis Hastert "was ready to move forward with a feel-good, election-year extension of the landmark 1965 act that guaranteed voting rights for African Americans disenfranchised by Jim Crow law and custom in Alabama, Mississippi, Georgia, Louisiana, South Carolina and Virginia." Hastert "understood that reauthorizing the act would be useful in efforts to convince voters that the Republican Party as presently constituted is just ultraconservative, not actually racist. But Hastert was sandbagged by fellow Republicans who rebelled in a private caucus meeting Wednesday. The renewal probably could have won easy approval on the House floor, since Democrats would have voted for it, but Hastert's policy is to not bring out any bill that lacks majority support from Republicans, so he had no choice but to yank it. So much for the erstwhile 'party of Lincoln.'"

WNBA Player Decries Education Department Change In Title IX Policy. In a USA Today op-ed (6/23), Tamika Catchings of the Indiana Fever in the WNBA says, "Largely as a result of Title IX, women's participation in athletics has increased more than 400% at the college level and more than 800% in high schools since 1972." But "this march forward has reached a potential roadblock. About 15 months ago, the Department of Education quietly issued a new Title IX policy that lowers the bar for what schools must do to provide equal sports opportunities for women. Schools now can show compliance with the law simply by sending all female students an e-mail survey gauging their athletic interests. Schools can claim that any failure to respond indicates a lack of interest in additional opportunities." The Education Department "should reverse this policy. Preserving Title IX is simply the right thing to do."

ANTITRUST:

DOJ Approves Exelon's Acquisition Of PSEG. The AP (6/23) reports, "The U.S. Department of Justice on Thursday approved a deal to create the nation's largest power generation company, but it ordered Exelon Corp. and Public Service Enterprise Group to first divest six electricity generating plants." The AP continues, "The department said more competition was needed because the merger, as originally proposed, would have sparked higher prices for wholesale electricity and, ultimately, hiked rates for millions of customers in the mid-Atlantic region. … The deal, which was announced in 2004, still requires approval from New Jersey regulators. The final decision on whether to continue with the merger will rest with the boards of both Exelon and PSEG after the terms and conditions of regulatory requirements are known."

The Wall Street Journal (6/23, Smith) reports, "The federal antitrust enforcers didn't order nuclear-plant divestitures, a move that might have caused Exelon to abandon the stock-swap transaction. Exelon faces one more hurdle: regulatory approval from the state of New Jersey. Exelon Chief Executive John Rowe said he hopes the agreement with the Justice Department creates 'positive momentum' that will lead to resolution with the state." The Journal adds, "The demand by the Justice Department shows that antitrust regulators are willing to order significant divestitures to prevent the formation of giant utility companies that could push up electricity prices in deregulated markets. In its findings, the agency said the transaction 'as originally proposed, would have caused higher prices for...millions of electricity consumers in the mid-Atlantic region.' … Some consumer advocates said the Justice Department didn't go far enough. To nip unfair market power and improve market function, Exelon should be ordered to divest 6,300 megawatts to 9,600 megawatts, said the New Jersey Public Interest Research Group. That would amount to a significant portion of a portfolio starting at about 43,000 megawatts, before any divestitures."

DOJ_NMG_0036750

The Chicago Tribune (6/23, Miller) reports, "The Chicago-based utility holding company's accord with the Justice Department will reduce the economic value Exelon reaps from the planned purchase through a one-time hit of $500 million to $600 million, most of it tax-related. … But it also leaves Commonwealth Edison's parent with just one regulatory hurdle left to clear: The deal, first announced in December 2004, still needs approval of New Jersey's Board of Public Utilities. The merger has met with vocal opposition from some citizen groups, however." The Tribune adds, "Through its antitrust division, the Justice Department evaluates proposed mergers to ensure that the combination of two industry rivals won't damage competition by creating a company with excessive 'market power.' … The transaction as originally proposed 'would have caused higher prices for wholesale electricity, ultimately increasing prices paid by millions of electricity consumers in the mid-Atlantic region,' the department noted Thursday. … That's because, it said, with Exelon's existing Pennsylvania properties, the combined company would have owned nearly half the generating capacity in the densely populated area of eastern Pennsylvania, New Jersey, the District of Columbia, and parts of Maryland and Virginia."

The Newark Star-Ledger (NJ) (6/23, Ovide) reports, "Analysts said the green light from the Justice Department was crucial to finalize a deal Exelon and Public Service announced with fanfare 18 months ago, but which since has been delayed by regulatory concerns and scorned by some skeptical investors. … With the government agreement, the proposed merger faces one final regulatory hurdle -- approval by the New Jersey Board of Public Utilities."

MarketWatch (6/23, Cassidy) reports, "The merged company would serve 7.2 million electric customers in a patchwork of service territories in Illinois, Pennsylvania and New Jersey. It will also serve just more than 2 million natural-gas customers, primarily in New Jersey and Pennsylvania. … But the DOJ antitrust division said that the companies would own nearly half of the electricity generating capacity in the densely populated area encompassing eastern Pennsylvania, New Jersey and the District of Columbia, as well as parts of Maryland and Virginia. … 'The combination of their assets would enhance the incentive and ability of the merged firm to raise wholesale electric prices,' the government added."

Bloomberg (6/23, Seeley, Polson) reports that FERC "approved the acquisition a year ago on the conditions that Exelon sells plants with a capacity of 4,000 megawatts," and "sell 2,600 megawatts of nuclear-plant output to competitors under long-term contracts."

US, UK Antitrust Agencies Probing Alleged Airline Price-Fixing. The New York Times (6/23, Timmons) reports, "British and United States agencies are investigating a possible conspiracy to illegally fix the amounts of fuel surcharges imposed on passengers on long-distance flights to and from Britain." The Times continues, "Most major airlines flying between the United States and Heathrow, London's main international airport, charge passengers about £35 ($64) each way in fuel surcharges. … The Justice Department and the Office of Fair Trade in Britain have contacted British Airways, Virgin Atlantic Airways, United Airlines and American Airlines and may be talking to others in connection with the investigation. Violation of price-fixing laws could carry civil and criminal penalties."

The Dallas Morning News (6/23, Maxon) reports, "The extent of the investigation remained a mystery. … No other airline stepped forward to say it also faced accusations, although several others disclosed that they've been contacted by investigators." The News adds, "American Airlines Inc., British Airways' partner across the Atlantic and in the Oneworld airline alliance, said it received a federal grand jury subpoena Tuesday as part of a U.S. Department of Justice investigation. … The Times of London quoted analysts as saying that the investigators seem to be looking into airlines that fly into London's Heathrow Airport, particularly on the lucrative New York-London route."

Bloomberg (6/23, Fletcher) reports, "With oil prices near record highs, airlines have been able to cover 15 percent to 20 percent of their additional costs with supplemental charges, according to the International Air Transport Association. … British Airways' non-fare revenue, which includes fuel surcharges, increased 65 percent in the fourth quarter to 340 million pounds, the airline said on May 19. British Airways in April raised the fuel surcharge on long-haul flights by 17 percent to 35 pounds. The cost of a one-way business class ticket to New York from London Heathrow on July 6 is 2,563.50 pounds including taxes, according to the airline's Web site." Bloomberg adds, "The U.S. Justice Department 'is investigating the possibility of anticompetitive practices involving surcharges and rates for passenger fares and air cargo shipments,' agency spokeswoman Gina Talamona said in a statement."

DOJ_NMG_0036751

The AP (6/23, Wagner) reports, "Two BA executives -- commercial director Martin George and head of communications Iain Burns -- have been given leaves of absence. BA declined to provide any information beyond its brief statement, including whether George and Burns were asked to leave or ordered out." The AP adds, "High fuel prices have led airlines to raise the surcharge that passengers pay on long-haul flights. For instance, BA customers now pay a 70 pound ($129) surcharge on a round-trip ticket from London to New York, the airline said."

United Press International (6/23) also reports on the probe.

EU Has Received No Complaint By Adobe About Microsoft Office. The AP (6/23) reports, "The European Commission said Thursday that software company Adobe Systems Inc. has not made any complaints so far about Microsoft Corp.'s plans to ship its new Office software without Adobe's PDF file reader." The AP continues, "In an ongoing dispute with Adobe, Microsoft said earlier this month that it had canceled plans to include an automatic way to save documents in the popular Portable Document Format in Office 2007, due out to consumers in January. Instead, users will have to download separate, free software to save documents created in Office products such as Word and Excel as PDFs." The AP adds, "European Union spokesman Jonathan Todd said EU antitrust regulators were in contact with Microsoft to discuss concerns about how the new Windows Vista operating system will treat PDF-type documents, but had not received a complaint about Office from Adobe. … The spat with Adobe, which developed the popular PDF technology, comes as Microsoft prepares to launch its own competing format for saving documents that cannot be easily modified."

SCOTUS Dismisses Closely Watched Patent Case. The Legal Times (6/23, Mauro) reports, "The Supreme Court on Thursday dismissed from its docket a closely watched patent case, saving for another day a decision on whether a naturally occurring scientific relationship can be patented." The Times continues, "The Court's surprise action came in Laboratory Corp. v. Metabolite Laboratories, a dispute over the patentability of a correlation between blood composition and a vitamin deficiency. The dismissal came without explanation. But an unusual dissent by Justice Stephen Breyer hinted that the high court had dismissed the case because the patentability issue was not squarely raised before the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit, which ruled on the case in 2004." The Times adds, "Breyer, joined by Justices John Paul Stevens and David Souter, said he would have ruled on the case anyway, in part because physicians could become unwitting patent infringers whenever they make the same connection between the presence of a certain amino acid in a patient's blood and vitamin B deficiency that was included in Metabolite's patent. … A decision in the case could have had an effect on not only medical or scientific developments but also certain 'business method' patents that have been challenged as unpatentable. … But with the Court ending the case as it did, 'it became a nonevent,' says Michael Barclay, a patent specialist at Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati. Even though the net result of the high court's action is to let the federal circuit ruling stand, he says, that circuit ruling has no broad importance because the Supreme Court believes the patentability issue went undecided."

Bolloré Will Not Pursue Merger With Aegis. The Wall Street Journal (6/23, Patrick) reports, "Vincent Bolloré, the French corporate raider who is also chairman of French advertising concern Havas, said yesterday that he wants rival Aegis to remain independent, rebutting months of talk in the ad world about a possible merger of the two companies. … However, Mr. Bolloré, who in recent months has become Aegis's biggest shareholder, outlined his plans to seek 'links' between Havas and Aegis in one of the hottest areas in advertising: media buying and planning." The Journal continues, "Media buyers and planners purchase TV, newspaper and other advertising space and work out where to best place ads on behalf of marketers. The rapid growth of the Internet, computer games and other entertainment has made it harder for advertisers to reach consumers. And the services of media buyers and planners are in greater demand. … But Havas lacks the international scale that clients are increasingly demanding. By linking with London-based Aegis on specific accounts or in particular regions, for example, Havas could offer clients a broader menu."

Mittal May Boost Bid For Arcelor. The Wall Street Journal (6/23, Glader, Singer) reports, "Mittal Steel Co. is in advanced talks with rival steelmaker Arcelor SA about improving its €23.93 billion ($30.1 billion) hostile takeover bid to forge a friendly deal, according to people close to the matter." The Journal continues, "Mittal is considering increasing its bid for a second time, either with more cash, more stock or both, these people said. Under terms being discussed, Arcelor shareholders could end up with more than half of the combined company's shares, control much of a newly formed board of nonexecutive directors, and even keep current Arcelor Chief Executive Officer Guy Dollé in the same role, they said." The Journal adds, "Talks are continuing and terms could change, these people said. The parties are locked in tense negotiations in advance of Sunday's meeting of Arcelor's board, when it will consider any new proposals by Mittal Steel as well as an updated merger proposal by Russian steelmaker OAO Severstal. … The new proposal from London-based billionaire Lakshmi Mittal, chairman and CEO of Mittal, would likely value Arcelor above €40 a share, these people said. Mittal's current cash and stock offer values Arcelor at €36.04 a share. In Paris, Arcelor's shares stood at €35.02 before trading was suspended pending resolution of the matter. Mittal's shares ended trading in Amsterdam yesterday at €25.99, down four European cents."

DOJ_NMG_0036752

Univision Auction Draws Little Interest. The Wall Street Journal (6/23, Marr, Berman, Lyons) reports, "The high-profile auction of Univision Communications Inc. descended into turmoil yesterday, raising questions about the appeal of a Spanish-language media business that in recent years has been coveted for its ability to reach the growing ranks of Hispanic consumers in the U.S." The Journal continues, "With the dominant Spanish-language TV network in the U.S. and a collection of other assets, Univision was expected to be an unusually attractive media property. But as a deadline for bids came and went this week, it became apparent that there were few interested parties -- especially at the price Univision wanted." The Journal adds, "Univision's chairman, Hollywood veteran A. Jerrold Perenchio, may yet sell -- if he can coax a somewhat higher price out of the private-equity investors circling the company. One group, led by Mexican TV giant Grupo Televisa SA, was scrambling to present a bid last night after its original coalition fell apart. Some partners in that group, which initially included Kohlberg Kravis Roberts, Blackstone Group and Carlyle Group, have been smarting about the price they had to pay as well as the power-sharing arrangement with Televisa. U.S. law prohibits a foreign company from owning more than 25% of a U.S. broadcaster."

WSJournal Criticizes FCC Extension Of Universal Service Fund To Internet. The Wall Street Journal (6/23, 2.11M) says in an editorial that the Federal Communications Commission has "voted to require Internet telephone companies to contribute to the Universal Service Fund (USF). The move means higher phone bills for Internet telephone service as providers pass this new cost on to customers. But it also means that a Republican-run regulatory agency is expanding a federal subsidy that should have been phased out long ago." The USF "has become a tool for redistributing wealth from urban phone customers to their rural counterparts, says Randolph May, a former FCC lawyer who now heads the Free State Foundation think tank."

LATimes Criticizes Move To Regulate Internet Based On Network Neutrality. The Los Angeles Times (6/23, 958K) says in an editorial, "The debate over regulating high-speed Internet providers has unleashed a rare apocalyptic synchronicity. Both sides make the same dire warning: The future of the Internet is at stake. And both respond in the wrong way." At issue "is whether broadband providers will be able to offer websites and services a faster route into their customers' homes and offices. Some want to prioritize traffic on the last mile for a fee. This way, they say, Web-based companies can ensure the quality of the movies, music and other services they deliver online. It also would help broadband providers raise the money they say they need to keep up with the growing demand for space on their networks." This "kind of prioritizing scares some high-tech firms and advocacy groups, which worry about phone and cable companies picking winners and losers online. Such interference, they say, would stifle innovation by making it harder for start-ups and interest groups to compete with well-funded media powerhouses. They want Congress to preserve 'network neutrality' by banning network operators from prioritizing data in a discriminatory way." But "the best protection for websites and Internet users is to have more broadband providers competing with the phone and cable companies." The Internet is "a hotbed of innovation largely because there are no barriers to entry on the last mile. Broadband providers should be free to experiment as they add capacity, but not at the expense of the Internet access they deliver to customers today."

ENVIRONMENT:

US Charges Puerto Rico Utility With Environmental Crimes. AFP (6/23) reports, "The US government has indicted a Puerto Rico utility company for 'environmental crimes', and sealed a deal with the utility which will see it pay a record nine million dollar fine for partly polluting US waters." AFP continues, "The US Justice Department and the US Environmental Protection Agency said in a joint statement that the Puerto Rico Aqueduct and Sewer Authority (PRASA) has agreed to plead guilty to the indictment relating to Clean Water Act violations. … The criminal fine of nine million dollars is the largest ever paid by a utility for violating the act." AFP adds, "The indictment from the administration of President George W. Bush against the US island territory in the Caribbean follows the discharge of 'millions of gallons of inadequately treated sewage and raw sewage through illegal discharges,' the statement said. … The Bush administration has been fiercely criticized by environmental groups for rolling-back environmental protections and failing to penalize polluters."

California Supreme Court Denies Review Of Lead Paint Case. The California Recorder (6/23, McKee) reports, "After years of litigation, eight major paint manufacturers may be on the verge of having to get the lead out -- of countless public and private buildings around California, that is." The Recorder continues, "The California Supreme Court on Wednesday refused to review a ruling that OK'd a suit seeking to force manufacturers, such as Atlantic Richfield Co. and Sherwin-Williams Co., to cover the costs of abating lead paint inside and outside all types of structures." The Recorder adds, "The original suit was filed by 12 Bay Area counties, cities and public agencies -- including San Francisco, Oakland and Santa Clara County -- intent on forcing paint makers to fund cleanup costs that plaintiffs lawyer Bruce Simon, a partner in Burlingame, Calif.'s Cotchett, Pitre, Simon & McCarthy, estimated at "potentially billions of dollars." … 'You just have to imagine how many hospitals, schools and public buildings were built prior to 1978,' he said. That was the year the federal government banned lead paint for residential use. … The government entities sued the paint manufacturers on behalf of the public in March 2000, long after the industry had pulled lead paint from the market, but only two years after scientific studies showed that even low-level exposure could cause serious physical harm."

DOJ_NMG_0036753

Senate Adds $4 Billion In Emergency Aid For Farmers. The AP (6/23, Quaid) reports the Senate Agriculture Committee Thursday "revived a $4 billion aid measure for farmers struggling with high fuel prices and drought, despite opposition from President Bush and the House." Earlier this month, negotiators "dumped" the farm disaster aid from a spending bill for the war in Iraq and hurricane relief. The White House "disliked the farm aid because it raised the bill's price," the AP says. Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns contended the money "would not give energy relief to every farmer."

CQ (6/23, Richert) says the committee approved nearly $4.2 billion, including $18.2 billion in discretionary spending, for the Agriculture Department and Food and Drug Administration. Agriculture Appropriations Subcommittee Chairman Robert Bennett (R-UT) warned that the funding "would likely be cut again." Also, in a move CQ says "threatens to draw a veto threat from the Bush administration," the committee adopted an amendment that would license farmers to travel to Cuba to sell their products.

National Research Council Says Earth Warmest Since 1600. The CBS Evening News (6/22, lead story, 3:00, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "Well, it is getting hot here on Earth. How hot? Well, maybe hotter than it has been in 2,000 years and it is our fault, humans, that is. That in layman's language is the conclusion of a panel of prestigious scientists working for the National Academy of Science that was released today and it could spell serious trouble for the future." CBS (Whitaker) added, "Scientists with the National Research Council concluded with a high degree of confidence that the rise in temperatures the last few decades of the 20th century was unprecedented, adding to the general science of the consensus that much of the temperature up tick is due to human activity." The debate "over global warming is as much political as scientific. The Bush Administration insists the threat is not grave enough to warrant stringent pollution controls and risk American jobs. But Republican Congressman Sherwood Boehlert, who called for the national research council report, says it should put the debate to rest." Rep. Sherwood Boehlert, Chairman, Science Committee, New York: "I welcome the conclusions because nothing in the report raised any doubts about the broad scientific consensus on global climate change."

NBC Nightly News (6/22, lead story, Bazell, 9.87M) reported, "Congress asked the nation's top science body to study the issue after a widely publicized 1998 study concluding the 90s were the hottest decade in a thousand years. The Academy decided the thousand-year comparison may be true, but it said since 1600, the data are absolutely reliable. The evidence – it includes historical records of weather observations, the buildup of coral and reefs which indicates ocean warming, soil and ice samples from cores drilled deep into the Earth, tree ring growth, the wider the ring, the warmer the year, and the size of glaciers; as for the cause of the warming, Dr. Kurt Cuffey of the University of California." Dr. Cuffey: "This information is certainly consistent with the prevailing view that climate is warming due to human influences and will continue to do so in the future."

ABC World News Tonight (6/22, story 8, :25, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Congress got a weather report today that caught our attention. It was told the earth's temperature is warmer than it's been in 400 years, possibly the last 2,000 years."

The Washington Post (6/23, A3, Eilperin, 744K) reports the National Academy of Sciences report "on the 'hockey stick graph' -- a much-discussed chart showing a sudden rise in temperatures in the Northern Hemisphere since the Industrial Revolution began -- voiced less confidence about the graph's conclusion that the climate is hotter now than it has been in 1,000 years. As a result, the academy report is not likely to resolve the fierce debate over the extent to which human-generated greenhouse gas emissions are responsible for warming the earth."

The Los Angeles Times (6/23, Maugh, Kaplan, 958K) reports, "Coupled with a report last month from the Bush administration's Climate Change Science Program that found 'clear evidence of human influences on the climate system,' the new study from the council, part of the National Academy of Sciences, signals a growing acceptance in Washington of widely held scientific views on the causes of global warming."

Friedman Says Global Warming Hurts Developing Countries Most. In his New York Times column (6/23),

DOJ_NMG_0036754

Thomas Friedman says, "For many Americans, combating climate change is at best a cause for green do-gooders and at worse something to be debated. But in a developing country like Peru, where many people live on the land and close to the edge, climate change is neither a hobby nor a question for debate." Peru's "plant and animal species are also being affected. The Andes region is one of the world's most mega-diverse hot spots, home to unique plant and animal species. Its rain forests, mountains and varied terrain create microclimates that provide habitats for endemic species, which have evolved in isolation from one another. As climate change shifts the boundaries between these zones, species found nowhere else in the world are threatened and disappearing."

Increasing US Reliance On Coal Seen As Unwise. In a New York Times op-ed (6/23), author Jeff Goodell says According to a recent report by the National Coal Council, an advisory board to the Department of Energy that is dominated by coal executives, if America invested $211 billion in coal-to-liquids refineries over the next 20 years, we could make 2.6 million barrels of diesel per day, enhancing the American oil supply by 10 percent. A number of coal-to-liquids plants are on the drawing boards in the United States, and China is eagerly pursuing this technology too." But "let's consider the wisdom of substituting one fossil fuel for another. We already burn a billion tons of coal a year — it generates more than half the electricity in the United States. But thanks in part to ever bigger, more powerful equipment, mining is destroying vast swaths of Appalachia while providing fewer well-paying jobs."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Technical Mistake Reveals Conte As Reporter's Source In BALCO Probe. The San Francisco Chronicle (6/23, Egelko, Writer) reports, "Federal prosecutors say Victor Conte, founder of the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative, gave a Chronicle reporter information about the proceedings of a grand jury that was investigating BALCO for supplying performance-enhancing drugs to star athletes." The Chronicle continues, "The government's assertions, contained in portions of a federal court filing on Wednesday that were meant to be sealed from public view, stop short of accusing Conte of being the source of grand jury transcripts of testimony by Barry Bonds and other athletes reported in Chronicle articles and in a book by two Chronicle reporters." The Chronicle adds, "The government has subpoenaed the reporters, Mark Fainaru-Wada and Lance Williams, and The Chronicle to identify their source of the transcripts, which had been sealed by a federal judge's protective order. … Prosecutors cite numerous e-mail exchanges about grand jury testimony between Conte and Fainaru-Wada, including a purported offer by Conte to turn over a CD containing the testimony."

The New York Times (6/23, Liptak) reports, "About eight pages of a 51-page government brief filed in federal court in San Francisco on Wednesday were electronically blacked out to protect what prosecutors said was sensitive material concerning a grand jury's investigation into steroid use in baseball. … But the secret passages can be viewed by simply pasting the document into a word processing program. The passages open a window onto a particularly aggressive government leak investigation, one that seeks to force two San Francisco Chronicle reporters to reveal the identity of a confidential source. They also help explain why prosecutors are pursuing the matter so vigorously." The Times adds, "Phil Bronstein, the editor of The Chronicle, said the government might have taken more care to protect the blacked-out passages in light of the nature of its investigation. 'It's a little surprising and ironic in this case in particular,' Mr. Bronstein said, 'that this information which the government filed is somehow available to the public.' … Eve Burton, vice president and general counsel of the Hearst Corporation, which owns The Chronicle, said that prosecutors may be guilty of the very thing they are investigating. 'It is our hope,' she said, 'that the government did not leak the document.'"

The New York Sun (6/23, Gerstein) reports, "Those portions detail e-mail correspondence between Mr. Fainaru-Wada and the founder of a drug lab implicated in the probe, Victor Conte Jr. According to the filing, Conte broached the possibility of giving the reporter a CD containing grand jury transcripts, but added 'Just Kidding.' Mr. Fainaru-Wada pursued the possibility and suggested moving the conversation to a 'pay phone or cell or even meeting that would provide more comfort.' Three days after that exchange in June 2004, the Chronicle published a story detailing testimony about steroid use by a sprinter, Tim Montgomery."

Defendants In Heroin, Fentanyl Case Face Conspiracy Charges. The Chicago Tribune (6/23, Coen) reports two dozen people "charged in this week's takedown of the Mickey Cobras street gang appeared at the Dirksen U.S. Courthouse on Thursday for a reading of the drug conspiracy charges filed against them. Federal prosecutors have charged 47 members and associates of the gang in a sweeping complaint that accuses the Mickey Cobras of selling heroin and fentanyl at the Dearborn Homes housing project. … Christopher Hoyt, special agent with the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, said 32 of the 47 charged in the complaint were in custody Thursday."

The AP (6/23) reports a Chicago police officer "swept up in the crackdown on the Mickey Cobras' street gang appeared in federal court Thursday and arranged to post

DOJ_NMG_0036755

$10,000 bond. Tashika Sledge, 29, was among 47 people charged Wednesday with conspiracy to possess and distribute heroin and other drugs. Federal prosecutors contend the officer had a personal relationship with a top gang leader and fed him information about police activity."

UPI (6/22) reports a Chicago policewoman "is among 47 people arrested in a major gang-operated heroin distribution ring run out of a Chicago public housing complex. … The 213-page federal complaint alleges… Tashika Sledge helped the gang leaders by giving access to the police database to determine which members were under surveillance, and enabling them to check vehicle license plates to determine who was following them."

The Detroit News (6/22) reports that in Detroit, DEA spokeswoman Carolyn Gibson "said officials believe the tainted heroin sold in Detroit is linked with the Chicago heroin. Still, 'I cannot confirm at this time that that particular gang is connected,' Gibson said."

Accused Drug Dealer Said To Be Career Criminal. The Detroit News (6/22) reports, "A drug dealer accused of running a dope house where a 17-year-old Birmingham high school student overdosed was a career criminal and a fugitive on numerous parole violations that could have sent him to prison years ago, records show. A toxicology report completed Wednesday confirmed that Lauren Jolly of Bloomfield Township died last month from a lethal dose of fentanyl, a painkiller that has been mixed with heroin and is believed to have killed at least 79 people in Metro Detroit. Donald Edwin Cunningham, 26, with whom Jolly spent the last hours of her life at the house on Keating Street, according to police, violated terms of his parole at least nine times since he was sent to prison in April 2001."

Local TV Coverage. WFLD-TV, Chicago (6/22, 7:00 a.m.) reported, "Federal authorities say more arrests could be coming in connection with yesterday's sweeping gang crackdown. Drug agents swarmed the Dearborn Homes arresting several people they say were dealing drugs for the gang, the Mickey Cobras. The drugs include cocaine, marijuana, heroin laced with fentanyl and among those arrested was a Chicago police officer. Tashiqua Sledge was accused of feeding information to her boyfriend who is an alleged gang member. Police say they have been watching Sledge for months."

WGN-TV, Chicago (6/22, 8:00 a.m.) reported, "Chicago police and federal agents have shut down a major operation that sold killer drugs. Authorities staged a morning raid at the Dearborn Homes complex and charged 47 people in a conspiracy to market heroin laced with the painkiller fentanyl. Most of the suspects belong to the Mickey Cobras gang."

WBBM-TV, Chicago (6/22, 5:00 a.m.) reported, "Officials call it a significant victory in the war on drugs. Federal agents arrested nearly four dozen gang members who sold several types of drugs, the Mickey Cobras ran their operation out of the Dearborn Homes and eventually sold crack cocaine, marijuana, heroin and the potentially lethal prescription pain killer fentanyl."

New Orleans Police Promise "Massive Presence" Amidst Drug Turf War. The New Orleans Times-Picayune (6/23, Varney, 257K) reports that New Orleans Police Department said that, "augmented by the arrival of National Guard and State Police reinforcements," it "will begin deploying a 'massive physical presence' in Central City, Algiers and parts of Uptown," even as Federal law enforcement officials "vowed Thursday to bring federal cases whenever possible against suspects charged with violent offenses, yanking them out of a crippled state criminal justice system struggling to cope with a surge in crime and arrests." According to a recent FBI intelligence dossier, the "resurgence of crime in the city" is due to "a turf war among rival gangs that controlled the narcotics trade before Hurricane Katrina and have moved back into the city." Jim Bernazzani, special agent in charge of the FBI's New Orleans field office, said the report "shows that nine family or neighborhood-based drug organizations have returned to New Orleans and most have taken up residence in and around Central City."

FBI Announces Arrest Of Drug Ring Members. The Philadelphia Inquirer (6/23, Mason, 423K) reports that the FBI said "A drug task force has arrested three people suspected of distributing a deadly combination of heroin and a powerful painkiller." Louis "Bardo" Morales, Osvaldo "Valdi" Seda and Adam J. "Kekito" Torres-Ojeda were held after "the task force seized what agents called 'a large quantity' of heroin in predawn raids" at Morales' and at Torres-Ojeda's homes. "Jerri Williams, an FBI spokeswoman, said the drugs are being tested for fentanyl, a powerful painkiller that increases the odds of taking an overdose," but "declined to provide details of the arrests or seizures until the warrants are unsealed." Still, Chester narcotics Sgt. Joseph Bail said "the Morales organization is believed to be 'a major heroin distribution ring in the city.'"

Drug Suspect Arrested Nine Months After Faking His Death. The AP (6/23) reports that nine months after Kevin Klarell Washington faked this own death, "federal authorities found the 32-year-old Savannah man alive in Orlando, Fla., and arrested him on charges of distributing crack cocaine stemming from an investigation before Washington vanished." Authorities "had gotten a big break in March, when Washington's wife renewed his Georgia driver's license," but William Kirkconnell, the FBI's supervisory senior special agent in Savannah, notes, "'Based on the timing of his alleged drowning, law enforcement was skeptical at best' of his death."

DOJ_NMG_0036756

In Florida, Defense Attorneys Seek Dismissal Of Drug Cartel Case. The St. Petersburg Times (6/22) reports arguments were scheduled to conclude yesterday in a hearing regarding Joaquin Valencia-Trujillo, a Colombian businessman "described by federal prosecutors as a kingpin in the Cali drug cartel. Valencia-Trujillo's attorneys asked U.S. Magistrate Judge Elizabeth A. Jenkins to take the dramatic step of dismissing the case against their client. They say the government's actions, which include detaining a defense investigator as he returned from Colombia and seizing his records, have irreparably harmed Valencia-Trujillo's ability to receive a fair trial."

Texas Woman Gets Life Sentence In Drug Conspiracy Case. The Houston Chronicle (6/23, Rendon) reports a Texas City woman "convicted of conspiracy to distribute crack is headed to federal prison for life without parole, the mandatory sentence after prosecutors presented evidence of prior drug convictions. Carol Denise Richardson, 38, was convicted of conspiracy and several other federal drug charges in March. U.S. District Judge Keith P. Ellison sentenced her June 16. … Prosecutors sought a sentencing enhancement based upon Richardson's prior drug convictions, which raised the mandatory minimum sentence to life without parole."

IMMIGRATION:

High Court Decision Clears Way For Summary Deportations. The Washington Times (6/23, Seper, 90K) reports, "The Supreme Court yesterday upheld the deportation of an illegal alien who lived here for more than 20 years, started a business, married a US citizen and fathered a child -- delivering what immigration specialists said was a setback to other longtime illegal residents who might seek legal status." The Washington Post (6/23, A16, Lane, 744K) says that by a vote of 8 to 1, "the court ruled that the US government properly sent Utah truck driver Humberto Fernandez-Vargas back to Mexico in 2004 because he returned to the US illegally in 1982 after having been previously deported."

The Christian Science Monitor (6/23, Richey, 61K) reports, "Under the 1996 Illegal Immigration Reform and Immigrant Responsibility Act, anyone who sneaks back into the US after being deported is barred from applying to become a legal resident. The law says the old deportation order must be immediately reinstated and carried out, again. In his lone dissent, Justice John Paul Stevens says the law does not apply to those who entered the US prior to its passage - and creates an improper retroactive effect upon illegal immigrants." The ruling "will make it easier for immigration officials to enforce the law. But such enforcement will also jeopardize extensive family, work, and community ties forged by large numbers of illegal immigrants who have led productive lives in the US for decades."

The AP (6/23) reports, "By an 8-1 vote, justices said that Humberto Fernandez-Vargas, who was deported several times from the 1970s to 1981, is subject to a 1996 law Congress passed to streamline the legal process for expelling aliens who have been deported at least once before and returned. … After his last deportation in 1981, Fernandez-Vargas returned to the United States, fathered a child, started a trucking company in Utah and eventually married his longtime companion, a U.S. citizen. … But by the time he applied for legal status - after his marriage in 2001 - Congress had passed the Illegal Immigration and Immigrant Responsibility Act, which revoked the right to appeal to an immigration judge an order of removal."

The Houston Chronicle (6/23, Reinert) reports, "Making it more difficult for longtime illegal immigrants to remain in the United States, the U.S. Supreme Court on Thursday upheld the deportation of a Mexican national who lived in the United States for 20 years and is married to a U.S. citizen." The Chronicle continues, "Of the nine justices, only John Paul Stevens sided with Humberto Fernandez-Vargas, who has been trying to return to his wife and child in Utah since being deported in 2004." The Chronicle adds, "Lawyers for Fernandez-Vargas had argued that the federal Illegal Immigration and Immigrant Responsibility Act — which Congress passed in 1996 to speed up the removal of those who illegally re-enter the country after being deported at least once — did not apply to him because he had last re-entered 15 years before the law took effect. … Stevens said Fernandez-Vargas, who is in his 50s, rightly complained that the U.S. government 'changed the rules midgame.' Under previous law, the justice said, the best chance of eventually becoming a legal resident or U.S. citizen was to do exactly what Fernandez-Vargas did: Remain in the country at least seven years, start a business, stay out of trouble and build a U.S. family. … Stevens said the new law had an 'undeniably harsh retroactive effect' that Congress did not intend."

House GOP Leaders Deny They Plan To Thwart Immigration Bill. The Chicago Tribune (6/23, James, 643K) reports House GOP leaders, "stung by charges in recent days that they were trying to thwart congressional efforts at immigration reform," said yesterday "they still hoped to get a bill to President Bush this year." They "pointed the finger at the Republican-controlled Senate for delays in Congress's further consideration of immigration legislation, claiming that the Senate hadn't followed the proper legislative procedures that would allow the House to act." But the House leaders "also made clear that their re-election strategy this year includes blaming Senate Democrats for the perceived flaws in legislation passed by the Senate even though it passed last month with broad bipartisan support." Speaker Dennis Hastert said, "Let me be clear, our goal is to send an immigration bill to the president that is a strong bill on immigration that protects our borders and protects the American people. …We can send an immigration bill to the president this year." The Tribune adds House leaders "made every effort Thursday to link the bill to Senate Democrats, particularly Sen. Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts and Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada."

DOJ_NMG_0036757

The New York Times (6/23, Hulse, 1.19M) reports House Republicans "announced on Thursday a series of summer hearings on immigration policy to be held in California, Arizona and Texas and challenged the view that the sessions were intended to delay new immigration legislation." Sessions "are planned in San Diego and Laredo, Tex., on July 5 and July 7, respectively, on border vulnerabilities and international terrorism; hearings on English as the official language and enforcement of current immigration laws are planned for mid-July; and hearings are planned in Arizona in mid-August on costs to the government resulting from gaps in border control."

CNN's The Situation Room (6/22, Koppel) reported, "House Republican leaders and other committee members, some of the top committee members in the House, flanked the speaker, Dennis Hastert, this afternoon, as the Speaker made clear that the House wasn't going to compromise on immigration reform just because it's an election year. Dennis Hastert also said that the House wanted to get an immigration bill to President Bush by the end of this year."

NBC Nightly News (6/22, story 7, 2:35, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Republican leaders insisted today they want an immigration reform bill this year, but the House and Senate bills are so different, the republicans in charge admit it will all be very hard to reconcile. So, the situation on the border will likely continue, at least for now."

WPost, WSJournal Criticize House GOP On Immigration. The Washington Post (6/23, A24, 744K) says in an editorial that House Republican leaders "have refused to open talks to bridge the gaps between" the House and Senate immigration reform bills and "have decided that ironing out the differences within their own party is too onerous. Instead, House leaders have branded the Senate package as a liberal 'Kennedy bill' and promised to run against it in the coming midterm elections. Despite the fact that Congress has already held hearings on immigration for two years, lawmakers plan to hold yet more hearings around the country -- especially in the Southern border states where the House's draconian enforcement approach is electorally potent. This is irresponsible."

The Wall Street Journal (6/23, 2.11M) says in an editorial House Republicans "have decided that the key to saving their majority is not to solve the immigration problem they've spent the last year building into a 'crisis.' Give them credit for novelty, if not for wisdom." This is "the only way to read House Speaker Denny Hastert's decision this week to delay a House-Senate conference on immigration reform, and instead to stage a summer anti-immigration road show. Republicans plan to use the events to further raise the false alarm of 'amnesty,' which means further attacking their own President's immigration policy. We realize this year's immigration debate long ago left the rational world and is now driven entirely by political fear. But even as political strategy, this is the equivalent of snake-handling; it will be diverting to watch, unless the snake bites back."

Border Patrol Agents Increasingly Face Violence. NBC Nightly News (6/22, story 7, 2:35, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "There are 12,000 border Patrol agents, with another 6,000 to be added over the next two years time." NBC (Teague) added, "After five months of training that covers everything from Spanish classes to high-speed chases, graduates of the Border Patrol Academy enter one of the most dangerous jobs in law enforcement. There were nearly 800 violent assaults against Border Patrol agents last year, a 108% increase from the year before. One reason -- smugglers and others crossing the Mexican border are increasingly armed."

Cannon Faces Tough Primary Challenge Over Immigration. The Washington Times (6/23, Hurt, 90K) reports Rep. Chris Cannon "is a loyal Republican" but he "faces a tough challenge in next week's Republican primary because, his opponent," businessman John Jacob says, he's not tough enough on illegal immigration." Both sides "agree that the election will turn on the issue of immigration and Mr. Cannon has plenty to worry about. In May, Mr. Jacob beat Mr. Cannon at Utah's Republican convention in a 52-48 surprise upset. Because neither candidate collected 60 percent of the convention vote, the nominee will be picked in the Republican primary next week." Cannon is haunted by "a four-year-old quote he made before an audience at the Mexican American Legal Defense and Educational Fund dinner, where he was accepting an 'Excellence in Leadership' award for helping children of illegal aliens get tuition breaks at public universities." Cannon said, "We love immigrants in Utah and we don't oftentimes make the distinction between legal and illegal. In fact, I think Utah was the first state in the country to legislate the ability to get a driver's license based on the matricula consular and of that I am proud." The Times adds Cannon "insists, he's not soft on illegal immigration."

Local Virginia Authorities Lack Authority To Arrest Illegals For Immigration Status. The Washington Times (6/23, Bomey, 90K) reports local Northern Virginia authorities "say they can't stop a van full of illegal aliens that's on its way from Ohio to Manassas, Va., because they don't have the authority to detain them." A sheriff's deputy "in Belmont County, Ohio, detained the aliens for about two hours early Tuesday after stopping the van on Interstate 470 for a traffic violation. A passenger in the van told deputies that they were illegal aliens and heading to Manassas to find work." The deputies "released the group after federal immigration authorities said via telephone they could not interview the aliens." Officials "with the Manassas Police Department and the Prince William County Sheriff's Department said they can't arrest the illegals even if they spot the van in their jurisdictions. Local police in Virginia don't have the authority to make arrests solely on the basis of a person's immigration status."

DOJ_NMG_0036758

TAX:

House Votes To Cut Estate Taxes. The AP (6/23, Dalrymple) reports, "The House voted Thursday to cut taxes on inherited estates and relieve thousands of heirs from paying tax collectors beginning next decade. The 269-156 vote, just a few months before an election with control of Congress at stake, saw majority Republicans temporarily setting aside their ambition to abolish the tax." Instead, they "voted to exempt from taxation individual estates up to $5 million and couple's estates up to $10 million, while also blunting the impact on even richer families. The compromise measure now goes to the Senate."

Bloomberg (6/23, Newton-Small, Donmoyer) says that in the Senate, "some Democrats said it is unlikely the House legislation can draw enough support to attract swing votes in their party. Negotiations have begun among some Democrats for a compromise that would cost less to the Treasury than the House legislation, which has been estimated at about 75 percent of the cost of a full repeal."

The Wall Street Journal (6/23, Mullins, 2.11M) reports, "The decision by Republican congressional leaders to seek something less than full repeal reflects the changing political dynamic in Washington. After 12 years in control of Congress, Republicans worry that Democrats could win a majority in the House or Senate after November's congressional elections." The Journal adds, "With Democrats in control -- or even if they just pick up a few more seats in the Senate -- estate-tax repeal would face even longer odds. So, after four years of failed attempts to eliminate the tax, opponents of the estate tax decided to try at least to settle the issue and reduce its bite from what would happen if Congress didn't act at all." The Washington Post (6/23, A6, Weisman, 744K) also says "the estate tax bill -- which would cut but not eliminate taxes on inheritances -- marked a significant turnaround for House Republicans." The Washington Times (6/23, DeBose, 90K) runs a similar report.

NYTimes Criticizes Measure, GOP Priorities. The New York Times (6/23, 1.19M) editorializes, "Two weeks ago, the Senate killed an effort to repeal the federal estate tax on multimillion-dollar fortunes. The 'no' votes were a stand for budget sanity and basic fairness. But the pro-repeal camp doesn't want to take no for an answer. Yesterday, the House of Representatives passed an estate-tax cut that is a repeal in everything but name. The so-called compromise would exempt more than 99.5 percent of estates from tax, slash the tax rates on the rest and cost at least $760 billion during its first full decade. … No lawmaker who voted for the compromise gets any points for moderation."

A second New York Times editorial (6/23) says that "at the same time that Republicans are fighting to exempt the richest estates from taxes, they are blocking a raise for the nation's poorest workers. … Just 23 percent of Americans approve of the job Congress is doing, according to a recent New York Times/CBS News poll. These dismal ratings are no surprise when Congress's highest economic priority is handing out tax cuts to millionaires and oil companies, and its one point of fiscal restraint is protecting employers from having to pay a decent wage to factory workers and waiters."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

House Approves Line-Item Veto. The AP (6/23, Taylor) reports, "President Bush would receive greater power to try to kill 'pork barrel' spending projects under a bill passed Thursday by the House." Lawmakers "voted to give Bush and his successor a weaker version of the line-item veto law struck down by the Supreme Court in 1998, despite a recent series of lopsided votes in which they've rallied to preserve each other's back-home projects. The new power would expire after six years." The AP adds, "The House passed the bill by a 247-172 vote. Thirty-five Democrats joined with most Republicans in voting for the bill; 15 Republicans opposed the measure and others voted for the bill despite private reservations." The measure "must still pass the Senate, and that's by no means a certainty."

Rumsfeld Considering Replacements For Abizaid, Jones. The Wall Street Journal (6/23, Harwood, 2.11M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column that Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld is weighing "replacements for key commanders. Army Gen. Craddock of U.S. Southern Command might succeed Abizaid as senior Middle East commander. Air Force chief of staff Moseley is rumored front-runner to succeed Marine Gen. Jones as head of European Command."

The Washington Times (6/23, Gertz, Scarborough, 90K) reports in its "Inside the Ring" column, "Gen. Abizaid and Mr. Rumsfeld have agreed that the general will stay through the summer. But the question is open about whether he will remain at CentCom after that."

DOJ_NMG_0036759

FTC Computer Stolen. The Wall Street Journal (6/23, Conkey, 2.11M) reports, "The Federal Trade Commission, the primary regulator enforcing privacy laws, said a laptop containing sensitive consumer data was stolen, adding to a string of disclosures that has exposed lax security practices in government." FTC officials "said a laptop storing the Social Security numbers or other personal data of 110 people was stolen from a vehicle being used by its attorneys last week. The information on it was password-protected but not encrypted. The agency said the individuals who were affected are involved in a continuing legal case, which it declined to identify."

Hacker Obtains Information On USDA Employees, Retirees, Contractors. The Washington Post (6/23, A23, Goldfarb, 744K) reports, "A hacker breached the Agriculture Department's computer system and may have taken personal information on 26,000 employees, retirees and contractors, the department said, making it the latest federal agency to have had personal data compromised." The Post adds, "The potential loss is less dramatic than the one that occurred last month with the theft of a laptop computer and hard drive containing personal information on up to 26.5 million veterans and military personnel from the home of a Department of Veterans Affairs employee." The Agriculture Department "said those affected will receive a year of free credit monitoring. VA announced a similar plan Wednesday after weeks of criticism for its failure to safeguard private data."

Votes Cast In CBP Union Election. In its Federal Diary column, the Washington Post (6/23, D4, Barr, 744K) reports "yesterday was the deadline for casting votes" in the election of a union "to negotiate on behalf of employees at Customs and Border Protection." In petitioning for the election, which set up "a showdown between the American Federation of Government Employees, which represented immigration employees, and the National Treasury Employees Union, which represented customs employees," the agency "contended that the Homeland Security merger had raised a series of union jurisdiction issues."

Duvall Says Bush "Much Less Intellectual" Than Clinton, But "Very Bright." USA Today (6/23, 2.31M) reports actor Robert Duvall, his wife, "and friends spent an evening at the White House recently, invited by President and Laura Bush for a screening of Broken Trail. Bush, he says, is 'much less intellectual' than President Clinton, with whom he once spent two hours at a dinner, but 'a very bright guy, very focused — and he'll excuse himself and go to bed at 9 o'clock.'" And there's "something special about a visit to the White House, no matter who the occupant is, Duvall says."

OTHER NEWS:

Economy Expected To Slow In Coming Months. The CBS Evening News (6/22, story 6, 0:20, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "A report out today suggests the US economy will weaken somewhat in coming months. The Index of Leading Economic Indicators fell 0.6% in May to its lowest level since October. That drove down stocks on wall street. The Dow lost about 60 points [to close at 11,019.11], the NASDAQ 18 [to close at 2,122.98]." NBC Nightly News (6/22, story 9, 0:10, Williams, 9.87M) also reported the stock numbers, as did the Wall Street Journal (6/23, McKay, 2.11M), among other sources.

Meanwhile, the Wall Street Journal (6/23, McAuley, Ives-Halperin, 2.11M) reports US "jobless claims rose last week, reversing a recent two-week downward trend, and indicating the labor market, though generally sound, may have some slack." Initial jobless claims "increased by 11,000 to a seasonally adjusted 308,000 in the week ending June 17, the Labor Department said Thursday. New claims for the week ending June 10 were 297,000, revised from a previously reported 295,000."

Increase In Fed Funds Rate Urged. William A. Niskanen, chairman of the Cato Institute and a member and acting chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers under President Reagan, writes in the Wall Street Journal (6/23, 2.11M), "Ben Bernanke and the Fed face a critical test at the Federal Open Market Committee meeting next week that will demonstrate whether they are serious about constraining inflation. … Should the FOMC continue to increase the Fed funds rate in order to reduce the inflation rate? Or should it pause for a while, given the selective signs of a slowing economy and a concern by many about the potential effects on the mid-term congressional elections this fall? My vote is for another 25-basis-point increase in the Fed funds rate."

Nevada High Court Reviewing Conflict, Favoritism Charges Against Three Judges. The Los Angeles Times (6/23, Woutat) reports, "The Nevada Supreme Court has asked three Las Vegas judges to respond to reports that they have engaged in conflicts of interest, favoritism and other questionable practices." The Times continues, "Based on the responses of those senior judges and a review of the allegations, first detailed in the Los Angeles Times, the state Supreme Court will decide whether to take action, Chief Justice Robert E. Rose said." The Times adds, "In an interview, Rose also called for beefing up the state agency responsible for investigating judges, and for making it easier to remove senior judges from cases." The Times notes, "The Times articles, published this month, detailed what appeared to be widespread conflicts of interest, favoritism and violations of judicial canons by Las Vegas judges. … The reports focused on eight current or former district court judges and a sitting federal judge. The Supreme Court's inquiry is the first known step toward investigating the allegations. … News media and political commentators in Las Vegas have condemned the behavior described in the reports, and numerous Nevada lawyers praised the disclosures as a step toward reform."

DOJ_NMG_0036760

Duncan Drops Out Of Maryland Governor's Race. CNN's The Situation Room (6/22, King) reported that Democrat Doug Duncan says he is dropping out of the Maryland gubernatorial race "because he's suffering from depression. That clears the way for Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley to win the Democratic nomination and challenge Republican incumbent Robert Ehrlich this fall."

WPost Says Duncan Announcement Is Disappointment. The Washington Post (6/23, A24, 744K) editorializes, "Duncan's surprise announcement is a disappointment, and not only because hard-fought primary contests are a sign of robust health for any political party. For almost 12 years as the chief executive of Montgomery County, he has been a capable, decisive manager of the state's largest and most economically vibrant locality, overseeing a period of staggering growth, immigration and demographic change that left the county stronger and more vital."

Lieberman Votes On Iraq Troop Withdrawals Could Help Primary Opponent. The Washington Post (6/23, A11, Cillizza, 744K) reports Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (D-Conn.) "further inflamed his party's liberal base yesterday by opposing two Senate measures seeking to limit the scope of the war in Iraq." Lieberman "may have further jeopardized his chances of defeating businessman Ned Lamont in the state's Aug. 8 primary. Lamont, a political unknown until a few months ago, has drawn national attention and rising poll numbers at home in recent weeks -- especially after he drew support from a third of the delegates at a recent state party convention." Lamont spokeswoman Liz Dupont-Diehl said, "This is further evidence of why a lot of people call Joe Lieberman 'George Bush's favorite Democrat." The Post adds Lieberman "was one of six Democrats to vote against both resolutions offered by his Senate colleagues. Of that group, Sens. Ben Nelson (Neb.) and Bill Nelson (Fla.) are the only ones other than Lieberman standing for reelection this fall."

Edwards Calls For Eliminating Poverty By 2036. Knight Ridder (6/23, Funk) reports Sen. John Edwards, "Fresh from his first-place showing among possible presidential contenders in a poll of Iowa Democrats," yesterday spoke "to a roomful of pundits and national reporters, road-testing the big themes he hopes to ride into the White House in 2008." Edwards' "biggest" theme is to "eliminate poverty in the United States by 2036. Edwards, who heads the Center on Poverty, Work and Opportunity at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill, has made no secret of his itch to run for president again as long as his wife's health holds out." Edwards said his wife, Elizabeth, who "was diagnosed with breast cancer in late 2004," is "now cancer-free." In "his speech before the National Press Club to about 150 people, Edwards covered several issues, proposing an immediate pullout of 40,000 U.S. troops from Iraq and calling for a bolder Democratic Party, one with 'big ideas and backbone.'" But "mostly he talked about setting a national goal to eradicate poverty over the next 30 years. He proposes to end it not with a rehash of the 'Great Society,' President Lyndon Johnson's string of federal programs in the 1960s, but by ushering in what Edwards called his 'Working Society.'"

The Washington Post (6/23, A9, Balz, 744K) reports Edwards said "the nation should set a goal of eliminating poverty over the next three decades and seek to reclaim the moral high ground internationally by starting to withdraw forces from Iraq." Edwards had "sharp words for his party, saying Democrats must stand for big ideas, backbone and leadership. 'I do not believe in a party obsessed with incrementalism, half-measures, positions based on yesterday's polls,' he said." Edwards said "wiping out poverty would cost $15 billion to $20 billion a year, which he said he would pay for by rolling back President Bush's tax cuts for the wealthiest Americans and preserving the estate tax, which the Republicans are seeking to eliminate."

Study Finds Stewart's "Daily Show" Promotes Cynicism. The Washington Post (6/23, A2, Morin, 744K) reports Jon Stewart "and his hit Comedy Central cable show may be poisoning democracy. Two political scientists found that young people who watch Stewart's faux news program, 'The Daily Show,' develop cynical views about politics and politicians that could lead them to just say no to voting." The finding is "particularly dismaying news because the show is hugely popular among college students, many of whom already don't bother to cast ballots." Jody Baumgartner and Jonathan S. Morris of East Carolina University "said previous research found that nearly half -- 48 percent -- of this age group watched 'The Daily Show' and only 23 percent of show viewers followed 'hard news' programs closely."

Celebrities Under Pressure To Be Activists, Philanthropists. USA Today (6/23, Freydkin, 2.31M) reports Bono, Angelina Jolie and Oprah Winfrey "set the gold standard when it comes to celebrity activism. Bono has been instrumental in raising awareness of global poverty and the AIDS epidemic with his ONE campaign, which has gotten stars such as George Clooney, Matt Damon and Brad Pitt on board." After "initial skepticism, politicians from House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., to Sen. Rick Santorum, R-Pa., now wax poetic about the U2 singer, lauding his understanding of the issues." Celebrities "of all stripes find themselves under pressure to use their fame for a higher purpose. With the high-profile examples set by Jolie and Bono, there may come a time, observers say, when a star's lack of charity work will be a liability."

DOJ_NMG_0036761

Rumsfeld, Hadley Say Bush Could Order Shoot-Down Of North Korean Missile. The Washington Times (6/23, Dinan, 90K) reports Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley said the US "is set to shoot down any North Korean missile launch that threatens the United States." Rumsfeld told reporters that Bush "has the power to order a shootdown, using one of 11 ground-based interceptors now located in Alaska and California," while Hadley said the US "has a missile defense system with 'limited operational capability' that could be used to try to shoot down" a missile. Hadley added that US officials "were vigorously pursuing a diplomatic push to head off a test launch by Pyongyang."

NBC and CBS reported on the missile standoff. On NBC Nightly News (6/22, story 5, 0:45, 9.87M), Brian Williams said the story was "rather urgently reported earlier this evening," but "I'm not sure how urgent it is." NBC (Miklaszewski) added, "Military officials tell NBC News that the Pentagon has issued an execution order which officially puts the US missile defense system on alert to shoot down a North Korean missile but only if it poses a direct threat to the US."

The CBS Evening News (6/22, story 3, 2:45, Schieffer, 7.66M) ran a much longer report focusing on how Russia and China have joined the US "in urging North Korea to call off its preparations to test-fire a long-range missile with the capability to reach the West Coast. No one really believes that if the North Koreans do fire it, they will aim it there, but Administration officials made it clear today that if it does appear it is headed our way, they'll try to shoot it down." CBS (Martin) added, "Orders have been issued to the fledgling missile defense system to be prepared to shoot down the North Korean missile if it is launched in a direction to land on American soil. That includes the Pacific island of Guam, site of a growing US military base. Defense Secretary Rumsfeld said today the decision to fire would be up to the President."

Cheney, Hadley Reject Pre-Emptive Strike Advice. The Financial Times (6/23, Sevastopulo, Alden) reports Vice President Cheney rejected a call by two Clinton Administration Pentagon officials for a "US pre-emptive strike to prevent North Korea from testing an intercontinental ballistic missile." Responding to a Thursday Washington Post op-ed, Cheney "Cheney suggested that the US should not try to destroy the North Korean missile with a pre-emptive strike." Cheney said, "At this stage, we are addressing the issue in a proper fashion. Obviously, if you're going to launch strikes at another nation, you'd better be prepared to not just fire one shot." The Washington Post (6/23, A21, Kessler, 744K) reports others in the Administration, including Hadley, also rejected the advice from ex-Defense Secretary William Perry and ex-Assistant Secretary Ashton Carter.

Knight Ridder (6/23, Landay) says the White House "has little leverage to use on North Korea" despite a US "threat of severe consequences." The US "has no diplomatic or economic ties with North Korea, the rudimentary U.S. missile-defense system is untested in real-world conditions and Pyongyang is regarded as having a right to test missiles, making any American attack to forestall a launch an act of war with potentially explosive consequences."

Ex-Envoy Also Rejects Strike Suggestion. In a Washington Post (6/23, A25, 744K) op-ed, Charles L. "Jack" Pritchard, a former special US envoy for negotiations with North Korea, calls the ex-officials' advice an "egregious suggestion," asking, "If you were Kim Jong Il and saw a buildup of American forces on the Korean Peninsula before an announced preemptive airstrike, would you be thinking that it would be only a limited strike and not the start of an effort to bring down your regime?"

Cheney, Rice, Burns Lead India Nuclear Deal Lobbying Effort. The Financial Times (6/23, Daniel) reports the Administration "set out its strongest defence of the civilian nuclear assistance agreement with India, when" Vice President Cheney "called it 'one of the most important strategic foreign policy initiatives of our government.' His remarks are part of an aggressive campaign to address scepticism ahead of the mark-up of the draft bill next Tuesday in the House international relations committee and on Wednesday by the Senate foreign relations committee." Undersecretary Burns "spent the last two days briefing members on Capitol Hill." Secretary Rice "will make further calls on Friday." Burns, who "addressed fears that the agreement created a double standard by treating India's nuclear ambitions differently from Iran's and North Korea's," is quoted saying, "The message is that [that] country . . . plays by the rules and wants to invite the inspectors in. If India wants to do that, it is a good message for Iran and North Korea." Furthermore, Burns "expected amendments to be introduced next week, but warned that some of them 'could effectively kill the agreement.' He expressed confidence that the House and Senate would agree on 'one piece of legislation' that could be voted on after the July 4 recess."

DOJ_NMG_0036762

Cheney "also urged Congress to make sure 'that amendments or delays on the US side do not risk wasting this critical opportunity,' and encouraged the leaders of the Indian-American Caucus…to 'use their leadership role to help usher through a critical agreement.'"

The Washington Times (6/23, Stuhldreher, 90K) notes that "under legislation introduced in March, an exemption for India would depend upon several conditions: India would have to present a plan to segregate its civilian and military nuclear facilities, negotiate a treaty limiting the production of fissile material, adopt IAEA safeguards, and work to prevent the spread of technology that could assist other states in developing weapons." Additionally, "the 45 nations of the Nuclear Suppliers Group would have to reach a consensus to endorse the deal."

Bush Support Raises Hope For WTO Deal. The Financial Times (6/23, Beattie, Alden) reports the "troubled" Doha round of global trade talks is "witnessing the most serious attempt yet by the European Union, the US and developing countries" to reach a deal. Ahead of a "crucial" meeting of trade ministers in Geneva next week, President George W. Bush's "signal of strong political support for the talks has raised hopes the US will accept more constraints on its farm subsidies and will moderate its demands for access to foreign agricultural markets," the Times writes. A spokesman for EU trade commissioner Peter Mandelson said he had been "impressed" with Bush's "determination during the EU-US summit this week to get a deal done."

The New York Times (6/23, Landler, 1.19M) reports, "A month after he warned that the five-year negotiations for a global trade agreement were in the 'red zone,' the head of the World Trade Organization, Pascal Lamy, said Thursday that he had grown considerably more optimistic about the odds of a deal." Lamy attributed his "confidence to a change in the tone of the United States." While it was not clear whether the United States planned to make any new proposals next week, Lamy said Bush's words this week suggested that Washington was open to a compromise. "Until yesterday, the US side of the triangle had remained locked," Lamy said. "The good news yesterday was that suggestions of flexibility were given by the US, notably by Bush," he added.

EU Trade Chief Urges WTO Talks On Energy. The Wall Street Journal (6/23, A6, Champion, Von Reppert-Bismark, 2.11M) reports EU trade commissioner Peter Mandelson said Thursday he wants a new round of global trade talks that will focus on energy, with the goal of subjecting trade in oil and gas to the same "ordinary rules" as other goods. In an interview, Mandelson said "bringing energy trade and investment under the rules and enforcement procedures of the World Trade Organization would, among other things, require that producers provide free access to transit of such resources." However, the Journal says extending the WTO's reach over energy "would also face enormous hurdles. For one thing, producers are likely to see little to gain in opening up distribution networks to competition."

WSJournal Says Farm Subsidies Distort Global Trade. In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (6/23, 2.11M) says this week's US-EU summit "did little to end the finger-pointing over who is more at fault for endangering the Doha trade talks by refusing to budge on farm subsidies." According to a report released this week by the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development "shows that developed countries continue to prop up uncompetitive farmers, to the tune of $280 billion in 2005." These subsidies, the Journal says, "most distort global trade and punish poor farmers in the developing world" and "raise prices for domestic consumers." Farm liberalization, the newspaper continues, "shouldn't hinge on whether or how much other nations lower their barriers to Western goods. The people of Europe, America and Japan would benefit from any move to free up agricultural trade, even a unilateral one."

Olmert And Abbas Meet, Agree To Continue Dialogue. The New York Times (6/23, Erlanger, 1.19M) reports Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert "held informal and inconclusive talks over breakfast here on Thursday, their first meeting since Mr. Olmert became prime minister. They embraced and promised to accelerate preparations for a substantive meeting in the next few weeks, both men said afterward." The Times says the "reluctant" meeting "was orchestrated" by King Abdullah of Jordan and author Elie Wiesel. "Neither the Israelis nor the Palestinians wanted a rushed meeting that 'would produce no concrete agreements and could worsen the situation,' said the Israeli deputy prime minister, Shimon Peres, who also attended the breakfast." Olmert "made it clear on Thursday that substantive negotiations on a final peace agreement could not take place while Hamas…remains in control of the Palestinian Authority." He "praised Mr. Abbas as sincere, but said Israel had preconditions before opening such negotiations." Also, Olmert "apologized for the deaths of Palestinian civilians in Israeli military efforts to stop the firing of Qassam rockets from Gaza into Israel. The Financial Times (6/23, Morris) leads its coverage with Olmert's apology, saying he told Abbas that "he regretted the deaths of Palestinian civilians in recent air strikes on the Gaza Strip."

The AP (6/23, Halaby) says the two leaders "kissed and embraced Thursday in the first meeting between Israeli and Palestinian leaders in more than a year, and Olmert made a rare apology for Palestinian civilian deaths in recent Israeli airstrikes. Despite the icebreaker," Olmert "said peace talks are unlikely unless the Palestinians' Hamas-led government changes its stripes, and he pledged to keep up attacks against militants."

DOJ_NMG_0036763

Survey Finds Deep Division Between Views Of Muslims, Westerners. Knight Ridder (6/23, Latifi) reports, "Muslims and Westerners remain sharply at odds in the way they view each other, according to a 13-country poll released Thursday. Among the findings: Majorities of Muslims in several countries don't think Arabs were responsible for the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. Majorities of Westerners in countries surveyed don't think Muslims respect women." Knight Ridder adds, "On the bright side, support for Osama bin Laden is declining among Muslims, and most Muslims believe that democracy can work in Islamic countries."

The Washington Post (6/23, A19, Schrank, 744K) reports that "for the second year running, the survey shows increasing opposition among Muslim populations to violence targeting civilians in the name of Islam. About 71 percent of polled Muslim Indonesians said such violence is never justified, compared with 66 percent last year; in Pakistan, the figure was 69 percent, up from 46 percent; Jordan has had the steepest rise in the proportion of people opposed to extremist violence, up from 11 percent last year to 46 percent. But 'a sizeable number of adherents,' particularly among sampled Nigerian Muslims, still believe that violence against civilians is justifiable in defense of Islam, the survey found."

USA Today (6/23, Page, 2.31M) reports, "The poll by the Pew Research Center found that many Americans and Europeans view Muslims as fanatical and violent. By wider margins, most Muslims in the Middle East and Asia see Westerners as selfish, arrogant and violent. … In an example of conflicting views, about six of 10 of those surveyed in the USA and Western Europe blame 'Muslim intolerance' for the protests and violence this year that followed publication of Danish cartoons depicting the prophet Mohammed. Nearly nine of 10 of those surveyed in Jordan, Egypt, Indonesia and Turkey blame the furor on 'Western disrespect' of Islam. Islam forbids the depiction of Mohammed's image."

The New York Times (6/23, Bortin, 1.19M) says "majorities in every country surveyed except Pakistan expressed pessimism about Muslim-Western relations, with Germany most strongly viewing the situation as bad (70 percent), followed by France (66 percent), Turkey (64 percent), Spain and Britain (61 percent), and Egypt (58 percent)." Pew surveyed 14,030 people from March 31 to May 14 "in Britain, Egypt, France, Germany, India, Indonesia, Jordan, Nigeria, Pakistan, Russia, Spain, Turkey and the United States."

Albright, Danforth, Kohut Discuss Poll. The Christian Science Monitor (6/23, Cook, 61K) reports former Secretary of State Madeleine Albright, former Sen. John Danforth, and Pew Research Center pollster Andrew Kohut discussed a new study by the Pew Global Attitudes Project that examines Muslim public opinion about the US and the West. At a Monitor breakfast, Kohut said, "A real divide does exist between peoples. Muslims and Westerners are generally convinced that relationships are not good these days. Westerners see Muslims as fanatical, violent and not tolerant. Muslims see Westerners as selfish, immoral and greedy.... One of the most startling findings here, most Muslims remain unconvinced that Arabs carried out the September 11 attacks." Sen. Danforth said, "The leaders of Islam have been less than forthcoming in expressing strong views on matters of terrorism.... [Western religious leaders] have not been strong in any respect about how their religion relates to the world beyond themselves." Albright said the US government has "not fully engaged, or have not engaged enough, in what I consider the battle of ideas."

Former DIA Analyst Pleads Guilty To Giving Top Secret Information To China. The Washington Times (6/23, Gertz, 90K) reports former Defense Intelligence Agency analyst Ronald N. Montaperto "has pleaded guilty to illegally holding classified documents and admitted in a plea agreement to passing 'top secret' information to Chinese intelligence officials." Montaperto, "who held a security clearance as a China specialist at a U.S. Pacific Command research center until 2004, pleaded guilty to one count of unlawful retention of national defense information, according to court papers and law officials familiar with the case, who spoke on the condition of anonymity."

NRA Prompts Letter-Writing Protest Of UN Forum On Firearms. The Washington Times (6/23, Pisik, 90K) reports UN officials "have received more than 100,000 letters, many of them generated by a National Rifle Association campaign, protesting a U.N. forum on illicit small arms that starts Monday and runs through July Fourth." The form letter to UN Secretary General Kofi Annan available on the NRA Website says, "The 4th of July is America's most revered national holiday. Yet, you have nevertheless chosen that day to meet at the U.N., on American soil, in your drive to ban civilian firearm ownership worldwide. In doing so, you have placed the U.N. squarely on the side of freedom's enemies."

Somali Government, Islamic Faction Sign Ceasefire. The Washington Post/AP (6/23, A20) reports Somalia's "interim government and the Islamic faction that controls the country's capital signed an agreement Thursday that calls for an immediate cease-fire and confers mutual recognition on the warring parties." The secretary general of the Arab League, Amr Moussa, said "the delegation from the Islamic Courts Union, the militia that controls Mogadishu, the capital, and most of southern Somalia, agreed to recognize the legitimacy of the interim government, which is based in Baidoa, 155 miles northwest of Mogadishu."

DOJ_NMG_0036764

Lack Of Security Could Undercut Congolese Election. The New York Times (6/23, Polgreen, 1.19M) reports the Congo "presidential and parliamentary elections in July will be the first moment of self-determination for most Congolese; the last multiparty election was in 1965." Since former leader Mobuto Sese Seko "was deposed in 1997, the nation, renamed the Democratic Republic of the Congo, has been caught in the murderous grip of rival militias, both homegrown and backed by neighboring countries. The war has officially been over since a peace agreement between the factions was signed four years ago, but the transition to peace has yet to come." The election is "meant to draw a line between that chaotic past and a more hopeful future. But the process of preparing for the election has been extraordinarily difficult in the troubled and violent eastern regions, where militias have battled government troops over control of lucrative industries like diamond and copper mining, and in the short term the election may cause as many problems as it solves."

Lopez-Obrador Proposes "New Deal" Building Program. The Washington Post (6/23, A18, Roig-Franzia, 744K) reports Mexican presidential candidate Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador, "who is often compared with South American leftists, has found a model in an icon from the north: Franklin Delano Roosevelt." Lopez-Obrador's "economics team has developed a blueprint for what they call the 'Mexican New Deal.' Their modern version of Depression-era populism is an ambitious program to create millions of jobs and stem migration by undertaking huge public works projects, including a railroad network, vast housing developments, ports and timber replanting."

Venezuela's Security Council Bid Seen As Linked To Iran Crisis. In her Wall Street Journal column (6/23), Mary Anastasia O'Grady says, "In Latin America, the competition between Guatemala and Venezuela for the U.N. Security Council seat that Argentina will vacate at the end of this year is of particular importance." Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez "has made it clear that when it comes to geopolitics, his preferences lie with hostile states like Iran, Cuba, Sudan and North Korea. A seat on the Security Council, where the presidency also rotates monthly, would give the Venezuelan strongman ways to make those preferences operational at the multilateral level." Guatemala has "the solid backing of the more serious democracies in the region -- such as Colombia and Mexico -- and insists that it will not withdraw its candidacy. That means that in all likelihood the vote will probably go to the General Assembly. Guatemala believes it can win that ballot. Let's hope so. If not, Latin America will have handed Iran a victory that is likely to threaten world peace."

NYTimes Says UN Human Rights Council Membership Rules Flawed. The New York Times (6/23, 1.19M) says in an editorial, "The Bush administration was right to hold out for high principle when the ground rules for membership on the new United Nations Human Rights Council were being debated earlier this year. Unfortunately, the United States lost that fight, and the council's opening session this week was tarnished by the participation of Pakistan, Saudi Arabia and Cuba, all flagrant abusers themselves and poorly suited to judge the human-rights performance of other nations. Other questionable members include China and Russia, which not only circumscribe the rights of their own citizens but also use their clout regularly to defend the indefensible behavior of allies like Uzbekistan or Sudan."

Krauthammer Says Australia's Alliance With US "Heartfelt." In his Washington Post column (6/23, A25), Charles Krauthammer says, "When Australian ambassadors in Washington express support for the United States, it is heartfelt and unalloyed, never the 'yes, but' of the other allies, perfunctory support followed by a list of complaints, slights and sage finger-wagging. Australia understands America's role and is sympathetic to its predicament as reluctant hegemon. That understanding has led it to share foxholes with Americans from Korea to Kabul. They fought with us at Tet and now in Baghdad. Not every engagement has ended well. But every one was strenuous, and many quite friendless. Which is why America has such affection for a country whose prime minister said after Sept. 11, 'This is no time to be an 80 percent ally' and actually meant it."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:

"Secret U.S. Program Tracks Global Bank Transfers."
"New Gypsy Vision For The Future."
"Shyamalan Book Tells Of Breakup With Disney."
"Villaraigosa's Plan For L.A. Unified Faces Opposition In Classrooms."
"U.S. Panel Backs Data On Global Warming."

DOJ_NMG_0036765

"Mexico's Cartels Escalate Drug War."
"American Dream Still Out Of Reach."

USA Today:
"Court Eases Worker Lawsuits."
"Celebrity Activists Put Star Power To Good Use."
"Cities May Ban Trains With Chemicals."
"Study: 25% Of Americans Have No One To Confide In."

New York Times:
"Bank Data Sifted In Secret By U.S. To Block Terror."
"S.E.C. Is Reported To Be Examining A Big Hedge Fund."
"Senate Rejects Calls To Begin Iraq Pullback."
"In Congo, Hunger And Disease Erode Democracy."
"Doctors See Way To Cut Risks Of Suffering In Lethal Injection."

Washington Post:
"Duncan Drops Bid For Governor, Pitting O'Malley Vs. Ehrlich In Md."
"For The Love Of Ballou."
"Senate's Abramoff Report Disputes Rep. Ney."
"Court Expands Right To Sue Over Wrongs At Work."
"Senate Rejects Democrats' Calls For Iraq Timetable."

Washington Times:
"Senate Rejects Iraq Troop Pullout."
"U.S. Set To Down Korean Missile."
"Duncan Ends Campaign For Governor."
"Ex-DIA Analyst Admits Passing Secrets To China."
"Letters Against Gun Meeting Swamp U.N."
"Free Ride To Manassas And No Stopping Them."
"Putting Dinner On The Table."

Detroit Free Press:
"Car Incentive Wars To Heat Up."
"Cops Nab Fentanyl Suspect."
"UAW Springs For Fun, Perks."
"Feeling Cut Off."
"Secret U.S. Program Spies On Bank Records."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Few Water Police Guard Taps."
"Violent Crime, Guard Return To New Orleans."
'Metro Law Agencies Tune Up Radio Links For Security Crises."
"It's Not Age Before Duty."

Houston Chronicle:
"U.S. Secretly Scours Bank Data In War On Terror."
"He Lost The Game But Not The Magic."
"7 Held In Plot On Sears Tower."
"Feeling Alone? You're Not The Only One."
"'In A Lot Of Ways, I Still Am Suffering.'"

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Afghanistan-Stolen Documents; Iraq-US KIAs; Iraq-Senate Debate; Iraq-US Troops' Opinion; Bush-Hungary; Senate-NSA Surveillance Program; Merck-Zocor Patent; Global Warming; Arizona Wildfire; World Cup-US Out; Petite Women-Clothing.
CBS: Global Warming; Western Wildfires; North Korea Missile; US KIAs; Iraq-Iran Influence; US Economy Forecast; Social Networking Websites; Military Credit Monitoring; Faith-Based Health Care; World Cup-US Out.
NBC: Global Warming Report; Iraq-Senate Debate; Santorum-WMDs; Iraq-Iran Influence; North Korea Missile; Afghanistan-Taliban Offensive; Border Patrol Training; Supreme Court-Sexual Harassment; Stock Markets; World Cup-US Out; American Airlines-Cost-Cutting.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: Miami-Terror Arrests; Afghanistan-US Computer Disk Stolen; House-Line Item Veto.
CBS: Miami-Terror Arrests; Treasury-Terror Financing; Pentagon-Missile Interceptor Test; North Korea-Missile Test; Iraq-US KIA; AZ-Wildfire.
NPR: Senate-Iraq; North Korea-Missile Test; Economic Indicators Index; Wall Street; Treasury-Terror Financing; World Cup.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.
White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Attends White House Tee Ball Game, South Lawn.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — Speaks on the economy, Chicago Mercantile Exchange Auditorium, 20 South Wacker Drive; speaks at a luncheon for congressional candidate Dave McSweeney, Hilton Chicago.

US Senate: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 11 a.m. FLOOR SCHEDULE _ Reconvenes for morning business only.

1 p.m. FOREIGN RELATIONS _ Full Committee. Closed briefing on overseas cooperation between the Defense and State departments. State Department counselor Philip Zelikow; Undersecretary of Defense Eric Edelman. Location: Room S-407, Capitol.

US House: No Scheduled Events.

Other: COUNCIL ON BIOETHICS _ President's Council on Bioethics conference. Location: St. Regis Hotel.

NDN MEETING _ NDN holds its 2006 annual meeting, ``What Comes Next: A New Politics for America." Highlights: 8:30 a.m. Rep. Rahm Emanuel. 9 a.m. Sen. Hillary Clinton. 9:30 a.m. Session on ``Progressive Idea-Making in the 21st Century, with Jonathan Alter, Senior Editor and columnist at Newsweek; Rep. Artur Davis; Markos Moulitsas, Internet pioneer; Michael Tomasky, Editor, The American Prospect. 11 a.m. Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack and NDN President Simon

DOJ_NMG_0036766

Rosenberg. 12 p.m. Luncheon on ``What's Next for Globalization," with former Mexican Foreign Minister Jorge Castaneda and Loral Space and Communications CEO Bernard Schwartz. Location: Mayflower Hotel.

POW/MIA FAMILIES _ 37th annual convention of the National League of POW/MIA Families. Location: Hilton Crystal City, 2399 Jefferson Davis Highway, Arlington.

AMERICAN FOR DEMOCRATIC ACTION _ Americans for Democratic Action holds its 2006 conference on convention. Highlights: 9 a.m. Session on building a liberal majority, with Reps. Diane Watson, Pete STark, Mike Honda, Rush Holt and Lynn Woolsey. 10:30 a.m. Keynote address: ADA President Rep. Jim McDermott. 11 a.m. Session on a road map for liberal victories, with economist Jeff Faux, Rev. Lennox Yearwood, United Steelworkers President Leo Gerard, others. 12:15 p.m. Luncheon speaker - Rep. Raul Grijalva. 3:30 p.m. Session on governing, with Reps. Barney Frank and Jerrold Nadler, others. 7 p.m. Banquet with honorees John Connolly of AFTRA, Helen Thomas, and Fred Azcarate of Jobs with Justice. Location: Gallaudet University.

LIBYAN DEMOCRACY-CONFERENCE _ American Libyan Freedom Alliance holds conference on ``Working Toward the Return of the Constitutional Legitimacy to Libya. Highlights: 8:45 a.m. Opening remarks by Adel Mekraz, ALFA executive director. 9 a.m. Session 1 topics: ``Libya's struggle for constitutional rule" and ``The political forces behind the 1951 Libyan Constitution." 10:45 a.m. Session 2 Topics: ``The 1969 coup and economic impact of rule by fiat" and ``Libyan civil society and challenges under Totalitarianism." 1:30 p.m. Session 3 Topic: ``US foreign policy and the restoration of constitutional rule in Libya." 3 p.m. Session 4 Topics: ``Writing a new Libyan constitution" and ``The Libyan Experience: Lessons in Law." 4:15 p.m. Concluding remarks by ALFA director Mekraz. Location: HC-5, US Capitol.

RURAL AMERICA _ 8:30 a.m. - 3 p.m. The National Center for Food and Agricultural Policy and USDA hold a workshop, ``Growing Up and Growing Old in Rural America." Highlights: 8:45 a.m. Deputy Agriculture Secretary Chnuck Conner. 9:15 a.m. Rep. Rosa DeLauro. Location: Room 325, Russell.

LIBYA _ 8:45 a.m. - 2 p.m. The Middle East Institute, others, sponsor the first U.S.-Libya Business Association's annual policy conference. Highlights: 9:15 a.m. Keynote address - Rep. Tom Lantos. 10:10 a.m. Session on the diplomatic outlook, with Assistant Secretary of State David Welch, and Libyan Amb. Ali Aujali. 11:35 a.m. Session on commercial prospects in Libya, with Deputy USTR Douglas Bell, Deputy Assistant Commerce Secretary Matthew Borman. 12:45 p.m. Luncheon panel on economic reforms in Libya, with Taher El Jehaimi, Secretary of the General People's Committee for Planning, others. Location: Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, 1779 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

PAKISTAN-ENERGY _ 8:45 a.m. - 5:30 p.m. Wilson Center program on ``Meeting Pakistan's Energy Needs in the 21st Century." Participants include: Ziad Alahdad, World Bank Institute; Mukhtar Ahmed, Energy Advisor to the Prime Minister of Pakistan; Shahid Javed Burki, former Pakistan finance minister; John Hammond, United States Energy Association; and officials from the Karachi Stock Exchange; Canadian International Development Agency; elsewhere. Location: Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars, 6th Floor Auditorium; Ronald Reagan Building and International Trade Center; 1300 Pennsylvania Ave., NW.

MIDEAST _ 9 a.m. - 2 p.m. The Middle East Institute holds a forum on ``U.S.-Libya Re-Engagement: The Path Forward," with Taher El Jehaimi, Secretary of the General People's committee for Planning. Location: Carnegie Endowment for International Peace.

SUPREME COURT _ 9 a.m. The Washington Legal Foundation holds a discussion to review the 2005 Supreme Court term. Location: Murdock Center for Free Enterprise, 2009 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

SEMICONDUCTOR INDUSTRY-DEFENSE _ 9 a.m. - 10:30 a.m. The Center for Strategic and International Studies (CSIS) will hold a session on the national defense implications of U.S. competitiveness with a particular focus on the semiconductor chip industry. Location: CSIS, 1800 K St. NW.

FIGHTING TERRORISM _ 10 a.m. The Heritage Foundation holds a panel discussion on ``24 and America's Image in Fighting Terrorism: Fact, Fiction or Does it Matter?" with Homeland Security Secretary Chertoff, talk show host Rush Limbaugh, David Heyman of CSIS, James Carafano of the foundation, ``24" Executive Producers Howard Gordon and Joel Surnow, plus ``24 cast members. Location: Reagan Trade Center.

PALESTINE _ 10 a.m. The Council for the National Interest holds a discussion on ``Politics of Starvation: The Humanitarian Crisis in Palestine," with Timothy Rothermel, former UNDP Chief in Jerusalem, and Laila El Haddad, Al-Jazeera International Correspondent. Location: Room SC-6, Capitol.

SMITH _ 10 a.m. Conservative author Mark Smith gives a lecture on a new conservative battle plan for the courts. Location: National Press Club.

JUSTICE-TERRORISM _ 11 a.m. Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty hosts a pen-and-pad (no cameras) roundtable regarding DOJ efforts to prosecute terrorists after 9/11. Location: Room 4111, main Justice.

ENERGY _ 11:30 a.m. Agriculture Secretary Johanns and Energy Secretary Bodman hold a telephone briefing to discuss their departments' renewable energy efforts. Notes: Callin number: 888-455-0060; passcode: 6761983.

DOJ_NMG_0036767

PORT SECURITY _ 12:30 a.m. Kurt Nagle, president of the American Association of Port Authorities, speaks on ``Security, Globalization and American Ports'' at monthly Transportation Table lunch. Location: National Press Club, 14th and F Sts. NW.

PRESCRIPTION DRUGS _ 12:15 p.m. The Commonwealth Fund and the Alliance for Health Reform hold a briefing on prescription drug coverage and practices at several health systems. Location: Room G-50, Dirksen.

SARBANES-OXLEY _ 12:30 p.m. The Heritage Foundation holds a seminar on the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, with Alex Pollock of AEI, David John of Heritage, others. Location: 4th floor, Capitol Hill Club, 300 1st St. SE.

USTR-UAE _ 2:15 p.m. USTR Susan Schwab meets with the MAE Minister of Economy and commerce Shikha Luban Al Qasimi. Photo op only. Location: USTR offices, 600 17th St. NW.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

DOJ_NMG_0036768

Blomquist, Kathleen M

From: Blomquist, Kathleen M
Sent: Tuesday, June 27, 2006 2:59 PM
To: Clement, Paul D; Garre, Gregory G; Gorsuch, Neil M; 'jimenezf@dodgc.osd.mil' Subject: Hamdan Background Media Call

Hi,

I wanted to touch base with you regarding the background media call that will take place after the Hamdan decision comes down. We'd like to shoot for 1pm to accommodate press deadlines but can push it back if you need more time. We do hope to set the time soon after the decision comes down, however, so that we can send out an advisory to reporters with the time and call-in information.

Also, we spoke with Mr. Clement about this earlier and understand that he may not be available.

Thanks very much,

Kat Blomquist
202/514-2007

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From: USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent: Tuesday, June 27, 2006 7:26 PM
To: USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject: PUBLIC AFFAIRS DAILY NEWS WRAP FOR JUNE 27, 2006

PUBLIC AFFAIRS DAILY NEWS WRAP
June 27, 2006

Contact: Brian Roehrkasse, Deputy Director, Office of Public Affairs (202) 514-2007

TOMORROW'S EXPECTED NEWS STORIES:

Attorney General Delivers Remarks at Tel Aviv University (OPA)
Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales delivered remarks this morning on Global Law Enforcement in a Post 9/11 World and participated in a question-and-answer session with attendees at Tel Aviv University in Tel Aviv, Israel.

KPMG Ruling (OPA)
Today, a federal judge ruled against the government in United States v. Stein, ruling that prosecutors unconstitutionally pressured accounting firm KPMG LLP not to pay legal fees – based on guidance in the Department's Thompson Corporate Fraud Guidelines memo – for 16 former partners accused of setting up illegal tax shelters for wealthy clients.

Talking Points:

- The principles articulated in the Thompson Memorandum were first set out in the late 1990s. They have been successfully used by prosecutors over the last eight years, including a period of unparalleled success in rooting out corporate misconduct.

- The guidelines are time-tested and fairly balance the interests of the business community and the investing public. We are therefore surprised and disappointed by Judge Kaplan's novel conclusion, never before reached by any other court, that these guidelines are constitutionally suspect.

- The Department remains committed to the principles and guidance set out in the Thompson Memorandum. The Department of Justice is currently studying Judge Kaplan's opinion and its legal options in response.

Justice Department Testimony on Signing Statements (OPA)
Michelle Boardman, Deputy Assistant Attorney General for the Office of Legal Counsel, testified before the Senate Judiciary Committee on Presidential Signing Statements today.

Nevada Sex Trafficking Conviction (Criminal)
A Reno, Nevada man has been convicted by a federal jury in Los Angeles on multiple charges related to the sex trafficking of minors. Yesterday, a jury in the Central District of California found Juan Rico Doss guilty of two counts of sex trafficking of children, three counts of transporting minors into prostitution, one count of conspiracy to commit sex trafficking of children and transporting minors into prostitution, and two counts of witness tampering. Doss was found not guilty on one count of witness tampering. These charges arose from information that Doss prostituted two minor victims in both California and Reno, Nevada, during the first two weeks of May 2005.

State of Indiana & ITS Intelenet Commission Agree to Pay U.S. over $8.2 Million to Settle False Claims Involving E-Rate Program (Civil)
The state of Indiana and the Intelenet Commission, an entity controlled by the state of Indiana, have agreed to pay the United States nearly $8.3 million as a civil settlement relating to allegations of making false claims and false statements in connection with the Federal Communication Commission's (FCC) E-Rate program, the Department of Justice and the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Southern District of Indiana announced today.

AT&T Agrees to Pay the United States $2.9 Million to Settle Allegations of Contracting Fraud (Civil)
AT&T Communications- East, Inc., a subsidiary of AT&T Corp., has agreed to pay the United States $2.9 million to settle claims that it defrauded the General Services Administration (GSA) from 1998 to 2001, the Justice Department announced today.

Justice Department Announces Agreement to Protect the Integrity and Accuracy of Indiana's Voter Registration List (Civil Rights)
The Justice Department today announced that it has reached an agreement with Indiana officials that will help to ensure the accuracy and integrity of Indiana's statewide registration list in accordance with the National Voter Registration Act (NVRA).
The agreement sets forth the state's short-term and long-term plan for creating and implementing a program to identify and remove ineligible voters from the statewide database, including deceased registrants, convicted felons, and voters who no longer live in Indiana or the county of their registration. The lawsuit, which was filed contemporaneously with the agreement, was filed following a Justice Department investigation that found that Indiana had hundreds of thousands of ineligible voters on its registration lists, including over 29,000 possibly deceased registrants and 290,000 duplicate registrations.

Justice Department Requires Divestiture in the Acquisition of Knight Ridder Inc by the McClatchy Company (Antitrust)
The Department of Justice announced today that it will require The McClatchy Company and Knight Ridder Inc. to divest the St. Paul Pioneer Press in order to proceed with their proposed multi-billion dollar newspaper merger. The Department said that the transaction, as originally proposed, would have eliminated head-to-head competition between McClatchy and Knight Ridder and likely would have resulted in higher prices for advertisers and readers in the Minneapolis/St. Paul metropolitan area. The Department's Antitrust Division filed a civil antitrust lawsuit today in U.S. District Court in Washington, D.C. to block the proposed transaction. At the same time, the Department filed a proposed consent decree that, if approved by the court, would resolve the lawsuit and the Department's competitive concerns. Under the terms of the consent decree, Knight Ridder can merge with and into McClatchy, but McClatchy must divest the St. Paul Pioneer Press.

Announcement of Information Protection Center at Utica College (FBI)
A press conference will be held tomorrow at the National Press Club where Acting Deputy Assistant Director Ray Morrow will discuss creating a new Center for Information Management and Information Protection at Utica College in upstate New York. United States Secret Service and several private companies will also participate.

Oprah to Feature Watch List (FBI)
Tomorrow, "The Oprah Winfrey Show" will feature a segment on the sexual predator watch list.

WEDNESDAY'S EXPECTED EVENTS/RELEASES:

The Environmental and Natural Resources Division will have a release on a vessel pollution matter. (Magnuson)

At 10:00 A.M., DEA Administrator Karen Tandy will testify before the House Armed Services Committee regarding Stability in Afghanistan.
: Office Building
Room 2118

The Supreme Court may hand down a decision tomorrow in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld.

Keisler, Peter D (CIV)

From:	Keisler, Peter D (CIV)
Sent:	Wednesday, June 28, 2006 9:04 AM
To:	McCallum, Robert (SMO); Gorsuch, Neil M
Cc:	Bucholtz, Jeffrey (CIV); Schiffer, Stuart (CIV); Katsas, Gregory (CIV); Cohn, Jonathan (CIV); Nichols, Carl (CIV); Calvert, Chris (CIV)
Subject:	Weekly

Robert, Neil: [redacted]. If so, my apologies -- and please start without me, of course. Thanks. Peter

Gorsuch, Neil M

From: Gorsuch, Neil M
Sent: Wednesday, June 28, 2006 9:10 AM
To: Keisler, Peter D (CIV)
Subject: Re: Weekly

Congratulations! Thrilled with today's news.

-----Original Message-----
From: Keisler, Peter D (CIV)
To: McCallum, Robert (SMO); Gorsuch, Neil M
CC: Bucholtz, Jeffrey (CIV); Schiffer, Stuart (CIV); Katsas, Gregory (CIV); Cohn, Jonathan (CIV); Nichols, Carl (CIV); Calvert, Chris (CIV)
Sent: Wed Jun 28 09:04:26 2006
Subject: Weekly

Robert, Neil: [redacted] If so, my apologies -- and please start without me, of course. Thanks. Peter

Keisler, Peter D (CIV)

From: Keisler, Peter D (CIV)
Sent: Wednesday, June 28, 2006 9:14 AM
To: Gorsuch, Neil M
Subject: Re: Weekly

Thanks so much. I've only known about it for a very, very short time, and have been keeping it under wraps, per instructions -- but I'm absolutely delighted you know and appreciate so much all our conversations leading up to this.

May I ask how you found out (and who else knows)? I'm very eager to share it with Robert, but I'm enjoined from discussing it with anyone, and have obeyed.

-----Original Message-----
From: Gorsuch, Neil M <Neil.Gorsuch@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
To: Keisler, Peter D (CIV) <pkeisler@CIV.USDOJ.GOV>
Sent: Wed Jun 28 09:09:40 2006
Subject: Re: Weekly

Congratulations! Thrilled with today's news.

-----Original Message-----
From: Keisler, Peter D (CIV)
To: McCallum, Robert (SMO); Gorsuch, Neil M
CC: Bucholtz, Jeffrey (CIV); Schiffer, Stuart (CIV); Katsas, Gregory (CIV); Cohn, Jonathan (CIV); Nichols, Carl (CIV); Calvert, Chris (CIV)
Sent: Wed Jun 28 09:04:26 2006
Subject: Weekly

Robert, Neil: [redacted] If so, my apologies -- and please start without me, of course. Thanks. Peter

Gorsuch, Neil M

From: Gorsuch, Neil M
Sent: Wednesday, June 28, 2006 9:20 AM
To: Keisler, Peter D (CIV)
Subject: Re: Weekly

Heard it yesterday informally but it was announced at sr mgmt mtg today with firm instructions not to be shared prior to public announcement.

-----Original Message-----
From: Keisler, Peter D (CIV)
To: Gorsuch, Neil M
Sent: Wed Jun 28 09:14:07 2006
Subject: Re: Weekly

Thanks so much. I've only known about it for a very, very short time, and have been keeping it under wraps, per instructions -- but I'm absolutely delighted you know and appreciate so much all our conversations leading up to this.

May I ask how you found out (and who else knows)? I'm very eager to share it with Robert, but I'm enjoined from discussing it with anyone, and have obeyed.

-----Original Message-----
From: Gorsuch, Neil M <Neil.Gorsuch@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
To: Keisler, Peter D (CIV) <pkeisler@CIV.USDOJ.GOV>
Sent: Wed Jun 28 09:09:40 2006
Subject: Re: Weekly

Congratulations! Thrilled with today's news.

-----Original Message-----
From: Keisler, Peter D (CIV)
To: McCallum, Robert (SMO); Gorsuch, Neil M
CC: Bucholtz, Jeffrey (CIV); Schiffer, Stuart (CIV); Katsas, Gregory (CIV); Cohn, Jonathan (CIV); Nichols, Carl (CIV); Calvert, Chris (CIV)
Sent: Wed Jun 28 09:04:26 2006
Subject: Weekly

Robert, Neil: [redacted]. If so, my apologies -- and please start without me, of course. Thanks. Peter

Katsas, Gregory (CIV)

From:	Katsas, Gregory (CIV)
Sent:	Wednesday, June 28, 2006 9:20 AM
To:	Keisler, Peter D (CIV); McCallum, Robert (SMO); Gorsuch, Neil M
Cc:	Bucholtz, Jeffrey (CIV); Schiffer, Stuart (CIV); Cohn, Jonathan (CIV); Nichols, Carl (CIV); Calvert, Chris (CIV)
Subject:	Re: Weekly

I'll be out until this afternoon, but have nothing significant to report, other than that we are trying to get as much of Appellate back online as quickly as possible.

-----Original Message-----
From: Keisler, Peter D (CIV) <pkeisler@CIV.USDOJ.GOV>
To: McCallum, Robert (SMO) <Robert.McCallum@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Gorsuch, Neil M <Neil.Gorsuch@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
CC: Bucholtz, Jeffrey (CIV) <JBucholt@CIV.USDOJ.GOV>; Schiffer, Stuart (CIV) <sschiffe@CIV.USDOJ.GOV>; Katsas, Gregory (CIV) <GKatsas@CIV.USDOJ.GOV>; Cohn, Jonathan (CIV) <JCohn@CIV.USDOJ.GOV>; Nichols, Carl (CIV) <canichol@CIV.USDOJ.GOV>; Calvert, Chris (CIV) <CCalvert@CIV.USDOJ.GOV>
Sent: Wed Jun 28 09:04:26 2006
Subject: Weekly

Robert, Neil: [redacted] If so, my apologies -- and please start without me, of course. Thanks. Peter

Gorsuch, Neil M

From: Gorsuch, Neil M
Sent: Wednesday, June 28, 2006 9:24 AM
To: Katsas, Gregory (CIV)
Subject: Re: Weekly

How did Treas mtg go?

-----Original Message-----
From: Katsas, Gregory (CIV)
To: Keisler, Peter D (CIV); McCallum, Robert (SMO); Gorsuch, Neil M
CC: Bucholtz, Jeffrey (CIV); Schiffer, Stuart (CIV); Cohn, Jonathan (CIV); Nichols, Carl (CIV); Calvert, Chris (CIV)
Sent: Wed Jun 28 09:20:15 2006
Subject: Re: Weekly

I'll be out until this afternoon, but have nothing significant to report, other than that we are trying to get as much of Appellate back online as quickly as possible.

-----Original Message-----
From: Keisler, Peter D (CIV) <pkeisler@CIV.USDOJ.GOV>
To: McCallum, Robert (SMO) <Robert.McCallum@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Gorsuch, Neil M <Neil.Gorsuch@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
CC: Bucholtz, Jeffrey (CIV) <JBucholt@CIV.USDOJ.GOV>; Schiffer, Stuart (CIV) <sschiffe@CIV.USDOJ.GOV>; Katsas, Gregory (CIV) <GKatsas@CIV.USDOJ.GOV>; Cohn, Jonathan (CIV) <JCohn@CIV.USDOJ.GOV>; Nichols, Carl (CIV) <canichol@CIV.USDOJ.GOV>; Calvert, Chris (CIV) <CCalvert@CIV.USDOJ.GOV>
Sent: Wed Jun 28 09:04:26 2006
Subject: Weekly

Robert, Neil: [redacted] If so, my apologies -- and please start without me, of course. Thanks. Peter

Katsas, Gregory (CIV)

From: Katsas, Gregory (CIV)
Sent: Wednesday, June 28, 2006 9:38 AM
To: Gorsuch, Neil M
Subject: Re: Weekly

Haven't had it yet. They were going to try to schedule something for late this week, but that might be hard given all of the dislocation.

I'm in [redacted] for a Fed Soc panel with Judge [redacted], General [redacted], and Prof [redacted]. It was a lot of fun, out here in what [redacted] calls "real America.". Back this aft to deal with multiple disasters such as Hamdan (looks like JPS has it) and [redacted]

Congrats on your hearing. Wish I'd known, to go and cheer you on. Seems like everything is on track.

-----Original Message-----
From: Gorsuch, Neil M <Neil.Gorsuch@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
To: Katsas, Gregory (CIV) <GKatsas@CIV.USDOJ.GOV>
Sent: Wed Jun 28 09:24:11 2006
Subject: Re: Weekly

How did Treas mtg go?

-----Original Message-----
From: Katsas, Gregory (CIV)
To: Keisler, Peter D (CIV); McCallum, Robert (SMO); Gorsuch, Neil M
CC: Bucholtz, Jeffrey (CIV); Schiffer, Stuart (CIV); Cohn, Jonathan (CIV); Nichols, Carl (CIV); Calvert, Chris (CIV)
Sent: Wed Jun 28 09:20:15 2006
Subject: Re: Weekly

I'll be out until this afternoon, but have nothing significant to report, other than that we are trying to get as much of Appellate back online as quickly as possible.

-----Original Message-----
From: Keisler, Peter D (CIV) <pkeisler@CIV.USDOJ.GOV>
To: McCallum, Robert (SMO) <Robert.McCallum@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Gorsuch, Neil M
<Neil.Gorsuch@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>

<Neil.Gorsuch@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
CC: Bucholtz, Jeffrey (CIV) <JBucholt@CIV.USDOJ.GOV>; Schiffer, Stuart (CIV) <sschiffe@CIV.USDOJ.GOV>; Katsas, Gregory (CIV) <GKatsas@CIV.USDOJ.GOV>; Cohn, Jonathan (CIV) <JCohn@CIV.USDOJ.GOV>; Nichols, Carl (CIV) <canichol@CIV.USDOJ.GOV>; Calvert, Chris (CIV) <CCalvert@CIV.USDOJ.GOV>
Sent: Wed Jun 28 09:04:26 2006
Subject: Weekly

Robert, Neil: [redacted] If so, my apologies -- and please start without me, of course. Thanks. Peter

Gorsuch, Neil M

From: Gorsuch, Neil M
Sent: Wednesday, June 28, 2006 9:49 AM
To: Katsas, Gregory (CIV)
Subject: RE: Weekly

Sounds like a great trip and it's a very good time to be away. If I were you, I'd extend it as chaos reigns here. [redacted] what a hassle. Thanks for the good wishes on the hearing; may [redacted] go just as smoothly!

-----Original Message-----
From: Katsas, Gregory (CIV)
Sent: Wednesday, June 28, 2006 9:38 AM
To: Gorsuch, Neil M
Subject: Re: Weekly

Haven't had it yet. They were going to try to schedule something for late this week, but that might be hard given all of the dislocation.

I'm in [redacted] for a Fed Soc panel with Judge [redacted], General [redacted], and Prof [redacted]. It was a lot of fun, out here in what [redacted] calls "real America.". Back this aft to deal with multiple disasters such as Hamdan (looks like JPS has it) and [redacted]

Congrats on your hearing. Wish I'd known, to go and cheer you on. Seems like everything is on track.

-----Original Message-----
From: Gorsuch, Neil M <Neil.Gorsuch@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
To: Katsas, Gregory (CIV) <GKatsas@CIV.USDOJ.GOV>
Sent: Wed Jun 28 09:24:11 2006
Subject: Re: Weekly

How did Treas mtg go?

-----Original Message-----
From: Katsas, Gregory (CIV)
To: Keisler, Peter D (CIV); McCallum, Robert (SMO); Gorsuch, Neil M
CC: Bucholtz, Jeffrey (CIV); Schiffer, Stuart (CIV); Cohn, Jonathan (CIV); Nichols, Carl (CIV); Calvert, Chris (CIV)
Sent: Wed Jun 28 09:20:15 2006
Subject: Re: Weekly

I'll be out until this afternoon, but have nothing significant to report, other than that we are trying to get as much of Appellate back online as quickly as possible.

-----Original Message-----
From: Keisler, Peter D (CIV) <pkeisler@CIV.USDOJ.GOV>
To: McCallum, Robert (SMO) <Robert.McCallum@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Gorsuch, Neil M <Neil.Gorsuch@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
CC: Bucholtz, Jeffrey (CIV) <JBucholt@CIV.USDOJ.GOV>; Schiffer, Stuart (CIV) <sschiffe@CIV.USDOJ.GOV>; Katsas, Gregory (CIV) <GKatsas@CIV.USDOJ.GOV>; Cohn, Jonathan (CIV) <JCohn@CIV.USDOJ.GOV>; Nichols, Carl (CIV) <canichol@CIV.USDOJ.GOV>; Calvert, Chris (CIV) <CCalvert@CIV.USDOJ.GOV>
Sent: Wed Jun 28 09:04:26 2006
Subject: Weekly

Robert, Neil: [redacted] If so, my apologies -- and please start without me, of course. Thanks. Peter

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Wednesday, June 28, 2006 9:49 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Attorney General's News Briefing for Wednesday, June 28, 2006
Attachments:	agnb060628.pdf; agnb060628.doc

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: WEDNESDAY, JUNE 28, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

In Jerusalem, Gonzales Warns Of Home-Grown Terror Plots..3
House GOP Drafting Resolution Condemning NYTimes Over Intelligence Leaks 4
Miami Terror Plot Suspect Makes Court Appearance 5
US Seeks Juror Anonymity For Hamas-Funding Trial....6
DOJ Defends Terror Prosecutions Despite Light Sentences ...6
Guantanamo Officials Say They Can't Prevent All Suicides 7
EU Justice Office Says Europeans Gave US Terror Suspects .7
UK Police Arrest Two Terror Suspects....7
State Department Backs Pan Am 103 Families In Libyan Row 7

Homeland Response:

Study Finds US Ports Remain Vulnerable To Terror Attacks....8
Court Upholds Ruling On DHS Personnel Rules 8

War News:

Bush Jogs With Soldier Who Lost His Legs In Iraq 8
2008 Campaign Seen As Context For Kerry-Feingold Alliance On Iraq Pullout 9
Holbrooke Praises Bush Request For UN Help In Iraq....9
US Has Detained 20 In Kidnapping, Murder Of Two Soldiers 10
US Military Disappointed By Baghdad Crackdown 10
Sadr Said To Have Lost Control Of Mahdi Army.... 10
Pentagon Expects To Meet Annual Training Goals For Iraqi Forces 10
Maliki Backtracks On Amnesty Offer As Part Of Reconciliation Plan 11
Turkish Ambassador To US Alleges Iraqi Kurds Backing Separatists.... 12
Saddam To Face Additional Charges In August 12
Rice Travels To Afghanistan To Bolster Support For Embattled Karzai 12
Taliban Fighters Challenge NATO Forces In Southern Afghanistan 13
US Military Incurring Unprecedented Vehicle Repair Costs... 13
Internet Sites Speed Care Packages To Soldiers 14

DOJ:

Main Justice Closed By Floodwaters After Heavy Rains.... 14
Brooklyn US Attorney Nominated To Federal Bench 14

Corporate Scandals:

US Subpoenas VeriSign In Widening Options Timing Probe 15
European Court Allows Extradition Of Enron-Linked British Bankers.... 15
Judge Sentences Barred Broker, Partner To Prison For Commodities Fraud 16
DOJ Handling Of Hilfiger Nonprosecution Agreement Questioned 16
Hedge Funds Intensify Political Efforts To Block New Regulation.... 17
Morgan Stanley Settles With SEC Over Insider Accounts 17
CA To Add Shareholder Proposal After Court's Refusal To Rule 18

Criminal Law:

Katrina Fraud Estimated At Near $2 Billion 18
Tribe Releases Photo Of Meeting Ney Said He Could Not Remember.... 18
House Members Grill Internet Providers Over Child Porn Restrictions.... 19
Opening Arguments Made At Trial Of Alleged Unregistered Iraqi Agent 19
Closing Arguments Begin At Chicago Patronage Trial.... 20
Fumo Computer Technicians Indicted Over Deleted Emails 20
Court Documents Reveal Two-Month Delay In FBI Seizure Of Pellicano Computers.... 20

Judge Declines To Release Connecticut Trash Kingpin On Bail For Now 20
Gotti Says He Will Leave New York If Acquitted At Third Trial 21
Retired FBI Agent Denies Receiving Gifts From Bulger, Flemmi 21
Both Sides In Aryan Brotherhood Trial Relying On Shady Witnesses 21
Michigan Doctor Indicted On Medicare Fraud Charges 22
Texas Executes "Railroad Killer" Linked To 15 Murders 22
Government, Companies Form Identity Fraud Research Center 23
Judge Refuses To Release Hoffa Search Affidavit 23
California Jury Finds Man Guilty Of Serial Murders 23
WPost Columnist Skeptical Of Evidence In Duke Rape Case 23
Coast Guard Cadet Acquitted Of Rape, Convicted Of Other Sex-Related Charges 24

Civil Law:

Indiana Settles E-Rate Fraud Claims With DOJ 24
DOJ Seeks Dismissal Of Budget Lawsuit 24
AT&T Settles Contracting Fraud Charges With DOJ For $2.9 Million 25
US Scrutinizing Drug Industry Gifts To Charities Tied To Doctors 25
FEC Accused Of Seeking To Intimidate Major 527 Contributors 25
LATimes Praises Supreme Court Ruling On Vermont Campaign Contribution Limits 25

Civil Rights:

DOJ Reaches Agreement With Indiana Over Purging Of Voter Rolls 26
DOJ Probes Bias Allegations In Ohio Village's Police Firings 26
Shreveport To Improve Public Building Access In Agreement With DOJ 26
Grassley To Proposes IRS Pursuit Of Sex Traffickers 26
Senate GOP Conservatives Opposing Leadership On Voting Rights Act 27
Osceola County, FL, To Challenge DOJ Voting Rights Suit .. 27
Single Manipulator Said Able To Change E-Voting Election Outcome 27
8th Circuit Upholds Continued Federal Monitoring Of Little Rock Schools 28
Flag Amendment Falls One Vote Short In Senate 28
LATimes Assails Schwarzenegger Prison Reform Proposals 29
WPost Lauds Supreme Court On Workplace Discrimination Decision 29

Antitrust:

Mississippi PSC Considers BellSouth-AT&T Merger 30
McClatchy Closes Knight Ridder Deal 30
Attorneys Doubt Foundation For DOJ Position On Employees' Statements 30
Antitrust Commission Proposal Would Reduce Firms' Civil Damage Liability 31
Investment Consortium Buys Univision For $12.3 Billion 31
Judge Clears Adelphia Assets Sale 32
Citizens Banking Buys Rival Republic Bancorp 32
Mittal-Arcelor Deal Marks Changes To Steel Industry 32
EU May Fine Microsoft Up To $577 Million 32

Environment/Indian Affairs:

Grass Roots, Lobbyists Driving Effort To Revamp Energy Policy 33
Domenici Offers Proposal On Nuclear Waste Storage 34
Report Cites US As Disproportionate Carbon Dioxide Producer 34
Carmona Says Only Smoke-Free Environments Protect Against Secondhand Smoke 34
Sioux Tribal Leaders Plans Blockade To Curb Beer Transit. 34

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Massachusetts Latin Kings Leader Sentenced To 21 Years In Prison 35
Three Minnesota Men Accused Of Conspiring To Distribute Fentanyl 35
Investigators To Determine If Limbaugh Violated Deal In Prescription Fraud Case 35
Two Men Sentenced For Role In Connecticut Drug Ring 36
NFL To Add Amphetamines To List Of Banned Substances. 36
Bonds: No Word From Mitchell In Baseball's Steroid Investigation 36
Lance Armstrong Seeks To Discount Allegations Of Drug Use 36
US Cyclist Faces More Doping Allegations 36

Immigration:

Key Senators Open To Specter Compromise On Immigration 37

Tax:

Judge Blasts DOJ For Pressuring KPMG Over Legal Fees ... 37
IRS Employees Caught Illegally Browsing Through Taxpayer Files 39
Former Wife Of Acquitted Mississippi Judge Sentenced For Tax Evasion 39

DOJ_NMG_0036785

Lacking Votes, Senate Republicans Postpone Consideration Of Estate Tax Repeal 39
Gingrich, Kies Criticize US Taxation Of Expatriates 40

Congress-Administration:

Bush Signing Statements Draw Ire Of Specter, Democrats At Judiciary Hearing 40
Bush Urges Senate To Pass Line-Item Veto 41
New York Democrats Call For DOJ Probe Of Fosella 42
Paulson Defends Bush Tax Cuts 42
White House Eyes Social Security, Tax Reform For Fall Agenda 43
Wallace Stepping Down As White House Communications Director 43
Bush To Nominate Donohue To Federal Judgeship 43
Bush Nominates Connaughton To Head Maritime Administration 43
Nicholson Wants $160.5 Million For VA Data Security 43
Administration To Announce Sweeping Welfare Rule Changes 44
Reid Threatens To Block Congressional Pay Raise Unless Minimum Wage Increased 44
Aide Defends Murkowski's Earmaks 44
Deer Spotted Inside Fence Near Cheney's Residence 45

Other News:

Rising Interest Rates Putting Brakes On Housing Markets 45
Ohio, National Democrats Differ On Utility Of Corruption Charges 46
Democrats Lead GOP By 16 Points On Generic Ballot In USA Today/Gallup Poll 46
Democrats Seen As Handicapped By Lack Of Single Messenger 46
DCCC Hopes To Defeat Reynolds 47
Democrats Tell Judge DeLay's Exit Harms Party 47
House GOP Unveils Values Agenda 47
Morris Says Lieberman Can't Win Primary 47
Ehrlich Trails O'Malley By 16 Points Among Likely Voters In WPost Poll 48
High Gasoline Prices Could Be Crimping Summer Travel Plans 48
WSJournal Calls On Buffett, Gates To Invest On Strengthening Capitalism 48
WPost Praises DC's New HIV Testing Program 48
Hamas-Fatah Political Deal Does Not Slow Israeli Move Into Gaza 48
Khamenei Offers Mixed Message On Nuclear Program, Appoints Foreign Policy Advisors 50
Warner Says North Korea Missile Test May Not Be Imminent 50
House Panel Approves India Nuclear Cooperation Deal 51
Koizumi To Visit US 51
Powell, Albright Advocate Fully-Funding Foreign Aid 51
Somali Islamic Militia Accused Of Breaking Cease-Fire 51
US Backs UN Conference On Reducing Illegal Arms 51
Energy Wealth Strengthens Russia's Hand, Presents Headache For US 52
Belarus Vow To Retaliate For US Sanctions 52
State Department Officials' Claims About Myanmar Called "Exaggerated." 52
Obrador's Relations With "Street Bosses" Raise Critic's Concerns 52
China Announces Over $1 Billion In Bank Fraud 53
Taiwan's Chen Easily Beats Recall Attempt 53
Oman Trade Deal Rouses Groups For, Against Pact 54
Schwab Says WTO Talks Eventually Will Succeed 54
Friedman Says Profitable Eco-Friendly Businesses Needed To Preserve Amazon 54

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages 54

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington 55

TERRORISM NEWS:

In Jerusalem, Gonzales Warns Of Home-Grown Terror Plots. The Jerusalem Post (6/28, Izenberg) reports, "US Attorney-General Alberto Gonzales on Tuesday warned that the war against terrorism was evolving and that a new threat was in the making from homegrown terrorism, which was sometimes harder to defend against than international terrorism. … 'They [home-grown terrorists] are much more difficult to find because they exist in our communities,' said Gonzales in a speech at Tel Aviv University's Jaffe Center for Strategic Studies, during a short visit to Israel which was due to end Wednesday. 'This is presenting additional challenges for us that we are now beginning to focus on.'" The Post continues, "Asked whether he thought the war against terrorism was succeeding, Gonzales replied, 'The US and other countries, like Israel are safer today. [But] we are not safe.' … Gonzales singled out US-Israel collaboration in combatting terrorism. 'We are working closing in the war on terror,' he said." The Post adds, "Gonzales that the improvement in US security was due to the establishment of the Homeland Security Department, new legislation such as the Patriot Act, the war against terrorism in Afghanistan and Iraq and strong international cooperation among law enforcement agencies, which he described as 'fantastic.' … Still, he said, he constantly reads intelligence reports about terrorist threats to the US and other countries, including Israel. 'I sometimes wonder when it this ever going to stop,' he added. 'And it may not stop for a while.' … Gonzales refused to say whether or not the Bush administration was seriously considering closing the prison facility at Guantanamo Bay. In the meantime, the US government is awaiting a Supreme Court ruling on a petition challenging the commissions established by the government to try some of the detainees imprisoned at the US facility."

DOJ_NMG_0036786

House GOP Drafting Resolution Condemning NYTimes Over Intelligence Leaks. CNN's The Situation Room (6/27, Henry) reported, "Republicans on Capitol Hill stepped up their barrage on The New York Times in another move that will rally conservatives in advance of the midterm elections." CNN added, "The chance to beat up on a newspaper with a liberal reputation is too good to resist for an administration struggling to keep its conservative base happy. … But White House Press Secretary Tony Snow was less certain than the vice president when pressed Tuesday on what evidence there is the leak has compromised terror probes. … Snow did charge The New York Times endangered lives by bucking a tradition of media organizations agreeing to keep government secrets at a time of war. But Times executive editor Bill Keller defended the decision to publish."

The Hill (6/28 O'Connor, Allen) reports House Republican "are expected to introduce a resolution today condemning The New York Times for publishing a story last week that exposed government monitoring of banking records." Rep. J.D. Hayworth "working independently from his leadership, began circulating a letter…asking his leaders to revoke the Times's congressional press credentials."

Roll Call (6/28, Ben Pershing) reports, "At press time Tuesday, the resolution was still being drafted by a handful of different committees under the direction of Majority Leader John Boehner's office. Republican sources said they expected the finished product would condemn both the leaking of the law enforcement program and its publication by the Times and a handful of other newspapers. … What is less clear is how House Democrats will react. Both Democratic leaders and rank-and-file lawmakers have complained in the past about the administration's conduct of the war on terrorism, particularly after The New York Times disclosed last year that the National Security Agency was listening to some domestic phone calls without a warrant. But in the case of the SWIFT story, most Democratic leaders have been noticeably silent. The administration even enlisted some Democrats, reportedly including Rep. John Murtha…to try to lobby the Times not to publish its piece."

Roberts Calls For Investigation. The AP (6/28) reports Sen. Pat Roberts, chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee, said the government "should conduct an inquiry into damage done by the recent disclosures of intelligence programs aimed at stopping terrorists. .. 'We cannot continue to operate in a system where the government takes steps to counter terrorism while the media actively works to disclose those operations without any regard for protection of lives, sources and legal methods,' said Roberts."

The New York Times (6/28, Shane, 1.19M) reports Roberts asked John D. Negroponte, director of national intelligence "to assess any damage to American counterterrorism efforts caused by the disclosure of secret programs to monitor telephone calls and financial transactions." Roberts "asked for a formal evaluation of damage to intelligence collection resulting from the revelation of the secret financial monitoring as well as The Times's disclosure in December of the National Security Agency's monitoring of phone calls and e-mail messages of Americans suspected of having links to Al Qaeda."

Fox News' Special Report (6/27, Hume) reported Roberts "argues the New York Times served no public interest when it exposed an effective and highly classified program that tracked terrorist money transfers." Roberts "asked the Director of National Intelligence John Negroponte to determine how much damage has been done by this most recent leak and by the Times story on the terrorist eavesdropping program."

DOJ_NMG_0036787

The Los Angeles Times (6/28, Schmitt, 958K) reports Roberts "said he was particularly concerned with disclosures that the administration was monitoring phone calls and Internet traffic without a warrant and accessing an international database of bank transactions. 'We have been unable to persuade the media to act responsibly and protect the means by which we protect this nation,' he wrote."

Group Files Complaint In 17 Countries Over Terror Finance Tracking. The AP (6/28) reports, "A civil liberties group on Wednesday asked governments around the world to block the release of confidential financial records to U.S. authorities as part of American anti-terrorist probes." The AP continues, "London-based watchdog Privacy International said it had filed complaints with data protection and privacy regulators in 17 countries, arguing that disclosures of financial transactions 'were made without any legal basis or authority whatsoever.' … The complaint, sent to regulators in 13 European countries as well as Canada, Australia, New Zealand and Hong Kong, asks authorities to 'intervene to seek the immediate suspension of the disclosure program pending legal review.'" The AP adds, "The U.S. Treasury acknowledged on Friday that since the Sept. 11, 2001 attacks on the U.S., it has tracked millions of financial transactions handled by the Belgium-based Society for Worldwide Interbank Financial Telecommunication, or SWIFT. … SWIFT oversees about 11 million financial transactions a day among banks and financial institutions worldwide, recording customers' names, account numbers and other identifying information. … Privacy International's director, Simon Davies, said the secret CIA-Treasury program 'shows yet again how the U.S. willfully disregards the privacy rights not only of its own citizens, but also the rights of foreign nationals.'"

King Says NYTimes Should Be Investigated, Prosecuted Under Espionage Act. Rep. Peter King was asked on MSNBC's Hardball (6/27) what should be done to the New York Times. King said, "They should be investigated and prosecuted for violating the Espionage Act. This was a program that was working, it was an effective weapon in the war against terrorism, it was entirely illegal and there was absolutely no public purpose at all in revealing it. They might have as well have taken confidential information and handed it to Osama bin Laden."

Markey Says NYTimes Has Provided "Enormous Public Service." Rep. Ed Markey said on MSNBC's Hardball (6/27), "The New York Times has provided an enormous public service. It has revealed that the Department of Treasury, the Bush Administration, when confronted with internal criticism, inside its own administration that this program may be illegal, rather than in fact getting a court order, or going to Congress, instead they hired an auditing firm, Booz Allen, in order to determine whether or not constitutional rights were violated. That in and of itself is a violation of the Constitution, and I think that as the story unfolds and people understand it more, that the New York Times, rather than going to jail, will be put up once again for another Pulitzer Prize."

NYTimes Defends Decision To Run Swift Story. The New York Times (6/28, 1.19M), in an editorial, writes, "Over the last year, The New York Times has twice published reports about secret antiterrorism programs being run by the Bush administration. Both times, critics have claimed that the paper was being unpatriotic or even aiding the terrorists. Some have even suggested that it should be indicted under the Espionage Act. … From our side of the news-opinion wall, the Swift story looks like part of an alarming pattern. Ever since Sept. 11, the Bush administration has taken the necessity of heightened vigilance against terrorism and turned it into a rationale for an extraordinarily powerful executive branch, exempt from the normal checks and balances of our system of government. It has created powerful new tools of surveillance and refused, almost as a matter of principle, to use normal procedures that would acknowledge that either Congress or the courts have an oversight role."

Miami Terror Plot Suspect Makes Court Appearance. The AP (6/28) reports, "Stanley Grant Phanor, one of seven men suspected of seeking to blow up the Sears Tower and with help from al-Qaida, made his first appearance in court Tuesday but did not enter a plea. Phanor and five other co-defendants will return to federal court before U.S. Magistrate Judge Ted Bandstra Friday in downtown Miami for a hearing on whether the men should remain in custody prior to trial, the U.S. Attorney's Office said. The seventh man, Lyglenson Lemorin, was scheduled to appear Thursday in federal court in Atlanta." The AP notes, "Phanor's brother Michael said his brother and the other men they were trying to do community service in the area where they grew up, studying martial arts to keep in shape and setting a good example for neighborhood kids."

Terror Suspects Allegedly Also Targeted Chicago FBI. WLS-TV Chicago (6/27, Goudie) reports on its Web site

DOJ_NMG_0036788

from a story broadcast yesterday, "Until federal court records obtained Tuesday revealed it, the Sears Tower appeared to be the only Chicago target of the accused terrorists," but "the FBI in Chicago was also on the terrorists' hit list." However, "the alleged terrorists might well have attacked the wrong building," hitting the Dirksen Federal Building, rather than the new FBI facility in Chicago. According to the court documents, terror suspect Narseal Batiste tried to recruit an "emissary to lobby Islamic extremists for money to fund the Sears Tower attack, the assault on the Chicago FBI and the other bombings. According to prosecutors, that person did not go to the Middle East for Batiste but did go to the FBI about him."

Illinois Editorial Says Miami Arrests Demonstrate Ongoing Terror Threat. Under the headline "Sears Tower Threat Shows Terrorism A Serious Concern," the Rockford (IL) Register Star (6/27) editorialized, "Fortunately, the man the wannabe terrorists thought was from al-Qaida was a FBI informant. 'This group was more aspirational than operational,' FBI Deputy Director John Pistole said. … Perhaps the attorney general and the FBI downplayed the threat to keep Americans calm or perhaps the seven men were truly the bunglers they've been portrayed as, but they could have caused plenty of damage with the machine guns they did ask for." The Register Star concluded, "This episode, and the more than 400 arrests for domestic terrorism since 2001, show that the government is paying attention to threats real and perceived. We should be thankful for that."

Miami Reporter Praises Arrests, But Worries Suspects Only "Pathetic Wannabes." In a Miami Herald (6/28, 323K) op-ed, Michael Putney of WPLG-TV Miami writes that in the Miami arrests, "the FBI acted on information provided by a confidential informant," and "until this is sorted out it's a good thing these guys are behind bars. … But I can't help wondering if the Feds swooped in too soon and merely gathered up some 'pathetic wannabes,' as the editorial page of this paper called them. The Liberty City Seven may have said violent things, but they didn't commit violent acts." Putney adds that in their conversations with the FBI informant, the suspects made "big talk, but these guys had no money, guns, bullets, bombs or explosives."

US Seeks Juror Anonymity For Hamas-Funding Trial. Knight Ridder/Chicago Tribune (6/28, Coen) reports, "Federal prosecutors have asked a judge to seat an anonymous jury to hear the case" of Muhammad Salah, accused of "taking part in a conspiracy to fund Hamas, which raises concerns for prospective jurors, the court filing states. 'The nature of the charges and the evidence supporting the charges are such as to place jurors in reasonable apprehension for their safety,' the motion reads." The Tribune notes, "The parties in the Salah case are expected to appear for a status hearing Wednesday before U.S. District Judge Amy St. Eve. The judge already has indicated she might want thorough criminal background checks performed on each prospective juror."

DOJ Defends Terror Prosecutions Despite Light Sentences. NBC News (6/28) reports, "Dozens have been arrested in the U.S., suspected of terrorist ties, but the offenses are typically small and the sentences short. Is the government crackdown working?" NBC continues, "Some legal experts accuse the Justice Department overselling the arrests cases as terrorism arrests, generating dramatic headlines that actually end very differently. … 'Our approach tends to be, I think, prosecutions by press conferences,' says Juliette Kayyem, an NBC terrorism analyst and a professor at Harvard University. 'A lot is promised at the front end, and then when you actually get to the facts of the case, it tends to fall apart.'" NBC adds, "Sensitive to that criticism, the government is now defending its record. … Just last week, the Justice Department said 261 people have been convicted in terror-related prosecutions since 2001. Many were solid wins — Iyman Faris, who plotted to attack the Brooklyn Bridge, for example. Would-be shoe bomber Richard Reid, and Mohammed Babar, who admitted providing support for al-Qaida operations overseas. … But of the total 261 convictions, the average sentence is only around a year, from plea agreements, to charges like immigration or document fraud. And sometimes the threat may seem remote, as with the Lackawanna Six, the group in Buffalo, N.Y., convicted of getting terror training but never charged with planning any specific attack." NBC notes, "Even so, in a recent speech, the deputy attorney general said all are examples of a new approach — prevention through prosecution. … 'We could await further action by these men and then arrest and prosecute them,' says Paul McNulty, U.S. deputy attorney general, 'or we could prosecute at the moment our investigation reveals both a risk to our national security and a violation of our nation's laws,' … And the government cites one other statistic: Since Sept. 11, 2001, no further terror attacks in the U.S."

DOJ_NMG_0036789

Guantanamo Officials Say They Can't Prevent All Suicides. The Los Angeles Times (6/28, Williams, 958K) reports, "In the sharpening debate" about whether the suicides at Guantanamo Bay were "political statements or the actions of hopelessly depressed individuals," prison officials "outlined sweeping efforts to prevent them — but admitted nothing could stop the most determined prisoners." The commander of the prison, Navy Rear Adm. Harry B. Harris Jr., "stood by his characterization of the suicides as acts of 'asymmetrical warfare' by hardened holy warriors," rejecting the notion that the detainees killed themselves out of despair. The Times says the accessibility of these officials reflects "Harris' view of public scrutiny, which is more liberal than that of previous prison administrations." The Times writes that the interviews "seemed aimed at preparing the American public for continued detention and interrogation operations."

Commander Claims As Many As 140 Detainees Should Be Repatriated. ABC World News Tonight (6/27, story 5, 3:45, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Nightline anchor Terry Moran is getting unprecedented access this week to the Guantanamo facility." ABC (Moran) added, "Rear Admiral Harry Harris is in charge of the camp. In the first interview since Guantanamo was rocked by a riot last month and suicides of three inmates just over two weeks ago, Harris says he has no doubt men in here see their fates. Is any detainee allowed to see the evidence against them?" Harris: "No." Moran: "That doesn't seem fundamentally fair." Harris: "It's not fundamentally fair in a criminal sense. These are enemy combatants." Moran notes, "But only ten detainees have been charged with war crimes. Nearly 300 have been let freed. And defense lawyers for those incarcerated here say the lack of due process and hope has turned Guantanamo into a place of despair. The suicides on June 10th have made Guantanamo even tougher." ABC's Gibson asked: "I'm curious, the President has said he would like eventually to have Guantanamo closed down. How about the commander? What does he think about that?" Moran: "It might come as a surprise, but Admiral Harris says he supports that idea. He doesn't think Guantanamo should be opened any longer than it has to be. He believes there are 140 of the 450 detainees here who can be sent back to their home countries. But he says, he believe there's are 300 or so others that will have to be detained somewhere."

Guantanamo Prison Commander Says Detainees Waging Jihad. The AP (6/27, Jacobs) reports the medical officer in charge of the Guantanamo prison said the three detainees who committed suicide on June 10 had received psychological exams just days before to their deaths and showed no signs of depression. He suggested that the exams "supported assertions by military officials that the prisoners killed themselves as a political act."

EU Justice Office Says Europeans Gave US Terror Suspects. USA Today (6/28, 5A, 2.31M) reports comments by European Union Justice and Home Affairs Commissioner Franco Frattini that "terrorism suspects have been transferred to U.S. intelligence agents in Europe, but it's not clear whether the moves were illegal" or "whether governments knew about or cooperated in the transfers." Frattini "spoke after Europe's leading human rights watchdog, the Council of Europe, voted to continue its inquiry into alleged CIA flights and secret prisons in Europe. The council's lead investigator, Dick Marty of Switzerland, has complained that European governments weren't eager to help him establish the facts.

UK Police Arrest Two Terror Suspects. In its "Briefs" section, the New York Times (6/28, Lyall, 1.19M) reports Bolton, England police "arrested two people under terrorism legislation…in the latest in a series of antiterrorism raids — some linked, some independent — across England in the last few weeks." Police apprehended the two individuals, who have not yet been charged, after searching eight properties.

State Department Backs Pan Am 103 Families In Libyan Row. The AP (6/27) reports the Department of State "urged Libya on Tuesday to provide fair compensation to the families of victims in the 1988 bombing of a Pan Am flight over Scotland." Deputy Spokesman Adam Ereli is quoted saying, "Obviously, we support justice for the Pan Am 103 families, and we support their efforts to receive due compensation. We are actively involved in encouraging the Libyan government to extend escrow arrangements made under the settlement so that the final payment can be effected. In this matter, we want to see it resolved fairly." The Washington Post (6/27, A17, Graham, 744K) reported yesterday that Libyan officials are hedging on a previous agreement to make the final $2 million-per-family compensation payments this summer.

DOJ_NMG_0036790

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Study Finds US Ports Remain Vulnerable To Terror Attacks. Knight Ridder (6/28, Simerman) reports a study by the Public Policy Institute of California finds that US "seaports remain vulnerable to attack and a lack of coordination among agencies could worsen the economic aftermath of a terrorist attack." KRT notes, "One obstacle is a lack of a clear line of authority for emergency response. In areas like Los Angeles, as many as 15 different agencies may have jurisdiction, the study found." Port of Oakland security chief Mike O'Brien "said local, state and federal agencies work together on drills and exercises, and that the FBI has been designated as the lead agency if the port is attacked. 'We're talking about what-ifs and sorting out those jurisdictional issues,' said O'Brien."

Court Upholds Ruling On DHS Personnel Rules. The New York Times (6/28, Lipton, 1.19M) reports, "The United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit upheld a lower court decision that overturned personnel rules at the Homeland Security Department, saying they failed to ensure employees' right to bargain collectively. … The department set up the system in January 2005, saying it would allow salaries to be based on performance. A department spokesman said officials were considering what to do about the ruling."

The Washington Post (6/28, A23, Weiss, 744K) calls the ruling "another legal blow to the Bush administration's broad plan to overhaul the federal employee personnel system." The Post adds, "Elated union leaders said the decision could scuttle the broader attempt to replace the 15-grade General Schedule pay system with one that has wide salary ranges known as pay bands, and to more strongly tie annual raises to performance evaluations. The administration hopes to expand the proposed DHS system throughout the government."

The Washington Post (6/28, D4, Barr, 744K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column, "Administration officials, who spoke only on condition that they not be identified, acknowledged that the ruling was a heavy blow. One official said the new Homeland Security personnel system was 'dead in the water' and added: 'There is no leadership on this.'"

The Federal Times (6/28, Losey) reports, "The National Treasury Employees Union, which was lead plaintiff in the case, said the appeals court decision effectively settles the matter and strikes down what it calls 'a regressive personnel system.' … Homeland Security spokesman Larry Orluskie said the department will soon discuss the impact of the ruling with the Justice Department and Office of Personnel Management and decide what their next steps will be."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Jogs With Soldier Who Lost His Legs In Iraq. All three networks devoted segments of last night's broadcasts to President Bush's White House jog with Staff Sgt. Christian Bagge, who lost both legs in a roadside bomb explosion in Iraq. NBC Nightly News (6/27, story 11, 0:30, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "We want to share with you what became an emotional moment today on the South Lawn at the White House. President Bush, who has stopped jogging of late due to bad knees, suited up today so he could fulfill a promise, to go on a run with a young and courageous Iraqi war veteran he had first met back in January at Brook Army Medical Center."

ABC World News Tonight (6/27, story 8, 1:15, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The President just happened to stop at his bedside at an Army hospital in San Antonio." President Bush: "He said, 'I want to run with you.' He was in bed. He lost both legs. But I looked at him like, you know, there is an optimistic person. But I could tell in his eyes that he meant it." Gibson: He did, indeed, mean it. And today, he did it. Sergeant Bagge has been through 11 surgeries. And he runs on artificial limbs." Sgt. Bagge: "There's a lot of days when I don't want to do it anymore. But I can't just -- I can't call in sick. I can't quit." Gibson: "There was no quit in the Sergeant today. As he ran around the South Lawn of the White House with the President."

The CBS Evening News (6/27, story 5, 0:30, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported Bagge "was in the Oregon National Guard at the time" of the attack, "but has since enlisted in the regular Army."

The AP (6/28, Loven) reports, "Despite a slight drizzle," Bush and Bagge "took a slow jog around a spongy track that circles the White House's South Lawn. About halfway through their approximately half-mile run, Bush and Bagge paused briefly for reporters. 'He ran the president into the ground, I might add,' Bush said, as the two gripped hands in an emotional, lengthy shake. 'But I'm proud of you. I'm proud of your strength, proud of your character.'"

DOJ_NMG_0036791

USA Today (6/28, Benedetto, 2.31M) reports Bush, "who swapped his once-manic running regimen for mountain biking due to pain in his knees, said he was inspired by Bagge's courage. 'It's an amazing sight for me to be running with a guy who, last time I saw him, was in bed,' Bush said. 'I was wondering whether or not he'd ever get out of bed. There was no doubt in his mind that he would.'"

The Los Angeles Times (6/28, Gehlert, 958K) reports Bagge's right leg "was amputated above the knee, his left leg just below the knee. For many months, he said, he needed narcotics for the severe phantom pain and post-surgical agony. … Bagge has four sets of limbs: one for walking, one for running, one for swimming and one as a backup. And he's not ashamed of his injuries: When he was awarded a Purple Heart last year, Bagge wore shorts to the ceremony.

2008 Campaign Seen As Context For Kerry-Feingold Alliance On Iraq Pullout. The AP (6/28, Frommer) reports Sens. John Kerry and Russ Feingold "joined forces last week to push a proposal that would have required troops to leave Iraq by July of next year. And they may soon have something else in common: Both are considering presidential races in 2008." Kerry and Feingold "insist that politics has nothing to do with it." Feingold "has been openly critical of Democrats who voted to authorize the Iraq war, even those who have since said that vote was a mistake — a group that includes Kerry. But Feingold said that was one reason he was so encouraged to work with Kerry. 'Let's face it — he was our standard-bearer, he had voted for the war,' Feingold said. 'And yet, I was able to bring him together with me to do exactly what I've believed all along, that this wasn't a good idea, and that we needed to reverse course.'"

Senate Democrats Claim GOP Iraq Stance Is Cynical, Hypocritical. The Washington Times (6/28, Bellantoni, 90K) reports Senate Democrats accused Republicans "of using a 'Karl Rove playbook' to make the minority party seem weak on defense and to defeat a Democratic plan to begin withdrawing troops from Iraq." Sen. Carl Levin "called Republicans hypocritical for opposing his 'phased redeployment' plan because top military officials have announced there is likely to be some troop withdrawal this year." Senate Democratic leaders "will hold a press conference today on Iraq policy, during which several Democratic senators 'will call on Bush Republicans to put aside their failed policies and join Democrats, Gen. Casey and the Iraqis in working to change course in Iraq,' according to an announcement."

The Washington Post's Harold Meyerson (6/28, A25) writes, "When Senate Democrats brought two resolutions to the floor last week, each calling for a change in our policy, the Republicans defeated them both, but they pointedly failed to introduce a resolution of their own affirming the administration's conduct of the war. That, they understood, would have been a loser in the court of public opinion."

WPost/ABC News Poll Shows Democrats Losing Ground On Iraq. CNN's The Situation Room (6/27, Crowley) reported, "New polling suggests congressional debate on a US withdrawal from Iraq did not change minds, but it did push the politics. A Washington Post/ABC poll finds Republicans with a seven-point edge on the question of which party would best handle terrorism. Forty-six percent of Americans said Republicans, 39 percent said Democrats. That's a seven point drop for Democrats in a month. … The same poll shows Democrats losing ground on Iraq. They still hold a six-point edge as the party that would do a better job, but that is down from the 14-point advantage they had in May. Wrong way for a group that hopes to win big at polls in just about four months."

Holbrooke Praises Bush Request For UN Help In Iraq. In his monthly column for the Washington Post (6/28, A25, 744K) former UN ambassador Richard Holbrooke writes, "In a little-noticed announcement in President Bush's news conference on June 14, the day he returned from Iraq, he said that he would send two personal emissaries to New York to consult with U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan on the political and economic future of Iraq. The next day, still with remarkably little public attention, Philip Zelikow, the counselor of the State Department, and Deputy Treasury Secretary Robert Kimmitt met with Annan and his deputy, Mark Malloch Brown, at the secretary general's Sutton Place residence." The envoys "asked Annan to use his unique 'convening powers' to help organize international meetings that would lead (by this fall, the Americans hope) to the unveiling of a new 'Iraq Compact' -- an agreement between the Iraqi government and major international donors that would commit Baghdad to a series of political and economic reforms in return for substantially more international aid. … This is a good idea -- and quite similar to suggestions from many administration critics."

DOJ_NMG_0036792

US Has Detained 20 In Kidnapping, Murder Of Two Soldiers. The Washington Times (6/28, Scarborough, 90K) reports, "The U.S. military has detained 20 persons with knowledge of the brutal deaths of two American soldiers south of Baghdad and thinks al Qaeda in Iraq was responsible, an Army general said yesterday. Maj. Gen. James Thurman, who commands U.S. operations in and around Baghdad, said at a press conference that more than 8,000 Americans and Iraqis searched for the soldiers after their traffic checkpoint was attacked on June 16. The bodies of Pfc. Kristian Menchaca, 23, and Pfc. Thomas Tucker, 25 were found three days later in a village in the 'Triangle of Death.' … Asked who was suspected in the killings, Gen. Thurman said, 'This is a terrorist and foreign fighter area where al Qaeda operates. And I will tell you I believe al Qaeda is associated with the majority of the attacks in south Baghdad, and in and around the area where we found the soldiers.'"

The Los Angeles Times (6/28, Moore, 958K) reports, "Thurman declined to answer questions about possible procedural lapses that would have allowed the soldiers to leave their camp unaccompanied, saying the inquiry was continuing. U.S. military vehicles in Iraq almost always travel in groups of two or more."

US Military Disappointed By Baghdad Crackdown. USA Today/AP (6/28) reports, "The U.S. military issued a sober assessment Tuesday of the Baghdad security crackdown, saying violence had decreased only slightly in the two weeks since 75,000 American-backed Iraqi soldiers flooded the capital." Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, spokesman for U.S. forces in Iraq, "said the overwhelming security operation launched two weeks ago to rein in violence was moving slower than hoped. … 'We … see a slight decrease (in violence) but not of the degree we would like to see at this point,' he said at a news conference in the heavily fortified Green Zone."

Baghdad Residents Resort To Subterfuge To Escape Pervasive Violence. The Los Angeles Times (6/28, Stack, 958K) reports that in Baghdad, "Rich people hide their jewelry and dig frayed clothes from the back of their closets to evade ransom-seeking kidnappers. Muslims claim to be Sunni or Shiite, depending on circumstance. Christians pose as Muslims. Lying about employment is de rigueur. Street police wrap their faces in masks so nobody will recognize them. Everybody, it seems, is pretending to be somebody else, adopting a fake identity in the terrified hope of staying safe. Baghdad residents reason that no matter who you are, you're probably on somebody's hit list."

The Washington Times (6/28, Behn, 90K) reports, "In a country where people are killed because their names mark them as Shi'ites or Sunnis, having the wrong haircut can be lethal, too. So for barber Abu Saif, staying in business requires keeping up with the latest religious edicts. … The shape of a beard or haircut often marks its wearer as Shi'ite or Sunni, ensuring support in some neighborhoods but putting him at risk in others. Religious Sunnis, for example, do not remove any neck hair, and fundamental Wahhabis never shave or trim their beards, but will cut down their mustaches to almost nothing."

Sadr Said To Have Lost Control Of Mahdi Army. The Washington Times (6/28, Scarborough, 90K) reports Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr "has lost control of his Mahdi Army, which has embarked on a wide range of criminal activity, defense officials said. The officials said the Mahdi Army, which once confined most of its activities to protecting the firebrand cleric's religious turf and trying to dominate towns in Shi'ite southern Iraq, has become a criminal organization that commits homicides, kidnappings and robberies in the Baghdad area. … Sources said Army Gen. George Casey, during his trip to Washington last week for talks with President Bush and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, raised the Mahdi Army as a growing obstacle to peace."

Pentagon Expects To Meet Annual Training Goals For Iraqi Forces. The Washington Post (6/28, A20, White, 744K) reports, "U.S. military commanders expect to meet their goal of training and equipping more than 325,000 members of the new Iraqi security forces by the end of this year, an important step in developing Iraq's self-defense, Lt. Gen. Martin Dempsey, who leads the training effort, said yesterday." According to the Post, "Top officials remain optimistic" but "they warned that there is a long way to go before the Iraqis will be able to independently fight the insurgents." Dempsey is quoted as saying, "It's just not appropriate yet to be thinking in terms of independent anything in Iraq … They are not independent at this point in time." The Post adds that Dempsey noted, "Iraqi forces are not yet able to operate on their own, and the fact that they are learning while facing combat has created hurdles."

DOJ_NMG_0036793

The New York Times (6/28, Shanker, 1.19M) reports Dempsey "cautioned that the new military in Iraq still faced a shortage of qualified officers and the infrastructure required to carry out independent operations. … Dempsey said the threat of armed militias could be resolved only by negotiations with religious leaders commanding those illegal groups, and by taking away their foot soldiers by offering them the choice of a role within government-controlled security services, an opportunity to disarm — or punishment."

Maliki Backtracks On Amnesty Offer As Part Of Reconciliation Plan. The Washington Post (6/28, A14, Partlow, Sebti, 744K) reports Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki "vowed Tuesday that no one who has killed Americans or Iraqis would be pardoned under his government's national reconciliation plan." Maliki is quoted as saying, "The fighter who did not kill anyone will be included in the amnesty, but the fighter who killed someone will not be." The Post adds, "The question of who should receive amnesty has been fiercely debated, and the issue was not settled with the vague terms first offered on Sunday, when the plan was brought before parliament. Some politicians argue that only a broader amnesty has any real chance of bringing the violent Sunni Arab insurgency into the Iraqi political process in a peaceful way. But Maliki…said the Iraqi and American families who have lost loved ones in the three-year war would not stand for such pardons." Maliki "said lesser offenses, such as minor acts of sabotage or participation in former president Saddam Hussein's Baath Party could be forgiven."

The New York Times (6/28, Tavernise, Burns, 1.19M) reports Maliki "sought to allay concerns raised by many in the United States that the plan, which he unveiled Sunday as part of a broad effort to reduce insurgent violence, could lead to pardons for some who had killed American soldiers and spur attacks on American units." The Times notes Maliki "said the plan had drawn widespread interest from groups important to its success, including members of political militias, tribal groups, religious leaders and insurgent groups," though he "would not identify the insurgent groups." According to the Times, "Allies of Mr. Maliki have said that the amnesty, presented by American officials and the prime minister's aides among many initiatives that would give momentum to the new government, reflected his relative political weakness."

Maliki Claims Offer Has Been Well Received By Insurgents. The Los Angeles Times (6/28, Moore, 958K) reports, "The Iraqi government has had contact with several insurgent organizations through intermediaries since the announcement of a partial amnesty plan…Maliki said. … 'Many people contacted me on the day I announced the reconciliation plan, and there is a lot of support even from militias and…armed [insurgent] groups,' Maliki said during a rare interview with six Western and Iraqi journalists. 'We welcome their assistance, but we are still waiting until we can meet directly with these groups and talk to them in a civilized way in order to bring them into the political process.'"

Dempsey Contends Amnesty For Insurgents Is Likely. The New York Times (6/28, Shanker, 1.19M) reports Lt. Gen. Martin Dempsey, "in a statement of battlefield realism rarely heard from a lecturn in Washington, said "it was certain that a national reconciliation plan offered by the new Baghdad government would include amnesty for at least some who had engaged in insurgent acts. 'Isn't there some sense of inevitability about that?' General Dempsey said." Dempsey said "without a national reconciliation plan that reaches out simultaneously to Sunni insurgents and Shiite militia members, neither side would disarm out of fear of the other."

Ignatius Says Khalilzad Comments Show Administration Eager To Escape "Iraq Morass." The Washington Post's David Ignatius (6/28, A25) writes US Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad "outlined the Bush administration's current thinking about Iraq in a telephone interview from Baghdad on Monday. The items on his agenda include a joint U.S.-Iraqi committee to discuss the details for a gradual withdrawal of American troops over the next several years, a conditional amnesty for Iraqi insurgents as part of a broader reconciliation effort, and negotiations with insurgent groups about terms and conditions for ending the fighting. What was clear in Khalilzad's comments (but is rarely so in the partisan Washington debate about Iraq) is how badly the Bush administration wants to find a way out of the Iraq morass."

NYTimes Claims Amnesty Should Include "Unsavory" Combatants. The New York Times (6/28, 1.19M), in an editorial, writes, "the Iraqi government talks about denying amnesty to insurgents who have killed other Iraqis, and Washington has insisted on excluding those who have killed Americans. That is understandable on both counts, but it would seem to leave few, if any, real insurgents eligible for any amnesty. … Any reconciliation broad enough to matter will require embracing unsavory people and forgiving unsavory deeds. That won't be pretty or popular. But it is Iraq's best remaining hope for peace, reconstruction and national survival."

DOJ_NMG_0036794

Turkish Ambassador To US Alleges Iraqi Kurds Backing Separatists. The Washington Times (6/28, Sands, 90K) reports Turkey's ambassador to the US Nabi Sensoy claimed, "The United States' Kurdish allies in northern Iraq have provided arms, shelter and equipment to a violent Kurdish separatist movement in Turkey, and the U.S. government should do more to disrupt the links." Sensoy "said Ankara has evidence that as many as 3,000 fighters from the Kurdistan Workers' Party (PKK), considered a terrorist organization by the U.S. government, recently had moved from positions in northern Iraq to the Turkish border to carry out operations inside Turkey. The PKK units, Mr. Sensoy said, have received arms, safe passage and other logistical help from the two leading Iraqi Kurdish parties -- both of which are strongly allied with Washington."

Saddam To Face Additional Charges In August. CNN's The Situation Room (6/27, Blitzer) reported, "Iraqi officials are announcing another trial for the former dictator Saddam Hussein. He'll face charges starting in August in connection with the killings of as many as 200,000 Kurds in the late 1980s."

The Los Angeles Times (6/28, Kennedy, 958K) reports Hussein "and six high-ranking members of his regime will be indicted on charges of genocide this summer in the mass killings of Iraqi Kurds during a seven-month operation in 1988, the court trying the former Iraqi president announced Tuesday. … Iraq's minority Kurds, who inhabit the northern portion of the country, have long sought justice for the Anfal campaign, in which at least 2,000 villages were destroyed and tens of thousands of people were arrested, deported, tortured and killed, often in remote desert camps."

Saddam Believes US Will Seek His Help To Stop Insurgency. CNN's The Situation Room (6/27, Snow) reported, "Saddam Hussein apparently believes he can evade a death sentence because he thinks the US will seek his help in stopping the insurgency ravaging Iraq. That is according to Hussein's chief defense lawyer, who recently spoke with the Associated Press and the New York Times. One Iraqi expert suggests the idea says more about Saddam Hussein's mindset than about reality."

Clark Says Saddam Has No Thoughts Of Political Comeback. Ramsey Clark, a defense attorney for Saddam Hussein, was asked on CNN's The Situation Room (6/27) about reports that Hussein is thinking of making a political comeback. Clark said, "I don't think he has any thoughts of a political comeback. I've never heard him say anything about it or seen any indication of it. The thing that he always says and is always clear is that he's torn apart by what he sees happening to his country, to the people of Iraq. And the thing he says above all is Iraqis should never kill Iraqis. You've got to join together."

Rice Travels To Afghanistan To Bolster Support For Embattled Karzai. The Washington Post (6/28, A21, Kessler, 744K) reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice flew to Kabul to meet with President Hamid Karzai, "who is facing mounting international criticism over his performance. Rice "hailed Karzai as 'an extraordinary leader' and said the United States would 'back him fully.' Rice's visit comes as Karzai is straining to hold his country together but is losing popular support because of increasing violence, corruption, drug trafficking and an inability to demonstrate tangible progress since the fall of the Taliban. A failure of the Karzai government would undermine Bush administration claims that Afghanistan has become a symbol of rising freedom and democracy in the world." The New York Times (6/28, Cooper, 1.19M) reports Rice "had strong words of praise for the besieged Afghan president."

Pakistani Official Defends His Country's Performance Combating Taliban. The Washington Post (6/28, A21, Kessler, 744K) reports Rice tried "to heal a rift between Pakistan and Afghanistan…but tensions spilled over during a news conference in which Pakistani Foreign Minister Khursheed Kasuri angrily accused the Afghan government of making false charges. Rice smiled tightly during Kasuri's emotional, five-minute outburst, which was prompted by a question about Afghan claims that Pakistan is allowing its largely lawless border areas to shelter insurgents who are mounting their biggest offensive in Afghanistan since the Taliban was ousted in 2001." Kasuri "said Pakistan would add 10,000 troops to the 80,000 now operating in areas bordering Afghanistan."

DOJ_NMG_0036795

The Washington Times (6/28, Kralev, 90K) also reports Rice was "smiling tightly" as Kasuri "rejected Afghan accusations that Pakistan is sending terrorists across the border in an emotional monologue." Rice "urged the two countries to trust each other more" and "said the U.S. military would step up joint efforts with both of them to quell the resurgence of Taliban activity along the frontier." The New York Times (6/28, Cooper, 1.19M) reports Rice "refrained from wading into the continuing fight between Pakistan and Afghanistan over who is doing more to root out terrorism on the lawless border between the countries amid surging Taliban attacks." With Rice standing next to him "looking straight ahead,". Kasuri "went through a lengthy list of all he said Pakistan had given to fighting terrorism. … 'We have had 650 martyred soldiers' since the border effort began, he said. 'We have more troops than Afghanistan and the U.S. put together.'"

Rice Prods Musharraf To Foster Democracy. The New York Times (6/28, Cooper, 1.19M) reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice met with Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf, "whom she prodded, gently, to allow democratic elections. 'We've had a discussion about the role of continuing democratization,' Ms. Rice said after the meeting. 'It's a good start to talk about a good and moderate Pakistan.'"

The Los Angeles Times (6/28, Gerstenzang, 958K) reports Rice's "trip, which will also include Russia, encapsulates major goals of the Bush administration's foreign policy: seeking to promote democratic growth as a weapon against terrorism and to undercut potential nuclear proliferation. Visits by senior U.S. officials to Pakistan regularly revolve around questions of how devoted Musharraf…is to pushing his country toward democracy and how quickly he will move."

Taliban Fighters Challenge NATO Forces In Southern Afghanistan. The New York Times (6/28, Gall, 1.19M) reports, "Two British soldiers were killed Tuesday in fighting in southern Afghanistan against combatants suspected of being Taliban members, and a suicide bomber detonated his car next to German peacekeepers in northern Afghanistan, killing two boys. … The increase in activity by the Taliban-led insurgency in southern Afghanistan and of bomb attacks in the north appeared to be an effort by Islamic militants to unsettle NATO forces as they take over command from American forces in the south, military officials here said. British, Canadian and Dutch soldiers have clashed daily with insurgents in southern Afghanistan while mounting a large offensive against them, and attacks in more peaceful northern Afghanistan have increased in recent weeks." The Times notes, "Besides the two British soldiers killed, one was wounded and four enemy fighters were killed in the subsequent airstrikes, a statement from the American-led force in Afghanistan said."

Italy To Withdraw 400 Troops From Afghanistan. The New York Times (6/28, Gall, 1.19M) reports the Italian government "agreed Tuesday to withdraw as many as 400 soldiers from its 1,400-member force in Afghanistan."

Inability To Provide Safety For Informants Stymies US Effort To Dislodge Afghan Insurgents. The Christian Science Monitor (6/28, Calvert, 61K) reports, "As coalition forces move into remote insurgent havens…they have been unable to provide security locals say they need in order to help oust insurgents completely. Villagers who do help coalition forces suffer, or die, for it. … The inability to provide security for villagers in these areas hampers the long-term effectiveness of operations, such as Mountain Thrust, a large-scale coalition offensive launched recently in southern Afghanistan following an upswing in insurgent activity there. Insurgents hold sway in parts of the countryside surrounding operating bases in the southern provinces."

US Military Incurring Unprecedented Vehicle Repair Costs. The CBS Evening News (6/27, story 4, 2:30, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "By now, there have been so many things about the Iraq war that were predicted to go one way and turned out another way that there's probably nothing much that should shock us anymore. Well, here comes another one, though. Now we find out that even repair costs for military vehicles have been vastly underestimated and we are not talking small change here, we're talking billions." CBS (Martin) added, "By Pentagon count, the war in Iraq has cost $210 billion, burning money at the rate of $6 billion a month with no end in sight. And even that can't pay all the repair bills for the equipment chewed up by the fighting. Nobody could have imagined it when the war started, but today the chief of the Army cold Congress he will need $17 billion next year to repair, replace, or upgrade equipment destroyed, damaged, or plain worn out by constant combat in the harsh conditions of Iraq and Afghanistan, double what he's spending this year. The commandant of the Marine Corps said his repair bill is more than $11 billion for next year. Again, that's double this year's bill." CBS anchor Bob

DOJ_NMG_0036796

Schieffer asked, "Are our troops going to be put in danger because their vehicles need repair?" To which, the correspondent replied, "the Army chief of staff said today he is concerned about the readiness of equipment kept in reserve for other emergencies."

Internet Sites Speed Care Packages To Soldiers. USA Today (6/28, Dorell, 2.31M) reports, "Americans are increasingly turning to high-tech methods to send gifts and supplies to U.S. troops serving in Iraq and Afghanistan. Veterans say today's care packages are more numerous and creative — and get to servicemembers much faster — than those of the past. … Today, several websites designed specifically for supporting the troops overseas allow anyone with a credit card to order cellphone minutes, snacks, books — even armor and sniper accessories."

DOJ:

Main Justice Closed By Floodwaters After Heavy Rains. The Washington Post (6/28, A6, Schwartzman, Greenwell) reports, "The downtown D.C. headquarters of the Justice Department, Internal Revenue Service and National Archives will remain closed for the rest of the week because of damage wrought by Sunday's torrential downpour, officials said yesterday." The Post continues, "Nearly two days after the region's first deluge, at least four government offices in the Federal Triangle remained shut, including the Old Post Office building and the Ariel Rios Federal Building. The Commerce Department, at 15th Street NW and Pennsylvania Avenue NW, reopened yesterday after closing Monday. … Even with the closures, most of the federal government's Washington offices were open yesterday, officials said." The Post adds, "At Justice Department headquarters, at Ninth Street NW and Pennsylvania Avenue NW, crews pumped water from the subbasement and parking garage and worked to repair the seven-story building's electrical and air-conditioning systems. … Officials plan to keep the building shut for the next three days and possibly as many as seven, according to an e-mail sent to reporters by the General Services Administration late yesterday. … The nearly 2,000 employees assigned to the building were scattered elsewhere, some at offices a few blocks away. Brian Roehrkasse, a Justice spokesman, declined to specify the location for security reasons. … Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzalez is in the Middle East for the rest of the week on a scheduled trip. 'The Department of Justice is fully operational and able to carry out its essential functions,' Roehrkasse said."

The AP (6/28, Manning) reports, "In downtown Washington, the Justice Department, the IRS and the National Archives — where the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution were safe under glass — were among several buildings still closed because of flooding or other storm-related problems. Some streets also were shut down because water from the flooded buildings was being pumped into the city sewers. … None of the flooded buildings had structural damage, but water in the basements damaged air-conditioning, wiring and other building systems, said Mike McGill, a spokesman for the General Services Administration, which manages federal buildings. … Officials at the Justice Department said it could take a week to clean up and reopen the building."

The New York Times (6/28, Gately) reports, "On Tuesday evening, the National Weather Service called for four to six inches of additional rain in the Washington area, where more than seven inches fell Sunday and Monday. The deluge sent residents to emergency shelters in Maryland and Pennsylvania. Rescuers pulled stranded motorists and pedestrians from floodwaters, and workers heaved sandbags in front of office buildings in the nation's capital. … 'This has probably been the most intense rainfall in a 24-hour period in the history of Washington,' said Michael McGill, a spokesman for the General Services Administration, which oversees buildings closed because of flooding, including the headquarters for the Justice Department and the Internal Revenue Service. Both are expected to stay closed through at least Friday, he said, mostly because of basement flooding and damage to electrical systems."

Government Executive (6/28, Marino) reports, "The Justice Department's Robert F. Kennedy headquarters building will be closed for the next three to seven days as repairs are made to its flooded basement and lost power is restored. … Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said in a statement that fewer than 2,400 workers were affected by the weather-related damage, but that he remains unsure of when the headquarters will open."

Brooklyn US Attorney Nominated To Federal Bench. Roslynn Mauskopf, the US attorney in Brooklyn, has reportedly been selected to serve as a federal judge. The New York Times (6/28, Rashbaum, 1.19M) reports that while

DOJ_NMG_0036797

Mauskopf "has not yet been formally nominated, the people briefed on the matter said that she had already been interviewed by the White House and that the required F.B.I. background investigation had begun." The move "will open up one of the most important law enforcement posts in New York City."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

US Subpoenas VeriSign In Widening Options Timing Probe. The AP (6/28) reports, "VeriSign Inc., a provider of infrastructure services for Internet and telecom networks, said Tuesday it received a grand jury subpoena from the U.S. Attorney for the Northern District of California asking for documents relating to its stock option grants." The AP continues, "VeriSign said it also received a similar request from Securities and Exchange Commission as part of an informal inquiry. … The company said it intends to cooperate fully with both the SEC and the U.S. Attorney's office, and added that its board had already began an internal investigation prior to the two requests." The AP adds, "About 48 companies in addition to VeriSign are being questioned by the SEC or Justice Department about their stock-option granting practices. At issue is whether executives backdated stock options grants to time them at low points of the stock price, thus boosting the payouts."

Rambus Warns Of Option Timing Trouble. The AP (6/28, Liedtke) reports, "Computer chip supplier Rambus Inc. on Tuesday warned some of its previously reported profits might evaporate because the timing of stock options granted to its employees wasn't properly recorded - a problem that could haunt scores of other companies as they review their past compensation practices." The AP continues, "The news, which caused Rambus's stock price to drop by more than 5 percent in extended trading, was the latest jolt in a budding scandal that threatens once again to shake investor confidence just as corporate America recovers from the accounting fiascos exposed after the fall of Enron Corp. nearly five years. … Like dozens of other companies, Los Altos, Calif.-based Rambus has been scrutinizing stock options distributed years ago to determine whether company insiders rigged the system to increase the likelihood that management would reap huge windfalls." The AP adds, "At least 44 companies have launched their own internal inquiries into possible stock option abuses or have become targets of government investigations into the practice. Some companies already have gone so far as to fire some of their top executives after learning about the manipulation of past stock options. … The number of companies responding to government inquiries continued to expand Tuesday. Cnet Networks Inc., VeriSign Inc., Foundry Networks Inc. and Cyberonics Inc. all disclosed they had received subpoenas seeking more information about their stock option awards from the U.S. Justice Department."

The Wall Street Journal (6/28, Forelle) reports, "The disclosure raises the question of whether Rambus's grants were deliberately backdated from their real date of approval to a day when the company's stock was trading lower. That would make the grants more valuable to recipients. … Separately, six other companies -- VeriSign Inc., CNET Networks Inc., Foundry Networks Inc., Applied Micro Circuits Corp., Cyberonics Inc. and Progress Software Corp. -- announced new federal inquiries into their options practices." The Journal adds, "Rambus said it isn't sure whether any charge would be material and thus require restatement. It also says the board hasn't evaluated whether it will face a tax impact. … About 50 companies are being examined by federal regulators and prosecutors in a wide-ranging probe of option-granting practices that is focusing on possible backdating and other forms of manipulation."

Cybernonics Receives DOJ Subpoena. Dow Jones (6/28) reports, "Shares of Cyberonics moved lower Tuesday, the day after it reported it has been subpoenaed by the Department of Justice over stock- options practices. … Shares of Cyberonics (CYBX) were down 4% at $20.40 in midday trades." Dow Jones continues, "According to a regulatory filing Monday, the U.S. attorney's office for the Southern District of New York issued a subpoena for documents related to its stock-option grants. Cyberonics said it is cooperating with the request. … Earlier this month, Cyberonics said it was the focus of an informal investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission into stock options."

European Court Allows Extradition Of Enron-Linked British Bankers. Bloomberg (6/28) reports, "Three British bankers will be sent to the U.S. to face Enron Corp.-related fraud charges within three weeks after a European court refused to block their extradition, their final forum for an appeal." Bloomberg continues, "David Bermingham, Giles Darby and Gary Mulgrew are wanted in Texas for allegedly bilking their former employer, Royal Bank of Scotland Group Plc's Greenwich NatWest unit, out of millions from the sale of an Enron off-the-books partnership. The European Court of Human Rights in Strasbourg, France today declined to suspend their extradition, six days after Britain's highest court also rejected their appeal." Bloomberg adds, "The case has been at the forefront of calls from Britain's business and legal community to scrap its ``fast-track'' extradition arrangements with the U.S. Lobbying groups claim the legislation, introduced in 2004 mainly to clamp down on terrorism, is instead being used to target white-collar offences, unfairly increasing the risks for executives. … The European Court of Human Rights said that while it would review the merits of the men's appeal, the court wouldn't intervene to suspend extradition proceedings, according to a letter sent to the bankers' lawyers."

DOJ_NMG_0036798

The AP (6/28, Wardell) reports, "The so-called Bermingham Three have been fighting against their extradition since a High Court ruling in February. They ran out of British avenues of appeal last week when the House of Lords said it would not hear the case. … The three men have consistently argued that most of the alleged offenses took place in Britain and that any trial should be held here. Being forced to stand trial in Enron's home state of Texas would be unjust and incompatible with European human rights law, the men argued. … 'We have now done everything possible to establish the rights of three U.K. citizens to be investigated and, if appropriate, prosecuted in the U.K. but all we have established is that U.K. citizens have no such rights against an extradition request made by the U.S.,' said the men's lawyer, Mark Spragg."

Judge Sentences Barred Broker, Partner To Prison For Commodities Fraud. The AP (6/28, Gold) reports, "A man barred from selling leveraged commodities and his partner in an illicit operation have been sentenced to prison for cheating about 1,000 investors out of $14 million." The AP continues, "The barred broker, Charles Paul Hoffecker, who owned Amitex Investment Services Ltd., and his partner, Charles Edward Myers, told clients that Amitex would buy gold, silver and other commodities for them. But evidence at their trial showed that no purchases were made, federal prosecutors said Tuesday." The AP adds, "Hoffecker, 53, was sentenced June 19 to 17 1/2 years in prison, while Myers, 65, was sentenced Monday to nine years. They were ordered to pay a total of $2.67 million in restitution by U.S. District Judge Katharine S. Hayden. … The restitution figure was smaller than the total losses since not all victims have been found, mostly due to incomplete records at Amitex, Assistant U.S. Attorney Bohdan Vitvitsky said." The AP notes, "Hoffecker and Myers, who were convicted in March, were charged in 2003 after a sting operation in which investigators used an undercover business to infiltrate fraudulent telemarketing investment schemes."

DOJ Handling Of Hilfiger Nonprosecution Agreement Questioned. Corporate Counsel (6/28, Reisinger) reports, "Did Tommy Hilfiger Corp. get special treatment when it negotiated a nonprosecution agreement with the U.S. Department of Justice last summer? The question has come to light in recent weeks as the now-private company defends itself against a class action shareholders' suit." Corporate Counsel continues, "Typically, when the government completes a deferred or nonprosecution agreement, it makes the deal public. The Manhattan U.S. Attorney's Office departed from this practice with Hilfiger, however. … On Aug. 10, 2005, then-U.S. Attorney David Kelley announced that his office had reached an agreement with the retailer's American subsidiary. While Kelley's press release outlined the general features of the pact, it wasn't accompanied by an actual copy of the deal. Ten months later, neither Hilfiger nor the government has made the agreement public." Corporate Counsel adds, "The secret agreement is a problem for the shareholders who filed suit against Hilfiger after the government started investigating the company in 2004. In most deferred and nonprosecution agreements, the corporate defendant admits the government's criminal allegations. Without access to the details of the Hilfiger deal, the company's shareholders say that they don't know how the retailer responded. … Hilfiger has moved to dismiss the suit, in part, because prosecutors didn't file charges against the clothing chain. … According to a transcript of a May hearing, Wachtell's John Savarese told Manhattan federal district court Judge Richard Owen that the release is 'far from confirming that there was some basis to the initially announced U.S. Attorney investigation or that some great liability would emerge for the company from that, or some criminal case.' But Savarese cited only the government's press release in his argument, and not the nonprosecution agreement itself. … The shareholders' lead attorney, Samuel Rudman, says that he finds it unusual that the agreement was not made public, given that the government 'always make them public.' It's especially unusual, Rudman adds, 'when [Hilfiger's] lawyers are in court arguing what the agreement says.' … A spokesperson for the Manhattan U.S. Attorney's Office declined to comment when asked why Hilfiger was treated differently. Former U.S. Attorney Kelley, now a partner at Cahill Gordon & Reindel in New York, also declined to comment. A Justice Department spokesperson in Washington, D.C., would only say that the publication of agreements 'is within the discretion of individual U.S. attorney's offices.'"

DOJ_NMG_0036799

Hedge Funds Intensify Political Efforts To Block New Regulation. The Wall Street Journal (6/28, Scannell, Mullins, 2.11M) reports amid "increased scrutiny by lawmakers and regulators, hedge funds are stepping up their defenses in the nation's capital." A small group of fund managers "are behind a campaign to head off new regulations from Congress and the Securities and Exchange Commission. In the past year, funds have boosted political contributions, hired a string of new lobbyists and established a second trade association to make their case in Washington." Employees of "the 25 largest hedge funds and the Managed Funds Association, the industry's main trade group, have contributed a combined $1.2 million to congressional candidates and the Republican and Democratic parties so far in the 2005-2006 campaign. While that figure goes only through March 31 of this year, it represents nearly a 50% jump over donations made by the same organizations for the entire 2001-2002 election cycle, the last midterm election year, according to the nonpartisan Center for Responsive Politics." Hedge funds "have hired more than a dozen lobbying groups since early 2005, according to PoliticalMoneyLine, a nonpartisan organization. In 2005, the industry paid $1.5 million for Washington lobbyists, up from $1.2 million in 2004 and $565,000 in 2003."

Senate Judiciary Committee To Scrutinize Hedge Funds. Dow Jones (6/28, Schroeder) reports, "Washington and Wall Street may get a rare public look at how securities regulators track hedge funds' behavior on Wednesday, when a former Securities and Exchange Commission lawyer goes before a Senate panel probing the industry." Dow Jones continues, "Attorney Gary Aguirre told Congress that he was running the SEC's investigation into whether prominent hedge fund Pequot Capital Management engaged in insider trading. Aguirre said that he was fired in September after he sought the testimony of a Wall Street executive, reported to be John Mack, chief executive of Morgan Stanley." Dow Jones adds, "The SEC won't confirm or deny it's investigating Pequot. But the hearing in the Senate Judiciary Committee may shed light on the methods regulators use to catch potential cases of wrongdoing involving hedge funds -- the big, lightly regulated pools of money serving mostly wealthy investors. … The hearing will focus on the relationships between hedge funds and independent analysts."

Morgan Stanley Settles With SEC Over Insider Accounts. The AP (6/28) reports, "Wall Street powerhouse Morgan Stanley on Tuesday agreed to pay a $10 million civil fine to settle federal regulators' charges that it failed to maintain safeguards to prevent the misuse of inside information." The AP continues, "The Securities and Exchange Commission also censured Morgan Stanley under the settlement. The investment house neither admitted nor denied the SEC's allegations but did agree to refrain from future violations of the securities laws." The AP adds, "Morgan Stanley, the third-largest U.S. securities firm by market value, also agreed to hire an independent consultant to review its policies and practices for preventing misuse of confidential company information. … In a civil lawsuit, the SEC said Morgan Stanley for years failed to adequately maintain and enforce procedures to prevent the misuse of inside information regarding companies whose securities are held in hundreds of thousands of employee and employee-related accounts. The agency did not say whether any illegal insider trading or other improprieties had occurred using inside information as a result of the alleged lapses." The AP notes, "From at least 2000 to 2004, Morgan Stanley failed to conduct needed surveillance of hundreds of thousands of employee and employee-related accounts to detect possible insider trading, the SEC alleged."

The Wall Street Journal (6/28, Burns) reports, "Morgan Stanley settled without admitting or denying the SEC's claims that for years it lacked adequate policies and procedures to safeguard against misuse of nonpublic information, even though it was legally required to have them. … 'Due to a systemic breakdown in this critical compliance function, Morgan Stanley failed to conduct any surveillance' of trading in a massive number of employee accounts held at the firm, the SEC said. As a result, it said, 'Morgan Stanley may have failed to detect illegal insider trading' by the firm, its employees or their relatives." The Journal adds, "While the New York securities firm put stocks on a 'Watch List' when its bankers had inside information on a company, the SEC said that over a four-year period it failed to scrutinize employee trading in most or all of the Watch List shares. The omission went 'virtually undetected and uncorrected' for years, the SEC added."

DOJ_NMG_0036800

USA Today (6/28, Smith) reports, "Richard Grime, the SEC's assistant director of enforcement, said Morgan Stanley "failed to conduct any surveillance of a massive number' of its employee accounts until the agency discovered recordkeeping gaps during a routine investigation of potential inside trading. … 'Once we scratched the surface, we found this problem,' Grime said. Many of the recordkeeping deficiencies arose as a result of the firm's failure to fully integrate employees' records after its 1997 merger with Dean Witter Reynolds, the agency said, but investigators also found that the firm's compliance department had failed to update and enforce many of its surveillance procedures."

CA To Add Shareholder Proposal After Court's Refusal To Rule. The Wall Street Journal/AP (6/28) reports, "CA Inc. said it will add to its July proxy a shareholder proposal that seeks to change the company's bylaws after a Delaware court refused to rule on the company's original decision to reject the proposal." The AP continues, "CA shareholders will be able to vote on the resolution, which seeks to limit the company's poison-pill provisions, at the shareholders' annual meeting, which is scheduled for late August." The AP adds, "The Islandia, N.Y., technology company originally denied a request to add the proposal to its upcoming proxy statement, claiming the proposal was a violation of Delaware law. The rejection resulted in a court challenge by the drafter of the resolution, Harvard professor and shareholder rights activist Lucian Bebchuk. … Last week, a Delaware judge refused to rule on the legality of CA's decision to reject the proposal, saying the issue wasn't 'ripe' for a decision."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Katrina Fraud Estimated At Near $2 Billion. Reporting on an article that appeared yesterday in the New York Times, NBC Nightly News (6/27, story 9, 0:30, Williams, 9.87M) reported Sen. Susan Collins was quoted as saying that in the wake of Hurricane Katrina, "'The blatant fraud, audacious schemes and scale of the waste is breathtaking.' The amount of taxpayer money lost to scams, schemes and bungling is now put at $2 billion, according to the 'New York Times.' Officials admit 10 months now after Katrina hit, the situation is still not under control."

CNN's The Situation Room (6/27, Foreman) reported American taxpayers can now be counted among Katrina's "victims. … The New York Times has rolled out the latest tally of abuses, and it is staggering." CNN (Foreman) added, "FEMA, of course, says they're trying to fix all of this. But in all, the Times report today echoes what we've heard in recent months from the Government Accountability Office the Red Cross, FEMA, Congress, the Attorney General and a legion of taxpayer watchdog groups, all of which say the same thing, Wolf: The true cost of Katrina to American taxpayers is still climbing and no one can yet say what the final bill will be."

NYTimes Sees No Evidence FEMA Addressing Fraud Problem. Under the headline "The Disaster Without End," the New York Times (6/28, 1.19M) editorializes, "The widespread fraud, waste and bungling was abetted by FEMA's failure to put a high priority on existing tools for catching schemers and thieves, according to the Government Accountability Office. FEMA officials, wary at the advent of a new hurricane season, insist that tougher accountability precautions are now in place. But there's been no credible evidence of the top-to-bottom revamping that FEMA needs."

Historic Church Among New Orleans Landmarks Lost To Fires After Katrina. The New York Times (6/28, Nossiter, 1.19M) reports that New Orleans, with its "landscape of abandoned buildings, water mains cracked by the storm and fire engines with smaller crews," saw the Coliseum Place Baptist Church burn down Friday, a "heartbreaking," according to preservationists. The newest threat to New Orleans is a direct outcropping of the storm, in many respects." The loss of the historic church "was a heavy psychological blow to the struggling city."

Tribe Releases Photo Of Meeting Ney Said He Could Not Remember. NBC News (6/28, Seidman) reports, "The Tigua of El Paso, an Indian tribe and former client of disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff, released a photo Tuesday of a meeting that members had with Ohio Republican Rep Bob Ney — a meeting the congressman told Senate investigators he did not remember having." NBC News continues, "The photo, which was taken on Aug. 14, 2002, in a House hearing room, shows the Tigua tribe's Lt. Gov. Carlos Hisa and tribal council member Raul Gutierrez with Ney. Less than a week earlier, Ney had returned from an expenses-paid golf junket to Scotland with Abramoff, Ralph

DOJ_NMG_0036801

Reed, David Safavian, Neil Volz and others. … On Nov. 12, 2004, in an interview with Senate investigators, Ney said that 'he was not familiar with the Tigua.' But the report quotes tribal representatives as testifying that they met with Ney for about two hours and he assured them he could help with legislation." NBC adds, "Ney told the investigators that he 'could not recall ever meeting with any member of the Tigua.' Ney's lawyer later said the congressman's schedule for that day showed a half-hour meeting with the 'Taqua.' A spokesman for Ney, Brian Walsh, said the congressman simply could not recall that the tribe was also known by another name, the Ysleta del Sur Pueblo Indian Tribe of El Paso, Texas."

The AP (6/28) reports an Indian tribe "that was a client of disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff has released a photograph of tribal leaders meeting with Rep. Bob Ney, who had told investigators he wasn't familiar with the tribe." The photo "shows the Tigua tribe's Lt. Gov. Carlos Hisa and tribal council member Raul Gutierrez with Ney in a House hearing room on Aug. 14, 2002, less than a week after Ney finished an expenses-paid golf trip to Scotland with Abramoff and others."

House Members Grill Internet Providers Over Child Porn Restrictions. The AP (6/28, Werner) reports, "Internet providers told Congress on Tuesday they're doing all they can to combat online child pornography, but they were told to expect legislation." The AP continues, "Several voiced skepticism about creating new laws that would force them to retain data about their users' online activity. … Any such measure would be costly and easily circumvented and would 'fall far short of its intended goal,' America Online chief counsel John Ryan told a House Energy and Commerce subcommittee hearing." The AP adds, "The focus should be on improving existing child porn laws -- not 'new mandates,' said Verizon Online general counsel Thomas Dailey. … Lawmakers, however, said more must be done to stop the availability of child porn on the Web and chart rooms where pedophiles troll for young victims. … 'The parents of America and I think the Congress is tired of just talking about it. I think we're ready to take action,' Energy and Commerce Chairman Joe Barton, R-Texas, told a panel of executives from seven companies including Yahoo Inc., Google Inc. and Microsoft Corp."

Senate Committee Approves Web Labeling Requirement. CNET News (6/28, McCullagh, Broache) reports, "Web site operators posting sexually explicit information must slap warning labels on their pages or face prison terms of up to 15 years, according to a proposal adopted by a U.S. Senate committee on Tuesday." CNET continues, "During a day of debate on a wide-ranging communications bill, the Senate Commerce Committee approved an amendment backed by the Bush administration that proponents claim would help clean up the Internet and protect children online. … It says that commercial Web sites must not place 'sexually explicit material' on their home pages upon pain of felony prosecution--and, in addition, they must rate 'each page or screen of the website that does contain sexually explicit material' with a system to be devised by the Federal Trade Commission. … 'This will protect children from accidentally typing in the wrong address and immediately viewing indecent material,' said Sen. Conrad Burns, a Montana Republican who is the co-founder of the Congressional Internet Caucus." CNET notes, "Civil libertarians have opposed the mandatory labeling proposal, saying it violates the First Amendment's guarantee of freedom of speech. Also, courts have taken a dim view of mandatory rating systems: In a 1968 case called Interstate Circuit v. Dallas, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that Dallas' ordinance requiring that movies be rated was unconstitutional because the criteria for rating were unclear and vague. … Burns' seven-page amendment is virtually identical to a standalone bill introduced earlier this month by Sen. Jon Kyl, an Arizona Republican. Both proposals follow from a speech in April during which Attorney General Alberto Gonzales called on Congress to 'promptly' enact such a law."

Opening Arguments Made At Trial Of Alleged Unregistered Iraqi Agent. The AP (6/28, Caruso) reports alleged unregistered Iraqi agent Tongsun Park "was 'simply a middleman' who didn't intend to break any U.S. laws, his attorney told a federal jury Tuesday" in opening arguments at his trial. But prosecutors said Park "was no ordinary lobbyist," and "Assistant U.S. Attorney Michael Farbiarz told jurors that Park was promised millions of dollars by Iraq for his help influencing top U.N. officials, including former Secretary-General Boutros Boutros-Ghali. … 'There's a right way and a wrong way,' Farbiarz said. 'He hid his relationship with Iraq.'" Park lawyer Michael Kim "acknowledged that the case was 'full of intrigue,'" but he "insisted that Park committed no illegal acts, and urged jurors to ignore the sensational elements of the case." The New York Daily News (6/28, Shin, 729K) notes that Park "has been in jail since January, when he was nabbed in Mexico while traveling from Canada to Panama. At the time, he was carrying $45,000 in cash, FBI officials said."

DOJ_NMG_0036802

Closing Arguments Begin At Chicago Patronage Trial. Under the headline "Feds Tell Jury: Say 'Enough' To Political Hiring," the Chicago Tribune (6/28, Bush, Mihalopoulos, 643K) reports, "Federal prosecutors urged jurors in the City Hall corruption trial Tuesday to end the illegal political hiring that they say has pervaded Mayor Richard Daley's administration. 'This machine doesn't have any brakes. That's you,' Assistant U.S. Atty. Philip Guentert told jurors. 'It's time to say enough.'" However, defense attorneys "argued that prosecutors brought insufficient and misleading evidence against Daley's former patronage chief Robert Sorich and three co-defendants." The Tribune notes codefendant John Sullivan's lawyer, Cynthia Giacchetti, recalled "that FBI agent John Hauser waited more than five months to transcribe one of two face-to-face interviews with Sullivan. She also pointed out that Hauser did not take verbatim notes of the interviews. She contrasted that to federal prosecutors' interview of Daley last year, which was transcribed word-for-word." The Chicago Sun-Times (6/28, Korecki, Warmbir) adds, "'All of this was a charade, ladies and gentlemen,' federal prosecutor Julie Ruder said of a scheme to falsify job tests and hold bogus interviews so that hundreds of jobs went to predetermined, clout-backed winners. 'The fix was in.'" But Sorich attorney Tom Durkin "went on his own attack," saying "there was no testimony Sorich took money or boasted about his connections. 'That pig Tomczak did,' Durkin said," referring to key prosecution witness Donald Tomczak.

Fumo Computer Technicians Indicted Over Deleted Emails. The AP (6/28, Dale) reports that "a pair of computer technicians assigned to state Sen. Vincent Fumo were indicted on charges of obstructing a federal investigation by deleting years worth of Fumo's e-mails." Leonard Luchko and Mark Eister were indicted yesterday "with conspiracy, destroying evidence and obstruction." The AP notes, "The FBI last month arrested Luchko and Eister in pre-dawn raids on their homes, although defense lawyers complained that their clients had been willing to surrender. … U.S. Attorney Patrick Meehan has said that the three-year investigation is far from over, but defense lawyers noted that Tuesday's indictment did not name any new defendants." The Philadelphia Inquirer (6/28, Shiffman, 423K) adds, "Yesterday's indictment did not offer any new charges. It simply repeated FBI allegations" Luchko and Eister "deleted files at Fumo's direction. The indictment, however, did trigger the random selection of a judge for the case: Senior U.S. District Judge William H. Yohn Jr." The Philadelphia Daily News (6/28, Hinkelman) also reports on the indictments.

Court Documents Reveal Two-Month Delay In FBI Seizure Of Pellicano Computers. Under the headline "FBI Was Slow To Check Pellicano's Audio Lab," the Los Angeles Times (6/28, Krikorian, Blankstein, 958K) reports, "Court documents released Tuesday show that FBI agents did not examine private investigator Anthony Pellicano's sophisticated audio lab during their initial November 2002 search of his Sunset Strip offices, raising new questions about the handling of the probe." According to the documents, "FBI agents waited almost two months to seize computers and other items from the lab. With prosecutors publicly acknowledging that they have only one allegedly wiretapped conversation on tape, the time lapse between searches raises the possibility that Pellicano or others could have removed audio files or potential evidence in the case from computers in the lab." However, the Times notes, former federal prosecutor Orin Kerr observed, "The bottom line is it's hard to tell whether this was a missed opportunity or poor judgment."

Judge Declines To Release Connecticut Trash Kingpin On Bail For Now. The Danbury News-Times (6/28, Ali) reports, "A federal judge is open to the idea of releasing Danbury trash kingpin James Galante from federal detention and putting him under some type of house arrest while his racketeering case is pending. At a lengthy hearing on Tuesday, U.S. District Court Judge Ellen Bree Burns said she wants more information from Galante's defense lawyer, Hugh Keefe, on how such an arrangement would work before letting Galante out of jail. While she is 'amenable' to such an arrangement, she won't allow Galante to go back to work at the helm of Automated Waste Disposal in Danbury, Burns told Keefe." The AP (6/28) adds that Keefe "questioned why Galante is being detained while other suspects in the investigation have been released on bond," and "Burns said she understood Keefe's concerns. 'At the same time, however, I am persuaded there is a danger that there may be some tampering with witnesses,' Burns said. …

DOJ_NMG_0036803

The judge's comments came after a lengthy hearing Tuesday in which prosecutors played tapes of intercepted phone calls and cited other evidence of what they said were attempts to influence witnesses."

Gotti Says He Will Leave New York If Acquitted At Third Trial. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (6/28) reports, "Facing his third trial on racketeering charges, the son of the late mob boss John Gotti says he will leave New York this time if he's exonerated. 'I can't stay in New York,' John 'Junior' Gotti…told the Daily News. 'I'm alone in this world. I'm a man without an island.'" The AP notes, "Gotti's lawyers have argued that he gave up all mob activities after he pleaded guilty in another racketeering case in 1999. 'There are men dying in prison for that life,' Gotti said. 'It's like a religion. But it's their religion, not my religion.'"

Gotti Defense Seeking To Bar Evidence About Role In Mob Murder. The New York Post (6/28, Cornell, 624K) reports, "Faced with an onslaught of new charges, John 'Junior' Gotti is fighting to keep damaging evidence of his alleged role in a double murder and a money-laundering scheme away from jurors at his upcoming racketeering trial. In a strange twist of logic, Gotti's lawyers conceded that the government has 'ample evidence' to show that the former mob leader was involved in 'murders or violence' -- and therefre don't need to touch on the slayings of Thomas and Rosemary Uva" in 1992. The Post notes, "Gotti is not charged with the Uva murders, but the feds are seeking to show the killings were among many crimes that he had a hand in as a powerful member of an ongoing criminal enterprise."

Retired FBI Agent Denies Receiving Gifts From Bulger, Flemmi. The Boston Globe (6/28, Murphy, 484K) reports retired FBI Special Agent testified yesterday in the $50 million wrongful death lawsuit against the FBI "that he had just finished having dinner with informants James 'Whitey' Bulger and Stephen 'The Rifleman' Flemmi at a South Boston home in 1983 when Bulger's brother, then-Massachusetts Senate President William Bulger, showed up unexpectedly" with "some photographs from a recent trip to Ireland." William Bulger, "testifying three years ago before a congressional committee investigating his brother's relationship with the FBI, said he had no memory of any such dinner." Ring also testified he did not tip Flemmi off to an FBI wiretap and "said he had never received any gifts from Bulger and Flemmi," and Flemmi has alleged.

FBI Subpoenas Chicago Union Officials In Bulger Search. The Boston Globe (6/28, Murphy, 484K) reports, "The hunt for fugitive gangster James 'Whitey' Bulger has led to Chicago, where investigators from Boston delivered subpoenas to two labor union officials last week and seized a Palm Pilot from one of them, lawyers involved in the investigation said. The PDA was taken Thursday during a search of the union office of Charles Dunn, a business representative for Chicago's Local 134 of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, said Chicago attorney Patrick Deady, a partner in the law firm Hogan Marren, which represents the union. … 'We're unaware of any contact between these two guys and Whitey Bulger,' said Deady, adding that authorities told the union the FBI was following up on a lead in its hunt for Bulger. He was unaware what that lead was."

Both Sides In Aryan Brotherhood Trial Relying On Shady Witnesses. The AP (6/28, Flaccus) reports, "Convicted murderers, gang members and jailhouse informants have paraded past jurors for nearly four months in the U.S. federal government's racketeering case against the notorious Aryan Brotherhood prison gang. … Now, with the trial about to enter its final weeks, the jury will soon have to decide who to believe: the government, whose case rests on the testimony of admitted killers, or attorneys for the white supremacists accused of plotting and ordering many of those murders from behind bars." The AP continues, "Even the defense team, which has chided the U.S. Attorney's Office for its reliance on jailhouse snitches, plans to present testimony this week from a rival gang member and other inmates in a trial peppered with tales of violence and racial strife. … Attorneys on both sides are 'using and choosing from the best of the worst,' said Melissa Carr, an Anti-Defamation League special projects investigator monitoring the trial. … 'There were a couple instances where I caught jurors rolling their eyes and looking around for confirmation, like "Did I just hear that? Did he say what I thought he said?"' … The four defendants are alleged Aryan Brotherhood leaders implicated in many of the 32 murders and attempted murders detailed in the federal indictment against the white supremacist gang."

DOJ_NMG_0036804

Michigan Doctor Indicted On Medicare Fraud Charges. The Detroit Free Press (6/24, Patton) reported, "A Dearborn-based physician was indicted Friday in federal court on 39 counts of fraud in health care and immigration. … According to the indictment," Dr. Ali S. Makki "ordered dozens of unnecessary diagnostic tests for new Medicare patients, including blood tests, x-rays and echocardiograms. He falsely certified giving medical examinations and vaccinations, such as tuberculosis skin tests, the indictment says." The Detroit News (6/24, Egan) notes Makki "is accused of defrauding the federal government of more than $500,000. … Agents arrested Makki at Detroit Metropolitan Airport when he returned on a flight from Lebanon by way of Paris."

Texas Executes "Railroad Killer" Linked To 15 Murders. The AP (6/28, Graczyk) reports, "The last ride for infamous train-hopping serial killer Angel Maturino Resendiz was in a Texas prison van, from death row to the death house." The AP continues, "Resendiz, 46, received lethal injection Tuesday evening for the fatal stabbing and beating of a Houston-area physician 7 1/2 years ago. He had roamed the country by jumping aboard freight trains and was linked to at least 15 indiscriminate murders near railroad tracks around the nation, earning him the nickname the 'Railroad Killer' and a spot on the FBI's Most Wanted list." The AP adds, "The Mexican drifter, speaking from the death chamber gurney, asked for forgiveness from God and from relatives of some of his victims watching through a glass a few feet away. He then was executed for the slaying of Claudia Benton, 39, at her West University Place home during a deadly spree in 1998 and 1999. … The punishment, the 13th this year in the nation's busiest death penalty state, was delayed for two hours while multiple appeals were considered by the U.S. Supreme Court."

The New York Times (6/28, Barnes) reports, "A jury sentenced Mr. Resendiz, 46, to death for the rape and murder in 1998 of Dr. Claudia Benton, a medical researcher, at her house in Houston. Investigators said forensic evidence and, in some cases, Mr. Resendiz's statements implicated him in two years of killings in California, Florida, Georgia, Illinois, Kentucky and Texas that ended in 1999, when his half-sister helped arrange his surrender. … Catching Mr. Resendiz was made more difficult, detectives said, by his 30 aliases and a nomadic style of life, in which he hopped freight trains. Many of his suspected victims were found near rail lines and buildings. … Defense lawyers insisted that Mr. Resendiz was a paranoid schizophrenic, unable before or after Dr. Benton's murder to know right from wrong. A succession of judges found that Mr. Resendiz met the Supreme Court standard of sanity."

Tennessee Executes Man For 1985 Murder. The AP (6/28, French) reports that Tennessee "carried out only its second execution in 45 years early Wednesday after a federal appeals court panel lifted a stay of execution granted by one of its own judges." The AP continues, "Sedley Alley's execution had been scheduled to take place within hours of another, but a federal judge issued a stay late Tuesday afternoon for the other condemned man. … Alley, 50, was pronounced dead at 3:12 a.m. EDT Wednesday. He had confessed to killing 19-year-old Marine Suzanne Collins in 1985 while she jogged near a Navy base north of Memphis." The AP adds, "Alley claimed at trial that he was not responsible for the murder because he had multiple personalities. But in 2004, he recanted his confession, argued he was innocent and said DNA testing could prove it. … Judge Gilbert S. Merritt on the 6th Circuit Court of Appeals had issued a stay for Alley after a last-minute appeal was delivered to his home in Nashville. … But his colleagues on the appeals court -- Chief Judge Danny J. Boggs and Judge James L. Ryan -- overruled the order. A third judge on the panel was unavailable to participate in the decision. … The judges suggested it was improper for a single judge to 'take under consideration a matter for which the district courts and the court of appeals are competent to consider.' … Gov. Phil Bredesen and the U.S. Supreme Court had already rejected all requests for a stay Tuesday." The AP notes, "Alley's stay came only hours after federal Judge Todd Campbell halted the scheduled execution of another inmate, Paul Dennis Reid. … Campbell's stay was to give time to determine whether Reid was mentally competent to drop his appeals of seven death sentences tied to a string of 1997 murders in the Clarksville area."

High Court Asks DOJ For Brief In Oklahoma Death Row Appeal. The AP (6/28) reports, "The US Supreme Court is asking the Justice Department to file a brief in an appeal filed by an Oklahoma death row inmate." The AP continues, "Attorneys for Patrick Murphy are asking for a new trial on the grounds that Murphy and the victim are Indians, the crime took place on tribal land and the case should've been prosecuted in federal court instead of state court. … Murphy was convicted and sentenced to die for killing

DOJ_NMG_0036805

George Jacobs in 1999 in McIntosh County." The AP adds, "A state appeals court has rejected Murphy's appeal and now the Supreme Court is asking the US solicitor general for an opinion on whether a new trial is deserved."

Missouri Ordered To Halt All Executions. A federal judge has ordered a halt to all executions in the state of Missouri until the state changes its lethal injection procedures. The Los Angeles Times (6/28, Weinstein, 958K) reports that US District Judge Fernando J. Gaitan Jr. said in his ruling that the current system "creates an unnecessary risk that an inmate could be subjected to 'unconstitutional pain and suffering when the lethal-injection drugs are administered.' He gave corrections officials until July 15 to come up with new procedures."

Government, Companies Form Identity Fraud Research Center. The Wall Street Journal (6/28, Conkey, 2.11M) reports, "The Secret Service and Federal Bureau of Investigation today will join with International Business Machines Corp. and information-services firm LexisNexis" in announcing the formation of "the Center for Identity Management and Information Protection, or CIMIP, at Utica College in New York." It will "integrate various public and private efforts to study the national-security implications and other threats posed by identity fraud." According to Brian Nagel, deputy director of the Secret Service, "the agency's criminal division will share its case files with CIMIP so it can identify criminal patterns."

Judge Refuses To Release Hoffa Search Affidavit. The AP (6/28) reports, "A U.S. district judge refused to order the release of an affidavit the FBI used to get a search warrant to dig for Jimmy Hoffa's remains at a southeastern Michigan horse farm. … 'Granting public access to sensitive information in a sealed affidavit would not play a significant, positive role in the investigation,' Judge Marianne Battani wrote Monday in response to a request by the Detroit Free Press to release the document." The AP continues, "Battani said the affidavit included 'the details of a threat made to a witness' and other information that should not become public." The AP adds, "The FBI spent two weeks last month searching the Hidden Dreams Farm, 30 miles northwest of Detroit in Oakland County's Milford Township. Officials said they found no evidence of Hoffa's remains. … The former Teamsters union president was last seen July 30, 1975, the day he was supposed to meet a New Jersey Teamsters boss and a Detroit Mafia captain at a restaurant about 20 miles from the farm. Both of those men are now dead."

California Jury Finds Man Guilty Of Serial Murders. The Los Angeles Times (6/28, Reston) reports, "Serial killer Wayne Adam Ford was found guilty of four counts of first-degree murder today, making the former long-haul trucker eligible for the death penalty for the grisly slayings of four women across California. … A San Bernardino County jury delivered the verdict in the afternoon after deliberating for just over a week." The Times continues, "Ford, 44, walked into a Humboldt County sheriff's station in November 1998 with a woman's severed breast in a plastic bag in his pocket, and confessed to the sayings. … The Arcata trucker claimed the deaths were accidental, and had occurred during rough sex play. However, San Bernardino County Deputy Dist. Atty. J. David Mazurek told jurors that Ford preyed on young women to 'satisfy his sexually sadistic appetite', and 'got off' on their suffering when he tortured them." The Times adds, "Between 1997 and 1998, Ford allegedly picked up the women — prostitutes or hitchhikers — and bound, strangled, raped and, at times, beat them before dumping their bodies in waterways, Mazurek said. … The victims were found in Humboldt, Kern, San Joaquin and San Bernardino counties. Some of the bodies were dismembered. … Ford's attorney, Deputy Public Defender Joseph D. Canty, tried to convince the jury to find Ford guilty of a lesser charge — second-degree murder or manslaughter — that would have spared him from California's death row. … Canty said Ford realized that 'something was wrong with him,' and showed he was remorseful when he turned himself in. Canty argued that Ford, a retired U.S. Marine, was mired in depression, angry at his former wife — who he claimed was preventing him from seeing his young son — and struggling with other psychological problems, including borderline personality disorder."

WPost Columnist Skeptical Of Evidence In Duke Rape Case. In her column in the Washington Post (6/28, A25), Ruth Marcus writes, "At the start, I presumed they were guilty. The rape charges against three members of the Duke lacrosse team sounded like a plausible case of Jocks Gone Wild. It wasn't hard to imagine that a bunch of rowdy, hard-drinking players could have crossed the line from watching a paid dancer to sexually assaulting her. … But the more evidence that has emerged in the case, the more it appears that there is way more than reasonable doubt that the three accused committed rape." Marcus continues, "The paucity of physical evidence; the accuser's prior unsubstantiated rape charge; her changing stories that night; sloppy and unreliable identification procedures -- any of these alone, and certainly all of them together, make it hard to understand why the prosecution is going forward and impossible to imagine that it could win a conviction." Marcus adds, "Perhaps there are facts yet to emerge to support Durham County District Attorney Mike Nifong's continuing certitude that a rape occurred -- though the confluence of Nifong's political interests and the prosecution is itself another reason for discomfort. He brought the first charges just before a primary in which the black vote played a key role." Marcus concludes, "In an odd way, I hope Nifong's proved right, because the alternative -- that he began with a dubious case and stuck with it as it became shakier -- is so troubling. As it stands now, the case isn't expected to go to trial until spring 2007. That seems like an awfully long time to wait to find out."

DOJ_NMG_0036806

Coast Guard Cadet Acquitted Of Rape, Convicted Of Other Sex-Related Charges. The AP (6/28, Apuzzo) reports, "A Coast Guard Academy cadet was acquitted of rape charges but convicted on other sex-related charges in the institution's first-ever court-martial of a student." The AP continues, "Webster M. Smith was expected to ask the military jury for leniency at a sentencing hearing scheduled Wednesday. … Jurors on Tuesday deliberated eight hours before finding Smith, 23, of Houston, guilty of indecent assault, extortion, sodomy, failure to obey an order and absent without leave." The AP adds, "Smith, the first student in the school's 130-year history to be court-martialed, was stoic as the verdict was read, but wept afterward with his parents and lawyers by his side. … Smith faces up to 13 1/2 years in prison, but his attorney said he would argue for little or no jail time. … Prosecutors, who declined to comment after the verdict, said Smith was a predator who took advantage of women when they were vulnerable."

CIVIL LAW:

Indiana Settles E-Rate Fraud Claims With DOJ. The AP (6/28) reports that Indiana "has agreed to pay nearly $8.3 million to settle allegations that an agency violated federal rules by not seeking competitive bids on Internet services and charging inflated prices." The AP continues, "The U.S. Department of Justice and the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Southern District of Indiana announced the settlement in a news release Tuesday. … The settlement covers allegations that the Intelenet Commission, which has been disbanded, failed false claims to the Federal Communications Commission's E-rate program, which provided money for Internet technology in schools and libraries." The AP adds, "The federal government claimed the state charged inflated prices for services provided to Indiana schools and libraries, falsified invoices, disregarded the requirement that schools and libraries make co-payments for expenses and failed to seek competitive bids. … The state cooperated with the investigation, the Justice Department said. … 'The E-Rate Program makes federally mandated funds available to the poorest schools in the nation for Internet access and wiring,' Peter D. Keisler, Assistant Attorney General for the Civil Division, said in the release. 'False claims to this very important federal program will not be tolerated.'"

DOJ Seeks Dismissal Of Budget Lawsuit. The AP (6/28, Thomas) reports, "The Justice Department on Tuesday asked a federal judge to dismiss a lawsuit filed by House Democrats trying to stop a $39 billion deficit-reducing bill because the House and Senate failed to approve identical versions." The AP continues, "Lawyers for the government said the 11 House members lacked standing because they are not renters of medical equipment covered by the section of the bill or are in 'any way personally affected or injured' by other provisions in the measure." The AP adds, "House Democrats have accused GOP leaders of abusing the legislative process and contend they were denied their right to vote on legislation signed into law by President Bush. … Rep. John Conyers, D-Mich., the ranking member of the House Judiciary Committee and lead plaintiff, called the government's response 'legally tenuous.' … 'In terms of standing, there is no more fundamental right in Congress than the right to vote, yet the administration would not only take this right away, but prevent duly elected members from asserting that right after it is taken away,' he said. … The Senate version of the bill said Medicare can pay to rent some types of medical equipment for 13 months, as congressional negotiators had sought. A clerk erroneously wrote down 36 months before the bill was sent back to the House for a final vote, and the language was approved by the House on Feb. 1."

DOJ_NMG_0036807

AT&T Settles Contracting Fraud Charges With DOJ For $2.9 Million. Bloomberg (6/28, Schmidt) reports, "A unit of AT&T, the largest U.S. phone company, agreed to pay $2.9 million to resolve allegations that it defrauded the federal government." Bloomberg continues, "The civil suit against AT&T Communications East, brought by a whistleblower and joined by the government, said the company defrauded the General Services Administration from 1998 to 2001 by passing on to government customers certain costs and fees in violation of its contract. … The U.S. Justice Department announced the settlement Tuesday in Washington." Bloomberg adds, "The charges, known as Presubscribed Interexchange Carrier Charges, are a fee that long-distance companies pay to local phone companies to recover part of the cost for linking customers to the telephone network."

US Scrutinizing Drug Industry Gifts To Charities Tied To Doctors. The New York Times (6/28, Abelson) reports, "Around the country, doctors in private practice have set up tax-exempt charities into which drug companies and medical device makers are, with little fanfare, pouring donations — money that adds up to millions of dollars a year. And some medical experts see that as a big problem. … The charities are typically set up to engage in medical research or education, and the doctors involved defend those efforts as legitimate charitable activities that benefit the public. But because they operate mainly under the radar, the tax-exempt organizations represent what some other doctors, as well as regulators and industry consultants, say is a growing conduit for industry money. The payments, they say, can bias the treatment decisions of physicians, may lead to suspect research findings and at times may even risk running afoul of anti-kickback laws." The Times adds, "Federal officials are starting to take notice of such tax-exempt charities, which critics say are becoming increasingly popular as other forms of industry support to physicians — like lucrative consulting agreements that involve little actual work — have come under scrutiny from regulators and others worried about the potential conflicts." The Times notes, "The Midwest Heart Foundation, which has received millions of dollars from medical industry donors, including the drug makers Amgen and AstraZeneca, and the Cordis and Scios units of Johnson & Johnson, says it stands behind its charitable work, which currently involves about 30 studies and dozens of doctor-education lectures each year. … Dr. Mark Goodwin, a managing partner for the Midwest Heart for-profit practice, said the foundation was created to help prevent potential conflicts by keeping the industry money separate from the doctors' private practice. Companies contribute to the foundation, he said, because they can rely on its research and the doctors involved can enroll large numbers of patients in studies. … But some of its research has drawn criticism from federal regulators. Earlier this year, moreover, the foundation received a Justice Department subpoena as part of an investigation into the marketing activities of one of its big contributors, Scios."

FEC Accused Of Seeking To Intimidate Major 527 Contributors. The Hill (6/28, Bolton) reports the Federal Election Commission (FEC) "is being accused of attempting to intimidate soft-money donors to 527s by targeting the donors for questioning." The FEC is "targeting some of the wealthiest Republican and Democratic donors. Typically such people have escaped tough scrutiny unless suspected of deliberately evading contribution limits through the use of straw donors or other tactics. But recently the FEC appears to have aimed at donors even though it is the 527s that are suspected of evading campaign-finance law." A prominent GOP strategist "has charged that the new tactic is intended to scare big donors away from giving to 527s, which Congress and the White House have struggled to curb."

LATimes Praises Supreme Court Ruling On Vermont Campaign Contribution Limits. An editorial in the Los Angeles Times (6/28, 958K) says the Supreme Court's ruling on Vermont's campaign finance law "has sent a welcome signal that it will continue to scrutinize well-intentioned efforts to limit the role of money in politics with at least one eye on the 1st Amendment." The ruling that the state "went too far when it imposed strict limits on what candidates for public office could spend and on what citizens could donate to political campaigns," suggests that the 1976 Buckley vs. Valeo decision "is still good law." Buckley's "distinction between expenditures and contributions is still the law of the land. That's good news for both clean elections and free speech."

DOJ_NMG_0036808

CIVIL RIGHTS:

DOJ Reaches Agreement With Indiana Over Purging Of Voter Rolls. The AP (6/28) reports, "The Justice Department agreed Tuesday to an Indiana plan designed to eliminate the names of people who have died and those who are listed more than once from the state's voter registration rolls." The AP continues, "Indiana Secretary of State Todd Rokita last week announced the plan to purge the rolls, following negotiations between state Republicans and Democrats. It would also target convicted felons and voters who no longer live in Indiana or in the county of their registration." Letters "letters will be sent to every registered voter in the state. Any that cannot be delivered will be flagged as potential mistakes, and the state will then send follow-up mailers to those addresses. … If any of those are also returned, the voters would be placed on inactive status." The AP notes, "Inactive voters could still cast ballots this year, but their files would be flagged. If they did not vote in the 2006, 2007 or 2008 elections, their names could be removed by the end of 2008. … The agreement, designed to bring Indiana into compliance with the National Voter Registration Act, followed a Justice Department investigation that found the state had hundreds of thousands of ineligible voters on its registration lists, including possibly 29,000 who were deceased, and 290,000 duplicates."

DOJ Probes Bias Allegations In Ohio Village's Police Firings. The Cleveland Plain Dealer (6/28, Flournoy) reports, "The U.S. Justice Department has launched an investigation of (Woodmere, OH) village officials for suspending a police chief and refusing to reinstate two police officers who contend they were fired because they are white." The Plain Dealer continues, "Mayor Yolanda Broadie and Law Director Janet Beck acknowledged the investigation Tuesday, but provided no details. Justice Department officials were not available for comment. … The investigation comes a year after the U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission ruled that the village violated the civil rights of Chief Lamont Lockhart and officers Amy Mengay and Timothy Ellis." The Plain Dealer adds, "Mengay and Ellis told the EEOC that Broadie, who is black, unfairly fired them and allowed black officers with similar or more serious infractions to keep their jobs. … Broadie later suspended Lockhart for what she called 'failure to properly lead and supervise the Police Department.' Lockhart in turn filed his own complaint with the EEOC, which found that the suspension was retaliation for his support of the two officers. Lockhart has since resigned. … The commission ordered the village to attempt a settlement, reinstate the officers and give them back pay. But village officials refused. So, the commission referred the case to the U.S. Justice Department. … Avery Friedman, who represents Ellis, Lockhart and Mengay, said federal attorneys interviewed village officials and gathered public records this week."

Shreveport To Improve Public Building Access In Agreement With DOJ. KTBS-TV, ABC 3, Shreveport, LA (6/28, Roberts) reports, "The city of Shreveport could have to spend up to $4 million over the next three years to bring all city buildings into compliance with the Americans with Disabilities Act." KTBS-TV continues, "Mayor Keith Hightower this afternoon offered a proposed agreement with the U.S. Justice Department to make the upgrades. It would need City Council approval. … A Justice Department task force came to town, looked at public buildings and made hundreds of 'suggested' improvements." KTBS-TV adds, "One building that needs work, the government said, is the old City Hall Annex. It was built in the 1950s and hasn't been modified much since then. Another is the old Civic Theater and the Municipal Auditorium, circa 1920 -- both built before the ADA was passed. … But Ebarb said some of the government's recommendations don't make sense. … 'They wanted to renovate the Elvis Presley bathroom (at Municipal Auditorium),' he said. 'They wanted to make the shower (handicapped) accessible. Nobody even uses the shower.' … Hightower said Washington is a lot like city hall: You can't fight it. … 'When the Justice Department comes and says you must do these things, sooner or later you've got to get them done,' he said."

Grassley To Proposes IRS Pursuit Of Sex Traffickers. USA Today (6/28) reports, "Pimps and sex traffickers could soon find themselves being chased by tax collectors, not just the vice squad." USA continues, "Sen. Charles Grassley, chairman of the tax-writing Senate Finance Committee, wants the Internal Revenue Service to chase after pimps and sex traffickers with the same fervor it stalked gangster Al Capone for tax evasion. … Grassley, R-Iowa, would hit pimps with fines and lengthy prison sentences for failing to file employment forms and withhold taxes for the women and girls under their command." USA adds, "The proposal would make certain tax crimes a felony when the money comes from a criminal activity. A one-year prison sentence and $25,000 fine would become a 10-year sentence and $50,000 fine for each employment form that a pimp or sex trafficker fails to file. … Grassley planned to propose the penalties when his panel meets Wednesday." USA notes, "The IRS work is intended to build on efforts underway to curb worldwide trafficking. The Justice Department, collaborating with U.S. attorneys offices nationwide, would identify pimps and sex traffickers and refer them to the IRS."

DOJ_NMG_0036809

Senate GOP Conservatives Opposing Leadership On Voting Rights Act. The Hill (6/28, Allen) reports the reauthorization of the Voting Rights Act "is running into some of the same objections in the Senate that it faces in the House, where the bill was pulled from the floor schedule last week after rank-and-file Republicans rebelled against their leadership." Southern Senate conservatives are "raising concerns about reauthorizing Section 5 of the law, which requires jurisdictions with a history of racial discrimination to pre-clear voting-law changes with the Justice Department. Some Southerners argue that the requirement is unnecessarily onerous and that their states should not be singled out in perpetuity." Sen. Trent Lott said, "Our part of the country, no matter how good we do, we're going to be treated differently than the rest of the country."

House GOP Rank-And-File Say Leaders Not Addressing Voting Rights Act Concerns. Roll Call (6/28, Yachnin) reports even while Republican House leaders "work to quell internal divides that derailed consideration of the Voting Rights Act last week, some rank-and-file Members complained Tuesday that they remain shut out of discussions regarding the law's reauthorization." House Majority Leader John Boehner said, "We are continuing to have conversations with Members, and [with] lawyers, about some provisions in the bill; and those conversations will continue this week." Roll Call adds that nonetheless, "several rank-and-file Republicans said House leaders remain unwilling to discuss any aspect of reauthorization of the landmark 1965 law." Rep. Steve King "asserted that his efforts to meet with GOP leadership in recent days have yet to elicit any response." King, who is "seeking consideration of an amendment that would end mandates under the VRA that require jurisdictions to provide multilingual ballots to voters," said, "It's not due to lack of effort on my part." Roll Call adds the "exclusion of King's proposal, as well as a half-dozen other amendments targeting language provisions in the law, from consideration on the House floor sparked an internal revolt that prompted leaders to pull the measure from last Wednesday's schedule."

Rule Maneuver Prevents House From Taking Up Voting Rights Act This Week. CQ (6/27, Duggan) reports in case "there was any doubt, legislation to reauthorize the Voting Rights Act will not be making any surprise appearances on the House floor this week." The rule (H Res 890) "for the Commerce-Justice-Science spending bill, adopted 224-188 on Tuesday, included a provision that tabled a rule reported June 20 for legislation (HR 9) to reauthorize the Voting Rights Act (PL 89-110). " After that rule (H Res 878) "had been reported by the Rules Committee, House Republican leaders postponed consideration of the underlying bill to address concerns raised by a group of Southern lawmakers."

Osceola County, FL, To Challenge DOJ Voting Rights Suit. The Orlando Sentinel (6/28) reports, "A day after a federal judge put county commission elections on hold, Osceola County said it will not settle a case filed by the Justice Department over Hispanic voting rights. … 'The county intends to proceed with the defense of this case. As publicly elected officials, the board must uphold and defend the last expression of the voters in 1996 -- that every precinct voted to return to at-large elections,' read Vincent Fontana, the county's attorney, this afternoon. 'Also the 2003-2004 charter review advisory commission -- that reflected the entire ethnic makeup of the county -- voted not to recommend that the board put the issue on the ballot again.'" The Sentinel adds, "Commissioners met with Fontana for about an hour and a half to review Judge Gregory A. Prensell's order stopping this fall's elections. … 'It is important for the citizens to have direct political access to all public officials who have the power to tax their homes and property. This is among the many rights and freedoms for which our armed forces continue to fight,' Fontana concluded."

Single Manipulator Said Able To Change E-Voting Election Outcome. The Washington Post (6/28, A7, Goldfarb, 744K) reports that to "determine what it would take to hack a U.S. election, a team of cybersecurity experts turned to a fictional battleground state called Pennasota and a fictional gubernatorial race between Tom Jefferson and Johnny Adams. It's the year 2007, and the state uses electronic voting machines." The experts "concluded in a report issued yesterday that it would take only one person, with a sophisticated technical knowledge and timely access to the software that runs the voting machines, to change the outcome." The report "concluded that the three major electronic voting systems in use have significant security and reliability vulnerabilities. But it added that most of these vulnerabilities can be overcome by auditing printed voting records to spot irregularities. And while 26 states require paper records of votes, fewer than half of those require regular audits."

DOJ_NMG_0036810

8th Circuit Upholds Continued Federal Monitoring Of Little Rock Schools. The AP (6/28, Trister) reports, "A federal appeals court on Monday upheld a decision keeping the Little Rock School District under federal desegregation monitoring, which has been in effect since 1965." The AP continues, "A three-member panel of the 8th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals at St. Louis agreed with a 2004 ruling by U.S. District William R. Wilson in the long-running desegregation case involving the Little Rock district, the North Little Rock District and the Pulaski County Special School District." The AP adds, "Wilson had ruled that the Little Rock district did not successfully evaluate its academic programs for how well they helped black students. Otherwise, the district would have been released from the remaining desegregation monitoring it has faced since 1965. … The district had been released in 2002 from all aspects of its monitoring except those relating to program evaluations. … In his opinion, Wilson said the district would remain under court order through the 2005-06 school year. Wilson said the district must hire outside experts and design a program assessment process."

Flag Amendment Falls One Vote Short In Senate. The CBS Evening News (6/27, story 6, 0:20, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "Voting tonight, the US Senate rejected a constitutional amendment to ban burning the American flag, but it was a near thing. The vote was just one vote short of the required two-thirds majority." Bloomberg (6/28, Rowley) notes Senate Democratic leader "Harry Reid of Nevada and 13 other Democrats voted in favor of the proposed amendment. Kentucky Senator Mitch McConnell, the deputy Republican leader, voted against the amendment."

The New York Times (6/28, Hulse, 1.19M) reports, "Eleven senators facing re-election this year opposed the amendment and several are facing potentially difficult races, including Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island, a Republican, and the Democrats Daniel K. Akaka of Hawaii, Robert C. Byrd of West Virginia, Maria Cantwell of Washington and Joseph I. Lieberman of Connecticut."

The Wall Street Journal (6/28, Lueck, 2.11M) reports Daniel Wheeler, the president of the Citizens Flag Alliance, "a coalition led by the American Legion that has been lobbying hard to win Senate passage, said he was disappointed by the vote." The Journal adds, "Underscoring the politics behind the measure, Mr. Wheeler said his group will work to publicize the votes of amendment opponents. The coalition plans to highlight the 'no' votes of Democratic Sens. Kent Conrad and Byron Dorgan, both of North Dakota, as well as Maria Cantwell of Washington, among others." Wheeler said McConnell "also would be a target."

The vote is generally being cast as an attempt by Republicans to rally their base with an eye on the fall elections. ABC World News Tonight (6/27, story 3, 2:35, Stephanopoulos, 8.78M) reported, "Republicans hope this vote on top of last month's debate on gay marriage, will rally conservatives come November. Democrats called that raw politics." Sen. Frank Lautenberg: "There he is, Kid Rock. With his head through the flag. Is that a desecration? It was such a desecration that he was invited to address the Republican convention. What is going on here?" Stephanopoulos: "Democrats did try to pass their own bill that would make it a crime to harm the flag without changing the Constitution. But that was also defeated."

NBC Nightly News (6/27, story 4, 2:05, Reid, 9.87M) reported, "The real reason this amendment is being debated, critics said, is to rally the conservative Republican base for the November elections. … And the fact that this amendment was defeated today does not mean this debate is over. Rest assured, it will be part of the Republican offensive on the campaign trail from now through November."

The Los Angeles Times (6/28, Neuman, Fiore, 958K) reports the vote "capped two days of debate, during which opponents charged that the push for an amendment was driven more by politics than patriotism. They argued that the main aim of Republican sponsors was to rally conservatives in an election year even if that meant trampling on the Constitution to do it."

DOJ_NMG_0036811

The Washington Post (6/28, A1, Babington, 744K) reports, "In 2000, the Senate fell four votes short, and supporters had hoped the GOP's 55 to 44 majority -- there is one independent, James M. Jeffords (Vt.) -- would put them over the top this year."

The AP (6/28, Kellman) reports, "Among possible presidential contenders in 2008, six voted yes: Democrat Evan Bayh of Indiana and Republicans George Allen of Virginia, Sam Brownback of Kansas, Frist, Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, and John McCain of Arizona. Five, all Democrats, voted no: Joseph Biden of Delaware, Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, Christopher Dodd of Connecticut, Russell Feingold of Wisconsin, John Kerry of Massachusetts."

The Hill (6/28, Allen) reports that "even some who supported the amendment suggested it was not the most pressing business before the Senate. 'It's not a burning issue in the grand scheme of things,' said Sen. Gordon Smith (R-Ore.)." In a similar story, Dana Milbank writes in the Washington Post (6/28, A2, 744K), "As the Senate's flag-desecration debate heated up yesterday and the sparks began to fly -- but before the smoke cleared -- the amendment's backers were asked a burning question: Is this the most important issue facing the nation? The senators rushed to extinguish the very thought. 'I don't think anybody would say it's the most important,' said Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.). 'No, no, not even close,' said Sen. John Ensign (R-Nev.), who, like Lott and 57 other senators, nevertheless signed on as a co-sponsor of the amendment. … So why is the Senate, which came within one vote of approving the amendment yesterday, giving the matter such prominence?"

The AFP (6/28) notes the measure voted on Tuesday read, "The Congress shall have the power to prohibit the physical desecration of the flag of the United States." The Washington Times (6/28, Bellantoni, 90K) reports, "Opponents of the amendment also argued that the concept of 'desecration' was vague. They showed images of Mr. Bush using a marker to autograph a US flag and of musician Kid Rock wearing a shirt made out of the flag."

Fox News' Special Report (6/27, (Garrett) reported, "Supporters, including many veterans groups say burning or desecrating the flag isn't free speech, but a grotesque affront to those who fought and died for it. … Other veterans say they fought to protect the constitution and the free speech rights it guarantees, rights the flag amendment, they say, would diminish."

USA Today (6/28, Stone, 2.31M) reports "Sen. Orrin Hatch and other supporters vowed to try again next year, after a new Congress is elected in November. Since 1990, the measure has failed five times in the Senate to get the two-thirds vote needed to move to the states for ratification." The House of Representatives "has approved the amendment seven times, most recently last year."

Democratic Measure Fails 64-36. The New York Times (6/28, Kornblut, 1.19M) reports, "Perhaps even more than her stance on the war in Iraq, it is Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton's position on flag desecration that has drawn the scorn of the liberal Democratic base. When Mrs. Clinton took a stand on the matter last year -- co-sponsoring legislation that would have criminalized the desecration of the American flag even as she opposed a constitutional amendment that sought to achieve the same end -- she was pilloried from the left. … On Tuesday, Mrs. Clinton played a leading role in the flag-burning debate once again, co-sponsoring a measure similar to her previous one as an alternative to the constitutional amendment that was about to come up for a vote in the Senate." The measure "failed, 64 to 36, minutes before the proposed amendment fell short of the 67 votes it needed." The Times adds, "With more than half of Democrats supporting the measure, the outcome suggested that Mrs. Clinton's approach had plenty of adherents within her party, and that while she might have tried the patience of her core liberal supporters, she remained within the Democratic fold as she prepared for a possible presidential race."

LATimes Assails Schwarzenegger Prison Reform Proposals. An editorial in the Los Angeles Times (6/28, 958K) says, "Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's collapse on prison reform is one of the most disappointing failures of his tenure. … The extent of his retreat in the face of opposition from the guards union is evident in his new four-part plan for the prisons. … Though ostensibly aimed at overcrowding, it doesn't even propose genuine solutions to that problem, such as reforms in sentencing laws and a major boost in rehabilitation programs. If the Legislature, which met in special session Tuesday night to discuss the governor's proposals, wants to set things right, a radical shift in approach is required."

WPost Lauds Supreme Court On Workplace Discrimination Decision. The Washington Post

DOJ_NMG_0036812

(6/28, A24, 744K) editorializes that the Supreme Court resolved the issue of workplace discrimination complaints "last week in a decision that was remarkable for both its real-world sensibility and its unanimity." It "found that illegal retaliation can take place on or off the job and that it applies to situations in which the employer's actions are 'harmful to the point that they could well dissuade a reasonable worker from making or supporting a charge of discrimination,'" forming "a sensible middle ground between extremes that had been adopted by some of the federal appeals courts." From "a court sometimes characterized by ivory-tower jurisprudence, this ruling was a welcome instance of common-sense judging."

ANTITRUST:

Mississippi PSC Considers BellSouth-AT&T Merger. The AP (6/28, Mohr) reports, "A proposed merger between AT&T and BellSouth Corp. has no provisions that would immediately cut jobs in Mississippi, but some opponents fear smaller competitors here could suffer if they are not protected." The AP continues, "The $67 billion plan met opposition during a hearing before the Mississippi Public Service Commission on Tuesday from a workers' union and telecommunication companies that are concerned the massive acquisition could lead to monopolization of the market." The AP adds, "The Mississippi commission, the Justice Department, the Federal Communications Commission and several other states would have to sign off on the deal, which was announced in March. … Those testifying on behalf of the two companies on Tuesday played down the competition between AT&T and BellSouth, saying the companies target different customers. However, in a February filing with the Security and Exchange Commission, BellSouth said one of its most significant local competitors is AT&T Corp."

McClatchy Closes Knight Ridder Deal. The AP (6/28, Sutel) reports, "McClatchy Co. said Tuesday it had completed its acquisition of Knight Ridder Inc., making it the second-largest newspaper publisher in the country in terms of circulation." The AP continues, "The news came a day after Knight Ridder shareholders overwhelmingly approved the transaction in an emotional shareholders meeting in San Jose, Calif., where the company was based." The AP adds, "The company has received notice of regulatory approval for the deal on the condition that it completes its previously announced sale of the St. Paul Pioneer Press. McClatchy already owns the Star Tribune in neighboring Minneapolis, and owning both would have raised antitrust concerns. … McClatchy also announced Tuesday that it had completed the previously announced sales of four Knight Ridder newspapers: the Duluth News Tribune in Minnesota; the Grand Forks Herald in North Dakota; the Aberdeen American News in South Dakota; and the Ft. Wayne News-Sentinel in Indiana and a 75 percent interest in the Fort Wayne Joint Operating Agency." The AP notes, "In all, McClatchy has reached deals to sell 12 of Knight Ridder's 32 papers, which it has said previously it wanted to sell largely because they did not fit McClatchy's criteria of being located in rapidly growing markets."

MarketWatch (6/28, Wilkerson) reports, "The close came as expected after a legal formality in which McClatchy said it signed an agreement sought by the U.S. Department of Justice to sell the St. Paul, Minn., Pioneer Press, one of the 32 papers it bought from Knight Ridder. … The department's antitrust division earlier in the day filed a U.S. District Court suit and a proposed consent decree allowing the deal to go forward if McClatchy agreed to sell the Pioneer Press."

Attorneys Doubt Foundation For DOJ Position On Employees' Statements. In an op-ed in the New York Law Journal (6/28), Howard E. Heiss, partner and Mark A. Racanelli, counsel, with O'Melveny & Myers (both are former federal prosecutors in the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of New York) write, "In a recent criminal case, the antitrust division of the Department of Justice took the position -- and a federal court agreed -- that statements employees make during proffer sessions with the government can be used against their employer at trial, even though the company was not a party to the proffer agreement and was represented by separate counsel. … The government argued that it was permitted to use employees' statements in this way because they are vicarious admissions by the company itself. As far as the government and the court were concerned in that case, the only facts that mattered were that the employee worked at the company at the time of the proffer and made statements about things he did as part of his job." Heiss and Racanelli continue, "Whether an aberration or a sign of new thinking at the Justice Department, the case is a cautionary tale for defense lawyers representing companies whose employees have spoken to the government. … But the case also appears to rest on shaky legal ground. It is one thing to say that an employee speaks for the company when talking to coworkers, competitors or investors in a job-related setting. It is something else entirely when employees make statements in a prosecutor's office in an effort to avoid or deflect criminal liability for their business conduct, and when their interests might conflict with those of the company."

DOJ_NMG_0036813

Antitrust Commission Proposal Would Reduce Firms' Civil Damage Liability. Bloomberg News (6/28, Rowley) reports, "A congressionally created commission is considering a proposal to let U.S. judges reduce the billions of dollars in civil damages that companies such as Microsoft Corp. would have to pay victims for thwarting competition." Bloomberg continues, "In some cases, violators would be spared triple damages and only forced to reimburse consumers for actual financial losses." Bloomberg adds, "A companion proposal would give the government a two-thirds share of triple damages and consumers the rest in criminal price-fixing conspiracies such as the government's prosecution of a global vitamin cartel led by Roche Holding AG and BASF AG. … The proposals are the latest effort to rein in suits against corporations and, if approved by the commission and sent to Congress, are sure to stir opposition. … Richard Grossman, a San Francisco lawyer who sued Microsoft on behalf of consumers, says it is vital to retain the threat of triple damages." Bloomberg notes, "The 12-member federal commission was created at the prodding of Rep. James Sensenbrenner, 63, a Wisconsin Republican who heads the House Judiciary Committee. The commission has asked for public comment on its proposals by July 10 and is due to send a package of recommendations to Congress by April."

Investment Consortium Buys Univision For $12.3 Billion. The Wall Street Journal (6/28, Jordan, Berman, Lyons) reports, "The chaotic auction of Spanish-language broadcaster Univision Communications Inc. has resulted in an equally tumultuous outcome." The Journal continues, "Univision yesterday confirmed its planned sale to a consortium of private-equity investors who will pay $12.3 billion and assume $1.4 billion in debt. But in doing so, Los Angeles-based Univision appears to have further rankled an important business partner it had already been feuding with: Mexico's Grupo Televisa SA, the company that provides much of the popular programming that has made Univision the dominant Spanish-language TV network in the U.S." The Journal adds, "Televisa, which already owns 11% of Univision, led a group that made a competing bid for Univision. For weeks, it was expected to win the deal, fulfilling Televisa Chief Executive Emilio Azcarraga Jean's dream of controlling the U.S. media asset. After losing the deal early yesterday, people close to Televisa complained bitterly that Univision and its controlling shareholder -- billionaire A. Jerrold Perenchio -- had ignored its bid, failing to discuss it even though the bid was very close in value to the winning offer."

The Financial Times (6/28, Politi) reports, "The deal capped a five-month auction for Univision and was seen as a sign of the growth of the Hispanic media market in the US. … However, many of the biggest US media groups – such as Walt Disney and CBS – failed to play meaningful roles in the auction, leaving Mexico's Televisa and a handful of buy-out firms to battle it out in the final bidding." The Times adds, "The deal involves Texas Pacific Group, Thomas H. Lee Partners, Providence Equity Partners, Madison Dearborn Partners and Saban Capital paying $36.25 a share."

The Washington Post (6/28, D4, Veiga) reports, "Grupo Televisa SA, a Mexican broadcaster that had led a rival consortium of investors, said it was disappointed with the outcome of the Univision auction. … Univision's bylaws allow Grupo Televisa, which owns an 11 percent stake in Univision and supplies it with much of its programming, to veto a sale of the company, but that could be defeated by a 60 percent approval from Univision shareholders." The Post adds, "The deal, if approved by Univision shareholders and regulators, is expected to close in the fourth quarter of this year or first quarter of 2007, according to a news release on the sale."

USA Today (6/28, Lieberman, Petrecca) reports that, "the deal left a sour taste with rival bidder Mexico-based Grupo Televisa, which supplies most of Univision's prime-time programming and holds an 11.4% stake. … 'Notwithstanding our repeated offers to discuss all aspects of our proposal, including price, Univision and its advisers refused to enter into any discussions with us after we submitted our initial bid,' the company said in a statement. It said it will 'vigorously pursue' ways "to build its potential in the growing U.S. Hispanic marketplace." … It's unclear what options Televisa has. Federal law bars foreign companies from owning more than a 25% stake in TV stations. To have big U.S. impact, Televisa 'can't be on cable, since many Hispanic Americans don't have cable,' says Sanders Morris Harris analyst David Miller. What's more, Univision has a long-term deal that enables it to cherry-pick Televisa's programming."

DOJ_NMG_0036814

Judge Clears Adelphia Assets Sale. The Wall Street Journal/AP (6/28) reports, "A bankruptcy judge granted permission to Adelphia Communications Corp. to sell its assets to Time Warner Inc. and Comcast Corp. in deal estimated to net about $17 billion." The AP continues, "Judge Robert Gerber of the Southern District of New York said he would approve an order to be submitted later Tuesday that would detach the asset sale from the rest of the company's bankruptcy process. Adelphia sought the separation to bypass creditor disputes that have slowed the company in its filing of a final reorganization plan." The AP adds, "The sale agreement with Time Warner and Comcast had been put in jeopardy because of a July 31 deadline at which the buyers could end their offer. Once complete, it would secure their status as the two biggest cable operators in the nation. … Adelphia remains in bankruptcy protection and last week filed an amended version of its restructuring plan. The company, the country's fifth-largest cable operator, filed for bankruptcy protection four years ago, on June 25, 2002."

Citizens Banking Buys Rival Republic Bancorp. The Wall Street Journal (6/28) reports, "Citizens Banking Corp. agreed to buy Republic Bancorp Inc. for about $1.05 billion in cash and stock to form a Midwestern regional bank called Citizens Republic Bancorp." The Journal continues, "The combined bank would be the 45th-largest headquartered in the U.S., with assets of $13.9 billion and $8.6 billion in deposits, the two Michigan banks said." The Journal adds, "The terms value Republic, based in Owosso, Mich., at $13.86 a share. Shareholders will receive the equivalent of 0.4378 of a Citizens share plus $2.08 in cash for each of their shares. Of the purchase price, 85% will be paid in stock."

Mittal-Arcelor Deal Marks Changes To Steel Industry. In an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (6/28), Peter M. Fish, chairman and managing director of MEPS (International) Ltd., writes, "It finally looks as though Mittal Steel will win its bid for Arcelor. Shareholders still have to reject, this Friday, the merger with Russian steelmaker Severstal that Arcelor management tabled when trying to elude Mittal's grasp -- and then approve the new tie-up with Mittal. So anything can happen. But it's been clear for some time now that something, in the way of consolidation, was due to happen, and not only at the top of this industry." Fish continues, "Assuming the Arcelor-Mittal marriage goes through, it will have far-reaching consequences for the global steel industry. The new company would produce approximately 10% of world-wide output. Its nearest rival would be Nippon Steel, with less than 3% of the market. To gauge the importance of the deal, consider that the nine biggest steelmakers after Arcelor-Mittal would account for just above 20% of the world's supply. The new company is slated to be a giant with production well in excess of 100 million tons per annum -- almost equivalent to the combined U.S. and Canadian output. It will have 60 plants in 27 countries." Fish adds, "It is clear that the global steel industry will remain fragmented even after the Mittal-Arcelor merger goes through. More consolidation is inevitable. Other steelmakers will be frantically looking for partners to counter the new grouping. Moreover, the merged entity will probably maintain its passion for acquisitions. … Consolidation in the future will be more internationally focused. Outside of Arcelor and Mittal, most steelmakers have sought to acquire other firms in their domestic or regional markets. Significant rationalization of the U.S. sector has already taken place -- mainly by Nucor and U.S. Steel. More could follow if Mittal is required to sell off some of its U.S. assets to satisfy antitrust authorities after the new deal." Fish concludes, "Even with consolidation, cheap steel is a thing of the past. Raw material costs are unlikely to drop significantly in the near term. Energy costs are expected to remain high. Demand from the developing nations of the world will, almost certainly, continue to rise. But higher input costs have not damaged the steel companies. The industry is more profitable now than ever. The limited consolidation so far has been beneficial. Further rationalization can only help."

EU May Fine Microsoft Up To $577 Million. The IDG News Service (6/28, Meller) reports, "The European Commission is about to propose a new fine of up to €460 million ($577 million) against Microsoft for failing to honor the antitrust ruling imposed on the company in 2004, according to people close to the case Tuesday." IDG continues, "The Commission ruled two years ago that Microsoft was abusing its dominant position in the market by denying competitors access to documentation about its Windows operating system." IDG adds, "The imminent threat of a fine comes as Microsoft continues to submit new information to the regulator, with the aim of complying with the ruling. The final instalment of documentation is due on July 18 -- a deadline Microsoft said it agreed with the monitoring trustee in charge of overseeing Microsoft's compliance with the ruling, Neil Barrett. … On Monday the Commission, Europe's top antitrust regulator, will propose a new negative ruling and a new fine against Microsoft to national competition regulators from the 25 countries in the European Union, the people close to the case said. … A final decision could be taken by the Commission as soon as July 12, if the national regulators support the Commission's draft ruling."

DOJ_NMG_0036815

EU To Boost Antitrust Fines. The Financial Times (6/28, Buck) reports, "A huge increase in fines for companies that operate cartels or break European Union competition law will be announced on Wednesday by the European Commission." The Times continues, "Brussels has already imposed some of the toughest fines in recent history, including a record €497m ($626m, £350m) penalty against Microsoft in 2004 and one of €462m against Roche in 2001. Over the past few months the Brussels regulator has again ratcheted up the fines, especially in cartel cases. … Officials believe that only higher fines will deter companies from operating price-fixing cartels or abusing dominant market positions." The Times adds, "They are particularly keen to increase the fines for repeat offenders and large groups with significant financial fire-power. … The new guidelines, which have been seen by the Financial Times, reflect the Commission's belief that the rules are too rigid and lack transparency – a view shared by many competition lawyers and most companies targeted by the Brussels trust-busters. … The new regime will apply to all companies found guilty of participating in a cartel or that abuse their dominant market position. It will almost certainly mean that more companies will be fined the maximum amount allowed under EU law, which is 10 per cent of global annual turnover. Up to now, only a handful of companies have been punished that severely. … The new regime will be especially tough on repeat offenders. At present, fines are usually raised by 50 per cent for companies that have previous convictions for antitrust abuses. Now the Commission can double the punishment in cases where there is one earlier ruling against the group, and may go even higher for 'multi-recidivists'."

The Wall Street Journal (6/28, Jacoby, Cohen) reports, "The changes to the 1998 guidelines will be most relevant to price-fixing cases because such investigations most often lead to fines, according to two European Commission officials. They can also be used to increase financial penalties for companies found to have illegally used monopoly power to elbow rivals out of a market." The Journal adds, "If the new guidelines had been in effect in 2004, one official said, a €497 million ($625.3 million) fine to Microsoft Corp. would have been much larger. Microsoft was fined for using its dominant Windows computer-operating system to shut out competition in related software markets. Although the Microsoft fine was the largest ever leveled by the commission, it was much less than the $3 billion that the Redmond, Wash., company paid to various rivals to settle antitrust lawsuits against it in the U.S. EU officials see that disparity as evidence that their fine wasn't big enough to have a deterrent effect. … In separate deliberations, antitrust authorities from the EU's 25 member states will meet in Brussels Monday and again July 10 to review EU Antitrust Commissioner Neelie Kroes's proposal to impose additional fines on Microsoft. Ms. Kroes has concluded that Microsoft hasn't moved quickly enough to comply with the commission's 2004 orders to change its business practices, people familiar with the case said."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Grass Roots, Lobbyists Driving Effort To Revamp Energy Policy. The Christian Science Monitor (6/28, Knickerbocker, 61K) reports that the "real push for revamping energy policy" is "coming from the grass-roots and lobbyists. Citizen groups and special interests are pushing for solutions as fuel prices remain high and turmoil continues in oil-rich parts of the world. … In all, 477 energy-related bills have been introduced in this Congress, according to a New York Times report. … In the states, some governors are coming up with their own plans, banding together to promote more energy conservation and efficiency than the federal government requires. In the West especially, governors of both parties are pushing wind energy."

Pombo Makes Case For DOER Act. Rep. Richard W. Pombo, Chairman of the House Resources Committee, writes in the Washington Times (6/28, 90K), "When the House of Representatives votes tomorrow on the bipartisan Domestic Ocean Energy Resources (DOER) Act, it will be considering one of the nation's most meaningful energy-policy reforms in history. … The DOER Act represents a balanced, commonsense compromise to deliver desperately needed energy supplies to the American people, which in turn will lower prices for consumer wallets and create hundreds of thousands of family-wage jobs."

DOJ_NMG_0036816

WPost Says Ban On Coastal Drilling Should Be Revisited. An editorial in the Washington Post (6/28, A24, 744K) says it is time to revisit the policy of banning oil and gas drilling in most US coastal waters. The House of Representatives "is about to vote on this question, probably tomorrow. … Unfortunately, the House legislation is flawed. It diverts billions of dollars' worth of oil and gas royalties from the federal government to the states, even though the waters from which the resources will come are federal. … We hope the bill passes tomorrow, but we also hope this flaw is fixed before it becomes law."

Domenici Offers Proposal On Nuclear Waste Storage. In a $30.7 billion spending bill that advanced out of his Appropriations subcommittee Tuesday, Sen. Pete Domenici has included a provision that would have the government store civilian nuclear waste for up to 25 years at federal sites across the country. The AP (6/28, Hebert) reports, "The interim storage approach is aimed at addressing increasing concern about thousands of tons of used reactor fuel accumulating at power plants, waiting to be shipped to an oft-delayed central government repository in Nevada. Industry officials have said the failure to address the waste problem will inhibit investment in new nuclear reactors."

The Wall Street Journal (6/28, Fialka, 2.11M) reports, "The committee's action would give the Department of Energy the authority to store waste for as long as 25 years at 'consolidation and preparation' sites; from there, the waste would be shipped to Nevada's Yucca Mountain for permanent storage."

Report Cites US As Disproportionate Carbon Dioxide Producer. The Washington Post (6/28, D1, Freeman, 744K) reports that a new report by the nonprofit group Environmental Defense found "Americans represent 5 percent of the world's population but contribute 45 percent of the world's emission of carbon dioxide, the main pollutant that causes global warming." However, "the group said auto companies should not be singled out for blame, because consumer choices also play a role." Besides changing the carps people drive, they "also suggest that communities reconsider land use policies because Americans are taking more and longer trips, often to shop." The report is part of an effort "to build support for government policies aiming at curbing greenhouse gases."

Scientists Say Gore Movie Generally Scientifically Correct. USA Today (6/28, 2.31M) reports, "Al Gore's documentary on global warming, An Inconvenient Truth, earns five stars for accuracy, according to an Associated Press survey of top climate scientists." Although many of those contacted "had not yet seen the movie or read the book," the ones that had "had the same general impression: Gore conveyed the science correctly."

Carmona Says Only Smoke-Free Environments Protect Against Secondhand Smoke. The New York Times (6/28, O'Neil, 1.19M) reports that Surgeon General Richard H. Carmona said "the evidence is now 'indisputable' that secondhand smoke is an 'alarming' public health hazard, responsible for tens of thousands of premature deaths among nonsmokers each year." He also "warned that measures like no-smoking sections did not provide adequate protection, adding, 'Smoke-free environments are the only approach that protects nonsmokers from the dangers of secondhand smoke.'" However, he stopped short of a "call for a federal ban on smoking in workplaces, bars or restaurants," saying his role is "providing the public and Congress with definitive information on the subject."

Sioux Tribal Leaders Plans Blockade To Curb Beer Transit. USA Today/AP (6/28, Walker) reports, "In an effort to fight alcoholism on the Pine Ridge Indian Reservation (in South Dakota), leaders of the Oglala Sioux tribe plan to set up roadblocks today and stop members from bringing in beer bought at four outlying stores." The AP continues, "Alcohol has long been banned on the 16,500-member reservation, where drinking has been a scourge for generations. But four stores in Whiteclay, Neb., a village a few hundred feet outside the reservation, sell about 4 million cans of beer every year, mostly to Indians. … Tribal members say that from now on, they will confiscate beer bought in Whiteclay. … 'We are the last line of defense when it comes to protecting our people,' says Duane Martin of the reservation's Strong Heart Civil Rights Movement." The AP adds, "The effects of alcoholism can be seen in nearly every family, in accidents, violence, sexual abuse and suicide, says Terryl Blue-White Eyes, director of the alcohol and drug program for the reservation. … The youth suicide rate on the reservation is the highest in the nation, and most of the suicides involve alcohol, she says. … Shannon County, where most Pine Ridge residents live, is home to less than 2% of South Dakota's population but had 19% of the fatalities caused by drunken driving in 2005 — 14 of the 74 deaths statewide, according to the South Dakota Department of Public Safety."

DOJ_NMG_0036817

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Massachusetts Latin Kings Leader Sentenced To 21 Years In Prison. The Boston Globe (6/27, 484K) reported in "New England In Brief" that former Massachusetts Latin Kings leader Edwin Serrano on Friday "was sentenced to more than 21 years in federal prison for drug trafficking offenses." Serrano "was found guilty of selling cocaine and crack cocaine to a 'cooperating witness' working with a federal-state task force investigating gang activity throughout the state. Authorities say Serrano, who was minister of defense for the Lawrence chapter of the Almighty Latin King and Queen Nation, also offered to sell the witness a firearm and attempted to recruit the witness to go to New York to kidnap someone."

Three Minnesota Men Accused Of Conspiring To Distribute Fentanyl. According to the AP (6/28), heroin laced with fentanyl is working its way into the Twin Cities. "Three St. Paul men arrested Friday have been charged with conspiring to distribute fentanyl and crack cocaine. … Authorities in Minneapolis and St. Paul are reviewing heroin-related deaths to determine if fentanyl was involved."

Privacy Rules Said To Create Roadblocks For Drug Investigations. Wilmington, North Carolina's Star-News (6/27) reports federal guidelines intended to "keep personal health information confidential create a roadblock for police who want to speak with victims of overdoses about the source of the drugs that hospitalized them. The issue was discussed last week at a meeting of about 30 law enforcement officials and medical community representatives." Meanwhile, "Preliminary test results from the federal Drug Enforcement Administration show the heroin that killed two men earlier this month in Wilmington was high in purity and not cut with the powerful synthetic narcotic fentanyl, as was suspected. Whatever its composition, the heroin poses a lethal threat to users, Wilmington-based DEA Special Agent Eric Savitts said."

Michigan's Man's Death May Be Linked To Fentanyl. WOOD-TV, Grand Rapids, Michigan (6/27) reports the Portage Police Department "continues to investigate the death of a 34-year-old man. … Police think he died of a mix of heroin and the prescription pain reliever fentanyl. … Investigators hope a toxicology report on the Portage man's body will help their case."

Investigators To Determine If Limbaugh Violated Deal In Prescription Fraud Case. The AP (6/27) reports Rush Limbaugh "will likely have to wait several days to find out if he violated his deal with prosecutors in a prescription fraud case when authorities found him in possession of a bottle of Viagra that was apparently prescribed to someone else. Limbaugh, 55, was detained for more than three hours Monday at Palm Beach International Airport after he returned on his private plane from a vacation in the Dominican Republic. Customs officials found Viagra in his bag, but his name wasn't on the prescription, Palm Beach County sheriff's spokesman Paul Miller said." Limbaugh's lawyer "said the prescription was written in his doctor's name 'for privacy purposes.' The conservative radio host was released without being charged." The AP adds, "According to the Drug Enforcement Administration, Viagra is not considered a controlled substance because 'it's not something you can be addicted to,' said DEA Investigator Maria Gilbert."

USA Today (6/28, Yancey) writes, "Carrying a vial of Viagra without his name on it got talk-show host Rush Limbaugh in hot water with U.S. customs officers Monday. And his detention at Florida's Palm Beach airport raises questions for U.S. travelers who routinely fly with drugs that they can't show were prescribed to them." Jennifer Connors, a U.S. Customs and Border Protection spokeswoman said, "Names on prescription drug bottles must 'match the name on the travel document.' Passengers flying domestically don't have to carry a prescription or have a labeled bottle, although the Transportation Security Administration website encourages labeled medications."

Network TV Coverage. ABC's Good Morning America (6/27, 8:00 a.m.) reported, "An embarrassing incident for Rush Limbaugh. He was detained at a Florida airport after customs officials found a bottle of Viagra in his luggage without a prescription. The label was in his doctor's name to protect his privacy. Now he faces misdemeanor drug charges."

DOJ_NMG_0036818

ABC's World News Now (6/27, 4:30 a.m.) reported, "Rush Limbaugh is facing possible drug charges in Florida. He was detained at Palm Beach airport for carrying Viagra without a prescription. Limbaugh's attorney says the drug was issued to the doctor to protect his client's privacy."

CBS News (6/27, 4:30 a.m.) reported, "Rush Limbaugh had drugs confiscated from him on Monday. He was carrying the prescription sex enhancer Viagra. The name on the bottle wasn't his."

Cable TV Coverage. CNN (6/27, 9:00 a.m.) reported, "Rush Limbaugh is back in the legal spotlight. Authorities in south Florida say the radio talk show host could face misdemeanor drug charges. He was detained for several hours. Custom agents say they found a bottle of Viagra in his luggage. Instead of Limbaugh's name, it carried the names of two doctors. Limbaugh's attorney said it was labeled that way for privacy. Last month he reached a deal with prosecutors. They accused him of illegally obtaining prescription painkillers.

Two Men Sentenced For Role In Connecticut Drug Ring. The Danbury (CT) News Times (6/27) reports two more Danbury men "have been sentenced to prison terms for their involvement in a Danbury-area cocaine and crack distribution ring that was broken up by law enforcement last year. Edward Toney…was sentenced to five years in prison and four years of supervised release. Timothy Eberly…was sentenced to 27 months behind bars and six years of supervised release. … The two were among 24 people from Danbury and New York City who were arrested last year during a crackdown by Danbury police and the federal Drug Enforcement Administration on a drug ring operated by Alex Luna of Danbury."

NFL To Add Amphetamines To List Of Banned Substances. The NFL will toughen its drug policy. The AP (6/28) reports the league is "adding amphetamines to the list of banned performance-enhancers starting in 2007. Amphetamines were previously listed as a 'substance-abuse drug,' but are now in the same category as steroids and other enhancers that carry stronger penalties."

USA Today (6/28, Wood) reports, "The switch in classification for amphetamines and methamphetamines will not take affect until the 2007 season to make certain all players know of the new rules. A first positive test in 2006 would bring a warning and put a player into the drug program. A positive test next year will initially result in a four-game suspension."

Bonds: No Word From Mitchell In Baseball's Steroid Investigation. According to the AP (6/28), Barry Bonds "said Tuesday he hasn't heard yet from former Sen. George Mitchell in his independent investigation of steroids in baseball. Mitchell, the former Senate majority leader, was appointed in March by commissioner Bud Selig to head the league's investigation into steroids. He has already contacted some members of the San Francisco Giants' coaching staff."

Lance Armstrong Seeks To Discount Allegations Of Drug Use. According to the Los Angeles Times (6/27, Abrahamson), cyclist Lance Armstrong "mounted a public-relations offensive Monday, seeking to discount sworn testimony alleging that he had, nearly 10 years ago in an Indiana hospital room, acknowledged use of an array of performance-enhancing substances. Appearing on a number of shows on ABC or ESPN, Armstrong sought to undercut testimony offered by Betsy Andreu, a former teammate's wife. She testified Armstrong was asked by doctors on Oct. 27, 1996, if he had used performance-enhancing drugs and said, 'EPO, growth hormone, cortisone, steroid, testosterone.'"

US Cyclist Faces More Doping Allegations. The Los Angeles Times (6/27, Abrahamson) reports a Spanish newspaper "reported Monday that U.S. cyclist Tyler Hamilton, an Olympic gold medalist serving a two-year suspension for blood doping, was billed by a doctor for treatment that allegedly included blood transfusions and banned performance-enhancing drugs, including steroids, human growth hormone and the synthetic blood booster EPO. Hamilton…said, 'I have not done what the article alleges.' The report in El Pais…is part of a series sparked by a review of confidential judicial documents tied to a raid in May by police in Madrid. El Pais said Sunday that 58 riders in recent years might have received blood and banned substances."

Hamilton Will Keep Medal. The AP (6/28) also reports Tyler Hamilton "will keep his gold medal from the 2004 Athens Olympics. The Court of Arbitration for Sport rejected an appeal Tuesday by the Russian Olympic Committee to strip Hamilton of his time-trial gold medal due to a doping controversy and give it to silver medalist Vyacheslav Ekimov."

DOJ_NMG_0036819

German Contender Cleared In Doping Investigation. The New York Times (6/28, Vinton) writes, "The Tour de France has been enveloped by the turmoil of a doping investigation less than a week before it is scheduled to begin. Race officials asked the team of a top contender to withdraw Monday, and yesterday they cleared another contender, Jan Ullrich of Germany, after a Spanish newspaper linked him to the blood-doping inquiry that has shaken cycling for the past month."

Cycling Seen As Paying "Hefty" Price For Drug Testing. In USA Today (6/28) Jon Saraceno writes, "Cycling is paying a hefty price because of its leadership in testing, even as most pro sports fly under the drug performance-enhancement radar because of union dissent regarding perimeters for testing."

IMMIGRATION:

Key Senators Open To Specter Compromise On Immigration. The Washington Times (6/28, Fagan, 90K) reports, "Key backers of the Senate immigration bill said yesterday they are willing to consider a compromise that would delay the guest-worker program and "amnesty" portions until the borders have been secured. The proposal was floated by Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter in an interview Monday with editors and reporters at The Washington Times." Sen. John McCain said the idea is "worth discussing." Sen. Edward Kennedy "said a delay will occur anyway because it will take a few years to set up the guest-worker program and the structure to process millions of illegal aliens onto a pathway to citizenship."

The Los Angeles Times (6/28, Gaouette, 958K) says the proposal provides "a potential path to agreement between the House and Senate." The Times notes, "Left unclear in the still-emerging conversation is whether senators would agree that specific border security and law enforcement goals or targets would have to be met before a guest worker or legalization program could begin."

CQ (6/27, Sandler) reported, "Two prominent Senate Republicans called on their House GOP colleagues Tuesday to stop trying to score partisan political points on immigration and instead focus on a legislative solution. John McCain, R-Ariz., and Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., stood with Senate Democrats to reaffirm their support for the immigration bill (S 2611) the Senate passed May 25. They also expressed disappointment in the direction of the debate this year and urged House leaders to go to conference on an immigration bill this summer."

Boehner Criticizes Democratic "Silence" On Immigration. The Hill (6/28, O'Connor, Hearn) reports that House Majority Leader John Boehner "ripped congressional Democrats yesterday for refusing to adopt a unified position on" immigration reform legislation. Boehner said, "I think a feeble response from House Democrats on border security makes clear they have no coherent policy on this issue," adding, "The stone silence from them is deafening." Democratic leaders "insist their members remain largely unified on immigration reform."

Gutierrez Makes Case For Bush Immigration Reform Plan. Commerce Secretary Carols Gutierrez said on CNN's The Situation Room (6/27), "The President's comprehensive reform is realistic. It's practical. It is not amnesty. And that's the problem with this discussion, is that you can very easily go into a one-liner and shut off the discussion and call it amnesty. It is not amnesty. It makes people earn their legalization or their citizenship. But there are two extremes here. One extreme is mass deportation. We are not going to do that. The other extreme is amnesty. What the president said is, let's find something in the middle that we can do that will get a grip on national security and immigration. That's comprehensive reform."

TAX:

Judge Blasts DOJ For Pressuring KPMG Over Legal Fees. The Wall Street Journal (6/28, Cohen, Davies) reports, "In a decision that bolsters white-collar defendants facing criminal investigations, a federal judge said prosecutors can't pressure companies to stop paying legal bills for indicted employees." The Journal continues, "The ruling, by a judge overseeing the KPMG LLP accounting fraud case in a New York federal court, concluded that federal prosecutors gain an unfair advantage and violate the due process of indicted employees by pressuring their employers to refuse to pay their legal costs. The decision strikes down a key lever used by the government in several recent criminal investigations." The Journal adds, "At issue is a 2003 memorandum that advised U.S. attorneys to 'scrutinize the authenticity of a corporation's cooperation' when considering whether to seek criminal charges. Known as the 'Thompson memo,' for former Deputy Attorney General Larry D. Thompson, its author, the memo stated that prosecutors could take a company's willingness to advance legal fees to employees as a sign of lack of cooperation."

DOJ_NMG_0036820

USA Today (6/28, Farrell) reports, "In a narrow sense, the ruling means that more than a dozen former KPMG partners and employees under indictment can now have their legal costs paid upfront by the accounting firm. … But more broadly, the ruling strikes at the Justice Department's policy for determining whether to bring charges against corporations. That policy, known as the Thompson Memorandum, was written after the indictment and collapse of the Arthur Andersen auditing firm. It sets out the conditions prosecutors should take under advisement when deciding whether to bring criminal charges against a corporation. … In order to avoid prosecution for suspected criminal wrongdoing, the memorandum states, a corporation has to show that it is cooperating fully with the Justice Department's investigation. If the corporation is paying the legal fees of employees under investigation, prosecutors could view that as being less than fully cooperative. … U.S. District Judge Lewis Kaplan blasted that viewpoint in his 83-page decision. Under the Sixth Amendment of the U.S. Constitution, he wrote, every employee of a corporation, from hourly workers to top-ranked managers, has the right 'o have their employers pay their legal expenses if they are sued as a result of their doing their jobs. This right is as much a part of the bargain between employer and employee as salary or wages.'"

The Washington Post (6/28, D1, Johnson) reports that Judge Kaplan "criticized the federal government for holding 'the proverbial gun' to the head of accounting firm KPMG LLP and advising the firm not to pay full fees to lawyers defending more than a dozen former partners on fraud charges. … The policy 'interfered' with the executives' ability to fight criminal charges in a case that has been called the largest tax fraud in history, the judge wrote. He said the government 'evidenced a desire to minimize the involvement of the defense attorneys' and added that 'the government's proper concern is not with obtaining convictions.' … Kaplan's harshly worded 83-page decision handed a potent symbolic victory to defense lawyers and business groups, who have for years complained that the government is overreaching in its attempt to weed out fraud after the Enron Corp. and WorldCom Inc. scandals. … An unusual coalition of trade organizations, including the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, the Securities Industry Association and the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers, banded together to fight the policy and submitted court briefs in the KPMG case."

The Los Angeles Times (6/28, Kristof, Hamilton) reports, "KPMG agreed last year to pay $456 million to settle charges that it promoted fraudulent tax shelters to wealthy investors, including Global Crossing Ltd. founder Gary Winnick, Guess Inc. co-Chairmen Paul and Maurice Marciano and former California Republican gubernatorial candidate Bill Simon Jr. … But the firm — unlike the 16 former employees — was not indicted." The Times adds, "In court papers, KPMG acknowledged that it had departed from a longtime policy to pay its employees' legal bills. Instead, the accounting firm decided in the tax fraud case that it would pay bills only for those who cooperated with the government and agreed to a $400,000 cap on fees, and that payments would cease for workers who were criminally charged. … 'If those whom the government suspects are culpable in fact are guilty, they should pay the price,' Kaplan ruled. 'But determination of guilt or innocence must be made fairly — not in a proceeding in which the government has obtained an unfair advantage long before the trial even has begun.'" The Times notes, "Legal experts said Kaplan's ruling would probably force the government to reexamine its use of the Thompson memo. … 'It's going to chill the government's willingness' to use this tactic, said Steven Peikin, a partner at Sullivan & Cromwell in New York and former chief of the securities fraud division at the U.S. attorney's office in Manhattan."

The New York Law Journal (6/28, Hamblett) reports, "Southern District U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia issued a statement saying, 'We are disappointed in Judge Kaplan's opinion today ... which we respectfully believe is unsupported by the factual record and the applicable law. The actions of the government were entirely consistent with appropriate Department of Justice policy, and we believe that the prosecutors acted ethically and properly throughout this case.'"

The AP (6/28, Caruso) reports, "Kaplan did not reach a final decision Tuesday on how to remedy things for the KPMG defendants, who are accused of developing questionable tax shelters that allowed some wealthy clients to dodge $2.5 billion in taxes. … He declined a defense motion to immediately dismiss the charges, saying to do so would be extreme."

DOJ_NMG_0036821

WSJournal Praises Judge For Rebuking Government Over Thompson Memo. The Wall Street Journal (6/28, 2.11M) editorializes, "U.S. District Court Judge Lewis A. Kaplan upheld the logic and meaning of the Constitution's Due Process Clause and the Sixth Amendment" in the Justice Department's prosecution of 16 former KPMG executives. KPMG stopped "paying the legal fees of its former executives, largely to satisfy the requirements of the so-called Thompson memo" so as to "avoid firm-wide indictment." Judge Kaplan "delivered a scathing 83-page rebuke of the government's case. Noting that Constitutional rights to a fair trial and competent counsel were at stake here," the judge concluded that "the government had used the company as a proxy to violate the defendants' rights." This is the time for "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to reinterpret, or better yet rewrite," those policies "that his too-zealous prosecutors have been using in violation of defendants' due process rights."

IRS Employees Caught Illegally Browsing Through Taxpayer Files. The Wall Street Journal (6/28, Herman, 2.11M) reports in its "Tax Report" column, "A new Treasury report says many Internal Revenue Service employees have been caught illegally browsing through taxpayer files in recent years. In some cases, IRS employees have lost their jobs. In other cases, they have even gone to prison. Treasury agents have investigated more than 3,700 cases of potential violations in the past eight years, resulting in more than 1,600 'adverse personnel actions' by the IRS, including firings and suspensions, the report says. In addition, 126 IRS employees have been criminally prosecuted for such violations."

Former Wife Of Acquitted Mississippi Judge Sentenced For Tax Evasion. The Biloxi (MS) Sun Herald (6/28, Lee) reports, "A legal nightmare that began almost four years ago for state Supreme Court Justice Oliver Diaz Jr. and his former wife, Jennifer, ended quietly Tuesday after a 10-minute appearance in U.S. District Court (in Gulfport, MS), when Jennifer Diaz was sentenced to two years of supervised probation for income tax evasion." The Herald continues, "Judge Walter J. Gex III ordered her to pay $58,500 in restitution, but then Assistant U.S. Attorney Don Burkhalter and Diaz's attorney, James Kitchens of Jackson, told Gex the amount should be left blank until the IRS sorts out the figures. … 'I promised Jennifer early on that if she cooperated with us, I would do what I could to get her a favorable sentence,' Assistant U.S. Attorney Don Burkhalter said after the proceedings. 'As far as what I could determine, she told the truth, so I had an obligation to do what I said I would do. … I don't have any regrets about indicting them on the tax case. I just wish it had turned out better for the government.'" The Herald adds, "The U.S. Justice Department began investigating campaign contributions to judges in 2002, turning up suspicious loans from Coast attorneys to a Biloxi bed and breakfast the Diazes bought while married. … A year later, the investigation turned into judicial bribery and fraud charges against the Diazes, Biloxi attorney Paul Minor and two former trial court judges, John Whitfield and Wes Teel. Headlines played across the pages of Mississippi newspapers for several years as the case wound its way to a three-month trial last summer. … Before the trial started, Jennifer Diaz pleaded guilty to a separate charge of tax evasion. Attorneys had repaid campaign loans for them, which they had failed to report as income. … In exchange for her cooperation, the government dropped all judicial bribery charges against her. Even if a jury convicted her husband, she reasoned at the time, she would be home to raise their two young children. … Prosecutors never called her to testify against her ex-husband during the judicial bribery trial. A jury acquitted him of charges at the trial's conclusion."

Lacking Votes, Senate Republicans Postpone Consideration Of Estate Tax Repeal. The Wall Street Journal (6/28, Rogers, 2.11M) reports Senate Republicans "pulled back from a vote this week on the federal estate tax, admitting they still lack the needed support for a House-passed measure that would exempt all but the wealthiest Americans." Majority Leader Bill Frist "pledged to return to the issue after the July Fourth recess, but his announcement captured the increased frustration among Republicans in advancing their legislative agenda before the November elections."

The AP (6/28, Dalrymple) reports most Republicans "support the tax reduction, but they need support from a few more Democrats." In a statement, Sen. Frist said, "The vast majority of my Democratic colleagues have so far refused to address this issue. It's my hope that their constituents will use the upcoming recess to explain the importance of supporting a reasonable and permanent solution to this unfair tax."

Bloomberg (6/28, Donmoyer) reports the delay "is the third since Frist began his quest to repeal or reduce the tax last year and the second time this month his ambitions were thwarted by Democrats who say the government needs the revenue generated by the tax. The House passed the legislation 269-156 on June 22 after Frist urged it to act before the Independence Day recess next week."

DOJ_NMG_0036822

Thomas Urges Senate To Pass Estate Tax Reform. In a letter to the Wall Street Journal (6/28, 2.11M), House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Bill Thomas writes, "Though the House has voted five times to permanently repeal the estate tax in recent years, the Senate has been unable to follow through. Faced with this deadlock, Congress has a choice: make yet another political statement or make law. … This is the opportunity to provide meaningful estate tax reform that is permanent, fair and pro-growth. The House has voted; now it's up to the Senate. It is my hope that the spirit of compromise prevails and permanent estate tax relief can become law in the near future."

Gingrich, Kies Criticize US Taxation Of Expatriates. Newt Gingrich, a senior fellow at the American Enterprise Institute and former speaker of the House of Representatives, and Ken Kies, managing director at Clark Consulting and chief of staff of the Joint Committee on Taxation 1995-98, write in an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (6/28, A14, 2.11M), "Sadly, Congress has latched on" to a proposal that "would tax U.S. citizens working overseas at higher marginal rates and subject their housing to higher taxes." These section 911 rules "are of great importance for American competitiveness, which is why Congress needs to revisit the new law's changes as soon as possible." Because this makes it "cheaper for [an] employer to hire a non-American for a foreign position," these "new tax increases can only mean that there will be fewer 'Americans on the ground' in overseas markets going forward. Studies have shown a direct correlation between employment of Americans overseas and U.S. exports." Also, "the added cost of the new section 911 tax increases will only raise the pricing of U.S. bids, and therefore mean U.S. companies get less work." If we won't "follow the lead of our trading partners and exempt foreign-earned income completely," Congress should "repeal the tax increase" to get "more U.S. players out on the field. Global business competition is already fierce enough. We shouldn't sabotage ourselves."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Signing Statements Draw Ire Of Specter, Democrats At Judiciary Hearing. The AP (6/28, Kellman) reports the White House "defended President Bush's frequent use of special statements that claim authority to limit the effects of bills he signs, saying the statements help him uphold the Constitution and defend national security. Senators weren't so sure." Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter said, "It's a challenge to the plain language of the Constitution. There is a sense that the president has taken signing statements far beyond the customary purview." The AP adds the "bill-signing statements say Bush reserves a right to revise, interpret or disregard measures on national security and constitutional grounds. Some 110 statements have challenged about 750 statutes passed by Congress, according to numbers combined from White House and the Senate committee. They include documents revising or disregarding parts of legislation to ban torture of detainees and to renew the Patriot Act."

The Washington Times (6/28, Curl, 90K) reports the White House "defended President Bush's right to set limits on the scope of congressional bills he signs into law, saying the Constitution grants the executive broad powers and requires the president to uphold the law." Press secretary Tony Snow said, "The president does not, and the administration does not, refuse to carry out the laws that have been passed by Congress and signed into law by the president. In the context of trying to preserve and protect and defend the Constitution, there will be times, there will be places within signing statements, caveats, where he has reservations about [a bill he is signing into law.]"

The Financial Times (6/28, Daniel) reports Democratic senators "accused George W. Bush of 'making unprecedented claims for unchecked power.'" The issue "has attracted scrutiny following a study by the Boston Globe this year that found that Mr Bush had employed signing statements for more than 750 laws enacted by the Republican Congress." Sen. Patrick Leahy said, "That's far more than all the signing statements signed by every single president from George Washington to Bill Clinton, put together." The Times adds, "Concern has focused on whether Mr Bush has used the low-profile statements to side-step congressional authority, rather than publicly issue a presidential veto of legislation."

DOJ_NMG_0036823

The Christian Science Monitor (6/28, Chaddock, 61K) reports, "Not all Republicans are as enthused as chairman Specter and Senate Democrats over this line of questioning, especially as lawmakers head into fall elections that could change control of both houses of Congress." Sen. John Cornyn said, "This is a fascinating topic, mainly something law students and lawyers can love. … As a practical matter, I don't know what impact it has.... It promotes public discourse and discussion about what the roles of the legislative branch and the executive branch are." The Monitor adds that in testifying for the Bush Administration, Michelle Boardman, "deputy assistant attorney general in the Office of Legal Counsel at the US Department of Justice, said that signing statements serve a 'legitimate and important function' and are not an abuse of power."

The Washington Post (6/28, A9, Weisman, 744K) reports a "bipartisan group of senators and scholars denounced President Bush yesterday for using scores of 'signing statements' to reserve the right to ignore or reinterpret provisions of measures that he has signed into law." The New York Times (6/28, Zernike, 1.19M) reports, "Senators on the Judiciary Committee accused President Bush of an 'unprecedented' and 'astonishing' power grab" for using signing statements. Specter "and others are particularly upset that Mr. Bush reserved the right to interpret the torture ban passed overwhelmingly by Congress, as well as Congressional oversight powers in the renewal of the Patriot Act." Senators "and two law professors before the panel said that if the president objected to a bill, he should use his power to veto it — something he has not done in his six years in office."

Bush Urges Senate To Pass Line-Item Veto.

President Bush yesterday met with key senators and spoke before the Manhattan Institute in New York yesterday to promote the line-item veto bill. The story was picked up by the wires and major dailies, but only drew minimal attention from the cable news channels and was not covered by the networks. The AP (6/28, Riechmann) reports President Bush "criticized House Democrats who didn't back the measure even though they've called for federal spending restraint." The House "passed such legislation last week 247-172. Thirty-five Democrats joined with most Republicans in voting for the bill." At the Manhattan Institute in New York, Bush said, "I was disappointed, frankly, though that more Democrats didn't vote for the bill, especially those that are calling for fiscal discipline in Washington, D.C. I mean, you can't call for fiscal discipline on the one hand and then not pass a tool to enhance fiscal discipline on the other hand. You can't have it both ways, it seems like to me." The AP adds the bill "faces an uncertain future in the Senate. Democrats generally oppose the measure, and not all Republicans are excited about the idea."

CNN's The Situation Room (6/27, Blitzer) reported, "President Bush today urged the Senate to pass a bill giving him a line-item veto. And that would give him the power to reject items he considers wasteful in spending bills without vetoing the entire bill. In a speech in New York, Mr. Bush calls the measure a vital tool to enforce fiscal discipline."

The Washington Post (6/28, A3, Baker, 744K) reports Bush's line item veto remarks are "part of a broader political effort to assuage disaffected supporters that he really is a fiscal conservative despite the growth of government on his watch." Bush "summoned key senators to the White House and later gave a speech promoting a line-item veto to fight earmarks, or spending requests that members of Congress slip into larger bills without going through the normal budget process." In "seeking a line-item veto, Bush set sights on the most politically charged form of federal spending, often called pork. The number of earmarks inserted into spending bills has mushroomed from 3,055 in 1996 to 14,211 in 2004, according to the Congressional Research Service, and the overall cost has more than doubled to $52.7 billion." But even "if Bush had a line-item veto and struck every earmark, it would only carve a fraction out of a deficit projected to reach up to $350 billion this year."

The New York Times (6/28, Rutenberg, 1.19M) reports Bush "also met on Tuesday at the White House with senators to discuss his proposal, including the majority leader, Senator Bill Frist of Tennessee, and the president's 2000 Republican primary rival, Senator John McCain of Arizona. In his address, Mr. Bush also cited a more recent rival from the other side of the aisle, Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts, the Democratic presidential nominee in 2004, as a supporter of a line-item veto." Frist has "told administration officials he will try to bring a similar version of the bill to a vote in mid-July. But even White House officials acknowledged that the proposal would face a tough fight. Democrats have been reluctant to give the president any sort of victory, and lawmakers in charge of the Senate Appropriations Committee are not eager to cede any control."

DOJ_NMG_0036824

The Washington Times (6/28, Dinan, 90K) reports President Bush "called the line-item veto the next 'crucial test' for Congress on spending restraint, and said he was 'disappointed' in House Democrats who claimed they were for fiscal discipline but voted against the plan last week." Bush "also promised, using the strongest language he's used in months, to take another stab at controlling the growth of Social Security, saying he will try every year for the rest of his administration."

WSJournal Criticizes CBO, Joint Tax Committee For Underestimating Tax Revenues. The Wall Street Journal (6/28, 2.11M) says in an editorial titled, "Misunderestimated," that when it "comes to tax policy these days, the most powerful branch of government seems to be the unelected computers at the Joint Tax Committee and Congressional Budget Office. Those are the agencies that tell Congress how much tax cuts will 'cost' the Treasury in lost revenue. And what's standing in the way of the Senate repealing the death tax this year, for example, is their $600 billion boogeyman estimate of lost federal revenues to the Treasury over 10 years." But a "new study from the American Shareholders Association examined the 10-year forecast for economic growth and federal revenue collections for the period 1997-2006. And over these years, it found, the CBO underestimated tax revenue collections by a cumulative $800 billion. To paraphrase President Bush: That's a pretty severe misunderestimation." But the estimates "excluded the impact of at least three major tax cuts (in 1997, 2001 and 2003) that subsequently passed Congress. These tax cuts were estimated by the wizards at Joint Tax to deplete federal tax collections by an additional $1.24 trillion through 2006, according to the Shareholders Association study." If "you add those together, CBO and JTC have managed to underestimate revenues by $2.04 trillion over the past decade." Tied to "their outdated forecasting models, these agencies refuse to acknowledge that there is any Laffer Curve effect from changes in tax rates that help the economy grow and revenues increase."

New York Democrats Call For DOJ Probe Of Fosella. The New York Times (6/28, Hicks) reports, "The chairman of the State Democratic Party called on the Federal Election Commission and the Justice Department yesterday to investigate allegations that Representative Vito J. Fossella Jr. violated campaign finance regulations. Mr. Fossella is the only Republican member of Congress from New York City." The Times continues, "In a statement, the chairman, Assemblyman Herman D. Farrell Jr., said that the allegations, if true, 'would constitute a major breach of the public trust.' Mr. Farrell was referring to a report in The Daily News that Mr. Fossella, who represents Staten Island and parts of Brooklyn, took trips with his family to ski resorts and other destinations that were financed by donors and corporate sponsors." The Times adds, "Craig Donner, a Fossella spokesman, acknowledged that Mr. Fossella had taken several trips over the years, but he said they violated no laws."

Paulson Defends Bush Tax Cuts. Treasury Secretary nominee Hank Paulson defended President Bush's tax cuts yesterday during his confirmation hearing before the Senate Finance Committee, saying the cuts should be made permanent. The Financial Times (6/28, Guha) adds that Paulson also "hinted at a possible shift in emphasis in Washington's China policy." Paulson "also raised the possibility of a renewed push on reform of entitlement programmes Medicare, Medicaid and Social Security." Paulson "added that he hoped it would be possible to make progress on entitlement reform during the remainder of the Bush second term."

CQ (6/27, Crittenden) reported that Paulson "stuck to the administration line during his Senate confirmation hearing on Tuesday, touting a fiscal policy built on low tax rates." Paulson "also told the Finance Committee the costs of entitlement programs such as Social Security and Medicare need to be more tightly controlled."

The New York Times (6/28, Andrews, 1.19M) reports that during his hearing, Paulson "cautiously avoided any hints on Tuesday about the administration's economic priorities for the remainder of Mr. Bush's term." Paulson "reiterated Mr. Bush's general views on the need for low taxes, budget restraint, increased American competitiveness and the use of persuasion rather than threats in dealing with China on economic issues. But Mr. Paulson, the chairman of Goldman Sachs, carefully avoided specifics on most policy issues or any mention of prospects for reviving some of Mr. Bush's economic goals — like overhauling the income tax — that have languished for the last two years."

The Washington Post (6/28, D2, Blustein, 744K) also says Paulson "hewed firmly to Bush administration positions at his Senate confirmation hearing yesterday, saying that he 'very strongly' opposes tax increases, hopes to begin tackling the long-term obligations of Social Security and Medicare, and wants China to move more quickly toward changing its currency policy." The Post adds, "Paulson was asked deferential questions by senators who lauded his grasp of financial issues, but he skirted several controversial issues by pleading ignorance on technical and legal matters."

DOJ_NMG_0036825

The Wall Street Journal (6/28, Solomon, 2.11M) reports that Paulson, "who is expected to be confirmed, didn't signal that any major changes in economic policy are on the horizon." Paulson "told senators he would take steps to simplify taxes and overhaul entitlement programs such as Social Security and Medicare, but said it would be 'naïve' to think those issues could be 'addressed and solved in a two-and-a-half-year period.'"

USA Today (6/28, Lynch, 2.31M) reports that there was little indication that Paulson will "differ dramatically from outgoing John Snow." USA adds, "On issues from taxes to trade with China, Paulson echoed Snow's stance."

Wilkinson To Serve As Paulson's Chief Of Staff. The Washington Post (6/28, A23, 744K) reports in its "In the Loop" column, "Word is that Jim Wilkinson, formerly at the White House and more recently burnishing Rice's image, will be chief of staff to Henry M. Paulson Jr., once he's confirmed by the Senate as Treasury secretary."

White House Eyes Social Security, Tax Reform For Fall Agenda. The White House Bulletin/US News (6/27) reports President Bush's comments on Social Security at the Manhattan Institute yesterday "appear to be part of a new policy push by the Administration. Growing more confident that the Republicans can retain control of the House and Senate, the White House is set to push a major reform agenda in the fall to change Social Security, cut taxes and boost support for the war." At least "two new themes are under consideration. They are: 'Security versus surrender,' which will focus on the war in Iraq and Afghanistan, and 'taxes and the economy,' which will push for new tax cuts and reforms meant to stimulate the economy further, according to senior officials." "There is no retrenching," one official tells US News and the Bulletin. "We are continuing to push our agenda." The Bulletin adds while a "slight uptick in polling has helped the President's situation, said the official, the agenda has been in the works for months. What's new is the addition of Social Security reform. The Administration's previous effort bombed yet the President still wants to tackle it before he leaves office. The official, however, said that it may have to wait until next year when the President hopes that his lame duck status will help him because the partisan politics directed at him may dissolve."

Wallace Stepping Down As White House Communications Director. The AP (6/28) reports that White House Communications Director Nicolle Wallace is stepping down to move to New York City to be with her husband, Mark, who is UN ambassador for management and reform this spring. Wallace will leave her job "overseeing White House press strategy" this Friday.

Bush To Nominate Donohue To Federal Judgeship. President Bush today will nominate New York Lt. Gov. Mary Donohue for a federal judgeship in upstate New York. The New York Post (6/28, 624K) reports, "Sen. Chuck Schumer (D-N.Y.), who serves on the Senate Judiciary Committee which would consider her nomination, has been informed and 'is keeping an open mind,' aides said."

Bush Nominates Connaughton To Head Maritime Administration. President Bush has selected Prince William Board of County Supervisors Sean T. Connaughton to head the US Maritime Administration. The Washington Post (6/28, B1, McCrummen, Stewart, 744K) reports, "If confirmed by the Senate, Connaughton, a maritime lawyer, would resign the post he has held nearly seven years to be the administrator of an agency with an annual budget of more than $500 million and a staff of 1,000, whose primary job is to ensure safe and efficient access for commercial and military ships through U.S. waterways."

Nicholson Wants $160.5 Million For VA Data Security. VA Secretary Jim Nicholson yesterday told a House Appropriations subcommittee that he needs at least $160.5 million to turn his agency into a "model for information security." USA Today (6/28, 2.31M) reports that Nicholson's request "includes funding for at least one year of government-paid credit monitoring for the 26.5 million veterans and active-duty military personnel whose private personal information was stolen May 3 in a burglary at the home of a VA analyst."

The Washington Post (6/28, A23, 744K) reports that Nicholson "hinted that more money may be necessary. 'If a year expires, we have a responsibility to determine whether to renew based on what we know at the time,' he said." Nicholson "said that $29 million of the $160.5 million will be taken from VA funds budgeted for 2006 to cover personnel costs at the Veterans Benefits Administration, where hiring planned for this year has been postponed until next. He said the rest will come from other areas of the fiscal 2006 budget."

DOJ_NMG_0036826

Administration To Announce Sweeping Welfare Rule Changes. The New York Times (6/28, Pear, 1.19M) reports, "The Bush administration plans to issue sweeping new rules on Wednesday that will require states to move much larger numbers of poor people from welfare to work." In "the biggest changes in welfare policy since 1996," the rules "set a uniform definition for permissible work activities and require states to verify and document the number of hours worked by welfare recipients." However, "some state officials and antipoverty groups, including many who opposed the 1996 law, say the new work requirements are unrealistic," and "many Democrats say the welfare law creates a perverse incentive. A state can comply by putting some people to work and by simply removing others from the rolls, regardless of whether they find jobs."

Reid Threatens To Block Congressional Pay Raise Unless Minimum Wage Increased. The CBS Evening News (6/27, story 7, 2:20, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "It has been nine years now since Congress voted to raise the minimum wage and Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid told senators today he would block their own pay raise unless they agree to raise the minimum wage when it comes up for a vote later this summer. While they are waiting on Washington, out in the country, some state legislatures have decided to put their own plans into action. Here's our national correspondent Byron Pitts." CBS (Pitts) added, "Growing around the silent symbols of Cleveland's sagging economy, there's now a grass roots push to give Ohio's lowest-paid workers their first pay raise in nearly a decade. Since Congress hasn't raised the Federal minimum wage of $5.15 an hour in nine years, ACORN is trying to get state governments to do it." Pitts added, "The push to raise minimum wage goes well beyond Ohio. It's a national trend. Across the country, voters and state legislatures have said the $5.15 Federal minimum wage just isn't enough. Twenty states and the District of Columbia have already adopted minimum wages above $5.15 an hour. In November, higher minimum wages are likely to be on the ballot in six more states. But in today's debate, Republicans argue that raising the minimum wage is bad economics."

CNN's The Situation Room (6/27, Blitzer) reported, "Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid vowed today to block pay hikes for members of Congress until the minimum wage for all Americans is raised. Last week, the Senate voted down a minimum wage increase. The current minimum wage is $5.15 an hour. Democrats want to raise that wage to $7.25 an hour. The last hike in the minimum wage was back nine years ago. Republicans argue that the hike for lower-income workers would hurt small businesses."

Roll Call (6/28, Billings) adds, "Democrats offered few details about how they plan to carry out their promise to stop Congress' scheduled 2 percent pay hike from going into effect." Republicans "accused the Democrats of engaging in a 'political stunt; in an election year and said the minority won't get far with its latest tactic." Still, "Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) already has introduced a bill in the Senate tying a COLA freeze to a minimum wage boost, and in the House, Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) successfully added an amendment to the Labor, Health and Human Services and Education appropriations bill to boost the minimum wage to $7.25 an hour."

Dean Dismisses Argument Higher Minimum Wage Causes Unemployment. The Washington Times (6/28, Rutledge, 90K) reports that at a conference of liberal Christians, "Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean yesterday dismissed as economic 'mumbo jumbo' the argument that raising the minimum wage would cause unemployment." He added, "This is a moral nation, so the first thing we must do is convince people that poverty is a moral problem."

Clinton Reportedly Angry Over Democratic Press Conference Snub. Roll Call (6/28, Akers) reports in its "Heard on the Hill" column that Sen. Hillary Clinton and her staff "felt snubbed when party leaders organized a news conference in which they vowed to block efforts to give Members of Congress a pay raise until Congress approves an increase in the minimum wage. Clinton has introduced legislation along those lines, but she was not involved in planning the leadership's news conference to trumpet the issue." A Clinton aide "was apparently so furious that the Senator seemed to be left out of the loop that she bawled out…a spokeswoman for [Minority Leader Harry] Reid near the entrance to the Senate Radio-Television Gallery."

Aide Defends Murkowski's Earmaks. In a letter to the Wall Street Journal (6/28, 2.11M), Danielle Holland, Communications Director for Sen. Lisa Murkowski, takes "great umbrage" at the paper's "assertion that somehow the senator is an active participant in what you describe as a connection between the process of earmarking and the 'opportunity for corruption.' Including her in a list of convicted felons who have sought to use their positions of power for illegal activities, simply because she has openly advocated a longstanding effort to improve the infrastructure of an Alaska community, is more than perplexing." Holland calls the notion that Murkowski would advance the prospects" of a bridge project "for some kind of family benefit is preposterous."

DOJ_NMG_0036827

Deer Spotted Inside Fence Near Cheney's Residence. The Washington Post (6/28, Argetsinger, Roberts, 744K) reports in its "The Reliable Source" column, "Last week, a fully grown deer was spotted inside the fence of the Naval Observatory grounds in a wooded area near Observatory Circle." The Vice President's hours, which is on the grounds, "is surrounded by a high fence and -- we assume -- a bunch of other top-secret stuff like motion detectors and radar. In this day and age, nothing the size of a deer meanders around the 40-acre property unless the Secret Service gives it special security clearance." Bill Anderson of Naval District said that while the deer "do not affect 'at all' the vice president or the house," the Park Service "is preparing an environmental impact statement to look at the 'options' for dealing with the four-legged trespassers."

OTHER NEWS:

Rising Interest Rates Putting Brakes On Housing Markets. USA Today (6/28, Knox, 2.31M) reports rising interest rates "are making it increasingly hard to buy a home and are putting the brakes on the nation's most expensive housing markets." The "latest evidence came Tuesday from the National Association of Realtors, which said sales of existing homes fell 6% from January to May. The drop was worse for single-family homes, whose sales posted their steepest drop in 11 years. The number of homes for sale, meantime, rose sharply last month, a sign of slackening demand." The Fed "is expected to raise its target for short-term rates later this week for the 17th time in two years. Previous increases are already shutting out some buyers."

The Wall Street Journal (6/28, 2.11M) reports sales of existing homes "fell in May for the seventh time in nine months as interest rates rose, but the mood of the consumer brightened a bit in June." The Conference Board "said its consumer-confidence index, which had decreased in May, posted a slight increase in June. Consumer attitudes toward the state of the economy deteriorated, but their outlook improved."

More Economists Expect Fed To Keep Raising Rates. USA Today (6/28, Hagenbaugh, 2.31M) reports Federal Reserve Board Chairman Ben Bernanke "and his colleagues are widely expected to raise interest rates by a quarter-percentage point for the 17th time in two years at the conclusion of their two-day meeting Thursday." And in "a bid to thwart inflation, a number of economists, including those at UBS, Lehman Bros. and Bank of America, are predicting the Fed will continue raising rates at its meeting on Aug. 8 and perhaps again later in the year. Such expectations are a big change from just a few weeks ago, when many economists weren't sure if the Fed would raise rates this month, let alone later in the year. But since then, inflation measures have been coming in higher and a number of Fed officials, including Bernanke, have been warning that inflation is outside their comfort zones."

Past Fed Rate Hikes Thought To Be Slowing Economic Growth. The Christian Science Monitor (6/28, Scherer, 61K) reports, "past interest-rate increases are rippling through the economy." Economists "believe the continual rate hikes are finally starting to act as a brake on the economy. The expectation is for economic growth to slow from 5 percent in the first quarter to about 3 percent for the rest of the year. Tuesday saw yet another sign of rising interest rates: Existing home sales in May dipped 1.2 percent, the third drop in five months." If the economic data "continues to soften, economists anticipate the Fed will want to pause and try to judge how much the higher cost of borrowing money is crimping economic activity."

Stock Markets Decline Sharply On Expected Fed Rate Increases. The Financial Times (6/28, O'Doherty) reports Wall Street "ended lower on Tuesday as investors awaited the outcome of the two-day meeting of the US Federal Reserve's rate-setting body, which starts on Wednesday." The S&P 500 "was down 0.9 per cent, or 11.36 points, at 1,239.20. The Nasdaq Composite was down 1.6 per cent, or 33.42 points, at 2,100.25. The Dow Jones Industrial Average was down 1.1 per cent, or 120.54 points, at 10,924.74."

USA Today (6/28, Krantz, 2.31M) reports, "Tech stocks were clobbered as Wall Street braced for Thursday, when the Fed will announce the result of its two-day meeting. The Nasdaq composite fell 33.42 points, or 1.6%, to 2100.25."

DOJ_NMG_0036828

The Wall Street Journal (6/28, Mckay, 2.11M) reports, "It was a bad day for companies that make things. Woes at most of the Dow Jones Industrial Average's truly industrial component companies sent the market tumbling more than 120 points." General Motors shares "nosedived 6.7% on worries about the auto makers' second-quarter sales. In particular, GM executives warned that year-over-year sales comparisons would be 'brutal,' considering that last year's totals were boosted by retail incentives programs."

Ohio, National Democrats Differ On Utility Of Corruption Charges. The AP (6/28, Hammer) reports Democrats are "split over how to attack unfolding corruption scandals involving Republicans: Continue to hammer away at what they call a culture of corruption or focus on their own candidates' ideas." Democrats "believe more than ever that Republican ethical problems in Ohio make the state a key battleground this November's midterm elections. In recent weeks, another former official from Gov. Bob Taft's administration has been charged with ethics law violations, and more details about lobbyists' allegations that Rep. Bob Ney accepted gifts for official acts have emerged in the Justice Department's investigation of congressional corruption." Ohio Democrats "see corruption as a pervasive and distinctly Republican problem in Ohio that they must exploit in every competitive race, while national Democrats' zeal has been tempered by a bribery investigation against one of their own, Rep. William Jefferson of Louisiana." The national Democrats' "issues-first perspective can be seen in one of their most favored challengers - Rep. Sherrod Brown, who is running for Senate against GOP Sen. Mike DeWine." Political analyst Stuart Rothenberg said "corruption is a clear theme for Democrat Zack Space in his race against Ney, and will be just as important for Mary Jo Kilroy against Rep. Deborah Pryce and for John Cranley against Rep. Steve Chabot - even though Pryce and Chabot are not connected to scandals by anything more than party."

Democrats Lead GOP By 16 Points On Generic Ballot In USA Today/Gallup Poll. USA Today (6/28, Page, 2.31M) reports, "Americans are paying unusually close attention to the congressional elections in November, a USA TODAY/Gallup Poll finds. They are more inclined to deliver significant gains to Democrats than in any year since Republicans won control of the House and Senate in 1994." Respondents "are more concerned about national issues than local ones — a situation that favors Democrats hoping to tap discontent over the Iraq war and gasoline prices — and prefer Democrats over Republicans on handling every major issue except terrorism." For Republicans, President Bush "looms as a significant drag: 40% of Americans say they are less likely to vote for a candidate who supports Bush. A fifth say they are more likely." The poll "of 1,000 adults Friday through Sunday has an error margin of +/-3 percentage points." By "54%-38%, the registered voters surveyed say they'd vote for a Democratic congressional candidate over a Republican one if the election were held today."

Democrats Seen As Handicapped By Lack Of Single Messenger. Roll Call (6/28, Billings) reports congressional Democrats have "spent more than a year struggling to craft what they hope is a winning message and agenda, but their biggest challenge may be one they can't fix with focus groups and slogans: lack of a singular messenger." In a "perennial problem for a minority, Democrats are denied both the bully pulpit of the White House and the instant credibility of a Speaker or Senate Majority Leader. And many view the top national Democratic leaders as either too polarizing to unify the party or too obscure to command widespread attention." While "emboldened by President Bush's sagging poll numbers and internal GOP divisions on key issues, Democrats also acknowledge they face major challenges in convincing voters to hand them power them without a prominent figure to call their drumbeat." Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid is "a social moderate who prefers to play a behind-the-scenes strategic role than that of spokesman," while House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) is "an outspoken liberal who enjoys the spotlight but is viewed as too far to the left for many in her party." Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean is "outspoken" but "arguably the Democrat whom Republicans most love to hate." Other Democrats "share a high public profile, including Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.), John Kerry (Mass.), Edward Kennedy (Mass.) and increasingly newcomer Barack Obama (Ill.), but most have their own separate political ambitions or agendas that so far have kept them from becoming unifying figures."

DOJ_NMG_0036829

DCCC Hopes To Defeat Reynolds. The Hill (6/28, Kaplan) reports Democrats "would like nothing better than to make an example of a Republican leader and they have Rep. Tom Reynolds (R-N.Y.), chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC), in their crosshairs." Speaking to reporters last month, Reynolds "suggested that he and Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC) Chairman Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.) are like two tennis players and Emanuel has forced Reynolds to raise the level of his game." Despite their "gentlemanly respect," Emanuel has "recruited multimillionaire Democrat Jack Davis, whom Reynolds defeated in 2004 with 56 percent of the vote" and "the two chairmen have spent the past nine months trash-talking while trading allegations of corruption." Some political observers "say Emanuel will seek a leadership bid in the next Congress and others have speculated that Reynolds has his eye on replacing House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) when the Illinois lawmaker retires. November's results will have a significant impact on the leadership aspirations of both men."

Democrats Tell Judge DeLay's Exit Harms Party. Time (6/28, Hylton) reports in a "Web exclusive" that Democrats "miss him so terribly that they are trying to persuade a federal judge to keep former Congressman Tom DeLay's name on the ballot this fall. Allowing the Texas Republican Party to replace DeLay, who says he lives and votes in Virginia, would cause great harm to the Democratic Party, the party's lawyers argued in an Austin federal court Monday. Proving that claim is crucial to their lawsuit so Democrats testified just how much DeLay meant to them. Embarrassing? 'Maybe,' said Cris Feldman, an attorney for the Democrats, 'but necessary.'"

House GOP Unveils Values Agenda. Roll Call (6/28, Pershing) reports that with "little fanfare," House Republican leaders "unveiled a broad 'American Values Agenda,' composed of bills designed to appeal to the GOP's political base." The agenda "includes measures on topics such as abortion, cloning, religious freedom, flag burning and gun rights — all issues that resonate with social conservatives, some of whom have expressed misgivings about the party's recent direction." GOP leaders, "with the help of Rep. Joe Pitts (R-Pa.), the head of the Values Action Team, began crafting the agenda in May after holding a handful of meetings with prominent social conservative leaders."

CQ (6/27, Ferrechio) reports House GOP leaders "say they plan to take up a series of bills next month favored by the Republican Party's socially conservative base, including a constitutional amendment that would ban gay marriage (H J Res 88). GOP leaders said they also plan floor action on a series of tax cuts, including the child tax credit, 'marriage penalty' relief and tax incentives for those who adopt children." House Majority Whip Roy Blunt "said the bills will be spread out over the three weeks between the return from the weeklong July 4 recess and the start of the much longer August recess. The legislation includes top priorities of groups such as Focus on the Family and the Family Research Council."

Morris Says Lieberman Can't Win Primary. In his column in The Hill (6/28), Dick Morris says Sen. Joseph Lieberman "is in the process of committing suicide. By insisting on running in Connecticut's Democratic primary against anti-war candidate Ned Lamont, he is in a fight he won't win and, in the process, destroying his chances in the general election, which he can win." Primaries in Connecticut "are notoriously polarized. The right dominates the GOP nominating process just as surely as the left controls that of the Democrats. This is no place for a centrist to thrive." If Lieberman "simply skips the primary and runs as an independent, forcing a three-way race, he will win overwhelmingly. The larger Connecticut electorate adores him and will happily desert either party to vote for his reelection." But in "an August Democratic primary, with its low turnout and ideologically skewed voters, he faces decapitation. As surely as an American soldier on patrol in Iraq, his very presence in the Democratic primary provides a tempting target for those who want to vent their frustration at American foreign policy." The "inevitable dynamics of this primary are likely to flow toward the challenger as he picks up money, support and recognition and offers a way to do something there is no other way to do: Vote against the war."

Connecticut AFL-CIO Backs Lieberman. The New York Times (6/28, Yardley, 1.19M) reports, "Connecticut's largest labor union," the state AFL-CIO, "on Tuesday endorsed Senator Joseph I. Lieberman in the Democratic primary, although many union leaders, meeting at their state political convention, complained of his support for the war in Iraq and foreign trade agreements. Many sounded loud

DOJ_NMG_0036830

'nays' when the voice vote was called." Most of the speakers "expressed support, noting the senator's efforts in his three terms to protect workers in industries ranging from clothing to submarine manufacturing. Many said, however, that his challenger, Ned Lamont, a businessman from Greenwich who owns a cable television company, is a fresh face who will better serve their interests and stand up to President Bush on issues like the war and trade."

Ehrlich Trails O'Malley By 16 Points Among Likely Voters In WPost Poll. The Washington Post (6/28, A1, Barnes, Deane, 744K) reports in a front page story that Maryland Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. "starts his reelection campaign today significantly trailing Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley, according to a new Washington Post poll. Although the state's voters give the governor good marks for the job he's done, they also appear inclined to return a Democrat to the governor's mansion." The poll "shows Ehrlich trailing O'Malley by 11 percentage points among registered voters," 40%-51%, "and 16 points among those who say they are 'absolutely certain' to vote in the Nov. 7 election," 39%-55%. The "deficit comes even though a majority of voters find Ehrlich likable, approve of the job he has been doing and believe that the 48-year-old former congressman from Baltimore County has a vision for the state." The telephone poll was "conducted among 902 registered voters June 19 to Sunday and has a margin of error of plus or minus 3 percentage points."

High Gasoline Prices Could Be Crimping Summer Travel Plans. USA Today (6/28, De Lollis, Hagenbaugh, 2.31M) reports, "Only 39.8% of consumers plan to take a vacation within the next six months, a 28-year low, the Conference Board said," and "a new USA TODAY/Gallup Poll supports the notion that high gas prices are crimping vacations," as "one-third of respondents in the survey of 1,000 adults taken Friday through Sunday said they are changing summer vacation plans because of higher gas prices." Of those, "37% said they would reduce the number of trips normally taken, while 26% said they're canceling plans or simply can't afford to vacation. Some 23% will take shorter trips." However, "the decline in vacation plans could also reflect a drop in employees who get paid time off," and "hotels are packed and airlines are nearly fully booked this summer."

WSJournal Calls On Buffett, Gates To Invest On Strengthening Capitalism. The Wall Street Journal (6/28, 2.11M) editorializes that after "Warren Buffett's pledge of more than $30 billion to the Gates Foundation," now "the nation's two wealthiest men have to prove…they can be as effective at giving away their money as they have been at making it. This is harder than it sounds." Still, the Foundation "seems to have avoided the worst pitfalls of many other large, politically correct foundations" and concentrated on problems, not advocating government solutions. Still, "with their tax-sheltered assets, modern foundations have no expiration date and have become hugely important players in policy debates, the culture and even politics," creating another "reason to watch how well the two men now deploy their gifts." The Journal would "suggest that they put at least a smidgen of their money back into strengthening the foundations of the free-market system that has allowed them to become so fabulously rich." There is a good in "reinvesting in the moral capital of a free society and trying to sustain and export free-enterprise policies."

WPost Praises DC's New HIV Testing Program. The Washington Post (6/28, A24, 744K) editorializes that the District of Columbia's "new drive to test everyone…between the ages of 14 and 84" for HIV, "which kicked off yesterday in Freedom Plaza, is long overdue." With the data, "the District can start issuing the kinds of reports on the spread of the virus that have long been standard in cities such as Baltimore and New York…and finally begin targeting its HIV funding effectively." This "ambitious plan" is "an appropriately bold counterpunch in the city's so-far losing fight with HIV." However, it "won't work, however, if District residents don't take the time to get tested." The Post then urges people to make time to do so.

Hamas-Fatah Political Deal Does Not Slow Israeli Move Into Gaza. ABC World News Tonight (6/27, story 4, 2:10, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Israeli forces have launched an operation against Palestinians in Gaza in retaliation for the abduction of an Israeli soldier. An Israeli official warned today that Israel and the Palestinians were at the edge of a cliff. There is concern, tonight, about both sides plunging into a new round of violence." ABC (Wright) added, "Tonight, Israeli tanks and troops are on the move into Gaza, in what could be the start of a major Israeli offensive." The CBS Evening News (6/27, story 10, 0:30, Schieffer, 7.66M) noted the Israelis "have been threatening action since Sunday when the militants tunneled under the border, killed two Israeli soldiers and abducted a third. Palestinian officials say the captured soldier is alive."

DOJ_NMG_0036831

NBC Nightly News (6/27, story 6, 1:20, Fletcher, 9.87M) said "Palestinian fighters are bracing for battle. Today, they were laying landmines, patrolling fields and building obstacles in the streets of the towns. It's all about a 19-year-old Israeli corporal who was abducted by Palestinian fighters Sunday. They raided an Israeli army post, killed two soldiers and escaped with one Israeli soldier. Now they want to swap him for women and young prisoners in Israeli jails. Israel says, no way."

On its front page, the Washington Post (6/28, A1, Wilson, 744K) reports the Israeli incursion "overshadowed an agreement earlier in the day by leaders of Hamas…on a unified political agenda advocated by Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas to ease the economic sanctions against the government." Hamas "agreed to establish a national-unity government as part of an accord signed by the largest Palestinian political factions," a move that "would signal a major shift by Hamas's political leaders, who for the first time would effectively endorse a two-state solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict." The Post adds that the pact "runs counter to views held by Hamas's hard-line leadership in exile headed by Khaled Mashal, whom Israeli officials say was behind the Sunday attack. Some Hamas leaders in Gaza, along with Abbas and Egyptian interlocutors, have called for" the kidnapped soldier's release.

The Financial Times (6/28, Biedermann) notes the Israeli "army said it did not intend to carry out a prolonged operation." The incursion "follows the failure of diplomatic efforts to secure the" soldier's release. Also, "the two leading Palestinian factions…have in effect reached agreement on a unified approach towards Israel and on internal Palestinian issues," which "was billed as promising an unprecedented implicit recognition of Israel by Hamas."

In a 1,336-word piece, the New York Times (6/28, Fisher, Erlanger, 1.19M) adds, "The prospect of an invasion, threatened by Israel if Corporal Shalit was not released, seemed to have pushed the Palestinians toward agreement after months of internal fighting." The Times says the deal "would move Hamas closer to recognition of Israel — a significant change — and would raise the possibility of renewed Western aid to the Palestinians." A final deal would "represent a victory for Mr. Abbas, who had threatened to put the issue to a referendum next month." On the prospect of an armed incursion, the Times says Secretary Rice "e on Tuesday called on Israel to give diplomacy more time. 'There really needs to be an effort now to try and calm the situation, not to let the situation escalate, and to give diplomacy a chance to work to try to get this release,' Ms. Rice told reporters…en route to Pakistan."

In an analysis piece, the Wall Street Journal (6/28, Leggett, 2.11M) says the incursion "could threaten a decade-long effort to build a viable and independent Palestinian government." The Palestinian Authority "is facing perhaps the biggest crisis in its existence," despite "a hint of optimism" emanating from the political agreement. "While the agreement appeared to demonstrate a willingness on the part of the two leaders to compromise with Israel, it is unclear if the document has the full support of Hamas." The "military campaign in Gaza could create enormous long-term complications. Widespread chaos could result if Palestinian security forces are scattered and infrastructure such as roads and schools are further damaged. Hospitals, already short on many supplies, could be overwhelmed." If the internal situation deteriorates, "Israel would be left with two choices: watching as a humanitarian and security crisis likely worsens, or assuming responsibility for providing basic services to roughly five million Palestinians, as Israel did before the 1990s Oslo peace process that led to the establishment of the Palestinian Authority quasi-government."

The Los Angeles Times (6/30, King, Ellingwood, 958K), Washington Times (6/28, Mitnick, 90K) and USA Today (6/28, 2.31M) run similar reports on the Israeli attack, while the Christian Science Monitor (6/28, Mitnick, 61K) analyzes its effect on Palestinian politics, in a story titled "Israeli Threat Unites Hamas, Fatah."

Israel Urged To Return To Targeted-Killing Policy. Michael Oren, senior fellow at the Shalem Center in Jerusalem, writes in the Wall Street Journal (6/28, 2.11M) that "while the operation may flex its military muscle, it cannot restore Israel's deterrence power or prevent future rocket attacks and kidnappings. Indeed, the attack may well prove Pyrrhic -- inflicting greater injury on Israel than on the Palestinians." Oren adds, "The quandary Israel confronts today originated in the unilateral withdrawal of all Israeli settlers and soldiers from Gaza last August. … There is, however, one way to avert a public relations disaster for Israel, to limit casualties, and to restore Israel's deterrence power: Israel must return to the targeted-killing policy that enabled

DOJ_NMG_0036832

Mr. Sharon to triumph over terrorist organizations. Israel must target those Palestinians who order others to fire rockets from within civilian areas but whose families are located safely away from the firing zones. No Hamas or Islamic Jihad leader should be immune from such reprisals -- neither Prime Minister Ismail Haniya nor Khaled Meshal, who masterminds Hamas from Damascus."

Khamenei Offers Mixed Message On Nuclear Program, Appoints Foreign Policy Advisors.

The New York Times (6/28, Fathi, 1.19M) reports Iranian Supreme Leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei said "that Iran had 'no use' to negotiate with the United States. But in a more positive gesture he said that the 'the ground was prepared' for talks over Iran's nuclear program." The Times notes, "This is the first that Mr. Khamenei has reacted to the idea of direct talks with the United States since a package of incentives was submitted to Iran on June 6," and quotes Khamenei saying, "We will not negotiate over our undeniable right of using nuclear technology with anyone. But if they recognize our right, we are willing to negotiate over controls, inspections and international guarantees. The ground for such negotiations has been prepared." White House spokesman Tony Snow "said he did not consider Mr. Khamenei's comments to be a snub and pointed that various leaders in Iran had offered different reactions to the incentive plan." The Times adds, "In a major shift of policy, Mr. Khamenei created a new foreign policy committee on Sunday and appointed former Foreign Minister Kamal Kharrazi, a moderate politician, to head the committee for five years. The committee has four other members, who are all moderate former ministers."

The AP (6/28, Karimi) adds Khamenei "said Tuesday that Iran does not need negotiations with the United States over its nuclear program, apparently seeking to reassure hard-liners the country will not cave in," but Khamenei "did not give his position on the" West's incentives proposal.

Iran Courting Non-Western Powers On Nuclear Deal. The Los Angeles Times (6/28, Rubin, 958K) reports that Iranian diplomats are making dozens of visits "around the globe in recent weeks," as "high-ranking officials have touched down in Algeria, Tunisia, Yemen, China, Spain and Italy" in "part of an extensive international lobbying campaign to build support for Iran's position in talks over the future of its nuclear program." Diplomats and experts believe that "in order to make Tehran's case as strong as possible, Iranian officials are seeking broad international support, especially from outside the West." Meanwhile, "In the Middle East, Iranian officials are trying to use the nuclear talks as a vehicle for asserting themselves as the preeminent regional power."

Science Minister Says Islam Forbids WMD. The AP (6/28) reports Iranian Science and Research Minister Mohammad Mehdi Zahedi "told Indonesia's vice president Tuesday that his country has no plans to develop nuclear weapons because Islamic law outlaws the development of weapons of mass destruction." Zahedi "said that based on the Islamic principle, Iran must take advantage of all its potential resources including nuclear technology for the prosperity of its people." He also "called on Western countries not to…prevent developing nations from producing …nuclear power when it is designed for peaceful purposes."

Warner Says North Korea Missile Test May Not Be Imminent.

The New York Times (6/28, Shanker, Sanger, 1.19M) reports, "The chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee said Tuesday that while North Korea showed clear signs of preparing a missile for a test launching, it remained uncertain whether it was fully fueled for an imminent firing." The chairman, Senator John W. Warner, "spoke on Capitol Hill after committee members received a closed-door briefing from officials of the Missile Defense Agency, the Defense Intelligence Agency and the defense secretary's office."

South Korea Urges China To Dissuade North From Testing Missile. The AP (6/28, Wong) reports, "South Korea's foreign minister urged China to use its influence to dissuade North Korea from testing a long-range missile, but Western diplomats on Tuesday questioned Beijing's influence over the reclusive communist state." South Korea's Ban Ki-moon and Chinese counterpart Li Zhaoxing "met for about an hour, discussing strategies to sway Pyongyang not to test-launch a missile and to resume six-nation talks on its nuclear weapons program." Ban "urged China to persuade North Korea not to test the missile, the South's Yonhap news agency reported, citing South Korea Foreign Ministry official Lee Hyuck, who attended Tuesday's talks."

Snow Warns North Korea Not To "Bluff." AFP (6/28) reports, "The United States warned North Korea against thinking it could use worries over a possible long-range missile to force the United States into direct talks. 'If it's a bluff for direct negotiations, it's not an advisable way to do it,' White House spokesman Tony Snow told a press briefing."

DOJ_NMG_0036833

House Panel Approves India Nuclear Cooperation Deal. The Financial Times (6/28, Daniel, Sevastopulo) says the Administration "scored a key victory in securing congressional support for its historic agreement to allow civil nuclear co-operation with India when the House foreign relations committee voted 37 to five on Tuesday to allow it to proceed with legislation. The vote came after months of negotiations between administration officials and legislators." The Times adds, "Although the initial bill expanded from the two-page version submitted by the Bush administration to 30 pages, one aide closely involved in talks, said: 'In the operative language of the legislation there were no new conditions added.'" The Times says "many observers believe" Senate approval of the deal "will not come before" November's midterm elections.

The Wall Street Journal (6/28, Solomon, 2.11M) calls it a "foreign-policy victory for the Bush administration," and "the 37-5 vote was viewed by Democrats and Republicans as a positive indication that the White House's Indian initiative will win support from the full Congress this fall." The Washington Times/AP (6/28, Klug) reports that Rep. Jim Leach ""said the deal 'knifed' the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty." Rep. Henry J. Hyde, "and Rep. Tom Lantos of California, the committee's top Democrat and a supporter of the plan, said yesterday's legislation would strengthen Congress' role by having lawmakers vote only after they had seen a final version of the cooperation plan with India." The AFP (6/28) also covers this story.

Koizumi To Visit US. The Washington Times (6/28, Kambayashi, 90K) reports that Japan "has taken steps to ensure a successful meeting" between President Bush and Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi, "agreeing last week to reopen its markets to American beef and announcing Monday that it will deploy advanced U.S. Patriot interceptor missiles on Japanese soil." Japanese analysts expect the two "will discuss the Iranian nuclear standoff, rising instability in Afghanistan and the threat posed by bird flu." However, Japan's "protocol-conscious press" is focused on "crowing that Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi will receive a more elaborate welcome than Chinese President Hu Jintao did." The "Japanese are sensitive to the contrast with the treatment given to the Chinese president when he visited Washington in April."

Japan's Actions May Be Hurting US Relations In Asia. The Christian Science Monitor (6/28, Marquand, 61K) reports, that Koizumi's visits to the Yasukuni shrine "'are not in the US interest, and as the US-Japan alliance gets stronger, the US should discourage them,' says Ezra Vogel, a senior Asia expert at Harvard University. The rest of Asia sees them as "a provocative denial of World War II Japanese aggression," and, "We need to tell Japan, as a friend, that the way it handles the shrine makes the US job in the region more difficult." However, "it is considered axiomatic in Japanese relations that overt or highly public commentary about domestic behavior by foreign politicians can scupper efforts to influence Tokyo." Also, "there are new US concerns about Japan's revisionism regarding its history with the US." A museum on the grounds of the shrine "suggests that the US, not Japan, was responsible for World War II."

Powell, Albright Advocate Fully-Funding Foreign Aid. The Washington Times (6/28, Stuhldreher, 90K) reports, "Former Secretaries of State Colin L. Powell and Madeleine K. Albright warned yesterday that proposed funding cuts for international programs could jeopardize national security." The House Appropriations Committee recently cut Bush's proposed budget "by nearly $3 billion, to $32.28 billion," and "Supporters of full funding argue that more money spent on international projects would not only increase global security, but also open up business opportunities abroad."

Somali Islamic Militia Accused Of Breaking Cease-Fire. The AP (6/28, Duhul) reports, "Islamic militiamen seized a checkpoint outside Somalia's capital Tuesday in an hourlong battle that killed six people, according to a clan leader who accused the militia of breaking a new cease-fire." The agreement, made last week, would "stop all military action and recognize the country's powerless, U.N.-backed interim government. But militia officials subsequently voted to replace their relatively moderate leader, who also had been reaching out to the West, with" Sheikh Hassan Dahir Aweys, "a radical cleric whom the U.S. accused of links to al-Qaida."

US Backs UN Conference On Reducing Illegal Arms. The New York Times (6/28, Hoge, 1.19M) reports, "the Bush administration gave its backing on Tuesday to a United Nations conference on curtailing the international flow of illegal arms, but warned delegates against adopting measures that would restrict individual possession of weapons." Secretary General Kofi Annan reminded "urged member countries to toughen existing laws governing arms deals," bit "said the conference was not contemplating a global ban on gun ownership." Some of his remarks "seemed to be referring to a campaign by the National Rifle Association, which has charged in mass mailings that the United Nations is plotting to take away Americans' guns through a treaty banning ownership." John R. Bolton, the United States ambassador to the United Nations, declined to comment on "why all three citizen delegates from the United States to the conference were prominent members of the gun lobby group." The Washington Times (6/28, Pisik, 90K) also covers this story.

DOJ_NMG_0036834

Energy Wealth Strengthens Russia's Hand, Presents Headache For US. The Wall Street Journal (6/28, King, Cullison, 2.11M) reports, "The Bush administration is wrestling with a new challenge from abroad: an often strong-willed Russia made all the more assertive by its energy wealth." Russian President Vladimir Putin "delivered a hard-hitting speech yesterday, arguing that Russia's economic renaissance makes it an equal among other global powers," and "Bush aides say they worry that Russia's economic clout already is leading Moscow to overplay its hand on the diplomatic front." Russian "assertiveness has complicated life for an administration already struggling with falling approval ratings at home and the intractable conflict in Iraq" and "U.S. officials acknowledge that dealing with an increasingly cocky and robust Russia has complicated interactions with Moscow and made negotiations within the U.N. Security Council, where Russia holds a veto, more tricky." This is the "dilemma facing Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice" when she "arrives in Moscow today hoping to win Russia's support on international issues such as curbing Iran's nuclear ambitions, even as the Bush administration has stepped up criticism of Mr. Putin's policies both at home and toward Russia's nearest neighbors."

Belarus Vow To Retaliate For US Sanctions. The Washington Post (6/28, A23, 744K) reports in its "In the Loop" column that Belarus has "vowed to retaliate for the administration's decision to freeze the U.S. bank accounts of Belarusan President Alexander Lukashenko and other high-ranking officials. The sanctions, which also bar U.S. citizens from doing business with the Belarusans, were imposed for that government's human rights abuses, general corruption and thuggery, repression, election fraud and the disappearances of four regime critics. 'We'll apply appropriately symmetrical measures to George W. Bush and Condoleezza Rice,' Belarusan Security Council Secretary Viktor Sheiman vowed in a state television interview. 'We'll freeze their accounts and seize their assets' in Belarus."

State Department Officials' Claims About Myanmar Called "Exaggerated." Chan Kyaw Aung, Consulate General of the Union of Myanmar, writes in a letter to the Wall Street Journal (6/28, 2.11M) that US Undersecretary of State Paula J. Dobriansky's June 19 op-ed "is based on exaggerated and fabricated reports. It also makes the groundless assertion that, in addition to Aung San Suu Kyi, 50 million people are living without basic freedoms and human rights in Burma. … Instead of taking such an aggressive approach and making such provocations, those who truly want to support democracy and prosperity in Myanmar should cooperate with its government to achieve the goal of implementing the Seven-Step Road Map for Democratic Transition in Myanmar."

Obrador's Relations With "Street Bosses" Raise Critic's Concerns. The Wall Street Journal (6/28, Lyons, 2.11M) reports, "Street bosses…have long been a staple of Mexican politics, but their influence was supposed to fade as the country's democracy matured. Instead, their power has expanded because they can provide jobs and housing to thousands of families made desperate by a sluggish economy." Throughout leftist presidential candidate Andres Manuel López Obrador's "political career, he has relied on mass protests to get what he wants." Now "his critics fear that if he wins the presidency he'll rely on street bosses…to achieve his aims, and if he loses he'll call on them to shut down cities."

Chavez Used In Mexican Attack Ads. The Washington Post (6/28, A14, Roig-Franzia, 744K) reports that Hugo Chavez's "face has been all over Mexican television at critical stages in this country's bitter mudfest of a presidential race." In fact, the "imagery has gotten so intense that Mexico's electoral commission has twice ordered television advertisements featuring the Venezuelan leader off the air." Obrador's opponents have been "linking the candidate to Chavez," and "Mexican political experts generally agree the tactic has been effective." Now, "as the campaign enters its final stage,…Obrador has begun responding more often to the comparisons to Chavez."

DOJ_NMG_0036835

Obrador Criticized For "Messianic Populism." Enrique Krauze, editor of the magazine Letras Libres and the author of "Mexico: Biography of Power," writes in an op-ed in the New York Times (6/28, 1.19M), "Should Andrés Manuel López Obrador, the front-runner in Mexico's presidential race, emerge victorious on Sunday, it could usher in a form of Latin American leftism as yet unseen: messianic populism," and "Mexico's fragile democracy could become its first casualty." Now "millions of poor Mexicans, particularly in the center and south of the country, see in him what he sees in himself: a bestower of manna who will provide the poor with cash handouts and all the services of a great welfare state. His oratory increasingly blends the theological with the revolutionary." While "his platform is full of unrealizable initiatives," far "more troubling than his economics is his political messianism, which could undermine our democracy."

Samuelson Argues Mexican Economic Growth Won't Improve, No Matter Who Wins. Robert J. Samuelson writes in his column in the Washington Post (6/28, A25, 744K) that Mexico's slow economic growth is one reason it is "sending so many of its poorest citizens north." However, "Economies advance through the adoption of better technologies and business methods" and "in Mexico, this process is weak." It has "large, modern firms in semi-protected markets that limit the pressure to improve efficiency or lower prices" and "thousands of small firms…that theoretically aren't legal, because they haven't registered with the government and often don't pay taxes or comply with regulations on wages and hiring and firing," and thus "are virtually compelled to remain small and inefficient." This "frustrates rapid economic growth," and as each presidential candidate "might have trouble enacting his agenda without a legislative majority," it probably won't change soon.

China Announces Over $1 Billion In Bank Fraud. The Washington Post (6/28, D1, Goodman, 744K) reports, "The Chinese government disclosed $1.1 billion worth of fraud at" the Agricultural Bank of China, "one of the country's largest state-owned banks this week, underscoring the risks confronting foreign investors as they seek big stakes in China's precarious banking system." This comes "as China presses to eradicate the taint of corruption from its state-owned banks as it courts foreign capital in a bid to improve management practices," and "brings to the fore a basic question about the future of China's financial system: Are the state disclosures a sign that the government is indeed serious about fixing the troubles, or are they just another indication of the extent of the problems in a fundamentally shaky system? Analysts saw a little bit of both."

Chinese Government Responding To Rural Concerns Over Land Seizures. The Washington Post (6/28, A14, Cody, 744K) reports, "For 24 hours, thousands of rampaging farmers" in Sanzhou "unleashed their rage over confiscated farmland this month," and in "a twist: The villagers won significant concessions." Now "officials had pledged a high-level review of 750 acres of rice paddies and fish ponds, property that had been confiscated by the village committee and resold for development in what the villagers said was a corrupt transaction." This "stopped the violence after only a few serious injuries. More broadly, it dramatized the Chinese government's realization that farmers have a point when they complain that their land and their livelihoods are being unfairly swallowed up by relentless economic growth." The government, "in an indication of concern about the unrest among suddenly landless farmers, has launched a campaign to preserve the fields and paddies that feed China's 1.3 billion people" and "T become increasingly frank about the corruption that often accompanies land seizures, outraging farmers and corroding their willingness to abide by official decisions." Now there are "the first signs…that the campaign may be having an effect."

Taiwan's Chen Easily Beats Recall Attempt. The Washington Post (6/28, A21, Rickards, 744K) reports Taiwanese President Chen Shui-bian "easily survived a recall vote in Taiwan's legislature Tuesday but remained mired in scandals that have undermined his leadership and touched off a rancorous political struggle." A majority of lawmakers supported the recall, however that support fell well short of the two-thirds requirement. The Post adds, "Unless new irregularities are uncovered, Chen is now expected to remain in power for the last two years of his second four-year term. But he has been weakened by charges that his family and aides were involved in under-the-table deals, and buffeted by the political storm those charges have generated." Politics and decision making in Taipei "appeared headed for a period of instability that is likely to overshadow relations with China and perhaps brake Chen's attempts to push the self-ruled island toward formal independence." The New York Times/AP (6/28) also covers this story.

DOJ_NMG_0036836

Oman Trade Deal Rouses Groups For, Against Pact. Roll Call (6/28, Ackley) reports, "Groups for and against a Bush administration free-trade agreement with the Persian Gulf nation of Oman are stepping up their lobbying efforts, promising to fight just as hard as they did in last summer's bitter battle over the Central American Free Trade Agreement." Opponents "say Oman's labor and environmental standards are abysmal," and "while the pro-agreement side argues that Oman is a key strategic Middle East ally, especially in the war on terror, opponents counter that the trade agreement could hinder Congressional intervention when it comes to potential national security matters." Both sides agree that "the stakes are higher than they ordinarily might be because this is an election year."

Schwab Says WTO Talks Eventually Will Succeed. AFP (6/28, Raab) reports the United States "voiced optimism that struggling global trade negotiations would eventually succeed, even if a crucial WTO meeting in Switzerland this week fails." After meeting with lawmakers Tuesday, US Trade Representative Susan Schwab said, "We're going to try to get this done as soon as we can, rather than say if we don't get it done by the weekend it won't happen." Although deadlines are "important," Schwab added, "but deadlines in and of themselves are not going to create a good agreement." The World Trade Organization opens its latest round of talks Thursday in Geneva.

US Lawmakers Prefer No Deal To Bad Deal. The AP (6/28) reports US lawmakers said Tuesday they "would rather have no deal than a bad deal" when global trade talks commence this week in Geneva. Congress "won't support concessions beyond the existing offer from the US to cut farm subsidies," House Agriculture Committee chairman, Rep. Bob Goodlatte, said. "No other country has introduced a proposal that even comes close to the US proposal," Goodlatte continued.

Friedman Says Profitable Eco-Friendly Businesses Needed To Preserve Amazon. In his column in the New York Times (6/28, 1.19M), Thomas Friedman writes that the Amazon rain forest is "endangered by what Tim Killeen, a senior biologist and researcher at Conservation International, identifies as three converging forces: rising commodity prices driven by rapid growth in China, plans by leaders in South America to integrate their infrastructure and highways to create a continental economy…and some new climate models that predict that global warming could make the Amazon so hot and dry that within a century it could mutate from a rain forest into a savannah." These cannot be stopped by "protests by do-gooders." Instead, "profitable eco-friendly business alternatives — to counter the eco-hostile ones" are needed, or "the economic predators of this rain forest will eventually have their day."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Fear And Posing In Baghdad."
"Israeli Troops And Armor Surge Into Gaza."
"Flag Measure Fails By 1 Vote."
"Cities May Lose Power Over Cable TV."
"Some See Iran's Faculty Exodus As A New Purge."
"Secondhand Smoke: It's All Bad."

USA Today:
"Senate Rejects Flag Bill By 1 Vote."
"Film Legend, Rising Star Wearing 'Prada' Well."
"Summer Vacations Run On Empty."

New York Times:
"Israeli Troops Move Into Gaza; Bridges Are Hit."
"Flag Amendment Narrowly Fails In Senate Vote."
"Anglican Plan Threatens Split On Gay Issues."
"Charities Tied To Doctors Get Drug Industry Gifts."
"Despite Protests, Rent Board Sets 7.25% Increase."
"Push For New Tactics As War On Malaria Falters."

Washington Post:
"Israeli Troops Move Into Gaza."
"No Rest For The Wet And Weary."
"Poll Shows Ehrlich Lagging As He Opens Reelection Run."
"U.S. Details Dangers Of Secondhand Smoking."
"The Superhighway To Everywhere."
"Senate Rejects Flag-Burning Amendment."

Washington Times:
"Senate Warms To 'Border First.'"
"Abbas, Hamas Strike A Deal."

DOJ_NMG_0036837

"Homes Condemned After Floods."
"Anglican Leader Ponders A Split."
"Haircut, Shave Can Mean Life Or Death In Baghdad."
"Treasures Pulled From A Briny Tomb."
"Splitting Heirs Over Wealth."

Detroit Free Press:
"Should Girls Get Shots For Virus At 9?"
"Thousands Line Up For Delphi Jobs."
"Detroit, Flint Insurance Could Cost Less."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Flag Measure Dies By 1 Vote."
"Emory Left Out Of Loop In King Deal."
"Cutting The Internet Cord."
"Secondhand Smoke 'Serious Health Hazard.'"
"Dubai's legal System May Prove Harsh As Austin Faces Drug Trial."

Houston Chronicle:
"Health Alert Could Help City Expand Smoking Ban."
"Apartment Fire Kills Three Children Left With No Adults."
"'Railroad Killer' Offers Apology At Execution."
"Ban On Flag Desecration Comes Up One Vote Short."
"Soldier's Death 'Touched A Nerve.'"

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Second Hand Smoke; Mid-Atlantic Rains; Senate-Flag Burning Amendment; Israel-Gaza Offensive; Guantanamo Bay Conditions; Missouri-Elks Lodge Collapse; Bush, Amputee Run; Missing WWII Sub Found.
CBS: Mid-Atlantic Rains; White House Elm Tree; Western Wildfires; Military Vehicles-Repair Costs; Bush, Amputee Run; Senate-Flag Burning Amendment; Minimum Wage Debate; Secondhand Smoke; Gates Foundation-Disease Prevention; Israel-Gaza Offensive; Student Debt; Harry Potter-Character Deaths.
NBC: Secondhand Smoke; Secondhand Smoke-Analysis; Smoking Bans-Economic Impact; Senate-Flag Burning Amendment; Mid-Atlantic Rains; Israel-Gaza Offensive; Stock Markets; Justice Department-Terrorism Prosecutions; Katrina-Wasteful Spending; Sleep Deprivation; Bush, Amputee Run; Gates Foundation-Disease Prevention; Misplaced Buffett Pledge Documents.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: Rumsfeld-North Korea; South Korean President-ID Theft; Israel-Gaza Offensive; Limbaugh-Detained At Airport; TX-Murderer Executed.
CBS: Israel-Gaza Offensive; Northeast-Heavy Rain; Bush Runs With Wounded Soldier; TX-Yates Retrial.
NPR: Israel-Gaza Offensive; Senate-Flag Desecration; VA-Personal Data Theft; Foreign Stock Markets; Rice-Afghanistan; Nepal-Drought.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Speaks about the line item veto, JW Marriott Hotel; photo opportunity with Staff Sgt. Christian Bagge, Oval Office; participates in a meeting with the National Endowment for Democracy Award recipients, Oval Office; Participates in a run with Staff Sgt. Christian Bagge, South Lawn.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: 10 a.m. JOINT ECONOMIC _ Full Committee. Hearing on prospects for continued economic expansion. Council of Economic Advisers Chairman Edward Lazear. Location: Room 2118, Rayburn.

9 a.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Labor, HHS, Education and Related Agencies Subcommittee. Hearing on the impact of deriving human pluripotent stem cell lines using techniques that do no knowingly harm embryos. James Battey of the NIH Stel Cell Task Force; Stephen Strom of the University of Pittsburgh; Alan Leshner, American Association for the Advancement of Science. Location: Room 192, Dirksen.

10 a.m. COMMERCE, SCIENCE AND TRANSPORTATION _ Full Committee. Markup of the Communications Act of 2006. Location: Room 216, Hart.

10 a.m. ENERGY AND NATURAL RESOURCES _ Full Committee. Hearing on implementation of the Energy Policy Act provisions on enhancing oil and gas production on federal lands in the Rocky Mountain region. BLM Director Kathleen Clarke; Jeffrey Eppink, vice president and treasurer, Advance Resources International Inc.; Mary Flanderka, Wyoming state planning coordinator; Tom Reed, Wyoming field coordinator, Trout Unlimited; Duane Zavadil, vice president, Government and Regulatory Affairs, Bill Barrett Corp., Denver. Location: Room 366, Dirksen.

10 a.m. FINANCE _ Committee on Finance meets to consider nomination of Henry Paulson to be Secretary of the Treasury. Location: Room 106, Dirksen.

DOJ_NMG_0036838

10 a.m. HOMELAND SECURITY AND GOVERNMENTAL AFFAIRS _ Subcommittee on Oversight of Government Management, the Federal Workforce and the District of Columbia. Hearing to conduct a management review of the Office of Personnel Management. With David Walker, Comptroller General, Government Accountability Office and Linda Springer, director, Office of Personnel Management. Location: Room 342, Dirksen.

10 a.m. SPECIAL AGING _ Full Committee. Hearing on medical tourism and possible cost savings. Bruce Cunningham, American Society of Plastic Surgeons; Arnold Milstein, Mercer Health & Benefits; Bonnie Blackley, corporate benefits director, Blue Ridge Paper Products; and Rajesh Rao, CEO, IndUShealth. Location: Room 215, Dirksen.

10:30 a.m. JUDICIARY _ Full Committee. Hearing on presidential signing statements. Location: Room 226, Dirksen.

2:30 p.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Energy and Water Subcommittee. Markup of the House Energy-Water Appropriations bill. Location: Room 138, Dirksen.

2:30 p.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Homeland Security Subcommittee. Markup of the Homeland Security appropriations bill. Location: Room S-128, Capitol.

2:30 p.m. BANKING, HOUSING AND URBAN AFFAIRS _ Housing and Transportation Subcommittee. Oversight hearing on the SAFETEA-LU Act. FTA Deputy Administrator Sandra Bushue; Kate Siggerud, GAO; William Millar, President, American Public Transportation Association. Location: Room 538, Dirksen.

2:30 p.m. SELECT INTELLIGENCE _ Full Committee. Closed briefing in pending matters. Location: Room 219, Hart.

US House: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 9 a.m. Meets for morning hour debate, then for legislative business at 10 a.m. Highlights: Suspensions (3 bills): 1) H.R. 42 - Freedom to Display the American Flag Act of 2005; 2) H.R. 5341 - Seasoned Customer CTR Exemption Act of 2006; 3) H.Res. 854 - Recognizing National Homeownership Month and the importance of homeownership in the United States. H.R. 4973 - Flood Insurance Reform and Modernization Act of 2006. H.R. 5672 - Science, State, Justice, Commerce, and Related Agencies Appropriations Act for Fiscal Year 2007.

10 a.m. JOINT ECONOMIC _ Full Committee. Hearing on prospects for continued economic expansion. Council of Economic Advisers Chairman Edward Lazear. Location: Room 2118, Rayburn.

9:30 a.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Military Quality of Life and Veterans Affairs and Related Agencies Subcommittee. Hearing on the recent VA data security breach. David McIntyre, Jr., President, TriWest Healthcare Alliance; Dennis Hoffman, EMC Corp.; VA Secretary Nicholson. Location: Room H-140, Capitol.

9:45 a.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Interior and Related Agencies Subcommittee. Markup of the Interior-Environment appropriations bill. Location: Room 124, Dirksen.

10 a.m. ENERGY AND COMMERCE _ Subcommittee on Oversight and Investigations. Hearing entitled, ``Making the Internet Safe for Kids: The Role of ISPs and Social Networking Sites," to discuss child pornography and sexual exploitation. With Chris Hansen, NBC News; John Ryan, America Online Inc.; Dave Baker, Earthlink; Elizabeth Banker, Yahoo! Inc.; Tom Dailer, Verizon; Philip Reitinger, Microsoft; Gerard Lewis, Comcast Cable Communications; and Nicole Wong, Google Inc. Location: 2123 Rayburn.

10 a.m. GOVERNMENT REFORM _ Federalism and the Census Subcommittee. Hearing on administration proposals for the Community Development Block Grant Program. Location: Room 2154, Rayburn.

10 a.m. INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS _ Full Committee. Markup of pending legislation. Location: Room 2172, Rayburn.

10 a.m. RESOURCES _ Water and Power Subcommittee and Forests and Forest Health Subcommittee. Joint hearing on forest management on federal rights of wat to ensure reliable electricity service. Location: Room 1324, Longworth.

10 a.m. TRANSPORTATION AND INFRASTRUCTURE _ Railroads Subcommittee. Hearing on current FRA rail safety initiatives. FRA Administrator Joseph Boardman; Association of American Railroads CEO Edward Hamberger; James Stem of the United Transportation Union. Location: Room 2167, Rayburn.

10 a.m. VETERANS AFFAIRS _ Health Subcommittee. Hearing on the DVA health care for veterans in rural communities. Jonathan B. Perlin, undersecretary of Veterans Affairs; Patricia Vandenberg, assistant deputy undersecretary of Veterans Affairs; Adam Darkins, chief consultant for care coordination, Department of Veterans Affairs; Robert Petzel, network director, VA Midwest Health Care Network; David Hartley, director, Division of Rural Health, Muskie School of

DOJ_NMG_0036839

Public Services, University of Southern Maine; Graham L. Adams, president, National Organization of State Offices of Rural Health. Location: Room 334, Cannon.

10 a.m. - 12 p.m. SCIENCE _ Full Committee. Markup of H.R. 5656, Energy, Research, Development, Demonstration, and Commercial Application Act of 2006. Location: 2318 Rayburn.

2 p.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Full Committee. Hearing on Army and Marine Corps reset strategies for gound equipment and rotor craft. Army Chief of Staff Gen. Peter Schoomaker; Marine Corps Commandant Gen. Michale Hagee. Location: Room 2118, Rayburn.

2 p.m. ENERGY AND COMMERCE _ Subcommittee on Telecommunications and the Internet. Hearing on ``The Audio and Video Flag: Can Content Protection and Technological Innovation Coexist?" With Mitch Bainwol, Chairman, Recording Industry Association of America; Andrew Levin, Executive Vice President and Chief Legal Officer, Clear Channel Communications, on bahalf of the National Association of Broadcasters; Stewart Harris, songwriter, on Songwriters Guild of America; Ruth Ziegler, Deputy General Counsel, Sirius Satellite Radio; Fritz Attaway, Executive Vice President and Special Policy Advisor, Motion Picture Association of America; Gary Shapiro, President and CEO, Consumer Electronics Association; and Gigi Sohn, President, Public Knowledge. Location: Room 2322, Rayburn House Office Building.

2 p.m. GOVERNMENT REFORM _ Criminal Justice, Drug Policy and Human Resources Subcommittee. Hearing on clinical lab quality. Location: Room 2247, Rayburn.

2 p.m. GOVERNMENT REFORM _ National Security, Emerging Threats and International Relations Subcommittee. Hearing on sexual assaults against women in the military. Delilah Rumberg, National Sexual Violence Resource Center; Christine Hansen, The Miles Foundation; Beth Davis, former United States Air Force Academy cadet; Kaye Whitley, Acting Director Sexual Assault Prevention and Response Office, Defense Department; Vice Admiral Rodney P. Rempt, Superintendent of the Naval Academy; Brigadier General Robert L. Caslen, Jr., Commandant of the United States Military Academy; Brigadier General Susan Y. Desjardins; Commandant of the United States Air Force Academy; Rear Admiral Paul J. Higgins, Director of Health & Safety, Coast Guard. Location: Room 2154, Rayburn.

2 p.m. INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS _ Africa, Global Human Rights and International Operations Subcommittee. Hearing on safe blood transfusions in Africa. Caroline Ryan, Office of the Global Aids Coordinator; Jerry Holmberg, HHS; Karen Shoos Lipton, CEO, AABB; Robert Ferris, USAID; Edward Green, Paresidential Advisory Council on HIV/AIDS; Neelam Dhingra, WHO. Location: Room 2172, Rayburn.

2 p.m. TRANSPORTATION AND INFRASTRUCTURE _ Subcommittee on Highways, Transit and Pipelines. Oversight hearing on ``Celebrating 50 Years: The Eisenhower Interstate Highway System." Richard Capka, Administrator, Federal Highway Administration; Jonathon Gifford, George Mason University; Tom Lewis, Skidmore College; Gene McCormick, Chairman, American Road & Transportation Builders Association. Location: Room 2167, Rayburn.

2:30 p.m. JUDICIARY _ Constitution, Civil Rights and Property Rights Subcommittee. Hearing on federal examiners and observers at elections. Location: Room 226, Dirksen.

2:30 p.m. SMALL BUSINESS _ Workforce, Empowerment and Government Programs Subcommittee. Hearing on immigrant employment verification. Location: Room 2360, Rayburn.

Other: RELIGION-POVERTY _ Faith and lay leaders from across the country attend the annual Christian Mobilization, sponsored by Sojourners and Call to Renewal. Highlights: 8:30 a.m. DNC Chairman Howard Dean speaks. 9 a.m. Amos and Joseph Award ceremony, with Marian Wright Edelman and Sen. Barack Obama. At the church. 11 a.m. March to the Capitol. Begins at the church. 12 p.m. Rally with speakers from national religious denominations and organizations. Upper Senate Park. 5 p.m. Dialogue with Sens. Hillary Clinton, Blanche Lincoln, Sam Brownback and Rick Santorum. Room 902, Hart. Location: National City Christian Church, 5 Thomas Circle, unless otherwise noted.

POWELL-ALBRIGHT _ 8 a.m. US Global Leadership Campaign and US Chamber of Commerce hosts roundtable discussion with former secretaries of state Colin Powell and Madeleine Albright. Admiral Edmund Giambastiani, Vice Chairman, Joint Chiefs of Staff, also participates. Location: 1615 H St. NW.

WORKERS-JORDAN _ 8:30 a.m. The AFL-CIO sponsors a panel of international labor, economic, and trade policy experts discussing worker rights violations in Jordan. Speakers include AFL-CIO Policy Director and Chief International Economist Thea M. Lee, General Secretary of the General Federation of Jordanian Trade Unions Mazen al Ma'ayta, Center for American Progress President and CEO

DOJ_NMG_0036840

John Podesta, and CAP Senior Fellow Gene Sperling. Location: Center for American Progress, 10th floor, 1333 H St. NW.

COMMERCE SECRETARY GUTIERREZ _ 9 a.m. Commerce Secretary Gutierrez meets with Korean Minister of Commerce, Industry and Energy Dr. Chung Sye Kyun. Location: Commerce Department.

ELECTRONIC VOTING _ 10 a.m. Rep. Rush Holt, others, hold a news conference on electronic voting machines. Location: Room 2456, Rayburn.

FDA FAILURES _ 10 a.m. News conference with advocates of food- and drug/medical device-safety to condemn the FDA's failure to protect Americans from dangerous drugs and unsafe food ingredients and the agency's domination by the industries it regulates. Participants include Rep. Henry Waxman, Sidney M. Wolfe of Public Citizen's Health Research Group, and Michael F. Jacobson, of the Center for Science in the Public Interest. Location: Room 2203, Rayburn.

FOREIGN INVESTMENTS _ 10 a.m. The National Foundation for American Policy releases a comprehensive study by Johns Hopkins University scholars examining the economic and jobs impact of foreign investment on America and individual states. Participants include Stuart Anderson of NFAP; Daniel Hamilton of Johns Hopkins; and Joseph Quinlan, SAIS. Location: National Press Club.

GULF COAST REBUILDING _ 10 a.m. The Commerce Department holds a briefing for U.S. businesses on Gulf Coast rebuilding opportunities. Highlights: 10:05 a.m. Donald Powell, Federal Coordinator for Gulf Coast Rebuilding. 10:15 a.m. Commerce Secretary Gutierrez. 10:30 a.m. Briefing with HUD Deputy Secretary Roy Bernardi, Beth Tucker of the IRS, Art Garcia of the Treasury Department, and Steve Stockton of the Army Corps of Engineers. 11:20 a.m. Louisiana briefing with Gov. Kathleen Blanco. 11:40 a.m. Mississippi briefing with Gov. Haley Barbour (taped), Gary Swoope of the Mississippi Development Authority and Leland Speed of the authority. Location: Willard Inter-Continental Hotel, 1401 Pennsylvania Ave. NW.

SECONDHAND SMOKE _ 10 a.m. Surgeon General Richard Carmona releases the new ``Surgeon General's Report on The Health Consequences of Involuntary Exposure to Tobacco Smoke." Location: The Great Hall, Hubert H. Humphrey Building, 200 Independence Ave., SW.

US-CANADA ENERGY _ 10 a.m. The Canadian American Business Council holds a telephone briefing to release a poll on U.S. voter attitudes toward Canada and energy security. Contacts: Amy Weiss, 202-203-0448. Notes: Callin number: 800-274-0873. Media RSVP requested.

DEMOCRATS-PRESCRIPTION DRUGS _ 10:45 a.m. House Democrats will hold a news conference to outline their proposed changes to the prescription drug program. With House Minority Nancy Pelosi, Congresswoman Hilda Solis and Congressman Rahm Emanuel. Location: H-204, The Capitol.

BOEHNER _ 11:30 a.m. House Majority Leader Rep. John Boehner holds a pen and pad only briefing. Location: Room H-107, Capitol.

WOMEN'S GROUP HONORS _ 11:30 a.m. National Partnership for Women & Families honors Sen. Christopher Dodd, D-Conn., as a champion of the Family and Medical Leave Act; Paul Sprenger for a career helping victims of employment discrimination, including a case depicted in the film ``North Country"; and Madelyn Antoncic, Chief Risk Officer at Lehman Brothers, as a Wall Street trailblazer for women. Location: Washington Hilton Ballroom, 1919 Connecticut Ave. NW.

CAPITAL MARKETS _ 12 p.m. The Heritage Foundation hosts a forum entitled ``Restoring American Leadership in World Capital Markets," with speaker Rep. Tom Feeney, R-Fla., and comments by Alex Pollock, resident fellow, American Enterprise Institute, and David John, senior research fellow, The Heritage Foundation's Thomas A. Roe Institute for Economic Policy Studies. Location: Lehrman Auditorium, The Heritage Foundation, 214 Massachusetts Ave. NE.

GUANTANAMO _ 12 p.m. The Council on American-Islamic Relations holds a panel discussion on the need to close the Guantanamo Bay prison camp. Location: Room 2226, Rayburn.

RADIO FREQUENCIES _ 12 p.m. The Internet Caucus Advisory Committee, others, launch the first roundtable discussion on Radio Frequency Identification with Jeff Richards, VeriSign; Shannon Kellogg, RSA Security; Paula Bruening, Center for Democracy & Technology; Elizabeth Board, EPCglobal; others. Location: Room B-339, Rayburn.

SADDAM HUSSEIN _ 12 p.m. Attorneys for Saddam Hussein, including former Attorney General Ramsey Clark, hold a news conference on the case, including presentation of new evidence. Location: National Press Club.

DOJ_NMG_0036841

ISLAM-US _ 12:15 p.m. The New America Foundation holds a discussion with author Robert Dreyfuss about ``The U.S. vs. The Evil Caliphate: The Phony Clash of Civilizations." Location: 7th floor, 1630 Connecticut Ave. NW.

REPUBLICANS-FLAG PROTECTION _ 12:15 p.m. Republican senators to hold news conference on the Flag Protection Amendment. With Majority Leader Bill Frist; Sen. Arlen Specter; Sen. Orrin Hatch; Sen. Jim Bunning; Sen. Conrad Burns; Sen. Sam Brownback; Sen. John Thune; and (Ret) Army Maj. Gen. Patrick Brady. Location: S-230, U.S. Capitol.

FLAG BURNING _ 12:30 p.m. Rep. Roscoe Bartlett holds a news conference to discuss the anticipated approval of H.R. 42, the Freedom to Display the American Flag Act of 2005. Location: Room 2325, Rayburn.

HOYER _ 12:30 p.m. House Democratic Whip Rep. Steny Hoyer holds a pen and pad only briefing. Location: Room H-306, Capitol.

OMAN-TRADE _ 12:30 p.m. Reps. Michael Michaud, Linda Sanchez, others, hold a press conference on the Oman Free Trade Agreement. Location: Cannon Terrace.

US-AUSTRALIA _ 1:15 p.m. The American Enterprise Institute holds a discussion with Australian Defense Minister Brendan John Nelson on the U.S.-Australian security alliance's future. Location: 12th floor, AEI, 1150 17th St. NW.

IMMIGRATION _ 2:30 p.m. Sens. Lindsey Graham, Edward Kennedy, John McCain and Ken Salazar, others, hold a news conference to call for comprehensive immigration reform. Location: Room 430, Dirksen.

DEMOCRACY AWARDS _ 3:30 p.m. - 7:30 p.m. The National Endowment for Democracy holds a roundtable discussion and the presentation of the 2006 Democracy Awards. Four African democracy activists have been chosen to receive the award this year. With Zainab Bangura, activist, Sierra Leone, and chief civil affairs officer to the U.N. mission in Liberia; Alfred Taban, publisher and chairman, Khartoum Monitor, Sudan; Immaculee Birhaheka, co-founder, Promotion and Support of Women's Initiatives, Democratic Republic of the Congo; and Reginald Matchaba-Howe, chairman, Zimbabwe Election Support Network. Location: Room 345, Cannon.

HUMAN RIGHTS _ 4 p.m. The UN Association holds a panel discussion on the new UN Human Rights Council. Location: UN Foundation, 4th floor conference room, 1225 Connecticut Ave. NW.

HENRY KISSINGER _ 4 p.m. - 5:30 p.m. Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars holds a seminar on ``Henry Kissinger and the Dilemmas of American Power." With Thomas Schwartz, professor of history, Vanderbilt University. Location: Flom Auditorium, Woodrow Wilson Center, 1300 Pennsylvania Ave., NW.

ALBERTA-ENERGY _ 5 p.m. Alberta Premier Ralph Klein meets with Sen. Pete Domenici. Photo op and media availability. Location: Room 328, Hart.

MATH-SCIENCE _ 5 p.m. The Tapping America's Potential coalition holds a math and science fair and reception to emphasize the importance of Congress moving ahead on innovation and competitiveness policies. Location: Room B-357, Rayburn.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

DOJ_NMG_0036842

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: WEDNESDAY, JUNE 28, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

In Jerusalem, Gonzales Warns Of Home-Grown Terror Plots 3
House GOP Drafting Resolution Condemning NYTimes Over Intelligence Leaks 3
Miami Terror Plot Suspect Makes Court Appearance 5
US Seeks Juror Anonymity For Hamas-Funding Trial..... 5
DOJ Defends Terror Prosecutions Despite Light Sentences 5
Guantanamo Officials Say They Can't Prevent All Suicides 6
EU Justice Office Says Europeans Gave US Terror Suspects 6
UK Police Arrest Two Terror Suspects 6
State Department Backs Pan Am 103 Families In Libyan Row 6

Homeland Response:

Study Finds US Ports Remain Vulnerable To Terror Attacks..... 6
Court Upholds Ruling On DHS Personnel Rules..... 7

War News:

Bush Jogs With Soldier Who Lost His Legs In Iraq 7
2008 Campaign Seen As Context For Kerry-Feingold Alliance On Iraq Pullout 8
Holbrooke Praises Bush Request For UN Help In Iraq 8
US Has Detained 20 In Kidnapping, Murder Of Two Soldiers..... 8
US Military Disappointed By Baghdad Crackdown..... 8
Sadr Said To Have Lost Control Of Mahdi Army..... 9
Pentagon Expects To Meet Annual Training Goals For Iraqi Forces 9
Maliki Backtracks On Amnesty Offer As Part Of Reconciliation Plan 9
Turkish Ambassador To US Alleges Iraqi Kurds Backing Separatists 10
Saddam To Face Additional Charges In August 10
Rice Travels To Afghanistan To Bolster Support For Embattled Karzai 11
Taliban Fighters Challenge NATO Forces In Southern Afghanistan 11
US Military Incurring Unprecedented Vehicle Repair Costs 12
Internet Sites Speed Care Packages To Soldiers 12

DOJ:

Main Justice Closed By Floodwaters After Heavy Rains..... 12
Brooklyn US Attorney Nominated To Federal Bench 13

Corporate Scandals:

US Subpoenas VeriSign In Widening Options Timing Probe..... 13
European Court Allows Extradition Of Enron-Linked British Bankers 13
Judge Sentences Barred Broker, Partner To Prison For Commodities Fraud 14
DOJ Handling Of Hilfiger Nonprosecution Agreement Questioned..... 14
Hedge Funds Intensify Political Efforts To Block New Regulation14
Morgan Stanley Settles With SEC Over Insider Accounts 15
CA To Add Shareholder Proposal After Court's Refusal To Rule 15

Criminal Law:

Katrina Fraud Estimated At Near $2 Billion 16
Tribe Releases Photo Of Meeting Ney Said He Could Not Remember 16
House Members Grill Internet Providers Over Child Porn Restrictions 16
Opening Arguments Made At Trial Of Alleged Unregistered Iraqi Agent..... 17
Closing Arguments Begin At Chicago Patronage Trial..... 17
Fumo Computer Technicians Indicted Over Deleted Emails..... 17
Court Documents Reveal Two-Month Delay In FBI Seizure Of Pellicano Computers..... 18
Judge Declines To Release Connecticut Trash Kingpin On Bail For Now 18
Gotti Says He Will Leave New York If Acquitted At Third Trial.... 18
Retired FBI Agent Denies Receiving Gifts From Bulger, Flemmi 18
Both Sides In Aryan Brotherhood Trial Relying On Shady Witnesses 19
Michigan Doctor Indicted On Medicare Fraud Charges 19
Texas Executes "Railroad Killer" Linked To 15 Murders 19
Government, Companies Form Identity Fraud Research Center 20
Judge Refuses To Release Hoffa Search Affidavit 20
California Jury Finds Man Guilty Of Serial Murders..... 20
WPost Columnist Skeptical Of Evidence In Duke Rape Case 20
Coast Guard Cadet Acquitted Of Rape, Convicted Of Other Sex-Related Charges 21

Civil Law:

Indiana Settles E-Rate Fraud Claims With DOJ..... 21
DOJ Seeks Dismissal Of Budget Lawsuit..... 21

AT&T Settles Contracting Fraud Charges With DOJ For $2.9 Million ... 21
US Scrutinizing Drug Industry Gifts To Charities Tied To Doctors 22
FEC Accused Of Seeking To Intimidate Major 527 Contributors 22
LATimes Praises Supreme Court Ruling On Vermont Campaign Contribution Limits ... 22

Civil Rights:

DOJ Reaches Agreement With Indiana Over Purging Of Voter Rolls ... 22
DOJ Probes Bias Allegations In Ohio Village's Police Firings ... 23
Shreveport To Improve Public Building Access In Agreement With DOJ ... 23
Grassley To Proposes IRS Pursuit Of Sex Traffickers ... 23
Senate GOP Conservatives Opposing Leadership On Voting Rights Act ... 23
Osceola County, FL, To Challenge DOJ Voting Rights Suit ... 24
Single Manipulator Said Able To Change E-Voting Election Outcome ... 24
8th Circuit Upholds Continued Federal Monitoring Of Little Rock Schools ... 24
Flag Amendment Falls One Vote Short In Senate ... 24
LATimes Assails Schwarzenegger Prison Reform Proposals ... 26
WPost Lauds Supreme Court On Workplace Discrimination Decision ... 26

Antitrust:

Mississippi PSC Considers BellSouth-AT&T Merger ... 26
McClatchy Closes Knight Ridder Deal ... 26
Attorneys Doubt Foundation For DOJ Position On Employees' Statements ... 26
Antitrust Commission Proposal Would Reduce Firms' Civil Damage Liability ... 27
Investment Consortium Buys Univision For $12.3 Billion ... 27
Judge Clears Adelphia Assets Sale ... 28
Citizens Banking Buys Rival Republic Bancorp ... 28
Mittal-Arcelor Deal Marks Changes To Steel Industry ... 28
EU May Fine Microsoft Up To $577 Million ... 28

Environment/Indian Affairs:

Grass Roots, Lobbyists Driving Effort To Revamp Energy Policy 29
Domenici Offers Proposal On Nuclear Waste Storage ... 29
Report Cites US As Disproportionate Carbon Dioxide Producer 30
Carmona Says Only Smoke-Free Environments Protect Against Secondhand Smoke ... 30
Sioux Tribal Leaders Plans Blockade To Curb Beer Transit ... 30

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Massachusetts Latin Kings Leader Sentenced To 21 Years In Prison ... 30
Three Minnesota Men Accused Of Conspiring To Distribute Fentanyl ... 30
Investigators To Determine If Limbaugh Violated Deal In Prescription Fraud Case ... 31
Two Men Sentenced For Role In Connecticut Drug Ring ... 31
NFL To Add Amphetamines To List Of Banned Substances ... 31
Bonds: No Word From Mitchell In Baseball's Steroid Investigation ... 32
Lance Armstrong Seeks To Discount Allegations Of Drug Use ... 32
US Cyclist Faces More Doping Allegations ... 32

Immigration:

Key Senators Open To Specter Compromise On Immigration ... 32

Tax:

Judge Blasts DOJ For Pressuring KPMG Over Legal Fees ... 33
IRS Employees Caught Illegally Browsing Through Taxpayer Files ... 34
Former Wife Of Acquitted Mississippi Judge Sentenced For Tax Evasion ... 34
Lacking Votes, Senate Republicans Postpone Consideration Of Estate Tax Repeal ... 34
Gingrich, Kies Criticize US Taxation Of Expatriates ... 35

Congress-Administration:

Bush Signing Statements Draw Ire Of Specter, Democrats At Judiciary Hearing ... 35
Bush Urges Senate To Pass Line-Item Veto ... 36
New York Democrats Call For DOJ Probe Of Fosella ... 37
Paulson Defends Bush Tax Cuts ... 37
White House Eyes Social Security, Tax Reform For Fall Agenda 37
Wallace Stepping Down As White House Communications Director ... 38
Bush To Nominate Donohue To Federal Judgeship ... 38
Bush Nominates Connaughton To Head Maritime Administration 38
Nicholson Wants $160.5 Million For VA Data Security ... 38
Administration To Announce Sweeping Welfare Rule Changes ... 38
Reid Threatens To Block Congressional Pay Raise Unless Minimum Wage Increased ... 38
Aide Defends Murkowski's Earmaks ... 39
Deer Spotted Inside Fence Near Cheney's Residence ... 39

Other News:

Rising Interest Rates Putting Brakes On Housing Markets ... 39
Ohio, National Democrats Differ On Utility Of Corruption Charges ... 40
Democrats Lead GOP By 16 Points On Generic Ballot In USA Today/Gallup Poll ... 40
Democrats Seen As Handicapped By Lack Of Single Messenger 40
DCCC Hopes To Defeat Reynolds ... 41
Democrats Tell Judge DeLay's Exit Harms Party ... 41
House GOP Unveils Values Agenda ... 41
Morris Says Lieberman Can't Win Primary ... 41
Ehrlich Trails O'Malley By 16 Points Among Likely Voters In WPost Poll ... 42
High Gasoline Prices Could Be Crimping Summer Travel Plans 42
WSJournal Calls On Buffett, Gates To Invest On Strengthening Capitalism ... 42
WPost Praises DC's New HIV Testing Program ... 42
Hamas-Fatah Political Deal Does Not Slow Israeli Move Into Gaza ... 42
Khamenei Offers Mixed Message On Nuclear Program, Appoints Foreign Policy Advisors ... 43

DOJ_NMG_0036844

Warner Says North Korea Missile Test May Not Be Imminent.... 44
House Panel Approves India Nuclear Cooperation Deal..... 44
Koizumi To Visit US 45
Powell, Albright Advocate Fully-Funding Foreign Aid..... 45
Somali Islamic Militia Accused Of Breaking Cease-Fire..... 45
US Backs UN Conference On Reducing Illegal Arms 45
Energy Wealth Strengthens Russia's Hand, Presents Headache For US..... 45
Belarus Vow To Retaliate For US Sanctions..... 45
State Department Officials' Claims About Myanmar Called "Exaggerated." 46
Obrador's Relations With "Street Bosses" Raise Critic's Concerns..... 46
China Announces Over $1 Billion In Bank Fraud 46
Taiwan's Chen Easily Beats Recall Attempt..... 47
Oman Trade Deal Rouses Groups For, Against Pact 47
Schwab Says WTO Talks Eventually Will Succeed 47
Friedman Says Profitable Eco-Friendly Businesses Needed To Preserve Amazon 47

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages 47

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington 48

TERRORISM NEWS:

In Jerusalem, Gonzales Warns Of Home-Grown Terror Plots. The Jerusalem Post (6/28, Izenberg) reports, "US Attorney-General Alberto Gonzales on Tuesday warned that the war against terrorism was evolving and that a new threat was in the making from homegrown terrorism, which was sometimes harder to defend against than international terrorism. … 'They [home-grown terrorists] are much more difficult to find because they exist in our communities,' said Gonzales in a speech at Tel Aviv University's Jaffe Center for Strategic Studies, during a short visit to Israel which was due to end Wednesday. 'This is presenting additional challenges for us that we are now beginning to focus on.'" The Post continues, "Asked whether he thought the war against terrorism was succeeding, Gonzales replied, 'The US and other countries, like Israel are safer today. [But] we are not safe.' … Gonzales singled out US-Israel collaboration in combatting terrorism. 'We are working closing in the war on terror,' he said." The Post adds, "Gonzales that the improvement in US security was due to the establishment of the Homeland Security Department, new legislation such as the Patriot Act, the war against terrorism in Afghanistan and Iraq and strong international cooperation among law enforcement agencies, which he described as 'fantastic.' … Still, he said, he constantly reads intelligence reports about terrorist threats to the US and other countries, including Israel. 'I sometimes wonder when it this ever going to stop,' he added. 'And it may not stop for a while.' … Gonzales refused to say whether or not the Bush administration was seriously considering closing the prison facility at Guantanamo Bay. In the meantime, the US government is awaiting a Supreme Court ruling on a petition challenging the commissions established by the government to try some of the detainees imprisoned at the US facility."

House GOP Drafting Resolution Condemning NYTimes Over Intelligence Leaks. CNN's The Situation Room (6/27, Henry) reported, "Republicans on Capitol Hill stepped up their barrage on The New York Times in another move that will rally conservatives in advance of the midterm elections." CNN added, "The chance to beat up on a newspaper with a liberal reputation is too good to resist for an administration struggling to keep its conservative base happy. … But White House Press Secretary Tony Snow was less certain than the vice president when pressed Tuesday on what evidence there is the leak has compromised terror probes. … Snow did charge The New York Times endangered lives by bucking a tradition of media organizations agreeing to keep government secrets at a time of war. But Times executive editor Bill Keller defended the decision to publish."

The Hill (6/28 O'Connor, Allen) reports House Republican "are expected to introduce a resolution today condemning The New York Times for publishing a story last week that exposed government monitoring of banking records." Rep. J.D. Hayworth "working independently from his leadership, began circulating a letter…asking his leaders to revoke the Times's congressional press credentials."

Roll Call (6/28, Ben Pershing) reports, "At press time Tuesday, the resolution was still being drafted by a handful of different committees under the direction of Majority Leader John Boehner's office. Republican sources said they expected the finished product would condemn both the leaking of the law enforcement program and its publication by the Times and a handful of other newspapers. … What is less clear is how House Democrats will react. Both Democratic leaders and rank-and-file lawmakers have complained in the past about the administration's conduct of the war on terrorism, particularly after The New York Times disclosed last year that the National Security Agency was listening to some domestic phone calls without a warrant. But in the case of the SWIFT story, most Democratic leaders have been noticeably silent. The administration even enlisted some Democrats, reportedly including Rep. John Murtha…to try to lobby the Times not to publish its piece."

DOJ_NMG_0036845

Roberts Calls For Investigation. The AP (6/28) reports Sen. Pat Roberts, chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee, said the government "should conduct an inquiry into damage done by the recent disclosures of intelligence programs aimed at stopping terrorists. .. 'We cannot continue to operate in a system where the government takes steps to counter terrorism while the media actively works to disclose those operations without any regard for protection of lives, sources and legal methods,' said Roberts."

The New York Times (6/28, Shane, 1.19M) reports Roberts asked John D. Negroponte, director of national intelligence "to assess any damage to American counterterrorism efforts caused by the disclosure of secret programs to monitor telephone calls and financial transactions." Roberts "asked for a formal evaluation of damage to intelligence collection resulting from the revelation of the secret financial monitoring as well as The Times's disclosure in December of the National Security Agency's monitoring of phone calls and e-mail messages of Americans suspected of having links to Al Qaeda."

Fox News' Special Report (6/27, Hume) reported Roberts "argues the New York Times served no public interest when it exposed an effective and highly classified program that tracked terrorist money transfers." Roberts "asked the Director of National Intelligence John Negroponte to determine how much damage has been done by this most recent leak and by the Times story on the terrorist eavesdropping program."

The Los Angeles Times (6/28, Schmitt, 958K) reports Roberts "said he was particularly concerned with disclosures that the administration was monitoring phone calls and Internet traffic without a warrant and accessing an international database of bank transactions. 'We have been unable to persuade the media to act responsibly and protect the means by which we protect this nation,' he wrote."

Group Files Complaint In 17 Countries Over Terror Finance Tracking. The AP (6/28) reports, "A civil liberties group on Wednesday asked governments around the world to block the release of confidential financial records to U.S. authorities as part of American anti-terrorist probes." The AP continues, "London-based watchdog Privacy International said it had filed complaints with data protection and privacy regulators in 17 countries, arguing that disclosures of financial transactions 'were made without any legal basis or authority whatsoever.' … The complaint, sent to regulators in 13 European countries as well as Canada, Australia, New Zealand and Hong Kong, asks authorities to 'intervene to seek the immediate suspension of the disclosure program pending legal review.'" The AP adds, "The U.S. Treasury acknowledged on Friday that since the Sept. 11, 2001 attacks on the U.S., it has tracked millions of financial transactions handled by the Belgium-based Society for Worldwide Interbank Financial Telecommunication, or SWIFT. … SWIFT oversees about 11 million financial transactions a day among banks and financial institutions worldwide, recording customers' names, account numbers and other identifying information. … Privacy International's director, Simon Davies, said the secret CIA-Treasury program 'shows yet again how the U.S. willfully disregards the privacy rights not only of its own citizens, but also the rights of foreign nationals.'"

King Says NYTimes Should Be Investigated, Prosecuted Under Espionage Act. Rep. Peter King was asked on MSNBC's Hardball (6/27) what should be done to the New York Times. King said, "They should be investigated and prosecuted for violating the Espionage Act. This was a program that was working, it was an effective weapon in the war against terrorism, it was entirely illegal and there was absolutely no public purpose at all in revealing it. They might have as well have taken confidential information and handed it to Osama bin Laden."

Markey Says NYTimes Has Provided "Enormous Public Service." Rep. Ed Markey said on MSNBC's Hardball (6/27), "The New York Times has provided an enormous public service. It has revealed that the Department of Treasury, the Bush Administration, when confronted with internal criticism, inside its own administration that this program may be illegal, rather than in fact getting a court order, or going to Congress, instead they hired an auditing firm, Booz Allen, in order to determine whether or not constitutional rights were violated. That in and of itself is a violation of the Constitution, and I think that as the story unfolds and people understand it more, that the New York Times, rather than going to jail, will be put up once again for another Pulitzer Prize."

NYTimes Defends Decision To Run Swift Story. The New York Times (6/28, 1.19M), in an editorial, writes, "Over the last year, The New York Times has twice published reports about secret antiterrorism programs being run by the Bush administration. Both times, critics have claimed that the paper was being unpatriotic or even aiding the terrorists. Some have even suggested that it should be indicted under the Espionage Act. … From our side of the news-opinion wall, the Swift story looks like part of an alarming pattern. Ever since Sept. 11, the Bush administration has taken the necessity of heightened vigilance against terrorism and turned it into a rationale for an extraordinarily powerful executive branch, exempt from the normal checks and balances of our system of government. It has created powerful new tools of surveillance and refused, almost as a matter of principle, to use normal procedures that would acknowledge that either Congress or the courts have an oversight role."

DOJ_NMG_0036846

Miami Terror Plot Suspect Makes Court Appearance. The AP (6/28) reports, "Stanley Grant Phanor, one of seven men suspected of seeking to blow up the Sears Tower and with help from al-Qaida, made his first appearance in court Tuesday but did not enter a plea. Phanor and five other co-defendants will return to federal court before U.S. Magistrate Judge Ted Bandstra Friday in downtown Miami for a hearing on whether the men should remain in custody prior to trial, the U.S. Attorney's Office said. The seventh man, Lyglenson Lemorin, was scheduled to appear Thursday in federal court in Atlanta." The AP notes, "Phanor's brother Michael said his brother and the other men they were trying to do community service in the area where they grew up, studying martial arts to keep in shape and setting a good example for neighborhood kids."

Terror Suspects Allegedly Also Targeted Chicago FBI. WLS-TV Chicago (6/27, Goudie) reports on its Web site from a story broadcast yesterday, "Until federal court records obtained Tuesday revealed it, the Sears Tower appeared to be the only Chicago target of the accused terrorists," but "the FBI in Chicago was also on the terrorists' hit list." However, "the alleged terrorists might well have attacked the wrong building," hitting the Dirksen Federal Building, rather than the new FBI facility in Chicago. According to the court documents, terror suspect Narseal Batiste tried to recruit an "emissary to lobby Islamic extremists for money to fund the Sears Tower attack, the assault on the Chicago FBI and the other bombings. According to prosecutors, that person did not go to the Middle East for Batiste but did go to the FBI about him."

Illinois Editorial Says Miami Arrests Demonstrate Ongoing Terror Threat. Under the headline "Sears Tower Threat Shows Terrorism A Serious Concern," the Rockford (IL) Register Star (6/27) editorialized, "Fortunately, the man the wannabe terrorists thought was from al-Qaida was a FBI informant. 'This group was more aspirational than operational,' FBI Deputy Director John Pistole said. … Perhaps the attorney general and the FBI downplayed the threat to keep Americans calm or perhaps the seven men were truly the bunglers they've been portrayed as, but they could have caused plenty of damage with the machine guns they did ask for." The Register Star concluded, "This episode, and the more than 400 arrests for domestic terrorism since 2001, show that the government is paying attention to threats real and perceived. We should be thankful for that."

Miami Reporter Praises Arrests, But Worries Suspects Only "Pathetic Wannabes." In a Miami Herald (6/28, 323K) op-ed, Michael Putney of WPLG-TV Miami writes that in the Miami arrests, "the FBI acted on information provided by a confidential informant," and "until this is sorted out it's a good thing these guys are behind bars. … But I can't help wondering if the Feds swooped in too soon and merely gathered up some 'pathetic wannabes,' as the editorial page of this paper called them. The Liberty City Seven may have said violent things, but they didn't commit violent acts." Putney adds that in their conversations with the FBI informant, the suspects made "big talk, but these guys had no money, guns, bullets, bombs or explosives."

US Seeks Juror Anonymity For Hamas-Funding Trial. Knight Ridder/Chicago Tribune (6/28, Coen) reports, "Federal prosecutors have asked a judge to seat an anonymous jury to hear the case" of Muhammad Salah, accused of "taking part in a conspiracy to fund Hamas, which raises concerns for prospective jurors, the court filing states. 'The nature of the charges and the evidence supporting the charges are such as to place jurors in reasonable apprehension for their safety,' the motion reads." The Tribune notes, "The parties in the Salah case are expected to appear for a status hearing Wednesday before U.S. District Judge Amy St. Eve. The judge already has indicated she might want thorough criminal background checks performed on each prospective juror."

DOJ Defends Terror Prosecutions Despite Light Sentences. NBC News (6/28) reports, "Dozens have been arrested in the U.S., suspected of terrorist ties, but the offenses are typically small and the sentences short. Is the government crackdown working?" NBC continues, "Some legal experts accuse the Justice Department overselling the arrests cases as terrorism arrests, generating dramatic headlines that actually end very differently. … 'Our approach tends to be, I think, prosecutions by press conferences,' says Juliette Kayyem, an NBC terrorism analyst and a professor at Harvard University. 'A lot is promised at the front end, and then when you actually get to the facts of the case, it tends to fall apart.'" NBC adds, "Sensitive to that criticism, the government is now defending its record. … Just last week, the Justice Department said 261 people have been convicted in terror-related prosecutions since 2001. Many were solid wins — Iyman Faris, who plotted to attack the Brooklyn Bridge, for example. Would-be shoe bomber Richard Reid, and Mohammed Babar, who admitted providing support for al-Qaida operations overseas. … But of the total 261 convictions, the average sentence is only around a year, from plea agreements, to charges like immigration or document fraud. And sometimes the threat may seem remote, as with the Lackawanna Six, the group in Buffalo, N.Y., convicted of getting terror training but never charged with planning any specific attack." NBC notes, "Even so, in a recent speech, the deputy attorney general said all are examples of a new approach — prevention through prosecution. … 'We could await further action by these men and then arrest and prosecute them,' says Paul McNulty, U.S. deputy attorney general, 'or we could prosecute at the moment our investigation reveals both a risk to our national security and a violation of our nation's laws,' … And the government cites one other statistic: Since Sept. 11, 2001, no further terror attacks in the U.S."

DOJ_NMG_0036847

Guantanamo Officials Say They Can't Prevent All Suicides. The Los Angeles Times (6/28, Williams, 958K) reports, "In the sharpening debate" about whether the suicides at Guantanamo Bay were "political statements or the actions of hopelessly depressed individuals," prison officials "outlined sweeping efforts to prevent them — but admitted nothing could stop the most determined prisoners." The commander of the prison, Navy Rear Adm. Harry B. Harris Jr., "stood by his characterization of the suicides as acts of 'asymmetrical warfare' by hardened holy warriors," rejecting the notion that the detainees killed themselves out of despair. The Times says the accessibility of these officials reflects "Harris' view of public scrutiny, which is more liberal than that of previous prison administrations." The Times writes that the interviews "seemed aimed at preparing the American public for continued detention and interrogation operations."

Commander Claims As Many As 140 Detainees Should Be Repatriated. ABC World News Tonight (6/27, story 5, 3:45, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Nightline anchor Terry Moran is getting unprecedented access this week to the Guantanamo facility." ABC (Moran) added, "Rear Admiral Harry Harris is in charge of the camp. In the first interview since Guantanamo was rocked by a riot last month and suicides of three inmates just over two weeks ago, Harris says he has no doubt men in here see their fates. Is any detainee allowed to see the evidence against them?" Harris: "No." Moran: "That doesn't seem fundamentally fair." Harris: "It's not fundamentally fair in a criminal sense. These are enemy combatants." Moran notes, "But only ten detainees have been charged with war crimes. Nearly 300 have been let freed. And defense lawyers for those incarcerated here say the lack of due process and hope has turned Guantanamo into a place of despair. The suicides on June 10th have made Guantanamo even tougher." ABC's Gibson asked: "I'm curious, the President has said he would like eventually to have Guantanamo closed down. How about the commander? What does he think about that?" Moran: "It might come as a surprise, but Admiral Harris says he supports that idea. He doesn't think Guantanamo should be opened any longer than it has to be. He believes there are 140 of the 450 detainees here who can be sent back to their home countries. But he says, he believe there's are 300 or so others that will have to be detained somewhere."

Guantanamo Prison Commander Says Detainees Waging Jihad. The AP (6/27, Jacobs) reports the medical officer in charge of the Guantanamo prison said the three detainees who committed suicide on June 10 had received psychological exams just days before to their deaths and showed no signs of depression. He suggested that the exams "supported assertions by military officials that the prisoners killed themselves as a political act."

EU Justice Office Says Europeans Gave US Terror Suspects. USA Today (6/28, 5A, 2.31M) reports comments by European Union Justice and Home Affairs Commissioner Franco Frattini that "terrorism suspects have been transferred to U.S. intelligence agents in Europe, but it's not clear whether the moves were illegal" or "whether governments knew about or cooperated in the transfers." Frattini "spoke after Europe's leading human rights watchdog, the Council of Europe, voted to continue its inquiry into alleged CIA flights and secret prisons in Europe. The council's lead investigator, Dick Marty of Switzerland, has complained that European governments weren't eager to help him establish the facts.

UK Police Arrest Two Terror Suspects. In its "Briefs" section, the New York Times (6/28, Lyall, 1.19M) reports Bolton, England police "arrested two people under terrorism legislation…in the latest in a series of antiterrorism raids — some linked, some independent — across England in the last few weeks." Police apprehended the two individuals, who have not yet been charged, after searching eight properties.

State Department Backs Pan Am 103 Families In Libyan Row. The AP (6/27) reports the Department of State "urged Libya on Tuesday to provide fair compensation to the families of victims in the 1988 bombing of a Pan Am flight over Scotland." Deputy Spokesman Adam Ereli is quoted saying, "Obviously, we support justice for the Pan Am 103 families, and we support their efforts to receive due compensation. We are actively involved in encouraging the Libyan government to extend escrow arrangements made under the settlement so that the final payment can be effected. In this matter, we want to see it resolved fairly." The Washington Post (6/27, A17, Graham, 744K) reported yesterday that Libyan officials are hedging on a previous agreement to make the final $2 million-per-family compensation payments this summer.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Study Finds US Ports Remain Vulnerable To Terror Attacks. Knight Ridder (6/28, Simerman) reports a study by the Public Policy Institute of California finds that US "seaports remain vulnerable to attack and a lack of coordination among agencies could worsen the economic aftermath of a terrorist attack." KRT notes, "One obstacle is a lack of a clear line of authority for emergency response. In areas like Los Angeles, as many as 15 different agencies may have jurisdiction, the study found." Port of Oakland security chief Mike O'Brien "said local, state and federal agencies work together on drills and exercises, and that the FBI has been designated as the lead agency if the port is attacked. 'We're talking about what-ifs and sorting out those jurisdictional issues,' said O'Brien."

DOJ_NMG_0036848

Court Upholds Ruling On DHS Personnel Rules. The New York Times (6/28, Lipton, 1.19M) reports, "The United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit upheld a lower court decision that overturned personnel rules at the Homeland Security Department, saying they failed to ensure employees' right to bargain collectively. … The department set up the system in January 2005, saying it would allow salaries to be based on performance. A department spokesman said officials were considering what to do about the ruling."

The Washington Post (6/28, A23, Weiss, 744K) calls the ruling "another legal blow to the Bush administration's broad plan to overhaul the federal employee personnel system." The Post adds, "Elated union leaders said the decision could scuttle the broader attempt to replace the 15-grade General Schedule pay system with one that has wide salary ranges known as pay bands, and to more strongly tie annual raises to performance evaluations. The administration hopes to expand the proposed DHS system throughout the government."

The Washington Post (6/28, D4, Barr, 744K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column, "Administration officials, who spoke only on condition that they not be identified, acknowledged that the ruling was a heavy blow. One official said the new Homeland Security personnel system was 'dead in the water' and added: 'There is no leadership on this.'"

The Federal Times (6/28, Losey) reports, "The National Treasury Employees Union, which was lead plaintiff in the case, said the appeals court decision effectively settles the matter and strikes down what it calls 'a regressive personnel system.' … Homeland Security spokesman Larry Orluskie said the department will soon discuss the impact of the ruling with the Justice Department and Office of Personnel Management and decide what their next steps will be."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Jogs With Soldier Who Lost His Legs In Iraq. All three networks devoted segments of last night's broadcasts to President Bush's White House jog with Staff Sgt. Christian Bagge, who lost both legs in a roadside bomb explosion in Iraq. NBC Nightly News (6/27, story 11, 0:30, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "We want to share with you what became an emotional moment today on the South Lawn at the White House. President Bush, who has stopped jogging of late due to bad knees, suited up today so he could fulfill a promise, to go on a run with a young and courageous Iraqi war veteran he had first met back in January at Brook Army Medical Center."

ABC World News Tonight (6/27, story 8, 1:15, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The President just happened to stop at his bedside at an Army hospital in San Antonio." President Bush: "He said, 'I want to run with you.' He was in bed. He lost both legs. But I looked at him like, you know, there is an optimistic person. But I could tell in his eyes that he meant it." Gibson: He did, indeed, mean it. And today, he did it. Sergeant Bagge has been through 11 surgeries. And he runs on artificial limbs." Sgt. Bagge: "There's a lot of days when I don't want to do it anymore. But I can't just -- I can't call in sick. I can't quit." Gibson: "There was no quit in the Sergeant today. As he ran around the South Lawn of the White House with the President."

The CBS Evening News (6/27, story 5, 0:30, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported Bagge "was in the Oregon National Guard at the time" of the attack, "but has since enlisted in the regular Army."

The AP (6/28, Loven) reports, "Despite a slight drizzle," Bush and Bagge "took a slow jog around a spongy track that circles the White House's South Lawn. About halfway through their approximately half-mile run, Bush and Bagge paused briefly for reporters. 'He ran the president into the ground, I might add,' Bush said, as the two gripped hands in an emotional, lengthy shake. 'But I'm proud of you. I'm proud of your strength, proud of your character.'"

USA Today (6/28, Benedetto, 2.31M) reports Bush, "who swapped his once-manic running regimen for mountain biking due to pain in his knees, said he was inspired by Bagge's courage. 'It's an amazing sight for me to be running with a guy who, last time I saw him, was in bed,' Bush said. 'I was wondering whether or not he'd ever get out of bed. There was no doubt in his mind that he would.'"

The Los Angeles Times (6/28, Gehlert, 958K) reports Bagge's right leg "was amputated above the knee, his left leg just below the knee. For many months, he said, he needed narcotics for the severe phantom pain and post-surgical agony. … Bagge has four sets of limbs: one for walking, one for running, one for swimming and one as a backup. And he's not ashamed of his injuries: When he was awarded a Purple Heart last year, Bagge wore shorts to the ceremony.

DOJ_NMG_0036849

2008 Campaign Seen As Context For Kerry-Feingold Alliance On Iraq Pullout. The AP (6/28, Frommer) reports Sens. John Kerry and Russ Feingold "joined forces last week to push a proposal that would have required troops to leave Iraq by July of next year. And they may soon have something else in common: Both are considering presidential races in 2008." Kerry and Feingold "insist that politics has nothing to do with it." Feingold "has been openly critical of Democrats who voted to authorize the Iraq war, even those who have since said that vote was a mistake — a group that includes Kerry. But Feingold said that was one reason he was so encouraged to work with Kerry. 'Let's face it — he was our standard-bearer, he had voted for the war,' Feingold said. 'And yet, I was able to bring him together with me to do exactly what I've believed all along, that this wasn't a good idea, and that we needed to reverse course.'"

Senate Democrats Claim GOP Iraq Stance Is Cynical, Hypocritical. The Washington Times (6/28, Bellantoni, 90K) reports Senate Democrats accused Republicans "of using a 'Karl Rove playbook' to make the minority party seem weak on defense and to defeat a Democratic plan to begin withdrawing troops from Iraq." Sen. Carl Levin "called Republicans hypocritical for opposing his 'phased redeployment' plan because top military officials have announced there is likely to be some troop withdrawal this year." Senate Democratic leaders "will hold a press conference today on Iraq policy, during which several Democratic senators 'will call on Bush Republicans to put aside their failed policies and join Democrats, Gen. Casey and the Iraqis in working to change course in Iraq,' according to an announcement."

The Washington Post's Harold Meyerson (6/28, A25) writes, "When Senate Democrats brought two resolutions to the floor last week, each calling for a change in our policy, the Republicans defeated them both, but they pointedly failed to introduce a resolution of their own affirming the administration's conduct of the war. That, they understood, would have been a loser in the court of public opinion."

WPost/ABC News Poll Shows Democrats Losing Ground On Iraq. CNN's The Situation Room (6/27, Crowley) reported, "New polling suggests congressional debate on a US withdrawal from Iraq did not change minds, but it did push the politics. A Washington Post/ABC poll finds Republicans with a seven-point edge on the question of which party would best handle terrorism. Forty-six percent of Americans said Republicans, 39 percent said Democrats. That's a seven point drop for Democrats in a month. … The same poll shows Democrats losing ground on Iraq. They still hold a six-point edge as the party that would do a better job, but that is down from the 14-point advantage they had in May. Wrong way for a group that hopes to win big at polls in just about four months."

Holbrooke Praises Bush Request For UN Help In Iraq. In his monthly column for the Washington Post (6/28, A25, 744K) former UN ambassador Richard Holbrooke writes, "In a little-noticed announcement in President Bush's news conference on June 14, the day he returned from Iraq, he said that he would send two personal emissaries to New York to consult with U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan on the political and economic future of Iraq. The next day, still with remarkably little public attention, Philip Zelikow, the counselor of the State Department, and Deputy Treasury Secretary Robert Kimmitt met with Annan and his deputy, Mark Malloch Brown, at the secretary general's Sutton Place residence." The envoys "asked Annan to use his unique 'convening powers' to help organize international meetings that would lead (by this fall, the Americans hope) to the unveiling of a new 'Iraq Compact' -- an agreement between the Iraqi government and major international donors that would commit Baghdad to a series of political and economic reforms in return for substantially more international aid. … This is a good idea -- and quite similar to suggestions from many administration critics."

US Has Detained 20 In Kidnapping, Murder Of Two Soldiers. The Washington Times (6/28, Scarborough, 90K) reports, "The U.S. military has detained 20 persons with knowledge of the brutal deaths of two American soldiers south of Baghdad and thinks al Qaeda in Iraq was responsible, an Army general said yesterday. Maj. Gen. James Thurman, who commands U.S. operations in and around Baghdad, said at a press conference that more than 8,000 Americans and Iraqis searched for the soldiers after their traffic checkpoint was attacked on June 16. The bodies of Pfc. Kristian Menchaca, 23, and Pfc. Thomas Tucker, 25 were found three days later in a village in the 'Triangle of Death.' … Asked who was suspected in the killings, Gen. Thurman said, 'This is a terrorist and foreign fighter area where al Qaeda operates. And I will tell you I believe al Qaeda is associated with the majority of the attacks in south Baghdad, and in and around the area where we found the soldiers.'"

The Los Angeles Times (6/28, Moore, 958K) reports, "Thurman declined to answer questions about possible procedural lapses that would have allowed the soldiers to leave their camp unaccompanied, saying the inquiry was continuing. U.S. military vehicles in Iraq almost always travel in groups of two or more."

US Military Disappointed By Baghdad Crackdown. USA Today/AP (6/28) reports, "The U.S.

DOJ_NMG_0036850

military issued a sober assessment Tuesday of the Baghdad security crackdown, saying violence had decreased only slightly in the two weeks since 75,000 American-backed Iraqi soldiers flooded the capital." Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, spokesman for U.S. forces in Iraq, "said the overwhelming security operation launched two weeks ago to rein in violence was moving slower than hoped. … 'We … see a slight decrease (in violence) but not of the degree we would like to see at this point,' he said at a news conference in the heavily fortified Green Zone."

Baghdad Residents Resort To Subterfuge To Escape Pervasive Violence. The Los Angeles Times (6/28, Stack, 958K) reports that in Baghdad, "Rich people hide their jewelry and dig frayed clothes from the back of their closets to evade ransom-seeking kidnappers. Muslims claim to be Sunni or Shiite, depending on circumstance. Christians pose as Muslims. Lying about employment is de rigueur. Street police wrap their faces in masks so nobody will recognize them. Everybody, it seems, is pretending to be somebody else, adopting a fake identity in the terrified hope of staying safe. Baghdad residents reason that no matter who you are, you're probably on somebody's hit list."

The Washington Times (6/28, Behn, 90K) reports, "In a country where people are killed because their names mark them as Shi'ites or Sunnis, having the wrong haircut can be lethal, too. So for barber Abu Saif, staying in business requires keeping up with the latest religious edicts. … The shape of a beard or haircut often marks its wearer as Shi'ite or Sunni, ensuring support in some neighborhoods but putting him at risk in others. Religious Sunnis, for example, do not remove any neck hair, and fundamental Wahhabis never shave or trim their beards, but will cut down their mustaches to almost nothing."

Sadr Said To Have Lost Control Of Mahdi Army. The Washington Times (6/28, Scarborough, 90K) reports Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr "has lost control of his Mahdi Army, which has embarked on a wide range of criminal activity, defense officials said. The officials said the Mahdi Army, which once confined most of its activities to protecting the firebrand cleric's religious turf and trying to dominate towns in Shi'ite southern Iraq, has become a criminal organization that commits homicides, kidnappings and robberies in the Baghdad area. … Sources said Army Gen. George Casey, during his trip to Washington last week for talks with President Bush and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, raised the Mahdi Army as a growing obstacle to peace."

Pentagon Expects To Meet Annual Training Goals For Iraqi Forces. The Washington Post (6/28, A20, White, 744K) reports, "U.S. military commanders expect to meet their goal of training and equipping more than 325,000 members of the new Iraqi security forces by the end of this year, an important step in developing Iraq's self-defense, Lt. Gen. Martin Dempsey, who leads the training effort, said yesterday." According to the Post, "Top officials remain optimistic" but "they warned that there is a long way to go before the Iraqis will be able to independently fight the insurgents." Dempsey is quoted as saying, "It's just not appropriate yet to be thinking in terms of independent anything in Iraq … They are not independent at this point in time." The Post adds that Dempsey noted, "Iraqi forces are not yet able to operate on their own, and the fact that they are learning while facing combat has created hurdles."

The New York Times (6/28, Shanker, 1.19M) reports Dempsey "cautioned that the new military in Iraq still faced a shortage of qualified officers and the infrastructure required to carry out independent operations. … Dempsey said the threat of armed militias could be resolved only by negotiations with religious leaders commanding those illegal groups, and by taking away their foot soldiers by offering them the choice of a role within government-controlled security services, an opportunity to disarm — or punishment."

Maliki Backtracks On Amnesty Offer As Part Of Reconciliation Plan. The Washington Post (6/28, A14, Partlow, Sebti, 744K) reports Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki "vowed Tuesday that no one who has killed Americans or Iraqis would be pardoned under his government's national reconciliation plan." Maliki is quoted as saying, "The fighter who did not kill anyone will be included in the amnesty, but the fighter who killed someone will not be." The Post adds, "The question of who should receive amnesty has been fiercely debated, and the issue was not settled with the vague terms first offered on Sunday, when the plan was brought before parliament. Some politicians argue that only a broader amnesty has any real chance of bringing the violent Sunni Arab insurgency into the Iraqi political process in a peaceful way. But Maliki…said the Iraqi and American families who have lost loved ones in the three-year war would not stand for such pardons." Maliki "said lesser offenses, such as minor acts of sabotage or participation in former president Saddam Hussein's Baath Party could be forgiven."

The New York Times (6/28, Tavernise, Burns, 1.19M) reports Maliki "sought to allay concerns raised by many in the United States that the plan, which he unveiled Sunday as part of a broad effort to reduce insurgent violence, could lead to pardons for some who had killed American soldiers and spur attacks on American units." The Times notes Maliki "said the plan had drawn widespread interest from groups important to its success, including members of political militias, tribal groups, religious leaders and insurgent groups," though he "would not identify the insurgent groups." According to the Times, "Allies of Mr. Maliki have said that the amnesty, presented by American officials and the prime minister's aides among many initiatives that would give momentum to the new government, reflected his relative political weakness."

DOJ_NMG_0036851

Maliki Claims Offer Has Been Well Received By Insurgents. The Los Angeles Times (6/28, Moore, 958K) reports, "The Iraqi government has had contact with several insurgent organizations through intermediaries since the announcement of a partial amnesty plan…Maliki said. … 'Many people contacted me on the day I announced the reconciliation plan, and there is a lot of support even from militias and…armed [insurgent] groups,' Maliki said during a rare interview with six Western and Iraqi journalists. 'We welcome their assistance, but we are still waiting until we can meet directly with these groups and talk to them in a civilized way in order to bring them into the political process.'"

Dempsey Contends Amnesty For Insurgents Is Likely. The New York Times (6/28, Shanker, 1.19M) reports Lt. Gen. Martin Dempsey, "in a statement of battlefield realism rarely heard from a lecturn in Washington, said "it was certain that a national reconciliation plan offered by the new Baghdad government would include amnesty for at least some who had engaged in insurgent acts. 'Isn't there some sense of inevitability about that?' General Dempsey said." Dempsey said "without a national reconciliation plan that reaches out simultaneously to Sunni insurgents and Shiite militia members, neither side would disarm out of fear of the other."

Ignatius Says Khalilzad Comments Show Administration Eager To Escape "Iraq Morass." The Washington Post's David Ignatius (6/28, A25) writes US Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad "outlined the Bush administration's current thinking about Iraq in a telephone interview from Baghdad on Monday. The items on his agenda include a joint U.S.-Iraqi committee to discuss the details for a gradual withdrawal of American troops over the next several years, a conditional amnesty for Iraqi insurgents as part of a broader reconciliation effort, and negotiations with insurgent groups about terms and conditions for ending the fighting. What was clear in Khalilzad's comments (but is rarely so in the partisan Washington debate about Iraq) is how badly the Bush administration wants to find a way out of the Iraq morass."

NYTimes Claims Amnesty Should Include "Unsavory" Combatants. The New York Times (6/28, 1.19M), in an editorial, writes, "the Iraqi government talks about denying amnesty to insurgents who have killed other Iraqis, and Washington has insisted on excluding those who have killed Americans. That is understandable on both counts, but it would seem to leave few, if any, real insurgents eligible for any amnesty. … Any reconciliation broad enough to matter will require embracing unsavory people and forgiving unsavory deeds. That won't be pretty or popular. But it is Iraq's best remaining hope for peace, reconstruction and national survival."

Turkish Ambassador To US Alleges Iraqi Kurds Backing Separatists. The Washington Times (6/28, Sands, 90K) reports Turkey's ambassador to the US Nabi Sensoy claimed, "The United States' Kurdish allies in northern Iraq have provided arms, shelter and equipment to a violent Kurdish separatist movement in Turkey, and the U.S. government should do more to disrupt the links." Sensoy "said Ankara has evidence that as many as 3,000 fighters from the Kurdistan Workers' Party (PKK), considered a terrorist organization by the U.S. government, recently had moved from positions in northern Iraq to the Turkish border to carry out operations inside Turkey. The PKK units, Mr. Sensoy said, have received arms, safe passage and other logistical help from the two leading Iraqi Kurdish parties -- both of which are strongly allied with Washington."

Saddam To Face Additional Charges In August. CNN's The Situation Room (6/27, Blitzer) reported, "Iraqi officials are announcing another trial for the former dictator Saddam Hussein. He'll face charges starting in August in connection with the killings of as many as 200,000 Kurds in the late 1980s."

The Los Angeles Times (6/28, Kennedy, 958K) reports Hussein "and six high-ranking members of his regime will be indicted on charges of genocide this summer in the mass killings of Iraqi Kurds during a seven-month operation in 1988, the court trying the former Iraqi president announced Tuesday. … Iraq's minority Kurds, who inhabit the northern portion of the country, have long sought justice for the Anfal campaign, in which at least 2,000 villages were destroyed and tens of thousands of people were arrested, deported, tortured and killed, often in remote desert camps."

Saddam Believes US Will Seek His Help To Stop Insurgency. CNN's The Situation Room (6/27, Snow) reported, "Saddam Hussein apparently believes he can evade a death sentence because he thinks the US will seek his help in stopping the insurgency ravaging Iraq. That is according to Hussein's chief defense lawyer, who recently spoke with the Associated Press and the New York Times. One Iraqi expert suggests the idea says more about Saddam Hussein's mindset than about reality."

Clark Says Saddam Has No Thoughts Of Political Comeback. Ramsey Clark, a defense attorney for Saddam Hussein, was asked on CNN's The Situation Room (6/27) about reports that Hussein is thinking of making a political comeback. Clark said, "I don't think he has any thoughts of a political comeback. I've never heard him say anything about it or seen any indication of it. The thing that he always says and is always clear is that he's torn apart by what he sees happening to his country, to the people of Iraq. And the thing he says above all is Iraqis should never kill Iraqis. You've got to join together."

DOJ_NMG_0036852

Rice Travels To Afghanistan To Bolster Support For Embattled Karzai. The Washington Post (6/28, A21, Kessler, 744K) reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice flew to Kabul to meet with President Hamid Karzai, "who is facing mounting international criticism over his performance. Rice "hailed Karzai as 'an extraordinary leader' and said the United States would 'back him fully.' Rice's visit comes as Karzai is straining to hold his country together but is losing popular support because of increasing violence, corruption, drug trafficking and an inability to demonstrate tangible progress since the fall of the Taliban. A failure of the Karzai government would undermine Bush administration claims that Afghanistan has become a symbol of rising freedom and democracy in the world." The New York Times (6/28, Cooper, 1.19M) reports Rice "had strong words of praise for the besieged Afghan president."

Pakistani Official Defends His Country's Performance Combating Taliban. The Washington Post (6/28, A21, Kessler, 744K) reports Rice tried "to heal a rift between Pakistan and Afghanistan…but tensions spilled over during a news conference in which Pakistani Foreign Minister Khursheed Kasuri angrily accused the Afghan government of making false charges. Rice smiled tightly during Kasuri's emotional, five-minute outburst, which was prompted by a question about Afghan claims that Pakistan is allowing its largely lawless border areas to shelter insurgents who are mounting their biggest offensive in Afghanistan since the Taliban was ousted in 2001." Kasuri "said Pakistan would add 10,000 troops to the 80,000 now operating in areas bordering Afghanistan."

The Washington Times (6/28, Kralev, 90K) also reports Rice was "smiling tightly" as Kasuri "rejected Afghan accusations that Pakistan is sending terrorists across the border in an emotional monologue." Rice "urged the two countries to trust each other more" and "said the U.S. military would step up joint efforts with both of them to quell the resurgence of Taliban activity along the frontier." The New York Times (6/28, Cooper, 1.19M) reports Rice "refrained from wading into the continuing fight between Pakistan and Afghanistan over who is doing more to root out terrorism on the lawless border between the countries amid surging Taliban attacks." With Rice standing next to him "looking straight ahead,". Kasuri "went through a lengthy list of all he said Pakistan had given to fighting terrorism. … 'We have had 650 martyred soldiers' since the border effort began, he said. 'We have more troops than Afghanistan and the U.S. put together.'"

Rice Prods Musharraf To Foster Democracy. The New York Times (6/28, Cooper, 1.19M) reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice met with Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf, "whom she prodded, gently, to allow democratic elections. 'We've had a discussion about the role of continuing democratization,' Ms. Rice said after the meeting. 'It's a good start to talk about a good and moderate Pakistan.'"

The Los Angeles Times (6/28, Gerstenzang, 958K) reports Rice's "trip, which will also include Russia, encapsulates major goals of the Bush administration's foreign policy: seeking to promote democratic growth as a weapon against terrorism and to undercut potential nuclear proliferation. Visits by senior U.S. officials to Pakistan regularly revolve around questions of how devoted Musharraf…is to pushing his country toward democracy and how quickly he will move."

Taliban Fighters Challenge NATO Forces In Southern Afghanistan. The New York Times (6/28, Gall, 1.19M) reports, "Two British soldiers were killed Tuesday in fighting in southern Afghanistan against combatants suspected of being Taliban members, and a suicide bomber detonated his car next to German peacekeepers in northern Afghanistan, killing two boys. … The increase in activity by the Taliban-led insurgency in southern Afghanistan and of bomb attacks in the north appeared to be an effort by Islamic militants to unsettle NATO forces as they take over command from American forces in the south, military officials here said. British, Canadian and Dutch soldiers have clashed daily with insurgents in southern Afghanistan while mounting a large offensive against them, and attacks in more peaceful northern Afghanistan have increased in recent weeks." The Times notes, "Besides the two British soldiers killed, one was wounded and four enemy fighters were killed in the subsequent airstrikes, a statement from the American-led force in Afghanistan said."

Italy To Withdraw 400 Troops From Afghanistan. The New York Times (6/28, Gall, 1.19M) reports the Italian government "agreed Tuesday to withdraw as many as 400 soldiers from its 1,400-member force in Afghanistan."

Inability To Provide Safety For Informants Stymies US Effort To Dislodge Afghan Insurgents. The Christian Science Monitor (6/28, Calvert, 61K) reports, "As coalition forces move into remote insurgent havens…they have been unable to provide security locals say they need in order to help oust insurgents completely. Villagers who do help coalition forces suffer, or die, for it. … The inability to provide security for villagers in these areas hampers the long-term effectiveness of operations, such as Mountain Thrust, a large-scale coalition offensive launched recently in southern Afghanistan following an upswing in insurgent activity there. Insurgents hold sway in parts of the countryside surrounding operating bases in the southern provinces."

DOJ_NMG_0036853

US Military Incurring Unprecedented Vehicle Repair Costs. The CBS Evening News (6/27, story 4, 2:30, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "By now, there have been so many things about the Iraq war that were predicted to go one way and turned out another way that there's probably nothing much that should shock us anymore. Well, here comes another one, though. Now we find out that even repair costs for military vehicles have been vastly underestimated and we are not talking small change here, we're talking billions." CBS (Martin) added, "By Pentagon count, the war in Iraq has cost $210 billion, burning money at the rate of $6 billion a month with no end in sight. And even that can't pay all the repair bills for the equipment chewed up by the fighting. Nobody could have imagined it when the war started, but today the chief of the Army cold Congress he will need $17 billion next year to repair, replace, or upgrade equipment destroyed, damaged, or plain worn out by constant combat in the harsh conditions of Iraq and Afghanistan, double what he's spending this year. The commandant of the Marine Corps said his repair bill is more than $11 billion for next year. Again, that's double this year's bill." CBS anchor Bob Schieffer asked, "Are our troops going to be put in danger because their vehicles need repair?" To which, the correspondent replied, "the Army chief of staff said today he is concerned about the readiness of equipment kept in reserve for other emergencies."

Internet Sites Speed Care Packages To Soldiers. USA Today (6/28, Dorell, 2.31M) reports, "Americans are increasingly turning to high-tech methods to send gifts and supplies to U.S. troops serving in Iraq and Afghanistan. Veterans say today's care packages are more numerous and creative — and get to servicemembers much faster — than those of the past. … Today, several websites designed specifically for supporting the troops overseas allow anyone with a credit card to order cellphone minutes, snacks, books — even armor and sniper accessories."

DOJ:

Main Justice Closed By Floodwaters After Heavy Rains. The Washington Post (6/28, A6, Schwartzman, Greenwell) reports, "The downtown D.C. headquarters of the Justice Department, Internal Revenue Service and National Archives will remain closed for the rest of the week because of damage wrought by Sunday's torrential downpour, officials said yesterday." The Post continues, "Nearly two days after the region's first deluge, at least four government offices in the Federal Triangle remained shut, including the Old Post Office building and the Ariel Rios Federal Building. The Commerce Department, at 15th Street NW and Pennsylvania Avenue NW, reopened yesterday after closing Monday. … Even with the closures, most of the federal government's Washington offices were open yesterday, officials said." The Post adds, "At Justice Department headquarters, at Ninth Street NW and Pennsylvania Avenue NW, crews pumped water from the subbasement and parking garage and worked to repair the seven-story building's electrical and air-conditioning systems. … Officials plan to keep the building shut for the next three days and possibly as many as seven, according to an e-mail sent to reporters by the General Services Administration late yesterday. … The nearly 2,000 employees assigned to the building were scattered elsewhere, some at offices a few blocks away. Brian Roehrkasse, a Justice spokesman, declined to specify the location for security reasons. … Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzalez is in the Middle East for the rest of the week on a scheduled trip. 'The Department of Justice is fully operational and able to carry out its essential functions,' Roehrkasse said."

The AP (6/28, Manning) reports, "In downtown Washington, the Justice Department, the IRS and the National Archives — where the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution were safe under glass — were among several buildings still closed because of flooding or other storm-related problems. Some streets also were shut down because water from the flooded buildings was being pumped into the city sewers. … None of the flooded buildings had structural damage, but water in the basements damaged air-conditioning, wiring and other building systems, said Mike McGill, a spokesman for the General Services Administration, which manages federal buildings. … Officials at the Justice Department said it could take a week to clean up and reopen the building."

The New York Times (6/28, Gately) reports, "On Tuesday evening, the National Weather Service called for four to six inches of additional rain in the Washington area, where more than seven inches fell Sunday and Monday. The deluge sent residents to emergency shelters in Maryland and Pennsylvania. Rescuers pulled stranded motorists and pedestrians from floodwaters, and workers heaved sandbags in front of office buildings in the nation's capital. … 'This has probably been the most intense rainfall in a 24-hour period in the history of Washington,' said Michael McGill, a spokesman for the General Services Administration, which oversees buildings closed because of flooding, including the headquarters for the Justice Department and the Internal Revenue Service. Both are expected to stay closed through at least Friday, he said, mostly because of basement flooding and damage to electrical systems."

Government Executive (6/28, Marino) reports, "The Justice Department's Robert F. Kennedy headquarters building will be closed for the next three to seven days as repairs are made to its flooded basement and lost power is restored. … Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said in a statement that fewer than 2,400 workers were affected by the weather-related damage, but that he remains unsure of when the headquarters will open."

DOJ_NMG_0036854

Brooklyn US Attorney Nominated To Federal Bench. Roslynn Mauskopf, the US attorney in Brooklyn, has reportedly been selected to serve as a federal judge. The New York Times (6/28, Rashbaum, 1.19M) reports that while Mauskopf "has not yet been formally nominated, the people briefed on the matter said that she had already been interviewed by the White House and that the required F.B.I. background investigation had begun." The move "will open up one of the most important law enforcement posts in New York City."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

US Subpoenas VeriSign In Widening Options Timing Probe. The AP (6/28) reports, "VeriSign Inc., a provider of infrastructure services for Internet and telecom networks, said Tuesday it received a grand jury subpoena from the U.S. Attorney for the Northern District of California asking for documents relating to its stock option grants." The AP continues, "VeriSign said it also received a similar request from Securities and Exchange Commission as part of an informal inquiry. … The company said it intends to cooperate fully with both the SEC and the U.S. Attorney's office, and added that its board had already began an internal investigation prior to the two requests." The AP adds, "About 48 companies in addition to VeriSign are being questioned by the SEC or Justice Department about their stock-option granting practices. At issue is whether executives backdated stock options grants to time them at low points of the stock price, thus boosting the payouts."

Rambus Warns Of Option Timing Trouble. The AP (6/28, Liedtke) reports, "Computer chip supplier Rambus Inc. on Tuesday warned some of its previously reported profits might evaporate because the timing of stock options granted to its employees wasn't properly recorded - a problem that could haunt scores of other companies as they review their past compensation practices." The AP continues, "The news, which caused Rambus's stock price to drop by more than 5 percent in extended trading, was the latest jolt in a budding scandal that threatens once again to shake investor confidence just as corporate America recovers from the accounting fiascos exposed after the fall of Enron Corp. nearly five years. … Like dozens of other companies, Los Altos, Calif.-based Rambus has been scrutinizing stock options distributed years ago to determine whether company insiders rigged the system to increase the likelihood that management would reap huge windfalls." The AP adds, "At least 44 companies have launched their own internal inquiries into possible stock option abuses or have become targets of government investigations into the practice. Some companies already have gone so far as to fire some of their top executives after learning about the manipulation of past stock options. … The number of companies responding to government inquiries continued to expand Tuesday. Cnet Networks Inc., VeriSign Inc., Foundry Networks Inc. and Cyberonics Inc. all disclosed they had received subpoenas seeking more information about their stock option awards from the U.S. Justice Department."

The Wall Street Journal (6/28, Forelle) reports, "The disclosure raises the question of whether Rambus's grants were deliberately backdated from their real date of approval to a day when the company's stock was trading lower. That would make the grants more valuable to recipients. … Separately, six other companies -- VeriSign Inc., CNET Networks Inc., Foundry Networks Inc., Applied Micro Circuits Corp., Cyberonics Inc. and Progress Software Corp. -- announced new federal inquiries into their options practices." The Journal adds, "Rambus said it isn't sure whether any charge would be material and thus require restatement. It also says the board hasn't evaluated whether it will face a tax impact. … About 50 companies are being examined by federal regulators and prosecutors in a wide-ranging probe of option-granting practices that is focusing on possible backdating and other forms of manipulation."

Cybernonics Receives DOJ Subpoena. Dow Jones (6/28) reports, "Shares of Cyberonics moved lower Tuesday, the day after it reported it has been subpoenaed by the Department of Justice over stock- options practices. … Shares of Cyberonics (CYBX) were down 4% at $20.40 in midday trades." Dow Jones continues, "According to a regulatory filing Monday, the U.S. attorney's office for the Southern District of New York issued a subpoena for documents related to its stock-option grants. Cyberonics said it is cooperating with the request. … Earlier this month, Cyberonics said it was the focus of an informal investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission into stock options."

European Court Allows Extradition Of Enron-Linked British Bankers. Bloomberg (6/28) reports, "Three British bankers will be sent to the U.S. to face Enron Corp.-related fraud charges within three weeks after a European court refused to block their extradition, their final forum for an appeal." Bloomberg continues, "David Bermingham, Giles Darby and Gary Mulgrew are wanted in Texas for allegedly bilking their former employer, Royal Bank of Scotland Group Plc's Greenwich NatWest unit, out of millions from the sale of an Enron off-the-books partnership. The European Court of Human Rights in Strasbourg, France today declined to suspend their extradition, six days after Britain's highest court also rejected their appeal." Bloomberg adds, "The case has been at the forefront of calls from Britain's business and legal community to scrap its ``fast-track" extradition arrangements with the U.S. Lobbying groups claim the legislation, introduced in 2004 mainly to clamp down on terrorism, is instead being used to target white-collar offences, unfairly increasing the risks for executives. … The European Court of Human Rights said that while it would review the merits of the men's appeal, the court wouldn't intervene to suspend extradition proceedings, according to a letter sent to the bankers' lawyers."

DOJ_NMG_0036855

The AP (6/28, Wardell) reports, "The so-called Bermingham Three have been fighting against their extradition since a High Court ruling in February. They ran out of British avenues of appeal last week when the House of Lords said it would not hear the case. … The three men have consistently argued that most of the alleged offenses took place in Britain and that any trial should be held here. Being forced to stand trial in Enron's home state of Texas would be unjust and incompatible with European human rights law, the men argued. … 'We have now done everything possible to establish the rights of three U.K. citizens to be investigated and, if appropriate, prosecuted in the U.K. but all we have established is that U.K. citizens have no such rights against an extradition request made by the U.S.,' said the men's lawyer, Mark Spragg."

Judge Sentences Barred Broker, Partner To Prison For Commodities Fraud. The AP (6/28, Gold) reports, "A man barred from selling leveraged commodities and his partner in an illicit operation have been sentenced to prison for cheating about 1,000 investors out of $14 million." The AP continues, "The barred broker, Charles Paul Hoffecker, who owned Amitex Investment Services Ltd., and his partner, Charles Edward Myers, told clients that Amitex would buy gold, silver and other commodities for them. But evidence at their trial showed that no purchases were made, federal prosecutors said Tuesday." The AP adds, "Hoffecker, 53, was sentenced June 19 to 17 1/2 years in prison, while Myers, 65, was sentenced Monday to nine years. They were ordered to pay a total of $2.67 million in restitution by U.S. District Judge Katharine S. Hayden. … The restitution figure was smaller than the total losses since not all victims have been found, mostly due to incomplete records at Amitex, Assistant U.S. Attorney Bohdan Vitvitsky said." The AP notes, "Hoffecker and Myers, who were convicted in March, were charged in 2003 after a sting operation in which investigators used an undercover business to infiltrate fraudulent telemarketing investment schemes."

DOJ Handling Of Hilfiger Nonprosecution Agreement Questioned. Corporate Counsel (6/28, Reisinger) reports, "Did Tommy Hilfiger Corp. get special treatment when it negotiated a nonprosecution agreement with the U.S. Department of Justice last summer? The question has come to light in recent weeks as the now-private company defends itself against a class action shareholders' suit." Corporate Counsel continues, "Typically, when the government completes a deferred or nonprosecution agreement, it makes the deal public. The Manhattan U.S. Attorney's Office departed from this practice with Hilfiger, however. … On Aug. 10, 2005, then-U.S. Attorney David Kelley announced that his office had reached an agreement with the retailer's American subsidiary. While Kelley's press release outlined the general features of the pact, it wasn't accompanied by an actual copy of the deal. Ten months later, neither Hilfiger nor the government has made the agreement public." Corporate Counsel adds, "The secret agreement is a problem for the shareholders who filed suit against Hilfiger after the government started investigating the company in 2004. In most deferred and nonprosecution agreements, the corporate defendant admits the government's criminal allegations. Without access to the details of the Hilfiger deal, the company's shareholders say that they don't know how the retailer responded. … Hilfiger has moved to dismiss the suit, in part, because prosecutors didn't file charges against the clothing chain. … According to a transcript of a May hearing, Wachtell's John Savarese told Manhattan federal district court Judge Richard Owen that the release is 'far from confirming that there was some basis to the initially announced U.S. Attorney investigation or that some great liability would emerge for the company from that, or some criminal case.' But Savarese cited only the government's press release in his argument, and not the nonprosecution agreement itself. … The shareholders' lead attorney, Samuel Rudman, says that he finds it unusual that the agreement was not made public, given that the government 'always make them public.' It's especially unusual, Rudman adds, 'when [Hilfiger's] lawyers are in court arguing what the agreement says.' … A spokesperson for the Manhattan U.S. Attorney's Office declined to comment when asked why Hilfiger was treated differently. Former U.S. Attorney Kelley, now a partner at Cahill Gordon & Reindel in New York, also declined to comment. A Justice Department spokesperson in Washington, D.C., would only say that the publication of agreements 'is within the discretion of individual U.S. attorney's offices.'"

Hedge Funds Intensify Political Efforts To Block New Regulation. The Wall Street Journal (6/28, Scannell, Mullins, 2.11M) reports amid "increased scrutiny by lawmakers and regulators, hedge funds are stepping up their defenses in the nation's capital." A small group of fund managers "are behind a campaign to head off new regulations from Congress and the Securities and Exchange Commission. In the past year, funds have boosted political contributions, hired a string of new lobbyists and established a second trade association to make their case in Washington." Employees of "the 25 largest hedge funds and the Managed Funds Association, the industry's main trade group, have contributed a combined $1.2 million to congressional candidates and the Republican and Democratic parties so far in the 2005-2006 campaign. While that figure goes only through March 31 of this year, it represents nearly a 50% jump over donations made by the same organizations for the entire 2001-2002 election cycle, the last midterm election year, according to the nonpartisan Center for Responsive Politics." Hedge funds "have hired more than a dozen lobbying groups since early 2005, according to PoliticalMoneyLine, a nonpartisan organization. In 2005, the industry paid $1.5 million for Washington lobbyists, up from $1.2 million in 2004 and $565,000 in 2003."

DOJ_NMG_0036856

Senate Judiciary Committee To Scrutinize Hedge Funds. Dow Jones (6/28, Schroeder) reports, "Washington and Wall Street may get a rare public look at how securities regulators track hedge funds' behavior on Wednesday, when a former Securities and Exchange Commission lawyer goes before a Senate panel probing the industry." Dow Jones continues, "Attorney Gary Aguirre told Congress that he was running the SEC's investigation into whether prominent hedge fund Pequot Capital Management engaged in insider trading. Aguirre said that he was fired in September after he sought the testimony of a Wall Street executive, reported to be John Mack, chief executive of Morgan Stanley." Dow Jones adds, "The SEC won't confirm or deny it's investigating Pequot. But the hearing in the Senate Judiciary Committee may shed light on the methods regulators use to catch potential cases of wrongdoing involving hedge funds -- the big, lightly regulated pools of money serving mostly wealthy investors. … The hearing will focus on the relationships between hedge funds and independent analysts."

Morgan Stanley Settles With SEC Over Insider Accounts. The AP (6/28) reports, "Wall Street powerhouse Morgan Stanley on Tuesday agreed to pay a $10 million civil fine to settle federal regulators' charges that it failed to maintain safeguards to prevent the misuse of inside information." The AP continues, "The Securities and Exchange Commission also censured Morgan Stanley under the settlement. The investment house neither admitted nor denied the SEC's allegations but did agree to refrain from future violations of the securities laws." The AP adds, "Morgan Stanley, the third-largest U.S. securities firm by market value, also agreed to hire an independent consultant to review its policies and practices for preventing misuse of confidential company information. … In a civil lawsuit, the SEC said Morgan Stanley for years failed to adequately maintain and enforce procedures to prevent the misuse of inside information regarding companies whose securities are held in hundreds of thousands of employee and employee-related accounts. The agency did not say whether any illegal insider trading or other improprieties had occurred using inside information as a result of the alleged lapses." The AP notes, "From at least 2000 to 2004, Morgan Stanley failed to conduct needed surveillance of hundreds of thousands of employee and employee-related accounts to detect possible insider trading, the SEC alleged."

The Wall Street Journal (6/28, Burns) reports, "Morgan Stanley settled without admitting or denying the SEC's claims that for years it lacked adequate policies and procedures to safeguard against misuse of nonpublic information, even though it was legally required to have them. … 'Due to a systemic breakdown in this critical compliance function, Morgan Stanley failed to conduct any surveillance' of trading in a massive number of employee accounts held at the firm, the SEC said. As a result, it said, 'Morgan Stanley may have failed to detect illegal insider trading' by the firm, its employees or their relatives." The Journal adds, "While the New York securities firm put stocks on a 'Watch List' when its bankers had inside information on a company, the SEC said that over a four-year period it failed to scrutinize employee trading in most or all of the Watch List shares. The omission went 'virtually undetected and uncorrected' for years, the SEC added."

USA Today (6/28, Smith) reports, "Richard Grime, the SEC's assistant director of enforcement, said Morgan Stanley "failed to conduct any surveillance of a massive number' of its employee accounts until the agency discovered recordkeeping gaps during a routine investigation of potential inside trading. … 'Once we scratched the surface, we found this problem,' Grime said. Many of the recordkeeping deficiencies arose as a result of the firm's failure to fully integrate employees' records after its 1997 merger with Dean Witter Reynolds, the agency said, but investigators also found that the firm's compliance department had failed to update and enforce many of its surveillance procedures."

CA To Add Shareholder Proposal After Court's Refusal To Rule. The Wall Street Journal/AP (6/28) reports, "CA Inc. said it will add to its July proxy a shareholder proposal that seeks to change the company's bylaws after a Delaware court refused to rule on the company's original decision to reject the proposal." The AP continues, "CA shareholders will be able to vote on the resolution, which seeks to limit the company's poison-pill provisions, at the shareholders' annual meeting, which is scheduled for late August." The AP adds, "The Islandia, N.Y., technology company originally denied a request to add the proposal to its upcoming proxy statement, claiming the proposal was a violation of Delaware law. The rejection resulted in a court challenge by the drafter of the resolution, Harvard professor and shareholder rights activist Lucian Bebchuk. … Last week, a Delaware judge refused to rule on the legality of CA's decision to reject the proposal, saying the issue wasn't 'ripe' for a decision."

DOJ_NMG_0036857

CRIMINAL LAW:

Katrina Fraud Estimated At Near $2 Billion. Reporting on an article that appeared yesterday in the New York Times, NBC Nightly News (6/27, story 9, 0:30, Williams, 9.87M) reported Sen. Susan Collins was quoted as saying that in the wake of Hurricane Katrina, "'The blatant fraud, audacious schemes and scale of the waste is breathtaking.' The amount of taxpayer money lost to scams, schemes and bungling is now put at $2 billion, according to the 'New York Times.' Officials admit 10 months now after Katrina hit, the situation is still not under control."

CNN's The Situation Room (6/27, Foreman) reported American taxpayers can now be counted among Katrina's "victims. … The New York Times has rolled out the latest tally of abuses, and it is staggering." CNN (Foreman) added, "FEMA, of course, says they're trying to fix all of this. But in all, the Times report today echoes what we've heard in recent months from the Government Accountability Office the Red Cross, FEMA, Congress, the Attorney General and a legion of taxpayer watchdog groups, all of which say the same thing, Wolf: The true cost of Katrina to American taxpayers is still climbing and no one can yet say what the final bill will be."

NYTimes Sees No Evidence FEMA Addressing Fraud Problem. Under the headline "The Disaster Without End," the New York Times (6/28, 1.19M) editorializes, "The widespread fraud, waste and bungling was abetted by FEMA's failure to put a high priority on existing tools for catching schemers and thieves, according to the Government Accountability Office. FEMA officials, wary at the advent of a new hurricane season, insist that tougher accountability precautions are now in place. But there's been no credible evidence of the top-to-bottom revamping that FEMA needs."

Historic Church Among New Orleans Landmarks Lost To Fires After Katrina. The New York Times (6/28, Nossiter, 1.19M) reports that New Orleans, with its "landscape of abandoned buildings, water mains cracked by the storm and fire engines with smaller crews," saw the Coliseum Place Baptist Church burn down Friday, a "heartbreaking," according to preservationists. The newest threat to New Orleans is a direct outcropping of the storm, in many respects." The loss of the historic church "was a heavy psychological blow to the struggling city."

Tribe Releases Photo Of Meeting Ney Said He Could Not Remember. NBC News (6/28, Seidman) reports, "The Tigua of El Paso, an Indian tribe and former client of disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff, released a photo Tuesday of a meeting that members had with Ohio Republican Rep Bob Ney — a meeting the congressman told Senate investigators he did not remember having." NBC News continues, "The photo, which was taken on Aug. 14, 2002, in a House hearing room, shows the Tigua tribe's Lt. Gov. Carlos Hisa and tribal council member Raul Gutierrez with Ney. Less than a week earlier, Ney had returned from an expenses-paid golf junket to Scotland with Abramoff, Ralph Reed, David Safavian, Neil Volz and others. … On Nov. 12, 2004, in an interview with Senate investigators, Ney said that 'he was not familiar with the Tigua.' But the report quotes tribal representatives as testifying that they met with Ney for about two hours and he assured them he could help with legislation." NBC adds, "Ney told the investigators that he 'could not recall ever meeting with any member of the Tigua.' Ney's lawyer later said the congressman's schedule for that day showed a half-hour meeting with the 'Taqua.' A spokesman for Ney, Brian Walsh, said the congressman simply could not recall that the tribe was also known by another name, the Ysleta del Sur Pueblo Indian Tribe of El Paso, Texas."

The AP (6/28) reports an Indian tribe "that was a client of disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff has released a photograph of tribal leaders meeting with Rep. Bob Ney, who had told investigators he wasn't familiar with the tribe." The photo "shows the Tigua tribe's Lt. Gov. Carlos Hisa and tribal council member Raul Gutierrez with Ney in a House hearing room on Aug. 14, 2002, less than a week after Ney finished an expenses-paid golf trip to Scotland with Abramoff and others."

House Members Grill Internet Providers Over Child Porn Restrictions. The AP (6/28, Werner) reports, "Internet providers told Congress on Tuesday they're doing all they can to combat online child pornography, but they were told to expect legislation." The AP continues, "Several voiced skepticism about creating new laws that would force them to retain data about their users' online activity. … Any such measure would be costly and easily circumvented and would 'fall far short of its intended goal,' America Online chief counsel John Ryan told a House Energy and Commerce subcommittee hearing." The AP adds, "The focus should be on improving existing child porn laws -- not 'new mandates,' said Verizon Online general counsel Thomas Dailey. … Lawmakers, however, said more must be done to stop the availability of child porn on the Web and chart rooms where pedophiles troll for young victims. … 'The parents of America and I think the Congress is tired of just talking about it. I think we're ready to take action,' Energy and Commerce Chairman Joe Barton, R-Texas, told a panel of executives from seven companies including Yahoo Inc., Google Inc. and Microsoft Corp."

DOJ_NMG_0036858

Senate Committee Approves Web Labeling Requirement. CNET News (6/28, McCullagh, Broache) reports, "Web site operators posting sexually explicit information must slap warning labels on their pages or face prison terms of up to 15 years, according to a proposal adopted by a U.S. Senate committee on Tuesday." CNET continues, "During a day of debate on a wide-ranging communications bill, the Senate Commerce Committee approved an amendment backed by the Bush administration that proponents claim would help clean up the Internet and protect children online. … It says that commercial Web sites must not place 'sexually explicit material' on their home pages upon pain of felony prosecution--and, in addition, they must rate 'each page or screen of the website that does contain sexually explicit material' with a system to be devised by the Federal Trade Commission. … 'This will protect children from accidentally typing in the wrong address and immediately viewing indecent material,' said Sen. Conrad Burns, a Montana Republican who is the co-founder of the Congressional Internet Caucus." CNET notes, "Civil libertarians have opposed the mandatory labeling proposal, saying it violates the First Amendment's guarantee of freedom of speech. Also, courts have taken a dim view of mandatory rating systems: In a 1968 case called Interstate Circuit v. Dallas, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that Dallas' ordinance requiring that movies be rated was unconstitutional because the criteria for rating were unclear and vague. … Burns' seven-page amendment is virtually identical to a standalone bill introduced earlier this month by Sen. Jon Kyl, an Arizona Republican. Both proposals follow from a speech in April during which Attorney General Alberto Gonzales called on Congress to 'promptly' enact such a law."

Opening Arguments Made At Trial Of Alleged Unregistered Iraqi Agent. The AP (6/28, Caruso) reports alleged unregistered Iraqi agent Tongsun Park "was 'simply a middleman' who didn't intend to break any U.S. laws, his attorney told a federal jury Tuesday" in opening arguments at his trial. But prosecutors said Park "was no ordinary lobbyist," and "Assistant U.S. Attorney Michael Farbiarz told jurors that Park was promised millions of dollars by Iraq for his help influencing top U.N. officials, including former Secretary-General Boutros Boutros-Ghali. … 'There's a right way and a wrong way,' Farbiarz said. 'He hid his relationship with Iraq.'" Park lawyer Michael Kim "acknowledged that the case was 'full of intrigue,'" but he "insisted that Park committed no illegal acts, and urged jurors to ignore the sensational elements of the case." The New York Daily News (6/28, Shin, 729K) notes that Park "has been in jail since January, when he was nabbed in Mexico while traveling from Canada to Panama. At the time, he was carrying $45,000 in cash, FBI officials said."

Closing Arguments Begin At Chicago Patronage Trial. Under the headline "Feds Tell Jury: Say 'Enough' To Political Hiring," the Chicago Tribune (6/28, Bush, Mihalopoulos, 643K) reports, "Federal prosecutors urged jurors in the City Hall corruption trial Tuesday to end the illegal political hiring that they say has pervaded Mayor Richard Daley's administration. 'This machine doesn't have any brakes. That's you,' Assistant U.S. Atty. Philip Guentert told jurors. 'It's time to say enough.'" However, defense attorneys "argued that prosecutors brought insufficient and misleading evidence against Daley's former patronage chief Robert Sorich and three co-defendants." The Tribune notes codefendant John Sullivan's lawyer, Cynthia Giacchetti, recalled "that FBI agent John Hauser waited more than five months to transcribe one of two face-to-face interviews with Sullivan. She also pointed out that Hauser did not take verbatim notes of the interviews. She contrasted that to federal prosecutors' interview of Daley last year, which was transcribed word-for-word." The Chicago Sun-Times (6/28, Korecki, Warmbir) adds, "'All of this was a charade, ladies and gentlemen,' federal prosecutor Julie Ruder said of a scheme to falsify job tests and hold bogus interviews so that hundreds of jobs went to predetermined, clout-backed winners. 'The fix was in.'" But Sorich attorney Tom Durkin "went on his own attack," saying "there was no testimony Sorich took money or boasted about his connections. 'That pig Tomczak did,' Durkin said," referring to key prosecution witness Donald Tomczak.

Fumo Computer Technicians Indicted Over Deleted Emails. The AP (6/28, Dale) reports that "a pair of computer technicians assigned to state Sen. Vincent Fumo were indicted on charges of obstructing a federal investigation by deleting years worth of Fumo's e-mails." Leonard Luchko and Mark Eister were indicted yesterday "with conspiracy, destroying evidence and obstruction." The AP notes, "The FBI last month arrested Luchko and Eister in pre-dawn raids on their homes, although defense lawyers complained that their clients had been willing to surrender. … U.S. Attorney Patrick Meehan has said that the three-year investigation is far from over, but defense lawyers noted that Tuesday's indictment did not name any new defendants." The Philadelphia Inquirer (6/28, Shiffman, 423K) adds, "Yesterday's indictment did not offer any new charges. It simply repeated FBI allegations" Luchko and Eister "deleted files at Fumo's direction. The indictment, however, did trigger the random selection of a judge for the case: Senior U.S. District Judge William H. Yohn Jr." The Philadelphia Daily News (6/28, Hinkelman) also reports on the indictments.

DOJ_NMG_0036859

Court Documents Reveal Two-Month Delay In FBI Seizure Of Pellicano Computers. Under the headline "FBI Was Slow To Check Pellicano's Audio Lab," the Los Angeles Times (6/28, Krikorian, Blankstein, 958K) reports, "Court documents released Tuesday show that FBI agents did not examine private investigator Anthony Pellicano's sophisticated audio lab during their initial November 2002 search of his Sunset Strip offices, raising new questions about the handling of the probe." According to the documents, "FBI agents waited almost two months to seize computers and other items from the lab. With prosecutors publicly acknowledging that they have only one allegedly wiretapped conversation on tape, the time lapse between searches raises the possibility that Pellicano or others could have removed audio files or potential evidence in the case from computers in the lab." However, the Times notes, former federal prosecutor Orin Kerr observed, "The bottom line is it's hard to tell whether this was a missed opportunity or poor judgment."

Judge Declines To Release Connecticut Trash Kingpin On Bail For Now. The Danbury News-Times (6/28, Ali) reports, "A federal judge is open to the idea of releasing Danbury trash kingpin James Galante from federal detention and putting him under some type of house arrest while his racketeering case is pending. At a lengthy hearing on Tuesday, U.S. District Court Judge Ellen Bree Burns said she wants more information from Galante's defense lawyer, Hugh Keefe, on how such an arrangement would work before letting Galante out of jail. While she is 'amenable' to such an arrangement, she won't allow Galante to go back to work at the helm of Automated Waste Disposal in Danbury, Burns told Keefe." The AP (6/28) adds that Keefe "questioned why Galante is being detained while other suspects in the investigation have been released on bond," and "Burns said she understood Keefe's concerns. 'At the same time, however, I am persuaded there is a danger that there may be some tampering with witnesses,' Burns said. … The judge's comments came after a lengthy hearing Tuesday in which prosecutors played tapes of intercepted phone calls and cited other evidence of what they said were attempts to influence witnesses."

Gotti Says He Will Leave New York If Acquitted At Third Trial. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (6/28) reports, "Facing his third trial on racketeering charges, the son of the late mob boss John Gotti says he will leave New York this time if he's exonerated. 'I can't stay in New York,' John 'Junior' Gotti…told the Daily News. 'I'm alone in this world. I'm a man without an island.'" The AP notes, "Gotti's lawyers have argued that he gave up all mob activities after he pleaded guilty in another racketeering case in 1999. 'There are men dying in prison for that life,' Gotti said. 'It's like a religion. But it's their religion, not my religion.'"

Gotti Defense Seeking To Bar Evidence About Role In Mob Murder. The New York Post (6/28, Cornell, 624K) reports, "Faced with an onslaught of new charges, John 'Junior' Gotti is fighting to keep damaging evidence of his alleged role in a double murder and a money-laundering scheme away from jurors at his upcoming racketeering trial. In a strange twist of logic, Gotti's lawyers conceded that the government has 'ample evidence' to show that the former mob leader was involved in 'murders or violence' -- and therefre don't need to touch on the slayings of Thomas and Rosemary Uva" in 1992. The Post notes, "Gotti is not charged with the Uva murders, but the feds are seeking to show the killings were among many crimes that he had a hand in as a powerful member of an ongoing criminal enterprise."

Retired FBI Agent Denies Receiving Gifts From Bulger, Flemmi. The Boston Globe (6/28, Murphy, 484K) reports retired FBI Special Agent testified yesterday in the $50 million wrongful death lawsuit against the FBI "that he had just finished having dinner with informants James 'Whitey' Bulger and Stephen 'The Rifleman' Flemmi at a South Boston home in 1983 when Bulger's brother, then-Massachusetts Senate President William Bulger, showed up unexpectedly" with "some photographs from a recent trip to Ireland." William Bulger, "testifying three years ago before a congressional committee investigating his brother's relationship with the FBI, said he had no memory of any such dinner." Ring also testified he did not tip Flemmi off to an FBI wiretap and "said he had never received any gifts from Bulger and Flemmi," and Flemmi has alleged.

FBI Subpoenas Chicago Union Officials In Bulger Search. The Boston Globe (6/28, Murphy, 484K) reports, "The hunt for fugitive gangster James 'Whitey' Bulger has led to Chicago, where investigators from Boston delivered subpoenas to two labor union officials last week and seized a Palm Pilot from one of them, lawyers involved in the investigation said. The PDA was taken Thursday during a search of the union office of Charles Dunn, a business representative for Chicago's Local 134 of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, said Chicago attorney Patrick Deady, a partner in the law firm Hogan Marren, which represents the union. … 'We're unaware of any contact between these two guys and Whitey Bulger,' said Deady, adding that authorities told the union the FBI was following up on a lead in its hunt for Bulger. He was unaware what that lead was."

DOJ_NMG_0036860

Both Sides In Aryan Brotherhood Trial Relying On Shady Witnesses. The AP (6/28, Flaccus) reports, "Convicted murderers, gang members and jailhouse informants have paraded past jurors for nearly four months in the U.S. federal government's racketeering case against the notorious Aryan Brotherhood prison gang. … Now, with the trial about to enter its final weeks, the jury will soon have to decide who to believe: the government, whose case rests on the testimony of admitted killers, or attorneys for the white supremacists accused of plotting and ordering many of those murders from behind bars." The AP continues, "Even the defense team, which has chided the U.S. Attorney's Office for its reliance on jailhouse snitches, plans to present testimony this week from a rival gang member and other inmates in a trial peppered with tales of violence and racial strife. … Attorneys on both sides are 'using and choosing from the best of the worst,' said Melissa Carr, an Anti-Defamation League special projects investigator monitoring the trial. … 'There were a couple instances where I caught jurors rolling their eyes and looking around for confirmation, like "Did I just hear that? Did he say what I thought he said?"' … The four defendants are alleged Aryan Brotherhood leaders implicated in many of the 32 murders and attempted murders detailed in the federal indictment against the white supremacist gang."

Michigan Doctor Indicted On Medicare Fraud Charges. The Detroit Free Press (6/24, Patton) reported, "A Dearborn-based physician was indicted Friday in federal court on 39 counts of fraud in health care and immigration. … According to the indictment," Dr. Ali S. Makki "ordered dozens of unnecessary diagnostic tests for new Medicare patients, including blood tests, x-rays and echocardiograms. He falsely certified giving medical examinations and vaccinations, such as tuberculosis skin tests, the indictment says." The Detroit News (6/24, Egan) notes Makki "is accused of defrauding the federal government of more than $500,000. … Agents arrested Makki at Detroit Metropolitan Airport when he returned on a flight from Lebanon by way of Paris."

Texas Executes "Railroad Killer" Linked To 15 Murders. The AP (6/28, Graczyk) reports, "The last ride for infamous train-hopping serial killer Angel Maturino Resendiz was in a Texas prison van, from death row to the death house." The AP continues, "Resendiz, 46, received lethal injection Tuesday evening for the fatal stabbing and beating of a Houston-area physician 7 1/2 years ago. He had roamed the country by jumping aboard freight trains and was linked to at least 15 indiscriminate murders near railroad tracks around the nation, earning him the nickname the 'Railroad Killer' and a spot on the FBI's Most Wanted list." The AP adds, "The Mexican drifter, speaking from the death chamber gurney, asked for forgiveness from God and from relatives of some of his victims watching through a glass a few feet away. He then was executed for the slaying of Claudia Benton, 39, at her West University Place home during a deadly spree in 1998 and 1999. … The punishment, the 13th this year in the nation's busiest death penalty state, was delayed for two hours while multiple appeals were considered by the U.S. Supreme Court."

The New York Times (6/28, Barnes) reports, "A jury sentenced Mr. Resendiz, 46, to death for the rape and murder in 1998 of Dr. Claudia Benton, a medical researcher, at her house in Houston. Investigators said forensic evidence and, in some cases, Mr. Resendiz's statements implicated him in two years of killings in California, Florida, Georgia, Illinois, Kentucky and Texas that ended in 1999, when his half-sister helped arrange his surrender. … Catching Mr. Resendiz was made more difficult, detectives said, by his 30 aliases and a nomadic style of life, in which he hopped freight trains. Many of his suspected victims were found near rail lines and buildings. … Defense lawyers insisted that Mr. Resendiz was a paranoid schizophrenic, unable before or after Dr. Benton's murder to know right from wrong. A succession of judges found that Mr. Resendiz met the Supreme Court standard of sanity."

Tennessee Executes Man For 1985 Murder. The AP (6/28, French) reports that Tennessee "carried out only its second execution in 45 years early Wednesday after a federal appeals court panel lifted a stay of execution granted by one of its own judges." The AP continues, "Sedley Alley's execution had been scheduled to take place within hours of another, but a federal judge issued a stay late Tuesday afternoon for the other condemned man. … Alley, 50, was pronounced dead at 3:12 a.m. EDT Wednesday. He had confessed to killing 19-year-old Marine Suzanne Collins in 1985 while she jogged near a Navy base north of Memphis." The AP adds, "Alley claimed at trial that he was not responsible for the murder because he had multiple personalities. But in 2004, he recanted his confession, argued he was innocent and said DNA testing could prove it. … Judge Gilbert S. Merritt on the 6th Circuit Court of Appeals had issued a stay for Alley after a last-minute appeal was delivered to his home in Nashville. … But his colleagues on the appeals court -- Chief Judge Danny J. Boggs and Judge James L. Ryan -- overruled the order. A third judge on the panel was unavailable to participate in the decision. … The judges suggested it was improper for a single judge to 'take under consideration a matter for which the district courts and the court of appeals are competent to consider.' … Gov. Phil Bredesen and the U.S. Supreme Court had already rejected all requests for a stay Tuesday." The AP notes, "Alley's stay came only hours after federal Judge Todd Campbell halted the scheduled execution of another inmate, Paul Dennis Reid. … Campbell's stay was to give time to determine whether Reid was mentally competent to drop his appeals of seven death sentences tied to a string of 1997 murders in the Clarksville area."

DOJ_NMG_0036861

High Court Asks DOJ For Brief In Oklahoma Death Row Appeal. The AP (6/28) reports, "The US Supreme Court is asking the Justice Department to file a brief in an appeal filed by an Oklahoma death row inmate." The AP continues, "Attorneys for Patrick Murphy are asking for a new trial on the grounds that Murphy and the victim are Indians, the crime took place on tribal land and the case should've been prosecuted in federal court instead of state court. … Murphy was convicted and sentenced to die for killing George Jacobs in 1999 in McIntosh County." The AP adds, "A state appeals court has rejected Murphy's appeal and now the Supreme Court is asking the US solicitor general for an opinion on whether a new trial is deserved."

Missouri Ordered To Halt All Executions. A federal judge has ordered a halt to all executions in the state of Missouri until the state changes its lethal injection procedures. The Los Angeles Times (6/28, Weinstein, 958K) reports that US District Judge Fernando J. Gaitan Jr. said in his ruling that the current system "creates an unnecessary risk that an inmate could be subjected to 'unconstitutional pain and suffering when the lethal-injection drugs are administered.' He gave corrections officials until July 15 to come up with new procedures."

Government, Companies Form Identity Fraud Research Center. The Wall Street Journal (6/28, Conkey, 2.11M) reports, "The Secret Service and Federal Bureau of Investigation today will join with International Business Machines Corp. and information-services firm LexisNexis" in announcing the formation of "the Center for Identity Management and Information Protection, or CIMIP, at Utica College in New York." It will "integrate various public and private efforts to study the national-security implications and other threats posed by identity fraud." According to Brian Nagel, deputy director of the Secret Service, "the agency's criminal division will share its case files with CIMIP so it can identify criminal patterns."

Judge Refuses To Release Hoffa Search Affidavit. The AP (6/28) reports, "A U.S. district judge refused to order the release of an affidavit the FBI used to get a search warrant to dig for Jimmy Hoffa's remains at a southeastern Michigan horse farm. … 'Granting public access to sensitive information in a sealed affidavit would not play a significant, positive role in the investigation,' Judge Marianne Battani wrote Monday in response to a request by the Detroit Free Press to release the document." The AP continues, "Battani said the affidavit included 'the details of a threat made to a witness' and other information that should not become public." The AP adds, "The FBI spent two weeks last month searching the Hidden Dreams Farm, 30 miles northwest of Detroit in Oakland County's Milford Township. Officials said they found no evidence of Hoffa's remains. … The former Teamsters union president was last seen July 30, 1975, the day he was supposed to meet a New Jersey Teamsters boss and a Detroit Mafia captain at a restaurant about 20 miles from the farm. Both of those men are now dead."

California Jury Finds Man Guilty Of Serial Murders. The Los Angeles Times (6/28, Reston) reports, "Serial killer Wayne Adam Ford was found guilty of four counts of first-degree murder today, making the former long-haul trucker eligible for the death penalty for the grisly slayings of four women across California. … A San Bernardino County jury delivered the verdict in the afternoon after deliberating for just over a week." The Times continues, "Ford, 44, walked into a Humboldt County sheriff's station in November 1998 with a woman's severed breast in a plastic bag in his pocket, and confessed to the sayings. … The Arcata trucker claimed the deaths were accidental, and had occurred during rough sex play. However, San Bernardino County Deputy Dist. Atty. J. David Mazurek told jurors that Ford preyed on young women to 'satisfy his sexually sadistic appetite', and 'got off' on their suffering when he tortured them." The Times adds, "Between 1997 and 1998, Ford allegedly picked up the women — prostitutes or hitchhikers — and bound, strangled, raped and, at times, beat them before dumping their bodies in waterways, Mazurek said. … The victims were found in Humboldt, Kern, San Joaquin and San Bernardino counties. Some of the bodies were dismembered. … Ford's attorney, Deputy Public Defender Joseph D. Canty, tried to convince the jury to find Ford guilty of a lesser charge — second-degree murder or manslaughter — that would have spared him from California's death row. … Canty said Ford realized that 'something was wrong with him,' and showed he was remorseful when he turned himself in. Canty argued that Ford, a retired U.S. Marine, was mired in depression, angry at his former wife — who he claimed was preventing him from seeing his young son — and struggling with other psychological problems, including borderline personality disorder."

WPost Columnist Skeptical Of Evidence In Duke Rape Case. In her column in the Washington Post (6/28, A25), Ruth Marcus writes, "At the start, I presumed they were guilty. The rape charges against three members of the Duke lacrosse team sounded like a plausible case of Jocks Gone Wild. It wasn't hard to imagine that a bunch of rowdy, hard-drinking players could have crossed the line from watching a paid dancer to sexually assaulting her. … But the more evidence that has emerged in the case, the more it appears that there is way more than reasonable doubt that the three accused committed rape." Marcus continues, "The paucity of physical evidence; the accuser's prior unsubstantiated rape charge; her changing stories that night; sloppy and unreliable identification procedures -- any of these alone, and certainly all of them together, make it hard to understand why the prosecution is going forward and impossible to imagine that it could win a conviction." Marcus adds, "Perhaps there are facts yet to emerge to support Durham County District Attorney Mike Nifong's continuing certitude that a rape occurred -- though the confluence of Nifong's political interests and the prosecution is itself another reason for discomfort. He brought the first charges just before a primary in which the black vote played a key role." Marcus concludes, "In an odd way, I hope Nifong's proved right, because the alternative -- that he began with a dubious case and stuck with it as it became shakier -- is so troubling. As it stands now, the case isn't expected to go to trial until spring 2007. That seems like an awfully long time to wait to find out."

DOJ_NMG_0036862

Coast Guard Cadet Acquitted Of Rape, Convicted Of Other Sex-Related Charges. The AP (6/28, Apuzzo) reports, "A Coast Guard Academy cadet was acquitted of rape charges but convicted on other sex-related charges in the institution's first-ever court-martial of a student." The AP continues, "Webster M. Smith was expected to ask the military jury for leniency at a sentencing hearing scheduled Wednesday. … Jurors on Tuesday deliberated eight hours before finding Smith, 23, of Houston, guilty of indecent assault, extortion, sodomy, failure to obey an order and absent without leave." The AP adds, "Smith, the first student in the school's 130-year history to be court-martialed, was stoic as the verdict was read, but wept afterward with his parents and lawyers by his side. … Smith faces up to 13 1/2 years in prison, but his attorney said he would argue for little or no jail time. … Prosecutors, who declined to comment after the verdict, said Smith was a predator who took advantage of women when they were vulnerable."

CIVIL LAW:

Indiana Settles E-Rate Fraud Claims With DOJ. The AP (6/28) reports that Indiana "has agreed to pay nearly $8.3 million to settle allegations that an agency violated federal rules by not seeking competitive bids on Internet services and charging inflated prices." The AP continues, "The U.S. Department of Justice and the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Southern District of Indiana announced the settlement in a news release Tuesday. … The settlement covers allegations that the Intelenet Commission, which has been disbanded, failed false claims to the Federal Communications Commission's E-rate program, which provided money for Internet technology in schools and libraries." The AP adds, "The federal government claimed the state charged inflated prices for services provided to Indiana schools and libraries, falsified invoices, disregarded the requirement that schools and libraries make co-payments for expenses and failed to seek competitive bids. … The state cooperated with the investigation, the Justice Department said. … 'The E-Rate Program makes federally mandated funds available to the poorest schools in the nation for Internet access and wiring,' Peter D. Keisler, Assistant Attorney General for the Civil Division, said in the release. 'False claims to this very important federal program will not be tolerated.'"

DOJ Seeks Dismissal Of Budget Lawsuit. The AP (6/28, Thomas) reports, "The Justice Department on Tuesday asked a federal judge to dismiss a lawsuit filed by House Democrats trying to stop a $39 billion deficit-reducing bill because the House and Senate failed to approve identical versions." The AP continues, "Lawyers for the government said the 11 House members lacked standing because they are not renters of medical equipment covered by the section of the bill or are in 'any way personally affected or injured' by other provisions in the measure." The AP adds, "House Democrats have accused GOP leaders of abusing the legislative process and contend they were denied their right to vote on legislation signed into law by President Bush. … Rep. John Conyers, D-Mich., the ranking member of the House Judiciary Committee and lead plaintiff, called the government's response 'legally tenuous.' … 'In terms of standing, there is no more fundamental right in Congress than the right to vote, yet the administration would not only take this right away, but prevent duly elected members from asserting that right after it is taken away,' he said. … The Senate version of the bill said Medicare can pay to rent some types of medical equipment for 13 months, as congressional negotiators had sought. A clerk erroneously wrote down 36 months before the bill was sent back to the House for a final vote, and the language was approved by the House on Feb. 1."

AT&T Settles Contracting Fraud Charges With DOJ For $2.9 Million. Bloomberg (6/28, Schmidt) reports, "A unit of AT&T, the largest U.S. phone company, agreed to pay $2.9 million to resolve allegations that it defrauded the federal government." Bloomberg continues, "The civil suit against AT&T Communications East, brought by a whistleblower and joined by the government, said the company defrauded the General Services Administration from 1998 to 2001 by passing on to government customers certain costs and fees in violation of its contract. … The U.S. Justice Department announced the settlement Tuesday in Washington." Bloomberg adds, "The charges, known as Presubscribed Interexchange Carrier Charges, are a fee that long-distance companies pay to local phone companies to recover part of the cost for linking customers to the telephone network."

DOJ_NMG_0036863

US Scrutinizing Drug Industry Gifts To Charities Tied To Doctors. The New York Times (6/28, Abelson) reports, "Around the country, doctors in private practice have set up tax-exempt charities into which drug companies and medical device makers are, with little fanfare, pouring donations — money that adds up to millions of dollars a year. And some medical experts see that as a big problem. … The charities are typically set up to engage in medical research or education, and the doctors involved defend those efforts as legitimate charitable activities that benefit the public. But because they operate mainly under the radar, the tax-exempt organizations represent what some other doctors, as well as regulators and industry consultants, say is a growing conduit for industry money. The payments, they say, can bias the treatment decisions of physicians, may lead to suspect research findings and at times may even risk running afoul of anti-kickback laws." The Times adds, "Federal officials are starting to take notice of such tax-exempt charities, which critics say are becoming increasingly popular as other forms of industry support to physicians — like lucrative consulting agreements that involve little actual work — have come under scrutiny from regulators and others worried about the potential conflicts." The Times notes, "The Midwest Heart Foundation, which has received millions of dollars from medical industry donors, including the drug makers Amgen and AstraZeneca, and the Cordis and Scios units of Johnson & Johnson, says it stands behind its charitable work, which currently involves about 30 studies and dozens of doctor-education lectures each year. … Dr. Mark Goodwin, a managing partner for the Midwest Heart for-profit practice, said the foundation was created to help prevent potential conflicts by keeping the industry money separate from the doctors' private practice. Companies contribute to the foundation, he said, because they can rely on its research and the doctors involved can enroll large numbers of patients in studies. … But some of its research has drawn criticism from federal regulators. Earlier this year, moreover, the foundation received a Justice Department subpoena as part of an investigation into the marketing activities of one of its big contributors, Scios."

FEC Accused Of Seeking To Intimidate Major 527 Contributors. The Hill (6/28, Bolton) reports the Federal Election Commission (FEC) "is being accused of attempting to intimidate soft-money donors to 527s by targeting the donors for questioning." The FEC is "targeting some of the wealthiest Republican and Democratic donors. Typically such people have escaped tough scrutiny unless suspected of deliberately evading contribution limits through the use of straw donors or other tactics. But recently the FEC appears to have aimed at donors even though it is the 527s that are suspected of evading campaign-finance law." A prominent GOP strategist "has charged that the new tactic is intended to scare big donors away from giving to 527s, which Congress and the White House have struggled to curb."

LATimes Praises Supreme Court Ruling On Vermont Campaign Contribution Limits. An editorial in the Los Angeles Times (6/28, 958K) says the Supreme Court's ruling on Vermont's campaign finance law "has sent a welcome signal that it will continue to scrutinize well-intentioned efforts to limit the role of money in politics with at least one eye on the 1st Amendment." The ruling that the state "went too far when it imposed strict limits on what candidates for public office could spend and on what citizens could donate to political campaigns," suggests that the 1976 Buckley vs. Valeo decision "is still good law." Buckley's "distinction between expenditures and contributions is still the law of the land. That's good news for both clean elections and free speech."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

DOJ Reaches Agreement With Indiana Over Purging Of Voter Rolls. The AP (6/28) reports, "The Justice Department agreed Tuesday to an Indiana plan designed to eliminate the names of people who have died and those who are listed more than once from the state's voter registration rolls." The AP continues, "Indiana Secretary of State Todd Rokita last week announced the plan to purge the rolls, following negotiations between state Republicans and Democrats. It would also target convicted felons and voters who no longer live in Indiana or in the county of their registration." Letters "letters will be sent to every registered voter in the state. Any that cannot be delivered will be flagged as potential mistakes, and the state will then send follow-up mailers to those addresses. … If any of those are also returned, the voters would be placed on inactive status." The AP notes, "Inactive voters could still cast ballots this year, but their files would be flagged. If they did not vote in the 2006, 2007 or 2008 elections, their names could be removed by the end of 2008. … The agreement, designed to bring Indiana into compliance with the National Voter Registration Act, followed a Justice Department investigation that found the state had hundreds of thousands of ineligible voters on its registration lists, including possibly 29,000 who were deceased, and 290,000 duplicates."

DOJ_NMG_0036864

DOJ Probes Bias Allegations In Ohio Village's Police Firings. The Cleveland Plain Dealer (6/28, Flournoy) reports, "The U.S. Justice Department has launched an investigation of (Woodmere, OH) village officials for suspending a police chief and refusing to reinstate two police officers who contend they were fired because they are white." The Plain Dealer continues, "Mayor Yolanda Broadie and Law Director Janet Beck acknowledged the investigation Tuesday, but provided no details. Justice Department officials were not available for comment. … The investigation comes a year after the U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission ruled that the village violated the civil rights of Chief Lamont Lockhart and officers Amy Mengay and Timothy Ellis." The Plain Dealer adds, "Mengay and Ellis told the EEOC that Broadie, who is black, unfairly fired them and allowed black officers with similar or more serious infractions to keep their jobs. … Broadie later suspended Lockhart for what she called 'failure to properly lead and supervise the Police Department.' Lockhart in turn filed his own complaint with the EEOC, which found that the suspension was retaliation for his support of the two officers. Lockhart has since resigned. … The commission ordered the village to attempt a settlement, reinstate the officers and give them back pay. But village officials refused. So, the commission referred the case to the U.S. Justice Department. … Avery Friedman, who represents Ellis, Lockhart and Mengay, said federal attorneys interviewed village officials and gathered public records this week."

Shreveport To Improve Public Building Access In Agreement With DOJ. KTBS-TV, ABC 3, Shreveport, LA (6/28, Roberts) reports, "The city of Shreveport could have to spend up to $4 million over the next three years to bring all city buildings into compliance with the Americans with Disabilities Act." KTBS-TV continues, "Mayor Keith Hightower this afternoon offered a proposed agreement with the U.S. Justice Department to make the upgrades. It would need City Council approval. … A Justice Department task force came to town, looked at public buildings and made hundreds of 'suggested' improvements." KTBS-TV adds, "One building that needs work, the government said, is the old City Hall Annex. It was built in the 1950s and hasn't been modified much since then. Another is the old Civic Theater and the Municipal Auditorium, circa 1920 -- both built before the ADA was passed. … But Ebarb said some of the government's recommendations don't make sense. … 'They wanted to renovate the Elvis Presley bathroom (at Municipal Auditorium),' he said. 'They wanted to make the shower (handicapped) accessible. Nobody even uses the shower.' … Hightower said Washington is a lot like city hall: You can't fight it. … 'When the Justice Department comes and says you must do these things, sooner or later you've got to get them done,' he said."

Grassley To Proposes IRS Pursuit Of Sex Traffickers. USA Today (6/28) reports, "Pimps and sex traffickers could soon find themselves being chased by tax collectors, not just the vice squad." USA continues, "Sen. Charles Grassley, chairman of the tax-writing Senate Finance Committee, wants the Internal Revenue Service to chase after pimps and sex traffickers with the same fervor it stalked gangster Al Capone for tax evasion. … Grassley, R-Iowa, would hit pimps with fines and lengthy prison sentences for failing to file employment forms and withhold taxes for the women and girls under their command." USA adds, "The proposal would make certain tax crimes a felony when the money comes from a criminal activity. A one-year prison sentence and $25,000 fine would become a 10-year sentence and $50,000 fine for each employment form that a pimp or sex trafficker fails to file. … Grassley planned to propose the penalties when his panel meets Wednesday." USA notes, "The IRS work is intended to build on efforts underway to curb worldwide trafficking. The Justice Department, collaborating with U.S. attorneys offices nationwide, would identify pimps and sex traffickers and refer them to the IRS."

Senate GOP Conservatives Opposing Leadership On Voting Rights Act. The Hill (6/28, Allen) reports the reauthorization of the Voting Rights Act "is running into some of the same objections in the Senate that it faces in the House, where the bill was pulled from the floor schedule last week after rank-and-file Republicans rebelled against their leadership." Southern Senate conservatives are "raising concerns about reauthorizing Section 5 of the law, which requires jurisdictions with a history of racial discrimination to pre-clear voting-law changes with the Justice Department. Some Southerners argue that the requirement is unnecessarily onerous and that their states should not be singled out in perpetuity." Sen. Trent Lott said, "Our part of the country, no matter how good we do, we're going to be treated differently than the rest of the country."

House GOP Rank-And-File Say Leaders Not Addressing Voting Rights Act Concerns. Roll Call (6/28, Yachnin) reports even while Republican House leaders "work to quell internal divides that derailed consideration of the Voting Rights Act last week, some rank-and-file Members complained Tuesday that they remain shut out of discussions regarding the law's reauthorization." House Majority Leader John Boehner said, "We are continuing to have conversations with Members, and [with] lawyers, about some provisions in the bill; and those conversations will continue this week." Roll Call adds that nonetheless, "several rank-and-file Republicans said House leaders remain unwilling to discuss any aspect of reauthorization of the landmark 1965 law." Rep. Steve King "asserted that his efforts to meet with GOP leadership in recent days have yet to elicit any response." King, who is "seeking consideration of an amendment that would end mandates under the VRA that require jurisdictions to provide multilingual ballots to voters," said, "It's not due to lack of effort on my part." Roll Call adds the "exclusion of King's proposal, as well as a half-dozen other amendments targeting language provisions in the law, from consideration on the House floor sparked an internal revolt that prompted leaders to pull the measure from last Wednesday's schedule."

DOJ_NMG_0036865

Rule Maneuver Prevents House From Taking Up Voting Rights Act This Week. CQ (6/27, Duggan) reports in case "there was any doubt, legislation to reauthorize the Voting Rights Act will not be making any surprise appearances on the House floor this week." The rule (H Res 890) "for the Commerce-Justice-Science spending bill, adopted 224-188 on Tuesday, included a provision that tabled a rule reported June 20 for legislation (HR 9) to reauthorize the Voting Rights Act (PL 89-110). " After that rule (H Res 878) "had been reported by the Rules Committee, House Republican leaders postponed consideration of the underlying bill to address concerns raised by a group of Southern lawmakers."

Osceola County, FL, To Challenge DOJ Voting Rights Suit. The Orlando Sentinel (6/28) reports, "A day after a federal judge put county commission elections on hold, Osceola County said it will not settle a case filed by the Justice Department over Hispanic voting rights. … 'The county intends to proceed with the defense of this case. As publicly elected officials, the board must uphold and defend the last expression of the voters in 1996 -- that every precinct voted to return to at-large elections,' read Vincent Fontana, the county's attorney, this afternoon. 'Also the 2003-2004 charter review advisory commission -- that reflected the entire ethnic makeup of the county -- voted not to recommend that the board put the issue on the ballot again.'" The Sentinel adds, "Commissioners met with Fontana for about an hour and a half to review Judge Gregory A. Prensell's order stopping this fall's elections. … 'It is important for the citizens to have direct political access to all public officials who have the power to tax their homes and property. This is among the many rights and freedoms for which our armed forces continue to fight,' Fontana concluded."

Single Manipulator Said Able To Change E-Voting Election Outcome. The Washington Post (6/28, A7, Goldfarb, 744K) reports that to "determine what it would take to hack a U.S. election, a team of cybersecurity experts turned to a fictional battleground state called Pennasota and a fictional gubernatorial race between Tom Jefferson and Johnny Adams. It's the year 2007, and the state uses electronic voting machines." The experts "concluded in a report issued yesterday that it would take only one person, with a sophisticated technical knowledge and timely access to the software that runs the voting machines, to change the outcome." The report "concluded that the three major electronic voting systems in use have significant security and reliability vulnerabilities. But it added that most of these vulnerabilities can be overcome by auditing printed voting records to spot irregularities. And while 26 states require paper records of votes, fewer than half of those require regular audits."

8th Circuit Upholds Continued Federal Monitoring Of Little Rock Schools. The AP (6/28, Trister) reports, "A federal appeals court on Monday upheld a decision keeping the Little Rock School District under federal desegregation monitoring, which has been in effect since 1965." The AP continues, "A three-member panel of the 8th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals at St. Louis agreed with a 2004 ruling by U.S. District William R. Wilson in the long-running desegregation case involving the Little Rock district, the North Little Rock District and the Pulaski County Special School District." The AP adds, "Wilson had ruled that the Little Rock district did not successfully evaluate its academic programs for how well they helped black students. Otherwise, the district would have been released from the remaining desegregation monitoring it has faced since 1965. … The district had been released in 2002 from all aspects of its monitoring except those relating to program evaluations. … In his opinion, Wilson said the district would remain under court order through the 2005-06 school year. Wilson said the district must hire outside experts and design a program assessment process."

Flag Amendment Falls One Vote Short In Senate. The CBS Evening News (6/27, story 6, 0:20, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "Voting tonight, the US Senate rejected a constitutional amendment to ban burning the American flag, but it was a near thing. The vote was just one vote short of the required two-thirds majority." Bloomberg (6/28, Rowley) notes Senate Democratic leader "Harry Reid of Nevada and 13 other Democrats voted in favor of the proposed amendment. Kentucky Senator Mitch McConnell, the deputy Republican leader, voted against the amendment."

The New York Times (6/28, Hulse, 1.19M) reports, "Eleven senators facing re-election this year opposed the amendment and several are facing potentially difficult races, including Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island, a Republican, and the Democrats Daniel K. Akaka of Hawaii, Robert C. Byrd of West Virginia, Maria Cantwell of Washington and Joseph I. Lieberman of Connecticut."

DOJ_NMG_0036866

The Wall Street Journal (6/28, Lueck, 2.11M) reports Daniel Wheeler, the president of the Citizens Flag Alliance, "a coalition led by the American Legion that has been lobbying hard to win Senate passage, said he was disappointed by the vote." The Journal adds, "Underscoring the politics behind the measure, Mr. Wheeler said his group will work to publicize the votes of amendment opponents. The coalition plans to highlight the 'no' votes of Democratic Sens. Kent Conrad and Byron Dorgan, both of North Dakota, as well as Maria Cantwell of Washington, among others." Wheeler said McConnell "also would be a target."

The vote is generally being cast as an attempt by Republicans to rally their base with an eye on the fall elections. ABC World News Tonight (6/27, story 3, 2:35, Stephanopoulos, 8.78M) reported, "Republicans hope this vote on top of last month's debate on gay marriage, will rally conservatives come November. Democrats called that raw politics." Sen. Frank Lautenberg: "There he is, Kid Rock. With his head through the flag. Is that a desecration? It was such a desecration that he was invited to address the Republican convention. What is going on here?" Stephanopoulos: "Democrats did try to pass their own bill that would make it a crime to harm the flag without changing the Constitution. But that was also defeated."

NBC Nightly News (6/27, story 4, 2:05, Reid, 9.87M) reported, "The real reason this amendment is being debated, critics said, is to rally the conservative Republican base for the November elections. … And the fact that this amendment was defeated today does not mean this debate is over. Rest assured, it will be part of the Republican offensive on the campaign trail from now through November."

The Los Angeles Times (6/28, Neuman, Fiore, 958K) reports the vote "capped two days of debate, during which opponents charged that the push for an amendment was driven more by politics than patriotism. They argued that the main aim of Republican sponsors was to rally conservatives in an election year even if that meant trampling on the Constitution to do it."

The Washington Post (6/28, A1, Babington, 744K) reports, "In 2000, the Senate fell four votes short, and supporters had hoped the GOP's 55 to 44 majority -- there is one independent, James M. Jeffords (Vt.) -- would put them over the top this year."

The AP (6/28, Kellman) reports, "Among possible presidential contenders in 2008, six voted yes: Democrat Evan Bayh of Indiana and Republicans George Allen of Virginia, Sam Brownback of Kansas, Frist, Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, and John McCain of Arizona. Five, all Democrats, voted no: Joseph Biden of Delaware, Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, Christopher Dodd of Connecticut, Russell Feingold of Wisconsin, John Kerry of Massachusetts."

The Hill (6/28, Allen) reports that "even some who supported the amendment suggested it was not the most pressing business before the Senate. 'It's not a burning issue in the grand scheme of things,' said Sen. Gordon Smith (R-Ore.)." In a similar story, Dana Milbank writes in the Washington Post (6/28, A2, 744K), "As the Senate's flag-desecration debate heated up yesterday and the sparks began to fly -- but before the smoke cleared -- the amendment's backers were asked a burning question: Is this the most important issue facing the nation? The senators rushed to extinguish the very thought. 'I don't think anybody would say it's the most important,' said Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.). 'No, no, not even close,' said Sen. John Ensign (R-Nev.), who, like Lott and 57 other senators, nevertheless signed on as a co-sponsor of the amendment. … So why is the Senate, which came within one vote of approving the amendment yesterday, giving the matter such prominence?"

The AFP (6/28) notes the measure voted on Tuesday read, "The Congress shall have the power to prohibit the physical desecration of the flag of the United States." The Washington Times (6/28, Bellantoni, 90K) reports, "Opponents of the amendment also argued that the concept of 'desecration' was vague. They showed images of Mr. Bush using a marker to autograph a US flag and of musician Kid Rock wearing a shirt made out of the flag."

Fox News' Special Report (6/27, (Garrett) reported, "Supporters, including many veterans groups say burning or desecrating the flag isn't free speech, but a grotesque affront to those who fought and died for it. … Other veterans say they fought to protect the constitution and the free speech rights it guarantees, rights the flag amendment, they say, would diminish."

USA Today (6/28, Stone, 2.31M) reports "Sen. Orrin Hatch and other supporters vowed to try again next year, after a new Congress is elected in November. Since 1990, the measure has failed five times in the Senate to get the two-thirds vote needed to move to the states for ratification." The House of Representatives "has approved the amendment seven times, most recently last year."

Democratic Measure Fails 64-36. The New York Times (6/28, Kornblut, 1.19M) reports, "Perhaps even more than her stance on the war in Iraq, it is Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton's position on flag desecration that has drawn the scorn of the liberal Democratic base. When Mrs. Clinton took a stand on the matter last year -- co-sponsoring legislation that would have criminalized the desecration of the American flag even as she opposed a constitutional amendment that sought to achieve the same end -- she was pilloried from the left. … On Tuesday, Mrs. Clinton played a leading role in the flag-burning debate once again, co-sponsoring a measure similar to her previous one as an alternative to the constitutional amendment that was about to come up for a vote in the Senate." The measure "failed, 64 to 36, minutes before the proposed amendment fell short of the 67 votes it needed." The Times adds, "With more than half of Democrats supporting the measure, the outcome suggested that Mrs. Clinton's approach had plenty of adherents within her party, and that while she might have tried the patience of her core liberal supporters, she remained within the Democratic fold as she prepared for a possible presidential race."

DOJ_NMG_0036867

LATimes Assails Schwarzenegger Prison Reform Proposals. An editorial in the Los Angeles Times (6/28, 958K) says, "Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's collapse on prison reform is one of the most disappointing failures of his tenure. … The extent of his retreat in the face of opposition from the guards union is evident in his new four-part plan for the prisons. … Though ostensibly aimed at overcrowding, it doesn't even propose genuine solutions to that problem, such as reforms in sentencing laws and a major boost in rehabilitation programs. If the Legislature, which met in special session Tuesday night to discuss the governor's proposals, wants to set things right, a radical shift in approach is required."

WPost Lauds Supreme Court On Workplace Discrimination Decision. The Washington Post (6/28, A24, 744K) editorializes that the Supreme Court resolved the issue of workplace discrimination complaints "last week in a decision that was remarkable for both its real-world sensibility and its unanimity." It "found that illegal retaliation can take place on or off the job and that it applies to situations in which the employer's actions are 'harmful to the point that they could well dissuade a reasonable worker from making or supporting a charge of discrimination,'" forming "a sensible middle ground between extremes that had been adopted by some of the federal appeals courts." From "a court sometimes characterized by ivory-tower jurisprudence, this ruling was a welcome instance of common-sense judging."

ANTITRUST:

Mississippi PSC Considers BellSouth-AT&T Merger. The AP (6/28, Mohr) reports, "A proposed merger between AT&T and BellSouth Corp. has no provisions that would immediately cut jobs in Mississippi, but some opponents fear smaller competitors here could suffer if they are not protected." The AP continues, "The $67 billion plan met opposition during a hearing before the Mississippi Public Service Commission on Tuesday from a workers' union and telecommunication companies that are concerned the massive acquisition could lead to monopolization of the market." The AP adds, "The Mississippi commission, the Justice Department, the Federal Communications Commission and several other states would have to sign off on the deal, which was announced in March. … Those testifying on behalf of the two companies on Tuesday played down the competition between AT&T and BellSouth, saying the companies target different customers. However, in a February filing with the Security and Exchange Commission, BellSouth said one of its most significant local competitors is AT&T Corp."

McClatchy Closes Knight Ridder Deal. The AP (6/28, Sutel) reports, "McClatchy Co. said Tuesday it had completed its acquisition of Knight Ridder Inc., making it the second-largest newspaper publisher in the country in terms of circulation." The AP continues, "The news came a day after Knight Ridder shareholders overwhelmingly approved the transaction in an emotional shareholders meeting in San Jose, Calif., where the company was based." The AP adds, "The company has received notice of regulatory approval for the deal on the condition that it completes its previously announced sale of the St. Paul Pioneer Press. McClatchy already owns the Star Tribune in neighboring Minneapolis, and owning both would have raised antitrust concerns. … McClatchy also announced Tuesday that it had completed the previously announced sales of four Knight Ridder newspapers: the Duluth News Tribune in Minnesota; the Grand Forks Herald in North Dakota; the Aberdeen American News in South Dakota; and the Ft. Wayne News-Sentinel in Indiana and a 75 percent interest in the Fort Wayne Joint Operating Agency." The AP notes, "In all, McClatchy has reached deals to sell 12 of Knight Ridder's 32 papers, which it has said previously it wanted to sell largely because they did not fit McClatchy's criteria of being located in rapidly growing markets."

MarketWatch (6/28, Wilkerson) reports, "The close came as expected after a legal formality in which McClatchy said it signed an agreement sought by the U.S. Department of Justice to sell the St. Paul, Minn., Pioneer Press, one of the 32 papers it bought from Knight Ridder. … The department's antitrust division earlier in the day filed a U.S. District Court suit and a proposed consent decree allowing the deal to go forward if McClatchy agreed to sell the Pioneer Press."

Attorneys Doubt Foundation For DOJ Position On Employees' Statements. In an op-ed in the New York Law Journal (6/28), Howard E. Heiss, partner and Mark A. Racanelli, counsel, with O'Melveny & Myers (both are former federal prosecutors in the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of New York) write, "In a recent criminal case, the antitrust division of the Department of Justice took the position -- and a federal court agreed -- that statements employees make during proffer sessions with the government can be used against their employer at trial, even though the company was not a party to the proffer agreement and was represented by separate counsel. … The government argued that it was permitted to use employees' statements in this way because they are vicarious admissions by the company itself. As far as the government and the court were concerned in that case, the only facts that mattered were that the employee worked at the company at the time of the proffer and made statements about things he did as part of his job." Heiss and Racanelli continue, "Whether an aberration or a sign of new thinking at the Justice Department, the case is a cautionary tale for defense lawyers representing companies whose employees have spoken to the government. … But the case also appears to rest on shaky legal ground. It is one thing to say that an employee speaks for the company when talking to coworkers, competitors or investors in a job-related setting. It is something else entirely when employees make statements in a prosecutor's office in an effort to avoid or deflect criminal liability for their business conduct, and when their interests might conflict with those of the company."

DOJ_NMG_0036868

Antitrust Commission Proposal Would Reduce Firms' Civil Damage Liability. Bloomberg News (6/28, Rowley) reports, "A congressionally created commission is considering a proposal to let U.S. judges reduce the billions of dollars in civil damages that companies such as Microsoft Corp. would have to pay victims for thwarting competition." Bloomberg continues, "In some cases, violators would be spared triple damages and only forced to reimburse consumers for actual financial losses." Bloomberg adds, "A companion proposal would give the government a two-thirds share of triple damages and consumers the rest in criminal price-fixing conspiracies such as the government's prosecution of a global vitamin cartel led by Roche Holding AG and BASF AG. … The proposals are the latest effort to rein in suits against corporations and, if approved by the commission and sent to Congress, are sure to stir opposition. … Richard Grossman, a San Francisco lawyer who sued Microsoft on behalf of consumers, says it is vital to retain the threat of triple damages." Bloomberg notes, "The 12-member federal commission was created at the prodding of Rep. James Sensenbrenner, 63, a Wisconsin Republican who heads the House Judiciary Committee. The commission has asked for public comment on its proposals by July 10 and is due to send a package of recommendations to Congress by April."

Investment Consortium Buys Univision For $12.3 Billion. The Wall Street Journal (6/28, Jordan, Berman, Lyons) reports, "The chaotic auction of Spanish-language broadcaster Univision Communications Inc. has resulted in an equally tumultuous outcome." The Journal continues, "Univision yesterday confirmed its planned sale to a consortium of private-equity investors who will pay $12.3 billion and assume $1.4 billion in debt. But in doing so, Los Angeles-based Univision appears to have further rankled an important business partner it had already been feuding with: Mexico's Grupo Televisa SA, the company that provides much of the popular programming that has made Univision the dominant Spanish-language TV network in the U.S." The Journal adds, "Televisa, which already owns 11% of Univision, led a group that made a competing bid for Univision. For weeks, it was expected to win the deal, fulfilling Televisa Chief Executive Emilio Azcarraga Jean's dream of controlling the U.S. media asset. After losing the deal early yesterday, people close to Televisa complained bitterly that Univision and its controlling shareholder -- billionaire A. Jerrold Perenchio -- had ignored its bid, failing to discuss it even though the bid was very close in value to the winning offer."

The Financial Times (6/28, Politi) reports, "The deal capped a five-month auction for Univision and was seen as a sign of the growth of the Hispanic media market in the US. … However, many of the biggest US media groups – such as Walt Disney and CBS – failed to play meaningful roles in the auction, leaving Mexico's Televisa and a handful of buy-out firms to battle it out in the final bidding." The Times adds, "The deal involves Texas Pacific Group, Thomas H. Lee Partners, Providence Equity Partners, Madison Dearborn Partners and Saban Capital paying $36.25 a share."

The Washington Post (6/28, D4, Veiga) reports, "Grupo Televisa SA, a Mexican broadcaster that had led a rival consortium of investors, said it was disappointed with the outcome of the Univision auction. … Univision's bylaws allow Grupo Televisa, which owns an 11 percent stake in Univision and supplies it with much of its programming, to veto a sale of the company, but that could be defeated by a 60 percent approval from Univision shareholders." The Post adds, "The deal, if approved by Univision shareholders and regulators, is expected to close in the fourth quarter of this year or first quarter of 2007, according to a news release on the sale."

USA Today (6/28, Lieberman, Petrecca) reports that, "the deal left a sour taste with rival bidder Mexico-based Grupo Televisa, which supplies most of Univision's prime-time programming and holds an 11.4% stake. … 'Notwithstanding our repeated offers to discuss all aspects of our proposal, including price, Univision and its advisers refused to enter into any discussions with us after we submitted our initial bid,' the company said in a statement. It said it will 'vigorously pursue' ways "to build its potential in the growing U.S. Hispanic marketplace." … It's unclear what options Televisa has. Federal law bars foreign companies from owning more than a 25% stake in TV stations. To have big U.S. impact, Televisa 'can't be on cable, since many Hispanic Americans don't have cable,' says Sanders Morris Harris analyst David Miller. What's more, Univision has a long-term deal that enables it to cherry-pick Televisa's programming."

DOJ_NMG_0036869

Judge Clears Adelphia Assets Sale. The Wall Street Journal/AP (6/28) reports, "A bankruptcy judge granted permission to Adelphia Communications Corp. to sell its assets to Time Warner Inc. and Comcast Corp. in deal estimated to net about $17 billion." The AP continues, "Judge Robert Gerber of the Southern District of New York said he would approve an order to be submitted later Tuesday that would detach the asset sale from the rest of the company's bankruptcy process. Adelphia sought the separation to bypass creditor disputes that have slowed the company in its filing of a final reorganization plan." The AP adds, "The sale agreement with Time Warner and Comcast had been put in jeopardy because of a July 31 deadline at which the buyers could end their offer. Once complete, it would secure their status as the two biggest cable operators in the nation. … Adelphia remains in bankruptcy protection and last week filed an amended version of its restructuring plan. The company, the country's fifth-largest cable operator, filed for bankruptcy protection four years ago, on June 25, 2002."

Citizens Banking Buys Rival Republic Bancorp. The Wall Street Journal (6/28) reports, "Citizens Banking Corp. agreed to buy Republic Bancorp Inc. for about $1.05 billion in cash and stock to form a Midwestern regional bank called Citizens Republic Bancorp." The Journal continues, "The combined bank would be the 45th-largest headquartered in the U.S., with assets of $13.9 billion and $8.6 billion in deposits, the two Michigan banks said." The Journal adds, "The terms value Republic, based in Owosso, Mich., at $13.86 a share. Shareholders will receive the equivalent of 0.4378 of a Citizens share plus $2.08 in cash for each of their shares. Of the purchase price, 85% will be paid in stock."

Mittal-Arcelor Deal Marks Changes To Steel Industry. In an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (6/28), Peter M. Fish, chairman and managing director of MEPS (International) Ltd., writes, "It finally looks as though Mittal Steel will win its bid for Arcelor. Shareholders still have to reject, this Friday, the merger with Russian steelmaker Severstal that Arcelor management tabled when trying to elude Mittal's grasp -- and then approve the new tie-up with Mittal. So anything can happen. But it's been clear for some time now that something, in the way of consolidation, was due to happen, and not only at the top of this industry." Fish continues, "Assuming the Arcelor-Mittal marriage goes through, it will have far-reaching consequences for the global steel industry. The new company would produce approximately 10% of world-wide output. Its nearest rival would be Nippon Steel, with less than 3% of the market. To gauge the importance of the deal, consider that the nine biggest steelmakers after Arcelor-Mittal would account for just above 20% of the world's supply. The new company is slated to be a giant with production well in excess of 100 million tons per annum -- almost equivalent to the combined U.S. and Canadian output. It will have 60 plants in 27 countries." Fish adds, "It is clear that the global steel industry will remain fragmented even after the Mittal-Arcelor merger goes through. More consolidation is inevitable. Other steelmakers will be frantically looking for partners to counter the new grouping. Moreover, the merged entity will probably maintain its passion for acquisitions. … Consolidation in the future will be more internationally focused. Outside of Arcelor and Mittal, most steelmakers have sought to acquire other firms in their domestic or regional markets. Significant rationalization of the U.S. sector has already taken place -- mainly by Nucor and U.S. Steel. More could follow if Mittal is required to sell off some of its U.S. assets to satisfy antitrust authorities after the new deal." Fish concludes, "Even with consolidation, cheap steel is a thing of the past. Raw material costs are unlikely to drop significantly in the near term. Energy costs are expected to remain high. Demand from the developing nations of the world will, almost certainly, continue to rise. But higher input costs have not damaged the steel companies. The industry is more profitable now than ever. The limited consolidation so far has been beneficial. Further rationalization can only help."

EU May Fine Microsoft Up To $577 Million. The IDG News Service (6/28, Meller) reports, "The European Commission is about to propose a new fine of up to €460 million ($577 million) against Microsoft for failing to honor the antitrust ruling imposed on the company in 2004, according to people close to the case Tuesday." IDG continues, "The Commission ruled two years ago that Microsoft was abusing its dominant position in the market by denying competitors access to documentation about its Windows operating system." IDG adds, "The imminent threat of a fine comes as Microsoft continues to submit new information to the regulator, with the aim of complying with the ruling. The final instalment of documentation is due on July 18 -- a deadline Microsoft said it agreed with the monitoring trustee in charge of overseeing Microsoft's compliance with the ruling, Neil Barrett. … On Monday the Commission, Europe's top antitrust regulator, will propose a new negative ruling and a new fine against Microsoft to national competition regulators from the 25 countries in the European Union, the people close to the case said. … A final decision could be taken by the Commission as soon as July 12, if the national regulators support the Commission's draft ruling."

DOJ_NMG_0036870

EU To Boost Antitrust Fines. The Financial Times (6/28, Buck) reports, "A huge increase in fines for companies that operate cartels or break European Union competition law will be announced on Wednesday by the European Commission." The Times continues, "Brussels has already imposed some of the toughest fines in recent history, including a record €497m ($626m, £350m) penalty against Microsoft in 2004 and one of €462m against Roche in 2001. Over the past few months the Brussels regulator has again ratcheted up the fines, especially in cartel cases. … Officials believe that only higher fines will deter companies from operating price-fixing cartels or abusing dominant market positions." The Times adds, "They are particularly keen to increase the fines for repeat offenders and large groups with significant financial fire-power. … The new guidelines, which have been seen by the Financial Times, reflect the Commission's belief that the rules are too rigid and lack transparency – a view shared by many competition lawyers and most companies targeted by the Brussels trust-busters. … The new regime will apply to all companies found guilty of participating in a cartel or that abuse their dominant market position. It will almost certainly mean that more companies will be fined the maximum amount allowed under EU law, which is 10 per cent of global annual turnover. Up to now, only a handful of companies have been punished that severely. … The new regime will be especially tough on repeat offenders. At present, fines are usually raised by 50 per cent for companies that have previous convictions for antitrust abuses. Now the Commission can double the punishment in cases where there is one earlier ruling against the group, and may go even higher for 'multi-recidivists'."

The Wall Street Journal (6/28, Jacoby, Cohen) reports, "The changes to the 1998 guidelines will be most relevant to price-fixing cases because such investigations most often lead to fines, according to two European Commission officials. They can also be used to increase financial penalties for companies found to have illegally used monopoly power to elbow rivals out of a market." The Journal adds, "If the new guidelines had been in effect in 2004, one official said, a €497 million ($625.3 million) fine to Microsoft Corp. would have been much larger. Microsoft was fined for using its dominant Windows computer-operating system to shut out competition in related software markets. Although the Microsoft fine was the largest ever leveled by the commission, it was much less than the $3 billion that the Redmond, Wash., company paid to various rivals to settle antitrust lawsuits against it in the U.S. EU officials see that disparity as evidence that their fine wasn't big enough to have a deterrent effect. … In separate deliberations, antitrust authorities from the EU's 25 member states will meet in Brussels Monday and again July 10 to review EU Antitrust Commissioner Neelie Kroes's proposal to impose additional fines on Microsoft. Ms. Kroes has concluded that Microsoft hasn't moved quickly enough to comply with the commission's 2004 orders to change its business practices, people familiar with the case said."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Grass Roots, Lobbyists Driving Effort To Revamp Energy Policy. The Christian Science Monitor (6/28, Knickerbocker, 61K) reports that the "real push for revamping energy policy" is "coming from the grass-roots and lobbyists. Citizen groups and special interests are pushing for solutions as fuel prices remain high and turmoil continues in oil-rich parts of the world. … In all, 477 energy-related bills have been introduced in this Congress, according to a New York Times report. … In the states, some governors are coming up with their own plans, banding together to promote more energy conservation and efficiency than the federal government requires. In the West especially, governors of both parties are pushing wind energy."

Pombo Makes Case For DOER Act. Rep. Richard W. Pombo, Chairman of the House Resources Committee, writes in the Washington Times (6/28, 90K), "When the House of Representatives votes tomorrow on the bipartisan Domestic Ocean Energy Resources (DOER) Act, it will be considering one of the nation's most meaningful energy-policy reforms in history. … The DOER Act represents a balanced, commonsense compromise to deliver desperately needed energy supplies to the American people, which in turn will lower prices for consumer wallets and create hundreds of thousands of family-wage jobs."

WPost Says Ban On Coastal Drilling Should Be Revisited. An editorial in the Washington Post (6/28, A24, 744K) says it is time to revisit the policy of banning oil and gas drilling in most US coastal waters. The House of Representatives "is about to vote on this question, probably tomorrow. … Unfortunately, the House legislation is flawed. It diverts billions of dollars' worth of oil and gas royalties from the federal government to the states, even though the waters from which the resources will come are federal. … We hope the bill passes tomorrow, but we also hope this flaw is fixed before it becomes law."

Domenici Offers Proposal On Nuclear Waste Storage. In a $30.7 billion spending bill that advanced out of his Appropriations subcommittee Tuesday, Sen. Pete Domenici has included a provision that would have the government store civilian nuclear waste for up to 25 years at federal sites across the country. The AP (6/28, Hebert) reports, "The interim storage approach is aimed at addressing increasing concern about thousands of tons of used reactor fuel accumulating at power plants, waiting to be shipped to an oft-delayed central government repository in Nevada. Industry officials have said the failure to address the waste problem will inhibit investment in new nuclear reactors."

DOJ_NMG_0036871

The Wall Street Journal (6/28, Fialka, 2.11M) reports, "The committee's action would give the Department of Energy the authority to store waste for as long as 25 years at 'consolidation and preparation' sites; from there, the waste would be shipped to Nevada's Yucca Mountain for permanent storage."

Report Cites US As Disproportionate Carbon Dioxide Producer. The Washington Post (6/28, D1, Freeman, 744K) reports that a new report by the nonprofit group Environmental Defense found "Americans represent 5 percent of the world's population but contribute 45 percent of the world's emission of carbon dioxide, the main pollutant that causes global warming." However, "the group said auto companies should not be singled out for blame, because consumer choices also play a role." Besides changing the carps people drive, they "also suggest that communities reconsider land use policies because Americans are taking more and longer trips, often to shop." The report is part of an effort "to build support for government policies aiming at curbing greenhouse gases."

Scientists Say Gore Movie Generally Scientifically Correct. USA Today (6/28, 2.31M) reports, "Al Gore's documentary on global warming, An Inconvenient Truth, earns five stars for accuracy, according to an Associated Press survey of top climate scientists." Although many of those contacted "had not yet seen the movie or read the book," the ones that had "had the same general impression: Gore conveyed the science correctly."

Carmona Says Only Smoke-Free Environments Protect Against Secondhand Smoke. The New York Times (6/28, O'Neil, 1.19M) reports that Surgeon General Richard H. Carmona said "the evidence is now 'indisputable' that secondhand smoke is an 'alarming' public health hazard, responsible for tens of thousands of premature deaths among nonsmokers each year." He also "warned that measures like no-smoking sections did not provide adequate protection, adding, 'Smoke-free environments are the only approach that protects nonsmokers from the dangers of secondhand smoke.'" However, he stopped short of a "call for a federal ban on smoking in workplaces, bars or restaurants," saying his role is "providing the public and Congress with definitive information on the subject."

Sioux Tribal Leaders Plans Blockade To Curb Beer Transit. USA Today/AP (6/28, Walker) reports, "In an effort to fight alcoholism on the Pine Ridge Indian Reservation (in South Dakota), leaders of the Oglala Sioux tribe plan to set up roadblocks today and stop members from bringing in beer bought at four outlying stores." The AP continues, "Alcohol has long been banned on the 16,500-member reservation, where drinking has been a scourge for generations. But four stores in Whiteclay, Neb., a village a few hundred feet outside the reservation, sell about 4 million cans of beer every year, mostly to Indians. … Tribal members say that from now on, they will confiscate beer bought in Whiteclay. … 'We are the last line of defense when it comes to protecting our people,' says Duane Martin of the reservation's Strong Heart Civil Rights Movement." The AP adds, "The effects of alcoholism can be seen in nearly every family, in accidents, violence, sexual abuse and suicide, says Terryl Blue-White Eyes, director of the alcohol and drug program for the reservation. … The youth suicide rate on the reservation is the highest in the nation, and most of the suicides involve alcohol, she says. … Shannon County, where most Pine Ridge residents live, is home to less than 2% of South Dakota's population but had 19% of the fatalities caused by drunken driving in 2005 — 14 of the 74 deaths statewide, according to the South Dakota Department of Public Safety."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Massachusetts Latin Kings Leader Sentenced To 21 Years In Prison. The Boston Globe (6/27, 484K) reported in "New England In Brief" that former Massachusetts Latin Kings leader Edwin Serrano on Friday "was sentenced to more than 21 years in federal prison for drug trafficking offenses." Serrano "was found guilty of selling cocaine and crack cocaine to a 'cooperating witness' working with a federal-state task force investigating gang activity throughout the state. Authorities say Serrano, who was minister of defense for the Lawrence chapter of the Almighty Latin King and Queen Nation, also offered to sell the witness a firearm and attempted to recruit the witness to go to New York to kidnap someone."

Three Minnesota Men Accused Of Conspiring To Distribute Fentanyl. According to the AP (6/28), heroin laced with fentanyl is working its way into the Twin Cities. "Three St. Paul men arrested Friday have been charged with conspiring to distribute fentanyl and crack cocaine. … Authorities in Minneapolis and St. Paul are reviewing heroin-related deaths to determine if fentanyl was involved."

Privacy Rules Said To Create Roadblocks For Drug Investigations. Wilmington, North Carolina's Star-News (6/27) reports federal guidelines intended to "keep personal health information confidential create a roadblock for police who want to speak with victims of overdoses about the source of the drugs that hospitalized them. The issue was discussed last week at a meeting of about 30 law enforcement officials and medical community representatives." Meanwhile, "Preliminary test results from the federal Drug Enforcement Administration show the heroin that killed two men earlier this month in Wilmington was high in purity and not cut with the powerful synthetic narcotic fentanyl, as was suspected. Whatever its composition, the heroin poses a lethal threat to users, Wilmington-based DEA Special Agent Eric Savitts said."

DOJ_NMG_0036872

Michigan's Man's Death May Be Linked To Fentanyl. WOOD-TV, Grand Rapids, Michigan (6/27) reports the Portage Police Department "continues to investigate the death of a 34-year-old man. … Police think he died of a mix of heroin and the prescription pain reliever fentanyl. … Investigators hope a toxicology report on the Portage man's body will help their case."

Investigators To Determine If Limbaugh Violated Deal In Prescription Fraud Case. The AP (6/27) reports Rush Limbaugh "will likely have to wait several days to find out if he violated his deal with prosecutors in a prescription fraud case when authorities found him in possession of a bottle of Viagra that was apparently prescribed to someone else. Limbaugh, 55, was detained for more than three hours Monday at Palm Beach International Airport after he returned on his private plane from a vacation in the Dominican Republic. Customs officials found Viagra in his bag, but his name wasn't on the prescription, Palm Beach County sheriff's spokesman Paul Miller said." Limbaugh's lawyer "said the prescription was written in his doctor's name 'for privacy purposes.' The conservative radio host was released without being charged." The AP adds, "According to the Drug Enforcement Administration, Viagra is not considered a controlled substance because 'it's not something you can be addicted to,' said DEA Investigator Maria Gilbert."

USA Today (6/28, Yancey) writes, "Carrying a vial of Viagra without his name on it got talk-show host Rush Limbaugh in hot water with U.S. customs officers Monday. And his detention at Florida's Palm Beach airport raises questions for U.S. travelers who routinely fly with drugs that they can't show were prescribed to them." Jennifer Connors, a U.S. Customs and Border Protection spokeswoman said, "Names on prescription drug bottles must 'match the name on the travel document.' Passengers flying domestically don't have to carry a prescription or have a labeled bottle, although the Transportation Security Administration website encourages labeled medications."

Network TV Coverage. ABC's Good Morning America (6/27, 8:00 a.m.) reported, "An embarrassing incident for Rush Limbaugh. He was detained at a Florida airport after customs officials found a bottle of Viagra in his luggage without a prescription. The label was in his doctor's name to protect his privacy. Now he faces misdemeanor drug charges."

ABC's World News Now (6/27, 4:30 a.m.) reported, "Rush Limbaugh is facing possible drug charges in Florida. He was detained at Palm Beach airport for carrying Viagra without a prescription. Limbaugh's attorney says the drug was issued to the doctor to protect his client's privacy."

CBS News (6/27, 4:30 a.m.) reported, "Rush Limbaugh had drugs confiscated from him on Monday. He was carrying the prescription sex enhancer Viagra. The name on the bottle wasn't his."

Cable TV Coverage. CNN (6/27, 9:00 a.m.) reported, "Rush Limbaugh is back in the legal spotlight. Authorities in south Florida say the radio talk show host could face misdemeanor drug charges. He was detained for several hours. Custom agents say they found a bottle of Viagra in his luggage. Instead of Limbaugh's name, it carried the names of two doctors. Limbaugh's attorney said it was labeled that way for privacy. Last month he reached a deal with prosecutors. They accused him of illegally obtaining prescription painkillers.

Two Men Sentenced For Role In Connecticut Drug Ring. The Danbury (CT) News Times (6/27) reports two more Danbury men "have been sentenced to prison terms for their involvement in a Danbury-area cocaine and crack distribution ring that was broken up by law enforcement last year. Edward Toney…was sentenced to five years in prison and four years of supervised release. Timothy Eberly…was sentenced to 27 months behind bars and six years of supervised release. … The two were among 24 people from Danbury and New York City who were arrested last year during a crackdown by Danbury police and the federal Drug Enforcement Administration on a drug ring operated by Alex Luna of Danbury."

NFL To Add Amphetamines To List Of Banned Substances. The NFL will toughen its drug policy. The AP (6/28) reports the league is "adding amphetamines to the list of banned performance-enhancers starting in 2007. Amphetamines were previously listed as a 'substance-abuse drug,' but are now in the same category as steroids and other enhancers that carry stronger penalties."

USA Today (6/28, Wood) reports, "The switch in classification for amphetamines and methamphetamines will not take affect until the 2007 season to make certain all players know of the new rules. A first positive test in 2006 would bring a warning and put a player into the drug program.

DOJ_NMG_0036873

A positive test next year will initially result in a four-game suspension."

Bonds: No Word From Mitchell In Baseball's Steroid Investigation. According to the AP (6/28), Barry Bonds "said Tuesday he hasn't heard yet from former Sen. George Mitchell in his independent investigation of steroids in baseball. Mitchell, the former Senate majority leader, was appointed in March by commissioner Bud Selig to head the league's investigation into steroids. He has already contacted some members of the San Francisco Giants' coaching staff."

Lance Armstrong Seeks To Discount Allegations Of Drug Use. According to the Los Angeles Times (6/27, Abrahamson), cyclist Lance Armstrong "mounted a public-relations offensive Monday, seeking to discount sworn testimony alleging that he had, nearly 10 years ago in an Indiana hospital room, acknowledged use of an array of performance-enhancing substances. Appearing on a number of shows on ABC or ESPN, Armstrong sought to undercut testimony offered by Betsy Andreu, a former teammate's wife. She testified Armstrong was asked by doctors on Oct. 27, 1996, if he had used performance-enhancing drugs and said, 'EPO, growth hormone, cortisone, steroid, testosterone.'"

US Cyclist Faces More Doping Allegations. The Los Angeles Times (6/27, Abrahamson) reports a Spanish newspaper "reported Monday that U.S. cyclist Tyler Hamilton, an Olympic gold medalist serving a two-year suspension for blood doping, was billed by a doctor for treatment that allegedly included blood transfusions and banned performance-enhancing drugs, including steroids, human growth hormone and the synthetic blood booster EPO. Hamilton…said, 'I have not done what the article alleges.' The report in El Pais…is part of a series sparked by a review of confidential judicial documents tied to a raid in May by police in Madrid. El Pais said Sunday that 58 riders in recent years might have received blood and banned substances."

Hamilton Will Keep Medal. The AP (6/28) also reports Tyler Hamilton "will keep his gold medal from the 2004 Athens Olympics. The Court of Arbitration for Sport rejected an appeal Tuesday by the Russian Olympic Committee to strip Hamilton of his time-trial gold medal due to a doping controversy and give it to silver medalist Vyacheslav Ekimov."

German Contender Cleared In Doping Investigation. The New York Times (6/28, Vinton) writes, "The Tour de France has been enveloped by the turmoil of a doping investigation less than a week before it is scheduled to begin. Race officials asked the team of a top contender to withdraw Monday, and yesterday they cleared another contender, Jan Ullrich of Germany, after a Spanish newspaper linked him to the blood-doping inquiry that has shaken cycling for the past month."

Cycling Seen As Paying "Hefty" Price For Drug Testing. In USA Today (6/28) Jon Saraceno writes, "Cycling is paying a hefty price because of its leadership in testing, even as most pro sports fly under the drug performance-enhancement radar because of union dissent regarding perimeters for testing."

IMMIGRATION:

Key Senators Open To Specter Compromise On Immigration. The Washington Times (6/28, Fagan, 90K) reports, "Key backers of the Senate immigration bill said yesterday they are willing to consider a compromise that would delay the guest-worker program and "amnesty" portions until the borders have been secured. The proposal was floated by Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter in an interview Monday with editors and reporters at The Washington Times." Sen. John McCain said the idea is "worth discussing." Sen. Edward Kennedy "said a delay will occur anyway because it will take a few years to set up the guest-worker program and the structure to process millions of illegal aliens onto a pathway to citizenship."

The Los Angeles Times (6/28, Gaouette, 958K) says the proposal provides "a potential path to agreement between the House and Senate." The Times notes, "Left unclear in the still-emerging conversation is whether senators would agree that specific border security and law enforcement goals or targets would have to be met before a guest worker or legalization program could begin."

CQ (6/27, Sandler) reported, "Two prominent Senate Republicans called on their House GOP colleagues Tuesday to stop trying to score partisan political points on immigration and instead focus on a legislative solution. John McCain, R-Ariz., and Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., stood with Senate Democrats to reaffirm their support for the immigration bill (S 2611) the Senate passed May 25. They also expressed disappointment in the direction of the debate this year and urged House leaders to go to conference on an immigration bill this summer."

Boehner Criticizes Democratic "Silence" On Immigration. The Hill (6/28, O'Connor, Hearn) reports that House Majority Leader John Boehner "ripped congressional Democrats yesterday for refusing to adopt a unified position on" immigration reform legislation. Boehner said, "I think a feeble response from House Democrats on border security makes clear they have no coherent policy on this issue," adding, "The stone silence from them is deafening." Democratic leaders "insist their members remain largely unified on immigration reform."

DOJ_NMG_0036874

Gutierrez Makes Case For Bush Immigration Reform Plan. Commerce Secretary Carols Gutierrez said on CNN's The Situation Room (6/27), "The President's comprehensive reform is realistic. It's practical. It is not amnesty. And that's the problem with this discussion, is that you can very easily go into a one-liner and shut off the discussion and call it amnesty. It is not amnesty. It makes people earn their legalization or their citizenship. But there are two extremes here. One extreme is mass deportation. We are not going to do that. The other extreme is amnesty. What the president said is, let's find something in the middle that we can do that will get a grip on national security and immigration. That's comprehensive reform."

TAX:

Judge Blasts DOJ For Pressuring KPMG Over Legal Fees. The Wall Street Journal (6/28, Cohen, Davies) reports, "In a decision that bolsters white-collar defendants facing criminal investigations, a federal judge said prosecutors can't pressure companies to stop paying legal bills for indicted employees." The Journal continues, "The ruling, by a judge overseeing the KPMG LLP accounting fraud case in a New York federal court, concluded that federal prosecutors gain an unfair advantage and violate the due process of indicted employees by pressuring their employers to refuse to pay their legal costs. The decision strikes down a key lever used by the government in several recent criminal investigations." The Journal adds, "At issue is a 2003 memorandum that advised U.S. attorneys to 'scrutinize the authenticity of a corporation's cooperation' when considering whether to seek criminal charges. Known as the 'Thompson memo,' for former Deputy Attorney General Larry D. Thompson, its author, the memo stated that prosecutors could take a company's willingness to advance legal fees to employees as a sign of lack of cooperation."

USA Today (6/28, Farrell) reports, "In a narrow sense, the ruling means that more than a dozen former KPMG partners and employees under indictment can now have their legal costs paid upfront by the accounting firm. … But more broadly, the ruling strikes at the Justice Department's policy for determining whether to bring charges against corporations. That policy, known as the Thompson Memorandum, was written after the indictment and collapse of the Arthur Andersen auditing firm. It sets out the conditions prosecutors should take under advisement when deciding whether to bring criminal charges against a corporation. … In order to avoid prosecution for suspected criminal wrongdoing, the memorandum states, a corporation has to show that it is cooperating fully with the Justice Department's investigation. If the corporation is paying the legal fees of employees under investigation, prosecutors could view that as being less than fully cooperative. … U.S. District Judge Lewis Kaplan blasted that viewpoint in his 83-page decision. Under the Sixth Amendment of the U.S. Constitution, he wrote, every employee of a corporation, from hourly workers to top-ranked managers, has the right 'o have their employers pay their legal expenses if they are sued as a result of their doing their jobs. This right is as much a part of the bargain between employer and employee as salary or wages.'"

The Washington Post (6/28, D1, Johnson) reports that Judge Kaplan "criticized the federal government for holding 'the proverbial gun' to the head of accounting firm KPMG LLP and advising the firm not to pay full fees to lawyers defending more than a dozen former partners on fraud charges. … The policy 'interfered' with the executives' ability to fight criminal charges in a case that has been called the largest tax fraud in history, the judge wrote. He said the government 'evidenced a desire to minimize the involvement of the defense attorneys' and added that 'the government's proper concern is not with obtaining convictions.' … Kaplan's harshly worded 83-page decision handed a potent symbolic victory to defense lawyers and business groups, who have for years complained that the government is overreaching in its attempt to weed out fraud after the Enron Corp. and WorldCom Inc. scandals. … An unusual coalition of trade organizations, including the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, the Securities Industry Association and the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers, banded together to fight the policy and submitted court briefs in the KPMG case."

The Los Angeles Times (6/28, Kristof, Hamilton) reports, "KPMG agreed last year to pay $456 million to settle charges that it promoted fraudulent tax shelters to wealthy investors, including Global Crossing Ltd. founder Gary Winnick, Guess Inc. co-Chairmen Paul and Maurice Marciano and former California Republican gubernatorial candidate Bill Simon Jr. … But the firm — unlike the 16 former employees — was not indicted." The Times adds, "In court papers, KPMG acknowledged that it had departed from a longtime policy to pay its employees' legal bills. Instead, the accounting firm decided in the tax fraud case that it would pay bills only for those who cooperated with the government and agreed to a $400,000 cap on fees, and that payments would cease for workers who were criminally charged. … 'If those whom the government suspects are culpable in fact are guilty, they should pay the price,' Kaplan ruled. 'But determination of guilt or innocence must be made fairly — not in a proceeding in which the government has obtained an unfair advantage long before the trial even has begun.'" The Times notes, "Legal experts said Kaplan's ruling would probably force the government to reexamine its use of the Thompson memo. … 'It's going to chill the government's willingness' to use this tactic, said Steven Peikin, a partner at Sullivan & Cromwell in New York and former chief of the securities fraud division at the U.S. attorney's office in Manhattan."

DOJ_NMG_0036875

The New York Law Journal (6/28, Hamblett) reports, "Southern District U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia issued a statement saying, 'We are disappointed in Judge Kaplan's opinion today ... which we respectfully believe is unsupported by the factual record and the applicable law. The actions of the government were entirely consistent with appropriate Department of Justice policy, and we believe that the prosecutors acted ethically and properly throughout this case.'"

The AP (6/28, Caruso) reports, "Kaplan did not reach a final decision Tuesday on how to remedy things for the KPMG defendants, who are accused of developing questionable tax shelters that allowed some wealthy clients to dodge $2.5 billion in taxes. … He declined a defense motion to immediately dismiss the charges, saying to do so would be extreme."

WSJournal Praises Judge For Rebuking Government Over Thompson Memo. The Wall Street Journal (6/28, 2.11M) editorializes, "U.S. District Court Judge Lewis A. Kaplan upheld the logic and meaning of the Constitution's Due Process Clause and the Sixth Amendment" in the Justice Department's prosecution of 16 former KPMG executives. KPMG stopped "paying the legal fees of its former executives, largely to satisfy the requirements of the so-called Thompson memo" so as to "avoid firm-wide indictment." Judge Kaplan "delivered a scathing 83-page rebuke of the government's case. Noting that Constitutional rights to a fair trial and competent counsel were at stake here," the judge concluded that "the government had used the company as a proxy to violate the defendants' rights." This is the time for "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to reinterpret, or better yet rewrite," those policies "that his too-zealous prosecutors have been using in violation of defendants' due process rights."

IRS Employees Caught Illegally Browsing Through Taxpayer Files. The Wall Street Journal (6/28, Herman, 2.11M) reports in its "Tax Report" column, "A new Treasury report says many Internal Revenue Service employees have been caught illegally browsing through taxpayer files in recent years. In some cases, IRS employees have lost their jobs. In other cases, they have even gone to prison. Treasury agents have investigated more than 3,700 cases of potential violations in the past eight years, resulting in more than 1,600 'adverse personnel actions' by the IRS, including firings and suspensions, the report says. In addition, 126 IRS employees have been criminally prosecuted for such violations."

Former Wife Of Acquitted Mississippi Judge Sentenced For Tax Evasion. The Biloxi (MS) Sun Herald (6/28, Lee) reports, "A legal nightmare that began almost four years ago for state Supreme Court Justice Oliver Diaz Jr. and his former wife, Jennifer, ended quietly Tuesday after a 10-minute appearance in U.S. District Court (in Gulfport, MS), when Jennifer Diaz was sentenced to two years of supervised probation for income tax evasion." The Herald continues, "Judge Walter J. Gex III ordered her to pay $58,500 in restitution, but then Assistant U.S. Attorney Don Burkhalter and Diaz's attorney, James Kitchens of Jackson, told Gex the amount should be left blank until the IRS sorts out the figures. … 'I promised Jennifer early on that if she cooperated with us, I would do what I could to get her a favorable sentence,' Assistant U.S. Attorney Don Burkhalter said after the proceedings. 'As far as what I could determine, she told the truth, so I had an obligation to do what I said I would do. … I don't have any regrets about indicting them on the tax case. I just wish it had turned out better for the government.'" The Herald adds, "The U.S. Justice Department began investigating campaign contributions to judges in 2002, turning up suspicious loans from Coast attorneys to a Biloxi bed and breakfast the Diazes bought while married. … A year later, the investigation turned into judicial bribery and fraud charges against the Diazes, Biloxi attorney Paul Minor and two former trial court judges, John Whitfield and Wes Teel. Headlines played across the pages of Mississippi newspapers for several years as the case wound its way to a three-month trial last summer. … Before the trial started, Jennifer Diaz pleaded guilty to a separate charge of tax evasion. Attorneys had repaid campaign loans for them, which they had failed to report as income. … In exchange for her cooperation, the government dropped all judicial bribery charges against her. Even if a jury convicted her husband, she reasoned at the time, she would be home to raise their two young children. … Prosecutors never called her to testify against her ex-husband during the judicial bribery trial. A jury acquitted him of charges at the trial's conclusion."

Lacking Votes, Senate Republicans Postpone Consideration Of Estate Tax Repeal. The Wall Street Journal (6/28, Rogers, 2.11M) reports Senate Republicans "pulled back from a vote this week on the federal estate tax, admitting they still lack the needed support for a House-passed measure that would exempt all but the wealthiest Americans." Majority Leader Bill Frist "pledged to return to the issue after the July Fourth recess, but his announcement captured the increased frustration among Republicans in advancing their legislative agenda before the November elections."

DOJ_NMG_0036876

The AP (6/28, Dalrymple) reports most Republicans "support the tax reduction, but they need support from a few more Democrats." In a statement, Sen. Frist said, "The vast majority of my Democratic colleagues have so far refused to address this issue. It's my hope that their constituents will use the upcoming recess to explain the importance of supporting a reasonable and permanent solution to this unfair tax."

Bloomberg (6/28, Donmoyer) reports the delay "is the third since Frist began his quest to repeal or reduce the tax last year and the second time this month his ambitions were thwarted by Democrats who say the government needs the revenue generated by the tax. The House passed the legislation 269-156 on June 22 after Frist urged it to act before the Independence Day recess next week."

Thomas Urges Senate To Pass Estate Tax Reform. In a letter to the Wall Street Journal (6/28, 2.11M), House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Bill Thomas writes, "Though the House has voted five times to permanently repeal the estate tax in recent years, the Senate has been unable to follow through. Faced with this deadlock, Congress has a choice: make yet another political statement or make law. … This is the opportunity to provide meaningful estate tax reform that is permanent, fair and pro-growth. The House has voted; now it's up to the Senate. It is my hope that the spirit of compromise prevails and permanent estate tax relief can become law in the near future."

Gingrich, Kies Criticize US Taxation Of Expatriates. Newt Gingrich, a senior fellow at the American Enterprise Institute and former speaker of the House of Representatives, and Ken Kies, managing director at Clark Consulting and chief of staff of the Joint Committee on Taxation 1995-98, write in an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (6/28, A14, 2.11M), "Sadly, Congress has latched on" to a proposal that "would tax U.S. citizens working overseas at higher marginal rates and subject their housing to higher taxes." These section 911 rules "are of great importance for American competitiveness, which is why Congress needs to revisit the new law's changes as soon as possible." Because this makes it "cheaper for [an] employer to hire a non-American for a foreign position," these "new tax increases can only mean that there will be fewer 'Americans on the ground' in overseas markets going forward. Studies have shown a direct correlation between employment of Americans overseas and U.S. exports." Also, "the added cost of the new section 911 tax increases will only raise the pricing of U.S. bids, and therefore mean U.S. companies get less work." If we won't "follow the lead of our trading partners and exempt foreign-earned income completely," Congress should "repeal the tax increase" to get "more U.S. players out on the field. Global business competition is already fierce enough. We shouldn't sabotage ourselves."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Signing Statements Draw Ire Of Specter, Democrats At Judiciary Hearing. The AP (6/28, Kellman) reports the White House "defended President Bush's frequent use of special statements that claim authority to limit the effects of bills he signs, saying the statements help him uphold the Constitution and defend national security. Senators weren't so sure." Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter said, "It's a challenge to the plain language of the Constitution. There is a sense that the president has taken signing statements far beyond the customary purview." The AP adds the "bill-signing statements say Bush reserves a right to revise, interpret or disregard measures on national security and constitutional grounds. Some 110 statements have challenged about 750 statutes passed by Congress, according to numbers combined from White House and the Senate committee. They include documents revising or disregarding parts of legislation to ban torture of detainees and to renew the Patriot Act."

The Washington Times (6/28, Curl, 90K) reports the White House "defended President Bush's right to set limits on the scope of congressional bills he signs into law, saying the Constitution grants the executive broad powers and requires the president to uphold the law." Press secretary Tony Snow said, "The president does not, and the administration does not, refuse to carry out the laws that have been passed by Congress and signed into law by the president. In the context of trying to preserve and protect and defend the Constitution, there will be times, there will be places within signing statements, caveats, where he has reservations about [a bill he is signing into law.]"

The Financial Times (6/28, Daniel) reports Democratic senators "accused George W. Bush of 'making unprecedented claims for unchecked power.'" The issue "has attracted scrutiny following a study by the Boston Globe this year that found that Mr Bush had employed signing statements for more than 750 laws enacted by the Republican Congress." Sen. Patrick Leahy said, "That's far more than all the signing statements signed by every single president from George Washington to Bill Clinton, put together." The Times adds, "Concern has focused on whether Mr Bush has used the low-profile statements to side-step congressional authority, rather than publicly issue a presidential veto of legislation."

The Christian Science Monitor (6/28, Chaddock, 61K) reports, "Not all Republicans are as enthused as chairman Specter and Senate Democrats over this line of questioning, especially as lawmakers head into fall elections that could change control of both houses of Congress." Sen. John Cornyn said, "This is a fascinating topic, mainly something law students and lawyers can love. … As a practical matter, I don't know what impact it has.... It promotes public discourse and discussion about what the roles of the legislative branch and the executive branch are." The Monitor adds that in testifying for the Bush Administration, Michelle Boardman, "deputy assistant attorney general in the Office of Legal Counsel at the US Department of Justice, said that signing statements serve a 'legitimate and important function' and are not an abuse of power."

DOJ_NMG_0036877

The Washington Post (6/28, A9, Weisman, 744K) reports a "bipartisan group of senators and scholars denounced President Bush yesterday for using scores of 'signing statements' to reserve the right to ignore or reinterpret provisions of measures that he has signed into law." The New York Times (6/28, Zernike, 1.19M) reports, "Senators on the Judiciary Committee accused President Bush of an 'unprecedented' and 'astonishing' power grab" for using signing statements. Specter "and others are particularly upset that Mr. Bush reserved the right to interpret the torture ban passed overwhelmingly by Congress, as well as Congressional oversight powers in the renewal of the Patriot Act." Senators "and two law professors before the panel said that if the president objected to a bill, he should use his power to veto it — something he has not done in his six years in office."

Bush Urges Senate To Pass Line-Item Veto. President Bush yesterday met with key senators and spoke before the Manhattan Institute in New York yesterday to promote the line-item veto bill. The story was picked up by the wires and major dailies, but only drew minimal attention from the cable news channels and was not covered by the networks. The AP (6/28, Riechmann) reports President Bush "criticized House Democrats who didn't back the measure even though they've called for federal spending restraint." The House "passed such legislation last week 247-172. Thirty-five Democrats joined with most Republicans in voting for the bill." At the Manhattan Institute in New York, Bush said, "I was disappointed, frankly, though that more Democrats didn't vote for the bill, especially those that are calling for fiscal discipline in Washington, D.C. I mean, you can't call for fiscal discipline on the one hand and then not pass a tool to enhance fiscal discipline on the other hand. You can't have it both ways, it seems like to me." The AP adds the bill "faces an uncertain future in the Senate. Democrats generally oppose the measure, and not all Republicans are excited about the idea."

CNN's The Situation Room (6/27, Blitzer) reported, "President Bush today urged the Senate to pass a bill giving him a line-item veto. And that would give him the power to reject items he considers wasteful in spending bills without vetoing the entire bill. In a speech in New York, Mr. Bush calls the measure a vital tool to enforce fiscal discipline."

The Washington Post (6/28, A3, Baker, 744K) reports Bush's line item veto remarks are "part of a broader political effort to assuage disaffected supporters that he really is a fiscal conservative despite the growth of government on his watch." Bush "summoned key senators to the White House and later gave a speech promoting a line-item veto to fight earmarks, or spending requests that members of Congress slip into larger bills without going through the normal budget process." In "seeking a line-item veto, Bush set sights on the most politically charged form of federal spending, often called pork. The number of earmarks inserted into spending bills has mushroomed from 3,055 in 1996 to 14,211 in 2004, according to the Congressional Research Service, and the overall cost has more than doubled to $52.7 billion." But even "if Bush had a line-item veto and struck every earmark, it would only carve a fraction out of a deficit projected to reach up to $350 billion this year."

The New York Times (6/28, Rutenberg, 1.19M) reports Bush "also met on Tuesday at the White House with senators to discuss his proposal, including the majority leader, Senator Bill Frist of Tennessee, and the president's 2000 Republican primary rival, Senator John McCain of Arizona. In his address, Mr. Bush also cited a more recent rival from the other side of the aisle, Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts, the Democratic presidential nominee in 2004, as a supporter of a line-item veto." Frist has "told administration officials he will try to bring a similar version of the bill to a vote in mid-July. But even White House officials acknowledged that the proposal would face a tough fight. Democrats have been reluctant to give the president any sort of victory, and lawmakers in charge of the Senate Appropriations Committee are not eager to cede any control."

The Washington Times (6/28, Dinan, 90K) reports President Bush "called the line-item veto the next 'crucial test' for Congress on spending restraint, and said he was 'disappointed' in House Democrats who claimed they were for fiscal discipline but voted against the plan last week." Bush "also promised, using the strongest language he's used in months, to take another stab at controlling the growth of Social Security, saying he will try every year for the rest of his administration."

WSJournal Criticizes CBO, Joint Tax Committee For Underestimating Tax Revenues. The Wall Street Journal (6/28, 2.11M) says in an editorial titled, "Misunderestimated," that when it "comes to tax policy these days, the most powerful branch of government seems to be the unelected computers at the Joint Tax Committee and Congressional Budget Office. Those are the agencies that tell Congress how much tax cuts will 'cost' the Treasury in lost revenue. And what's standing in the way of the Senate repealing the death tax this year, for example, is their $600 billion boogeyman estimate of lost federal revenues to the Treasury over 10 years." But a "new study from the American Shareholders Association examined the 10-year forecast for economic growth and federal revenue collections for the period 1997-2006. And over these years, it found, the CBO underestimated tax revenue collections by a cumulative $800 billion. To paraphrase President Bush: That's a pretty severe misunderestimation." But the estimates "excluded the impact of at least three major tax cuts (in 1997, 2001 and 2003) that subsequently passed Congress. These tax cuts were estimated by the wizards at Joint Tax to deplete federal tax collections by an additional $1.24 trillion through 2006, according to the Shareholders Association study." If "you add those together, CBO and JTC have managed to underestimate revenues by $2.04 trillion over the past decade." Tied to "their outdated forecasting models, these agencies refuse to acknowledge that there is any Laffer Curve effect from changes in tax rates that help the economy grow and revenues increase."

DOJ_NMG_0036878

New York Democrats Call For DOJ Probe Of Fosella. The New York Times (6/28, Hicks) reports, "The chairman of the State Democratic Party called on the Federal Election Commission and the Justice Department yesterday to investigate allegations that Representative Vito J. Fossella Jr. violated campaign finance regulations. Mr. Fossella is the only Republican member of Congress from New York City." The Times continues, "In a statement, the chairman, Assemblyman Herman D. Farrell Jr., said that the allegations, if true, 'would constitute a major breach of the public trust.' Mr. Farrell was referring to a report in The Daily News that Mr. Fossella, who represents Staten Island and parts of Brooklyn, took trips with his family to ski resorts and other destinations that were financed by donors and corporate sponsors." The Times adds, "Craig Donner, a Fossella spokesman, acknowledged that Mr. Fossella had taken several trips over the years, but he said they violated no laws."

Paulson Defends Bush Tax Cuts. Treasury Secretary nominee Hank Paulson defended President Bush's tax cuts yesterday during his confirmation hearing before the Senate Finance Committee, saying the cuts should be made permanent. The Financial Times (6/28, Guha) adds that Paulson also "hinted at a possible shift in emphasis in Washington's China policy." Paulson "also raised the possibility of a renewed push on reform of entitlement programmes Medicare, Medicaid and Social Security." Paulson "added that he hoped it would be possible to make progress on entitlement reform during the remainder of the Bush second term."

CQ (6/27, Crittenden) reported that Paulson "stuck to the administration line during his Senate confirmation hearing on Tuesday, touting a fiscal policy built on low tax rates." Paulson "also told the Finance Committee the costs of entitlement programs such as Social Security and Medicare need to be more tightly controlled."

The New York Times (6/28, Andrews, 1.19M) reports that during his hearing, Paulson "cautiously avoided any hints on Tuesday about the administration's economic priorities for the remainder of Mr. Bush's term." Paulson "reiterated Mr. Bush's general views on the need for low taxes, budget restraint, increased American competitiveness and the use of persuasion rather than threats in dealing with China on economic issues. But Mr. Paulson, the chairman of Goldman Sachs, carefully avoided specifics on most policy issues or any mention of prospects for reviving some of Mr. Bush's economic goals — like overhauling the income tax — that have languished for the last two years."

The Washington Post (6/28, D2, Blustein, 744K) also says Paulson "hewed firmly to Bush administration positions at his Senate confirmation hearing yesterday, saying that he 'very strongly' opposes tax increases, hopes to begin tackling the long-term obligations of Social Security and Medicare, and wants China to move more quickly toward changing its currency policy." The Post adds, "Paulson was asked deferential questions by senators who lauded his grasp of financial issues, but he skirted several controversial issues by pleading ignorance on technical and legal matters."

The Wall Street Journal (6/28, Solomon, 2.11M) reports that Paulson, "who is expected to be confirmed, didn't signal that any major changes in economic policy are on the horizon." Paulson "told senators he would take steps to simplify taxes and overhaul entitlement programs such as Social Security and Medicare, but said it would be 'naïve' to think those issues could be 'addressed and solved in a two-and-a-half-year period.'"

USA Today (6/28, Lynch, 2.31M) reports that there was little indication that Paulson will "differ dramatically from outgoing John Snow." USA adds, "On issues from taxes to trade with China, Paulson echoed Snow's stance."

Wilkinson To Serve As Paulson's Chief Of Staff. The Washington Post (6/28, A23, 744K) reports in its "In the Loop" column, "Word is that Jim Wilkinson, formerly at the White House and more recently burnishing Rice's image, will be chief of staff to Henry M. Paulson Jr., once he's confirmed by the Senate as Treasury secretary."

White House Eyes Social Security, Tax Reform For Fall Agenda. The White House Bulletin/US News (6/27) reports President Bush's comments on Social Security at the Manhattan Institute yesterday "appear to be part of a new policy push by the Administration. Growing more confident that the Republicans can retain control of the House and Senate, the White House is set to push a major reform agenda in the fall to change Social Security, cut taxes and boost support for the war." At least "two new themes are under consideration. They are: 'Security versus surrender,' which will focus on the war in Iraq and Afghanistan, and 'taxes and the economy,' which will push for new tax cuts and reforms meant to stimulate the economy further, according to senior officials." "There is no retrenching," one official tells US News and the Bulletin. "We are continuing to push our agenda." The Bulletin adds while a "slight uptick in polling has helped the President's situation, said the official, the agenda has been in the works for months. What's new is the addition of Social Security reform. The Administration's previous effort bombed yet the President still wants to tackle it before he leaves office. The official, however, said that it may have to wait until next year when the President hopes that his lame duck status will help him because the partisan politics directed at him may dissolve."

DOJ_NMG_0036879

Wallace Stepping Down As White House Communications Director. The AP (6/28) reports that White House Communications Director Nicolle Wallace is stepping down to move to New York City to be with her husband, Mark, who is UN ambassador for management and reform this spring. Wallace will leave her job "overseeing White House press strategy" this Friday.

Bush To Nominate Donohue To Federal Judgeship. President Bush today will nominate New York Lt. Gov. Mary Donohue for a federal judgeship in upstate New York. The New York Post (6/28, 624K) reports, "Sen. Chuck Schumer (D-N.Y.), who serves on the Senate Judiciary Committee which would consider her nomination, has been informed and 'is keeping an open mind,' aides said."

Bush Nominates Connaughton To Head Maritime Administration. President Bush has selected Prince William Board of County Supervisors Sean T. Connaughton to head the US Maritime Administration. The Washington Post (6/28, B1, McCrummen, Stewart, 744K) reports, "If confirmed by the Senate, Connaughton, a maritime lawyer, would resign the post he has held nearly seven years to be the administrator of an agency with an annual budget of more than $500 million and a staff of 1,000, whose primary job is to ensure safe and efficient access for commercial and military ships through U.S. waterways."

Nicholson Wants $160.5 Million For VA Data Security. VA Secretary Jim Nicholson yesterday told a House Appropriations subcommittee that he needs at least $160.5 million to turn his agency into a "model for information security." USA Today (6/28, 2.31M) reports that Nicholson's request "includes funding for at least one year of government-paid credit monitoring for the 26.5 million veterans and active-duty military personnel whose private personal information was stolen May 3 in a burglary at the home of a VA analyst."

The Washington Post (6/28, A23, 744K) reports that Nicholson "hinted that more money may be necessary. 'If a year expires, we have a responsibility to determine whether to renew based on what we know at the time,' he said." Nicholson "said that $29 million of the $160.5 million will be taken from VA funds budgeted for 2006 to cover personnel costs at the Veterans Benefits Administration, where hiring planned for this year has been postponed until next. He said the rest will come from other areas of the fiscal 2006 budget."

Administration To Announce Sweeping Welfare Rule Changes. The New York Times (6/28, Pear, 1.19M) reports, "The Bush administration plans to issue sweeping new rules on Wednesday that will require states to move much larger numbers of poor people from welfare to work." In "the biggest changes in welfare policy since 1996," the rules "set a uniform definition for permissible work activities and require states to verify and document the number of hours worked by welfare recipients." However, "some state officials and antipoverty groups, including many who opposed the 1996 law, say the new work requirements are unrealistic," and "many Democrats say the welfare law creates a perverse incentive. A state can comply by putting some people to work and by simply removing others from the rolls, regardless of whether they find jobs."

Reid Threatens To Block Congressional Pay Raise Unless Minimum Wage Increased. The CBS Evening News (6/27, story 7, 2:20, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "It has been nine years now since Congress voted to raise the minimum wage and Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid told senators today he would block their own pay raise unless they agree to raise the minimum wage when it comes up for a vote later this summer. While they are waiting on Washington, out in the country, some state legislatures have decided to put their own plans into action. Here's our national correspondent Byron Pitts." CBS (Pitts) added, "Growing around the silent symbols of Cleveland's sagging economy, there's now a grass roots push to give Ohio's lowest-paid workers their first pay raise in nearly a decade. Since Congress hasn't raised the Federal minimum wage of $5.15 an hour in nine years, ACORN is trying to get state governments to do it." Pitts added, "The push to raise minimum wage goes well beyond Ohio. It's a national trend. Across the country, voters and state legislatures have said the $5.15 Federal minimum wage just isn't enough. Twenty states and the District of Columbia have already adopted minimum wages above $5.15 an hour. In November, higher minimum wages are likely to be on the ballot in six more states. But in today's debate, Republicans argue that raising the minimum wage is bad economics."

DOJ_NMG_0036880

CNN's The Situation Room (6/27, Blitzer) reported, "Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid vowed today to block pay hikes for members of Congress until the minimum wage for all Americans is raised. Last week, the Senate voted down a minimum wage increase. The current minimum wage is $5.15 an hour. Democrats want to raise that wage to $7.25 an hour. The last hike in the minimum wage was back nine years ago. Republicans argue that the hike for lower-income workers would hurt small businesses."

Roll Call (6/28, Billings) adds, "Democrats offered few details about how they plan to carry out their promise to stop Congress' scheduled 2 percent pay hike from going into effect." Republicans "accused the Democrats of engaging in a 'political stunt; in an election year and said the minority won't get far with its latest tactic." Still, "Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) already has introduced a bill in the Senate tying a COLA freeze to a minimum wage boost, and in the House, Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) successfully added an amendment to the Labor, Health and Human Services and Education appropriations bill to boost the minimum wage to $7.25 an hour."

Dean Dismisses Argument Higher Minimum Wage Causes Unemployment. The Washington Times (6/28, Rutledge, 90K) reports that at a conference of liberal Christians, "Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean yesterday dismissed as economic 'mumbo jumbo' the argument that raising the minimum wage would cause unemployment." He added, "This is a moral nation, so the first thing we must do is convince people that poverty is a moral problem."

Clinton Reportedly Angry Over Democratic Press Conference Snub. Roll Call (6/28, Akers) reports in its "Heard on the Hill" column that Sen. Hillary Clinton and her staff "felt snubbed when party leaders organized a news conference in which they vowed to block efforts to give Members of Congress a pay raise until Congress approves an increase in the minimum wage. Clinton has introduced legislation along those lines, but she was not involved in planning the leadership's news conference to trumpet the issue." A Clinton aide "was apparently so furious that the Senator seemed to be left out of the loop that she bawled out…a spokeswoman for [Minority Leader Harry] Reid near the entrance to the Senate Radio-Television Gallery."

Aide Defends Murkowski's Earmaks. In a letter to the Wall Street Journal (6/28, 2.11M), Danielle Holland, Communications Director for Sen. Lisa Murkowski, takes "great umbrage" at the paper's "assertion that somehow the senator is an active participant in what you describe as a connection between the process of earmarking and the 'opportunity for corruption.' Including her in a list of convicted felons who have sought to use their positions of power for illegal activities, simply because she has openly advocated a longstanding effort to improve the infrastructure of an Alaska community, is more than perplexing." Holland calls the notion that Murkowski would advance the prospects" of a bridge project "for some kind of family benefit is preposterous."

Deer Spotted Inside Fence Near Cheney's Residence. The Washington Post (6/28, Argetsinger, Roberts, 744K) reports in its "The Reliable Source" column, "Last week, a fully grown deer was spotted inside the fence of the Naval Observatory grounds in a wooded area near Observatory Circle." The Vice President's hours, which is on the grounds, "is surrounded by a high fence and -- we assume -- a bunch of other top-secret stuff like motion detectors and radar. In this day and age, nothing the size of a deer meanders around the 40-acre property unless the Secret Service gives it special security clearance." Bill Anderson of Naval District said that while the deer "do not affect 'at all' the vice president or the house," the Park Service "is preparing an environmental impact statement to look at the 'options' for dealing with the four-legged trespassers."

OTHER NEWS:

Rising Interest Rates Putting Brakes On Housing Markets. USA Today (6/28, Knox, 2.31M) reports rising interest rates "are making it increasingly hard to buy a home and are putting the brakes on the nation's most expensive housing markets." The "latest evidence came Tuesday from the National Association of Realtors, which said sales of existing homes fell 6% from January to May. The drop was worse for single-family homes, whose sales posted their steepest drop in 11 years. The number of homes for sale, meantime, rose sharply last month, a sign of slackening demand." The Fed "is expected to raise its target for short-term rates later this week for the 17th time in two years. Previous increases are already shutting out some buyers."

The Wall Street Journal (6/28, 2.11M) reports sales of existing homes "fell in May for the seventh time in nine months as interest rates rose, but the mood of the consumer brightened a bit in June." The Conference Board "said its consumer-confidence index, which had decreased in May, posted a slight increase in June. Consumer attitudes toward the state of the economy deteriorated, but their outlook improved."

DOJ_NMG_0036881

More Economists Expect Fed To Keep Raising Rates. USA Today (6/28, Hagenbaugh, 2.31M) reports Federal Reserve Board Chairman Ben Bernanke "and his colleagues are widely expected to raise interest rates by a quarter-percentage point for the 17th time in two years at the conclusion of their two-day meeting Thursday." And in "a bid to thwart inflation, a number of economists, including those at UBS, Lehman Bros. and Bank of America, are predicting the Fed will continue raising rates at its meeting on Aug. 8 and perhaps again later in the year. Such expectations are a big change from just a few weeks ago, when many economists weren't sure if the Fed would raise rates this month, let alone later in the year. But since then, inflation measures have been coming in higher and a number of Fed officials, including Bernanke, have been warning that inflation is outside their comfort zones."

Past Fed Rate Hikes Thought To Be Slowing Economic Growth. The Christian Science Monitor (6/28, Scherer, 61K) reports, "past interest-rate increases are rippling through the economy." Economists "believe the continual rate hikes are finally starting to act as a brake on the economy. The expectation is for economic growth to slow from 5 percent in the first quarter to about 3 percent for the rest of the year. Tuesday saw yet another sign of rising interest rates: Existing home sales in May dipped 1.2 percent, the third drop in five months." If the economic data "continues to soften, economists anticipate the Fed will want to pause and try to judge how much the higher cost of borrowing money is crimping economic activity."

Stock Markets Decline Sharply On Expected Fed Rate Increases. The Financial Times (6/28, O'Doherty) reports Wall Street "ended lower on Tuesday as investors awaited the outcome of the two-day meeting of the US Federal Reserve's rate-setting body, which starts on Wednesday." The S&P 500 "was down 0.9 per cent, or 11.36 points, at 1,239.20. The Nasdaq Composite was down 1.6 per cent, or 33.42 points, at 2,100.25. The Dow Jones Industrial Average was down 1.1 per cent, or 120.54 points, at 10,924.74."

USA Today (6/28, Krantz, 2.31M) reports, "Tech stocks were clobbered as Wall Street braced for Thursday, when the Fed will announce the result of its two-day meeting. The Nasdaq composite fell 33.42 points, or 1.6%, to 2100.25."

The Wall Street Journal (6/28, Mckay, 2.11M) reports, "It was a bad day for companies that make things. Woes at most of the Dow Jones Industrial Average's truly industrial component companies sent the market tumbling more than 120 points." General Motors shares "nosedived 6.7% on worries about the auto makers' second-quarter sales. In particular, GM executives warned that year-over-year sales comparisons would be 'brutal,' considering that last year's totals were boosted by retail incentives programs."

Ohio, National Democrats Differ On Utility Of Corruption Charges. The AP (6/28, Hammer) reports Democrats are "split over how to attack unfolding corruption scandals involving Republicans: Continue to hammer away at what they call a culture of corruption or focus on their own candidates' ideas." Democrats "believe more than ever that Republican ethical problems in Ohio make the state a key battleground this November's midterm elections. In recent weeks, another former official from Gov. Bob Taft's administration has been charged with ethics law violations, and more details about lobbyists' allegations that Rep. Bob Ney accepted gifts for official acts have emerged in the Justice Department's investigation of congressional corruption." Ohio Democrats "see corruption as a pervasive and distinctly Republican problem in Ohio that they must exploit in every competitive race, while national Democrats' zeal has been tempered by a bribery investigation against one of their own, Rep. William Jefferson of Louisiana." The national Democrats' "issues-first perspective can be seen in one of their most favored challengers - Rep. Sherrod Brown, who is running for Senate against GOP Sen. Mike DeWine." Political analyst Stuart Rothenberg said "corruption is a clear theme for Democrat Zack Space in his race against Ney, and will be just as important for Mary Jo Kilroy against Rep. Deborah Pryce and for John Cranley against Rep. Steve Chabot - even though Pryce and Chabot are not connected to scandals by anything more than party."

Democrats Lead GOP By 16 Points On Generic Ballot In USA Today/Gallup Poll. USA Today (6/28, Page, 2.31M) reports, "Americans are paying unusually close attention to the congressional elections in November, a USA TODAY/Gallup Poll finds. They are more inclined to deliver significant gains to Democrats than in any year since Republicans won control of the House and Senate in 1994." Respondents "are more concerned about national issues than local ones — a situation that favors Democrats hoping to tap discontent over the Iraq war and gasoline prices — and prefer Democrats over Republicans on handling every major issue except terrorism." For Republicans, President Bush "looms as a significant drag: 40% of Americans say they are less likely to vote for a candidate who supports Bush. A fifth say they are more likely." The poll "of 1,000 adults Friday through Sunday has an error margin of +/-3 percentage points." By "54%-38%, the registered voters surveyed say they'd vote for a Democratic congressional candidate over a Republican one if the election were held today."

Democrats Seen As Handicapped By Lack Of Single Messenger. Roll Call (6/28, Billings) reports congressional Democrats have "spent more than a year struggling to craft what they hope is a winning message and agenda, but their biggest challenge may be one they can't fix with focus groups and slogans: lack of a singular messenger." In a "perennial problem for a minority, Democrats are denied both the bully pulpit of the White House and the instant credibility of a Speaker or Senate Majority Leader. And many view the top national Democratic leaders as either too polarizing to unify the party or too obscure to command widespread attention." While "emboldened by President Bush's sagging poll numbers and internal GOP divisions on key issues, Democrats also acknowledge they face major challenges in convincing voters to hand them power them without a prominent figure to call their drumbeat." Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid is "a social moderate who prefers to play a behind-the-scenes strategic role than that of spokesman," while House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) is "an outspoken liberal who enjoys the spotlight but is viewed as too far to the left for many in her party." Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean is "outspoken" but "arguably the Democrat whom Republicans most love to hate." Other Democrats "share a high public profile, including Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.), John Kerry (Mass.), Edward Kennedy (Mass.) and increasingly newcomer Barack Obama (Ill.), but most have their own separate political ambitions or agendas that so far have kept them from becoming unifying figures."

DOJ_NMG_0036882

DCCC Hopes To Defeat Reynolds. The Hill (6/28, Kaplan) reports Democrats "would like nothing better than to make an example of a Republican leader and they have Rep. Tom Reynolds (R-N.Y.), chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC), in their crosshairs." Speaking to reporters last month, Reynolds "suggested that he and Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC) Chairman Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.) are like two tennis players and Emanuel has forced Reynolds to raise the level of his game." Despite their "gentlemanly respect," Emanuel has "recruited multimillionaire Democrat Jack Davis, whom Reynolds defeated in 2004 with 56 percent of the vote" and "the two chairmen have spent the past nine months trash-talking while trading allegations of corruption." Some political observers "say Emanuel will seek a leadership bid in the next Congress and others have speculated that Reynolds has his eye on replacing House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) when the Illinois lawmaker retires. November's results will have a significant impact on the leadership aspirations of both men."

Democrats Tell Judge DeLay's Exit Harms Party. Time (6/28, Hylton) reports in a "Web exclusive" that Democrats "miss him so terribly that they are trying to persuade a federal judge to keep former Congressman Tom DeLay's name on the ballot this fall. Allowing the Texas Republican Party to replace DeLay, who says he lives and votes in Virginia, would cause great harm to the Democratic Party, the party's lawyers argued in an Austin federal court Monday. Proving that claim is crucial to their lawsuit so Democrats testified just how much DeLay meant to them. Embarrassing? 'Maybe,' said Cris Feldman, an attorney for the Democrats, 'but necessary.'"

House GOP Unveils Values Agenda. Roll Call (6/28, Pershing) reports that with "little fanfare," House Republican leaders "unveiled a broad 'American Values Agenda,' composed of bills designed to appeal to the GOP's political base." The agenda "includes measures on topics such as abortion, cloning, religious freedom, flag burning and gun rights — all issues that resonate with social conservatives, some of whom have expressed misgivings about the party's recent direction." GOP leaders, "with the help of Rep. Joe Pitts (R-Pa.), the head of the Values Action Team, began crafting the agenda in May after holding a handful of meetings with prominent social conservative leaders."

CQ (6/27, Ferrechio) reports House GOP leaders "say they plan to take up a series of bills next month favored by the Republican Party's socially conservative base, including a constitutional amendment that would ban gay marriage (H J Res 88). GOP leaders said they also plan floor action on a series of tax cuts, including the child tax credit, 'marriage penalty' relief and tax incentives for those who adopt children." House Majority Whip Roy Blunt "said the bills will be spread out over the three weeks between the return from the weeklong July 4 recess and the start of the much longer August recess. The legislation includes top priorities of groups such as Focus on the Family and the Family Research Council."

Morris Says Lieberman Can't Win Primary. In his column in The Hill (6/28), Dick Morris says Sen. Joseph Lieberman "is in the process of committing suicide. By insisting on running in Connecticut's Democratic primary against anti-war candidate Ned Lamont, he is in a fight he won't win and, in the process, destroying his chances in the general election, which he can win." Primaries in Connecticut "are notoriously polarized. The right dominates the GOP nominating process just as surely as the left controls that of the Democrats. This is no place for a centrist to thrive." If Lieberman "simply skips the primary and runs as an independent, forcing a three-way race, he will win overwhelmingly. The larger Connecticut electorate adores him and will happily desert either party to vote for his reelection." But in "an August Democratic primary, with its low turnout and ideologically skewed voters, he faces decapitation. As surely as an American soldier on patrol in Iraq, his very presence in the Democratic primary provides a tempting target for those who want to vent their frustration at American foreign policy." The "inevitable dynamics of this primary are likely to flow toward the challenger as he picks up money, support and recognition and offers a way to do something there is no other way to do: Vote against the war."

DOJ_NMG_0036883

Connecticut AFL-CIO Backs Lieberman. The New York Times (6/28, Yardley, 1.19M) reports, "Connecticut's largest labor union," the state AFL-CIO, "on Tuesday endorsed Senator Joseph I. Lieberman in the Democratic primary, although many union leaders, meeting at their state political convention, complained of his support for the war in Iraq and foreign trade agreements. Many sounded loud 'nays' when the voice vote was called." Most of the speakers "expressed support, noting the senator's efforts in his three terms to protect workers in industries ranging from clothing to submarine manufacturing. Many said, however, that his challenger, Ned Lamont, a businessman from Greenwich who owns a cable television company, is a fresh face who will better serve their interests and stand up to President Bush on issues like the war and trade."

Ehrlich Trails O'Malley By 16 Points Among Likely Voters In WPost Poll. The Washington Post (6/28, A1, Barnes, Deane, 744K) reports in a front page story that Maryland Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. "starts his reelection campaign today significantly trailing Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley, according to a new Washington Post poll. Although the state's voters give the governor good marks for the job he's done, they also appear inclined to return a Democrat to the governor's mansion." The poll "shows Ehrlich trailing O'Malley by 11 percentage points among registered voters," 40%-51%, "and 16 points among those who say they are 'absolutely certain' to vote in the Nov. 7 election," 39%-55%. The "deficit comes even though a majority of voters find Ehrlich likable, approve of the job he has been doing and believe that the 48-year-old former congressman from Baltimore County has a vision for the state." The telephone poll was "conducted among 902 registered voters June 19 to Sunday and has a margin of error of plus or minus 3 percentage points."

High Gasoline Prices Could Be Crimping Summer Travel Plans. USA Today (6/28, De Lollis, Hagenbaugh, 2.31M) reports, "Only 39.8% of consumers plan to take a vacation within the next six months, a 28-year low, the Conference Board said," and "a new USA TODAY/Gallup Poll supports the notion that high gas prices are crimping vacations," as "one-third of respondents in the survey of 1,000 adults taken Friday through Sunday said they are changing summer vacation plans because of higher gas prices." Of those, "37% said they would reduce the number of trips normally taken, while 26% said they're canceling plans or simply can't afford to vacation. Some 23% will take shorter trips." However, "the decline in vacation plans could also reflect a drop in employees who get paid time off," and "hotels are packed and airlines are nearly fully booked this summer."

WSJournal Calls On Buffett, Gates To Invest On Strengthening Capitalism. The Wall Street Journal (6/28, 2.11M) editorializes that after "Warren Buffett's pledge of more than $30 billion to the Gates Foundation," now "the nation's two wealthiest men have to prove…they can be as effective at giving away their money as they have been at making it. This is harder than it sounds." Still, the Foundation "seems to have avoided the worst pitfalls of many other large, politically correct foundations" and concentrated on problems, not advocating government solutions. Still, "with their tax-sheltered assets, modern foundations have no expiration date and have become hugely important players in policy debates, the culture and even politics," creating another "reason to watch how well the two men now deploy their gifts." The Journal would "suggest that they put at least a smidgen of their money back into strengthening the foundations of the free-market system that has allowed them to become so fabulously rich." There is a good in "reinvesting in the moral capital of a free society and trying to sustain and export free-enterprise policies."

WPost Praises DC's New HIV Testing Program. The Washington Post (6/28, A24, 744K) editorializes that the District of Columbia's "new drive to test everyone…between the ages of 14 and 84" for HIV, "which kicked off yesterday in Freedom Plaza, is long overdue." With the data, "the District can start issuing the kinds of reports on the spread of the virus that have long been standard in cities such as Baltimore and New York…and finally begin targeting its HIV funding effectively." This "ambitious plan" is "an appropriately bold counterpunch in the city's so-far losing fight with HIV." However, it "won't work, however, if District residents don't take the time to get tested." The Post then urges people to make time to do so.

Hamas-Fatah Political Deal Does Not Slow Israeli Move Into Gaza. ABC World News Tonight (6/27, story 4, 2:10, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Israeli forces have launched an operation against Palestinians in Gaza in retaliation for the abduction of an Israeli soldier. An Israeli official warned today that Israel and the Palestinians were at the edge of a cliff. There is concern, tonight, about both sides plunging into a new round of violence." ABC (Wright) added, "Tonight, Israeli tanks and troops are on the move into Gaza, in what could be the start of a major Israeli offensive." The CBS Evening News (6/27, story 10, 0:30, Schieffer, 7.66M) noted the Israelis "have been threatening action since Sunday when the militants tunneled under the border, killed two Israeli soldiers and abducted a third. Palestinian officials say the captured soldier is alive."

DOJ_NMG_0036884

NBC Nightly News (6/27, story 6, 1:20, Fletcher, 9.87M) said "Palestinian fighters are bracing for battle. Today, they were laying landmines, patrolling fields and building obstacles in the streets of the towns. It's all about a 19-year-old Israeli corporal who was abducted by Palestinian fighters Sunday. They raided an Israeli army post, killed two soldiers and escaped with one Israeli soldier. Now they want to swap him for women and young prisoners in Israeli jails. Israel says, no way."

On its front page, the Washington Post (6/28, A1, Wilson, 744K) reports the Israeli incursion "overshadowed an agreement earlier in the day by leaders of Hamas…on a unified political agenda advocated by Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas to ease the economic sanctions against the government." Hamas "agreed to establish a national-unity government as part of an accord signed by the largest Palestinian political factions," a move that "would signal a major shift by Hamas's political leaders, who for the first time would effectively endorse a two-state solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict." The Post adds that the pact "runs counter to views held by Hamas's hard-line leadership in exile headed by Khaled Mashal, whom Israeli officials say was behind the Sunday attack. Some Hamas leaders in Gaza, along with Abbas and Egyptian interlocutors, have called for" the kidnapped soldier's release.

The Financial Times (6/28, Biedermann) notes the Israeli "army said it did not intend to carry out a prolonged operation." The incursion "follows the failure of diplomatic efforts to secure the" soldier's release. Also, "the two leading Palestinian factions…have in effect reached agreement on a unified approach towards Israel and on internal Palestinian issues," which "was billed as promising an unprecedented implicit recognition of Israel by Hamas."

In a 1,336-word piece, the New York Times (6/28, Fisher, Erlanger, 1.19M) adds, "The prospect of an invasion, threatened by Israel if Corporal Shalit was not released, seemed to have pushed the Palestinians toward agreement after months of internal fighting." The Times says the deal "would move Hamas closer to recognition of Israel — a significant change — and would raise the possibility of renewed Western aid to the Palestinians." A final deal would "represent a victory for Mr. Abbas, who had threatened to put the issue to a referendum next month." On the prospect of an armed incursion, the Times says Secretary Rice "e on Tuesday called on Israel to give diplomacy more time. 'There really needs to be an effort now to try and calm the situation, not to let the situation escalate, and to give diplomacy a chance to work to try to get this release,' Ms. Rice told reporters…en route to Pakistan."

In an analysis piece, the Wall Street Journal (6/28, Leggett, 2.11M) says the incursion "could threaten a decade-long effort to build a viable and independent Palestinian government." The Palestinian Authority "is facing perhaps the biggest crisis in its existence," despite "a hint of optimism" emanating from the political agreement. "While the agreement appeared to demonstrate a willingness on the part of the two leaders to compromise with Israel, it is unclear if the document has the full support of Hamas." The "military campaign in Gaza could create enormous long-term complications. Widespread chaos could result if Palestinian security forces are scattered and infrastructure such as roads and schools are further damaged. Hospitals, already short on many supplies, could be overwhelmed." If the internal situation deteriorates, "Israel would be left with two choices: watching as a humanitarian and security crisis likely worsens, or assuming responsibility for providing basic services to roughly five million Palestinians, as Israel did before the 1990s Oslo peace process that led to the establishment of the Palestinian Authority quasi-government."

The Los Angeles Times (6/30, King, Ellingwood, 958K), Washington Times (6/28, Mitnick, 90K) and USA Today (6/28, 2.31M) run similar reports on the Israeli attack, while the Christian Science Monitor (6/28, Mitnick, 61K) analyzes its effect on Palestinian politics, in a story titled "Israeli Threat Unites Hamas, Fatah."

Israel Urged To Return To Targeted-Killing Policy. Michael Oren, senior fellow at the Shalem Center in Jerusalem, writes in the Wall Street Journal (6/28, 2.11M) that "while the operation may flex its military muscle, it cannot restore Israel's deterrence power or prevent future rocket attacks and kidnappings. Indeed, the attack may well prove Pyrrhic -- inflicting greater injury on Israel than on the Palestinians." Oren adds, "The quandary Israel confronts today originated in the unilateral withdrawal of all Israeli settlers and soldiers from Gaza last August. … There is, however, one way to avert a public relations disaster for Israel, to limit casualties, and to restore Israel's deterrence power: Israel must return to the targeted-killing policy that enabled Mr. Sharon to triumph over terrorist organizations. Israel must target those Palestinians who order others to fire rockets from within civilian areas but whose families are located safely away from the firing zones. No Hamas or Islamic Jihad leader should be immune from such reprisals -- neither Prime Minister Ismail Haniya nor Khaled Meshal, who masterminds Hamas from Damascus."

Khamenei Offers Mixed Message On Nuclear Program, Appoints Foreign Policy Advisors.

The New York Times (6/28, Fathi, 1.19M) reports Iranian Supreme Leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei said "that Iran had 'no use' to negotiate with the United States. But in a more positive gesture he said that the 'the ground was prepared' for talks over Iran's nuclear program." The Times notes, "This is the first that Mr. Khamenei has reacted to the idea of direct talks with the United States since a package of incentives was submitted to Iran on June 6," and quotes Khamenei saying, "We will not negotiate over our undeniable right of using nuclear technology with anyone. But if they recognize our right, we are willing to negotiate over controls, inspections and international guarantees. The ground for such negotiations has been prepared." White House spokesman Tony Snow "said he did not consider Mr. Khamenei's comments to be a snub and pointed that various leaders in Iran had offered different reactions to the incentive plan." The Times adds, "In a major shift of policy, Mr. Khamenei created a new foreign policy committee on Sunday and appointed former Foreign Minister Kamal Kharrazi, a moderate politician, to head the committee for five years. The committee has four other members, who are all moderate former ministers."

DOJ_NMG_0036885

The AP (6/28, Karimi) adds Khamenei "said Tuesday that Iran does not need negotiations with the United States over its nuclear program, apparently seeking to reassure hard-liners the country will not cave in," but Khamenei "did not give his position on the" West's incentives proposal.

Iran Courting Non-Western Powers On Nuclear Deal. The Los Angeles Times (6/28, Rubin, 958K) reports that Iranian diplomats are making dozens of visits "around the globe in recent weeks," as "high-ranking officials have touched down in Algeria, Tunisia, Yemen, China, Spain and Italy" in "part of an extensive international lobbying campaign to build support for Iran's position in talks over the future of its nuclear program." Diplomats and experts believe that "in order to make Tehran's case as strong as possible, Iranian officials are seeking broad international support, especially from outside the West." Meanwhile, "In the Middle East, Iranian officials are trying to use the nuclear talks as a vehicle for asserting themselves as the preeminent regional power."

Science Minister Says Islam Forbids WMD. The AP (6/28) reports Iranian Science and Research Minister Mohammad Mehdi Zahedi "told Indonesia's vice president Tuesday that his country has no plans to develop nuclear weapons because Islamic law outlaws the development of weapons of mass destruction." Zahedi "said that based on the Islamic principle, Iran must take advantage of all its potential resources including nuclear technology for the prosperity of its people." He also "called on Western countries not to…prevent developing nations from producing …nuclear power when it is designed for peaceful purposes."

Warner Says North Korea Missile Test May Not Be Imminent. The New York Times (6/28, Shanker, Sanger, 1.19M) reports, "The chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee said Tuesday that while North Korea showed clear signs of preparing a missile for a test launching, it remained uncertain whether it was fully fueled for an imminent firing." The chairman, Senator John W. Warner, "spoke on Capitol Hill after committee members received a closed-door briefing from officials of the Missile Defense Agency, the Defense Intelligence Agency and the defense secretary's office."

South Korea Urges China To Dissuade North From Testing Missile. The AP (6/28, Wong) reports, "South Korea's foreign minister urged China to use its influence to dissuade North Korea from testing a long-range missile, but Western diplomats on Tuesday questioned Beijing's influence over the reclusive communist state." South Korea's Ban Ki-moon and Chinese counterpart Li Zhaoxing "met for about an hour, discussing strategies to sway Pyongyang not to test-launch a missile and to resume six-nation talks on its nuclear weapons program." Ban "urged China to persuade North Korea not to test the missile, the South's Yonhap news agency reported, citing South Korea Foreign Ministry official Lee Hyuck, who attended Tuesday's talks."

Snow Warns North Korea Not To "Bluff." AFP (6/28) reports, "The United States warned North Korea against thinking it could use worries over a possible long-range missile to force the United States into direct talks. 'If it's a bluff for direct negotiations, it's not an advisable way to do it,' White House spokesman Tony Snow told a press briefing."

House Panel Approves India Nuclear Cooperation Deal. The Financial Times (6/28, Daniel, Sevastopulo) says the Administration "scored a key victory in securing congressional support for its historic agreement to allow civil nuclear co-operation with India when the House foreign relations committee voted 37 to five on Tuesday to allow it to proceed with legislation. The vote came after months of negotiations between administration officials and legislators." The Times adds, "Although the initial bill expanded from the two-page version submitted by the Bush administration to 30 pages, one aide closely involved in talks, said: 'In the operative language of the legislation there were no new conditions added.'" The Times says "many observers believe" Senate approval of the deal "will not come before" November's midterm elections.

The Wall Street Journal (6/28, Solomon, 2.11M) calls it a "foreign-policy victory for the Bush administration," and "the 37-5 vote was viewed by Democrats and Republicans as a positive indication that the White House's Indian initiative will win support from the full Congress this fall." The Washington Times/AP (6/28, Klug) reports that Rep. Jim Leach ""said the deal 'knifed' the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty." Rep. Henry J. Hyde, "and Rep. Tom Lantos of California, the committee's top Democrat and a supporter of the plan, said yesterday's legislation would strengthen Congress' role by having lawmakers vote only after they had seen a final version of the cooperation plan with India." The AFP (6/28) also covers this story.

DOJ_NMG_0036886

Koizumi To Visit US. The Washington Times (6/28, Kambayashi, 90K) reports that Japan "has taken steps to ensure a successful meeting" between President Bush and Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi, "agreeing last week to reopen its markets to American beef and announcing Monday that it will deploy advanced U.S. Patriot interceptor missiles on Japanese soil." Japanese analysts expect the two "will discuss the Iranian nuclear standoff, rising instability in Afghanistan and the threat posed by bird flu." However, Japan's "protocol-conscious press" is focused on "crowing that Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi will receive a more elaborate welcome than Chinese President Hu Jintao did." The "Japanese are sensitive to the contrast with the treatment given to the Chinese president when he visited Washington in April."

Japan's Actions May Be Hurting US Relations In Asia. The Christian Science Monitor (6/28, Marquand, 61K) reports, that Koizumi's visits to the Yasukuni shrine "'are not in the US interest, and as the US-Japan alliance gets stronger, the US should discourage them,' says Ezra Vogel, a senior Asia expert at Harvard University. The rest of Asia sees them as "a provocative denial of World War II Japanese aggression," and, "We need to tell Japan, as a friend, that the way it handles the shrine makes the US job in the region more difficult." However, "it is considered axiomatic in Japanese relations that overt or highly public commentary about domestic behavior by foreign politicians can scupper efforts to influence Tokyo." Also, "there are new US concerns about Japan's revisionism regarding its history with the US." A museum on the grounds of the shrine "suggests that the US, not Japan, was responsible for World War II."

Powell, Albright Advocate Fully-Funding Foreign Aid. The Washington Times (6/28, Stuhldreher, 90K) reports, "Former Secretaries of State Colin L. Powell and Madeleine K. Albright warned yesterday that proposed funding cuts for international programs could jeopardize national security." The House Appropriations Committee recently cut Bush's proposed budget "by nearly $3 billion, to $32.28 billion," and "Supporters of full funding argue that more money spent on international projects would not only increase global security, but also open up business opportunities abroad."

Somali Islamic Militia Accused Of Breaking Cease-Fire. The AP (6/28, Duhul) reports, "Islamic militiamen seized a checkpoint outside Somalia's capital Tuesday in an hourlong battle that killed six people, according to a clan leader who accused the militia of breaking a new cease-fire." The agreement, made last week, would "stop all military action and recognize the country's powerless, U.N.-backed interim government. But militia officials subsequently voted to replace their relatively moderate leader, who also had been reaching out to the West, with" Sheikh Hassan Dahir Aweys, "a radical cleric whom the U.S. accused of links to al-Qaida."

US Backs UN Conference On Reducing Illegal Arms. The New York Times (6/28, Hoge, 1.19M) reports, "the Bush administration gave its backing on Tuesday to a United Nations conference on curtailing the international flow of illegal arms, but warned delegates against adopting measures that would restrict individual possession of weapons." Secretary General Kofi Annan reminded "urged member countries to toughen existing laws governing arms deals," bit "said the conference was not contemplating a global ban on gun ownership." Some of his remarks "seemed to be referring to a campaign by the National Rifle Association, which has charged in mass mailings that the United Nations is plotting to take away Americans' guns through a treaty banning ownership." John R. Bolton, the United States ambassador to the United Nations, declined to comment on "why all three citizen delegates from the United States to the conference were prominent members of the gun lobby group." The Washington Times (6/28, Pisik, 90K) also covers this story.

Energy Wealth Strengthens Russia's Hand, Presents Headache For US. The Wall Street Journal (6/28, King, Cullison, 2.11M) reports, "The Bush administration is wrestling with a new challenge from abroad: an often strong-willed Russia made all the more assertive by its energy wealth." Russian President Vladimir Putin "delivered a hard-hitting speech yesterday, arguing that Russia's economic renaissance makes it an equal among other global powers," and "Bush aides say they worry that Russia's economic clout already is leading Moscow to overplay its hand on the diplomatic front." Russian "assertiveness has complicated life for an administration already struggling with falling approval ratings at home and the intractable conflict in Iraq" and "U.S. officials acknowledge that dealing with an increasingly cocky and robust Russia has complicated interactions with Moscow and made negotiations within the U.N. Security Council, where Russia holds a veto, more tricky." This is the "dilemma facing Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice" when she "arrives in Moscow today hoping to win Russia's support on international issues such as curbing Iran's nuclear ambitions, even as the Bush administration has stepped up criticism of Mr. Putin's policies both at home and toward Russia's nearest neighbors."

Belarus Vow To Retaliate For US Sanctions. The Washington Post (6/28, A23, 744K) reports in its "In the Loop" column that Belarus has "vowed to retaliate for the administration's decision to freeze the U.S. bank accounts of Belarusan President Alexander Lukashenko and other high-ranking officials. The sanctions, which also bar U.S. citizens from doing business with the Belarusans, were imposed for that government's human rights abuses, general corruption and thuggery, repression, election fraud and the disappearances of four regime critics. 'We'll apply appropriately symmetrical measures to George W. Bush and Condoleezza Rice,' Belarusan Security Council Secretary Viktor Sheiman vowed in a state television interview. 'We'll freeze their accounts and seize their assets' in Belarus."

DOJ_NMG_0036887

State Department Officials' Claims About Myanmar Called "Exaggerated." Chan Kyaw Aung, Consulate General of the Union of Myanmar, writes in a letter to the Wall Street Journal (6/28, 2.11M) that US Undersecretary of State Paula J. Dobriansky's June 19 op-ed "is based on exaggerated and fabricated reports. It also makes the groundless assertion that, in addition to Aung San Suu Kyi, 50 million people are living without basic freedoms and human rights in Burma. … Instead of taking such an aggressive approach and making such provocations, those who truly want to support democracy and prosperity in Myanmar should cooperate with its government to achieve the goal of implementing the Seven-Step Road Map for Democratic Transition in Myanmar."

Obrador's Relations With "Street Bosses" Raise Critic's Concerns. The Wall Street Journal (6/28, Lyons, 2.11M) reports, "Street bosses…have long been a staple of Mexican politics, but their influence was supposed to fade as the country's democracy matured. Instead, their power has expanded because they can provide jobs and housing to thousands of families made desperate by a sluggish economy." Throughout leftist presidential candidate Andres Manuel López Obrador's "political career, he has relied on mass protests to get what he wants." Now "his critics fear that if he wins the presidency he'll rely on street bosses…to achieve his aims, and if he loses he'll call on them to shut down cities."

Chavez Used In Mexican Attack Ads. The Washington Post (6/28, A14, Roig-Franzia, 744K) reports that Hugo Chavez's "face has been all over Mexican television at critical stages in this country's bitter mudfest of a presidential race." In fact, the "imagery has gotten so intense that Mexico's electoral commission has twice ordered television advertisements featuring the Venezuelan leader off the air." Obrador's opponents have been "linking the candidate to Chavez," and "Mexican political experts generally agree the tactic has been effective." Now, "as the campaign enters its final stage,…Obrador has begun responding more often to the comparisons to Chavez."

Obrador Criticized For "Messianic Populism." Enrique Krauze, editor of the magazine Letras Libres and the author of "Mexico: Biography of Power," writes in an op-ed in the New York Times (6/28, 1.19M), "Should Andrés Manuel López Obrador, the front-runner in Mexico's presidential race, emerge victorious on Sunday, it could usher in a form of Latin American leftism as yet unseen: messianic populism," and "Mexico's fragile democracy could become its first casualty." Now "millions of poor Mexicans, particularly in the center and south of the country, see in him what he sees in himself: a bestower of manna who will provide the poor with cash handouts and all the services of a great welfare state. His oratory increasingly blends the theological with the revolutionary." While "his platform is full of unrealizable initiatives," far "more troubling than his economics is his political messianism, which could undermine our democracy."

Samuelson Argues Mexican Economic Growth Won't Improve, No Matter Who Wins. Robert J. Samuelson writes in his column in the Washington Post (6/28, A25, 744K) that Mexico's slow economic growth is one reason it is "sending so many of its poorest citizens north." However, "Economies advance through the adoption of better technologies and business methods" and "in Mexico, this process is weak." It has "large, modern firms in semi-protected markets that limit the pressure to improve efficiency or lower prices" and "thousands of small firms…that theoretically aren't legal, because they haven't registered with the government and often don't pay taxes or comply with regulations on wages and hiring and firing," and thus "are virtually compelled to remain small and inefficient." This "frustrates rapid economic growth," and as each presidential candidate "might have trouble enacting his agenda without a legislative majority," it probably won't change soon.

China Announces Over $1 Billion In Bank Fraud. The Washington Post (6/28, D1, Goodman, 744K) reports, "The Chinese government disclosed $1.1 billion worth of fraud at" the Agricultural Bank of China, "one of the country's largest state-owned banks this week, underscoring the risks confronting foreign investors as they seek big stakes in China's precarious banking system." This comes "as China presses to eradicate the taint of corruption from its state-owned banks as it courts foreign capital in a bid to improve management practices," and "brings to the fore a basic question about the future of China's financial system: Are the state disclosures a sign that the government is indeed serious about fixing the troubles, or are they just another indication of the extent of the problems in a fundamentally shaky system? Analysts saw a little bit of both."

Chinese Government Responding To Rural Concerns Over Land Seizures. The Washington Post

DOJ_NMG_0036888

(6/28, A14, Cody, 744K) reports, "For 24 hours, thousands of rampaging farmers" in Sanzhou "unleashed their rage over confiscated farmland this month," and in "a twist: The villagers won significant concessions." Now "officials had pledged a high-level review of 750 acres of rice paddies and fish ponds, property that had been confiscated by the village committee and resold for development in what the villagers said was a corrupt transaction." This "stopped the violence after only a few serious injuries. More broadly, it dramatized the Chinese government's realization that farmers have a point when they complain that their land and their livelihoods are being unfairly swallowed up by relentless economic growth." The government, "in an indication of concern about the unrest among suddenly landless farmers, has launched a campaign to preserve the fields and paddies that feed China's 1.3 billion people" and "T become increasingly frank about the corruption that often accompanies land seizures, outraging farmers and corroding their willingness to abide by official decisions." Now there are "the first signs…that the campaign may be having an effect."

Taiwan's Chen Easily Beats Recall Attempt. The Washington Post (6/28, A21, Rickards, 744K) reports Taiwanese President Chen Shui-bian "easily survived a recall vote in Taiwan's legislature Tuesday but remained mired in scandals that have undermined his leadership and touched off a rancorous political struggle." A majority of lawmakers supported the recall, however that support fell well short of the two-thirds requirement. The Post adds, "Unless new irregularities are uncovered, Chen is now expected to remain in power for the last two years of his second four-year term. But he has been weakened by charges that his family and aides were involved in under-the-table deals, and buffeted by the political storm those charges have generated." Politics and decision making in Taipei "appeared headed for a period of instability that is likely to overshadow relations with China and perhaps brake Chen's attempts to push the self-ruled island toward formal independence." The New York Times/AP (6/28) also covers this story.

Oman Trade Deal Rouses Groups For, Against Pact. Roll Call (6/28, Ackley) reports, "Groups for and against a Bush administration free-trade agreement with the Persian Gulf nation of Oman are stepping up their lobbying efforts, promising to fight just as hard as they did in last summer's bitter battle over the Central American Free Trade Agreement." Opponents "say Oman's labor and environmental standards are abysmal," and "while the pro-agreement side argues that Oman is a key strategic Middle East ally, especially in the war on terror, opponents counter that the trade agreement could hinder Congressional intervention when it comes to potential national security matters." Both sides agree that "the stakes are higher than they ordinarily might be because this is an election year."

Schwab Says WTO Talks Eventually Will Succeed. AFP (6/28, Raab) reports the United States "voiced optimism that struggling global trade negotiations would eventually succeed, even if a crucial WTO meeting in Switzerland this week fails." After meeting with lawmakers Tuesday, US Trade Representative Susan Schwab said, "We're going to try to get this done as soon as we can, rather than say if we don't get it done by the weekend it won't happen." Although deadlines are "important," Schwab added, "but deadlines in and of themselves are not going to create a good agreement." The World Trade Organization opens its latest round of talks Thursday in Geneva.

US Lawmakers Prefer No Deal To Bad Deal. The AP (6/28) reports US lawmakers said Tuesday they "would rather have no deal than a bad deal" when global trade talks commence this week in Geneva. Congress "won't support concessions beyond the existing offer from the US to cut farm subsidies," House Agriculture Committee chairman, Rep. Bob Goodlatte, said. "No other country has introduced a proposal that even comes close to the US proposal," Goodlatte continued.

Friedman Says Profitable Eco-Friendly Businesses Needed To Preserve Amazon. In his column in the New York Times (6/28, 1.19M), Thomas Friedman writes that the Amazon rain forest is "endangered by what Tim Killeen, a senior biologist and researcher at Conservation International, identifies as three converging forces: rising commodity prices driven by rapid growth in China, plans by leaders in South America to integrate their infrastructure and highways to create a continental economy…and some new climate models that predict that global warming could make the Amazon so hot and dry that within a century it could mutate from a rain forest into a savannah." These cannot be stopped by "protests by do-gooders." Instead, "profitable eco-friendly business alternatives — to counter the eco-hostile ones" are needed, or "the economic predators of this rain forest will eventually have their day."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:

"Fear And Posing In Baghdad."
"Israeli Troops And Armor Surge Into Gaza."
"Flag Measure Fails By 1 Vote."

DOJ_NMG_0036889

"Cities May Lose Power Over Cable TV."
"Some See Iran's Faculty Exodus As A New Purge."
"Secondhand Smoke: It's All Bad."

USA Today:
"Senate Rejects Flag Bill By 1 Vote."
"Film Legend, Rising Star Wearing 'Prada' Well."
"Summer Vacations Run On Empty."

New York Times:
"Israeli Troops Move Into Gaza; Bridges Are Hit."
"Flag Amendment Narrowly Fails In Senate Vote."
"Anglican Plan Threatens Split On Gay Issues."
"Charities Tied To Doctors Get Drug Industry Gifts."
"Despite Protests, Rent Board Sets 7.25% Increase."
"Push For New Tactics As War On Malaria Falters."

Washington Post:
"Israeli Troops Move Into Gaza."
"No Rest For The Wet And Weary."
"Poll Shows Ehrlich Lagging As He Opens Reelection Run."
"U.S. Details Dangers Of Secondhand Smoking."
"The Superhighway To Everywhere."
"Senate Rejects Flag-Burning Amendment."

Washington Times:
"Senate Warms To 'Border First.'"
"Abbas, Hamas Strike A Deal."
"Homes Condemned After Floods."
"Anglican Leader Ponders A Split."
"Haircut, Shave Can Mean Life Or Death In Baghdad."
"Treasures Pulled From A Briny Tomb."
"Splitting Heirs Over Wealth."

Detroit Free Press:
"Should Girls Get Shots For Virus At 9?"
"Thousands Line Up For Delphi Jobs."
"Detroit, Flint Insurance Could Cost Less."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Flag Measure Dies By 1 Vote."
"Emory Left Out Of Loop In King Deal."
"Cutting The Internet Cord."
"Secondhand Smoke 'Serious Health Hazard.'"
"Dubai's legal System May Prove Harsh As Austin Faces Drug Trial."

Houston Chronicle:
"Health Alert Could Help City Expand Smoking Ban."
"Apartment Fire Kills Three Children Left With No Adults."
"'Railroad Killer' Offers Apology At Execution."
"Ban On Flag Desecration Comes Up One Vote Short."
"Soldier's Death 'Touched A Nerve.'"

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Second Hand Smoke; Mid-Atlantic Rains; Senate-Flag Burning Amendment; Israel-Gaza Offensive; Guantanamo Bay Conditions; Missouri-Elks Lodge Collapse; Bush, Amputee Run; Missing WWII Sub Found.
CBS: Mid-Atlantic Rains; White House Elm Tree; Western Wildfires; Military Vehicles-Repair Costs; Bush, Amputee Run; Senate-Flag Burning Amendment; Minimum Wage Debate; Secondhand Smoke; Gates Foundation-Disease Prevention; Israel-Gaza Offensive; Student Debt; Harry Potter-Character Deaths.
NBC: Secondhand Smoke; Secondhand Smoke-Analysis; Smoking Bans-Economic Impact; Senate-Flag Burning Amendment; Mid-Atlantic Rains; Israel-Gaza Offensive; Stock Markets; Justice Department-Terrorism Prosecutions; Katrina-Wasteful Spending; Sleep Deprivation; Bush, Amputee Run; Gates Foundation-Disease Prevention; Misplaced Buffett Pledge Documents.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: Rumsfeld-North Korea; South Korean President-ID Theft; Israel-Gaza Offensive; Limbaugh-Detained At Airport; TX-Murderer Executed.
CBS: Israel-Gaza Offensive; Northeast-Heavy Rain; Bush Runs With Wounded Soldier; TX-Yates Retrial.
NPR: Israel-Gaza Offensive; Senate-Flag Desecration; VA-Personal Data Theft; Foreign Stock Markets; Rice-Afghanistan; Nepal-Drought.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.
White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Speaks about the line item veto, JW Marriott Hotel; photo opportunity with Staff Sgt. Christian Bagge, Oval Office; participates in a meeting with the National Endowment for Democracy Award recipients, Oval Office; Participates in a run with Staff Sgt. Christian Bagge, South Lawn.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: 10 a.m. JOINT ECONOMIC _ Full Committee. Hearing on prospects for continued economic expansion. Council of Economic Advisers Chairman Edward Lazear. Location: Room 2118, Rayburn.

9 a.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Labor, HHS, Education and Related Agencies Subcommittee. Hearing on the impact of deriving human pluripotent stem cell lines using techniques that do no knowingly harm embryos. James Battey of the NIH Stel Cell Task Force; Stephen Strom of the University of Pittsburgh; Alan Leshner, American Association for the Advancement of Science. Location: Room 192, Dirksen.

10 a.m. COMMERCE, SCIENCE AND TRANSPORTATION _ Full Committee. Markup of the Communications Act of 2006. Location: Room 216, Hart.

DOJ_NMG_0036890

10 a.m. ENERGY AND NATURAL RESOURCES _ Full Committee. Hearing on implementation of the Energy Policy Act provisions on enhancing oil and gas production on federal lands in the Rocky Mountain region. BLM Director Kathleen Clarke; Jeffrey Eppink, vice president and treasurer, Advance Resources International Inc.; Mary Flanderka, Wyoming state planning coordinator; Tom Reed, Wyoming field coordinator, Trout Unlimited; Duane Zavadil, vice president, Government and Regulatory Affairs, Bill Barrett Corp., Denver. Location: Room 366, Dirksen.

10 a.m. FINANCE _ Committee on Finance meets to consider nomination of Henry Paulson to be Secretary of the Treasury. Location: Room 106, Dirksen.

10 a.m. HOMELAND SECURITY AND GOVERNMENTAL AFFAIRS _ Subcommittee on Oversight of Government Management, the Federal Workforce and the District of Columbia. Hearing to conduct a management review of the Office of Personnel Management. With David Walker, Comptroller General, Government Accountability Office and Linda Springer, director, Office of Personnel Management. Location: Room 342, Dirksen.

10 a.m. SPECIAL AGING _ Full Committee. Hearing on medical tourism and possible cost savings. Bruce Cunningham, American Society of Plastic Surgeons; Arnold Milstein, Mercer Health & Benefits; Bonnie Blackley, corporate benefits director, Blue Ridge Paper Products; and Rajesh Rao, CEO, IndUShealth. Location: Room 215, Dirksen.

10:30 a.m. JUDICIARY _ Full Committee. Hearing on presidential signing statements. Location: Room 226, Dirksen.

2:30 p.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Energy and Water Subcommittee. Markup of the House Energy-Water Appropriations bill. Location: Room 138, Dirksen.

2:30 p.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Homeland Security Subcommittee. Markup of the Homeland Security appropriations bill. Location: Room S-128, Capitol.

2:30 p.m. BANKING, HOUSING AND URBAN AFFAIRS _ Housing and Transportation Subcommittee. Oversight hearing on the SAFETEA-LU Act. FTA Deputy Administrator Sandra Bushue; Kate Siggerud, GAO; William Millar, President, American Public Transportation Association. Location: Room 538, Dirksen.

2:30 p.m. SELECT INTELLIGENCE _ Full Committee. Closed briefing in pending matters. Location: Room 219, Hart.

US House: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 9 a.m. Meets for morning hour debate, then for legislative business at 10 a.m. Highlights: Suspensions (3 bills): 1) H.R. 42 - Freedom to Display the American Flag Act of 2005; 2) H.R. 5341 - Seasoned Customer CTR Exemption Act of 2006; 3) H.Res. 854 - Recognizing National Homeownership Month and the importance of homeownership in the United States. H.R. 4973 - Flood Insurance Reform and Modernization Act of 2006. H.R. 5672 - Science, State, Justice, Commerce, and Related Agencies Appropriations Act for Fiscal Year 2007.

10 a.m. JOINT ECONOMIC _ Full Committee. Hearing on prospects for continued economic expansion. Council of Economic Advisers Chairman Edward Lazear. Location: Room 2118, Rayburn.

9:30 a.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Military Quality of Life and Veterans Affairs and Related Agencies Subcommittee. Hearing on the recent VA data security breach. David McIntyre, Jr., President, TriWest Healthcare Alliance; Dennis Hoffman, EMC Corp.; VA Secretary Nicholson. Location: Room H-140, Capitol.

9:45 a.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Interior and Related Agencies Subcommittee. Markup of the Interior-Environment appropriations bill. Location: Room 124, Dirksen.

10 a.m. ENERGY AND COMMERCE _ Subcommittee on Oversight and Investigations. Hearing entitled, ``Making the Internet Safe for Kids: The Role of ISPs and Social Networking Sites," to discuss child pornography and sexual exploitation. With Chris Hansen, NBC News; John Ryan, America Online Inc.; Dave Baker, Earthlink; Elizabeth Banker, Yahoo! Inc.; Tom Dailer, Verizon; Philip Reitinger, Microsoft; Gerard Lewis, Comcast Cable Communications; and Nicole Wong, Google Inc. Location: 2123 Rayburn.

10 a.m. GOVERNMENT REFORM _ Federalism and the Census Subcommittee. Hearing on administration proposals for the Community Development Block Grant Program. Location: Room 2154, Rayburn.

10 a.m. INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS _ Full Committee. Markup of pending legislation. Location: Room 2172, Rayburn.

10 a.m. RESOURCES _ Water and Power Subcommittee and Forests and Forest Health Subcommittee. Joint hearing on forest management on federal rights of wat to ensure reliable electricity service. Location: Room 1324, Longworth.

10 a.m. TRANSPORTATION AND INFRASTRUCTURE _ Railroads Subcommittee. Hearing on current FRA rail safety initiatives. FRA Administrator Joseph Boardman; Association of American Railroads CEO Edward Hamberger; James Stem of the United Transportation Union. Location: Room 2167, Rayburn.

10 a.m. VETERANS AFFAIRS _ Health Subcommittee. Hearing on the DVA health care for veterans in rural communities. Jonathan B. Perlin, undersecretary of Veterans Affairs; Patricia Vandenberg, assistant deputy undersecretary of Veterans Affairs; Adam Darkins, chief consultant for care coordination, Department of Veterans Affairs; Robert Petzel, network director, VA Midwest Health Care Network; David Hartley, director, Division of Rural Health, Muskie School of Public Services, University of Southern Maine; Graham L.

DOJ_NMG_0036891

Adams, president, National Organization of State Offices of Rural Health. Location: Room 334, Cannon.

10 a.m. - 12 p.m. SCIENCE _ Full Committee. Markup of H.R. 5656, Energy, Research, Development, Demonstration, and Commercial Application Act of 2006. Location: 2318 Rayburn.

2 p.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Full Committee. Hearing on Army and Marine Corps reset strategies for gound equipment and rotor craft. Army Chief of Staff Gen. Peter Schoomaker; Marine Corps Commandant Gen. Michale Hagee. Location: Room 2118, Rayburn.

2 p.m. ENERGY AND COMMERCE _ Subcommittee on Telecommunications and the Internet. Hearing on ``The Audio and Video Flag: Can Content Protection and Technological Innovation Coexist?" With Mitch Bainwol, Chairman, Recording Industry Association of America; Andrew Levin, Executive Vice President and Chief Legal Officer, Clear Channel Communications, on bahalf of the National Association of Broadcasters; Stewart Harris, songwriter, on Songwriters Guild of America; Ruth Ziegler, Deputy General Counsel, Sirius Satellite Radio; Fritz Attaway, Executive Vice President and Special Policy Advisor, Motion Picture Association of America; Gary Shapiro, President and CEO, Consumer Electronics Association; and Gigi Sohn, President, Public Knowledge. Location: Room 2322, Rayburn House Office Building.

2 p.m. GOVERNMENT REFORM _ Criminal Justice, Drug Policy and Human Resources Subcommittee. Hearing on clinical lab quality. Location: Room 2247, Rayburn.

2 p.m. GOVERNMENT REFORM _ National Security, Emerging Threats and International Relations Subcommittee. Hearing on sexual assaults against women in the military. Delilah Rumberg, National Sexual Violence Resource Center; Christine Hansen, The Miles Foundation; Beth Davis, former United States Air Force Academy cadet; Kaye Whitley, Acting Director Sexual Assault Prevention and Response Office, Defense Department; Vice Admiral Rodney P. Rempt, Superintendent of the Naval Academy; Brigadier General Robert L. Caslen, Jr., Commandant of the United States Military Academy; Brigadier General Susan Y. Desjardins; Commandant of the United States Air Force Academy; Rear Admiral Paul J. Higgins, Director of Health & Safety, Coast Guard. Location: Room 2154, Rayburn.

2 p.m. INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS _ Africa, Global Human Rights and International Operations Subcommittee. Hearing on safe blood transfusions in Africa. Caroline Ryan, Office of the Global Aids Coordinator; Jerry Holmberg, HHS; Karen Shoos Lipton, CEO, AABB; Robert Ferris, USAID; Edward Green, Paresidential Advisory Council on HIV/AIDS; Neelam Dhingra, WHO. Location: Room 2172, Rayburn.

2 p.m. TRANSPORTATION AND INFRASTRUCTURE _ Subcommittee on Highways, Transit and Pipelines. Oversight hearing on ``Celebrating 50 Years: The Eisenhower Interstate Highway System." Richard Capka, Administrator, Federal Highway Administration; Jonathon Gifford, George Mason University; Tom Lewis, Skidmore College; Gene McCormick, Chairman, American Road & Transportation Builders Association. Location: Room 2167, Rayburn.

2:30 p.m. JUDICIARY _ Constitution, Civil Rights and Property Rights Subcommittee. Hearing on federal examiners and observers at elections. Location: Room 226, Dirksen.

2:30 p.m. SMALL BUSINESS _ Workforce, Empowerment and Government Programs Subcommittee. Hearing on immigrant employment verification. Location: Room 2360, Rayburn.

Other: RELIGION-POVERTY _ Faith and lay leaders from across the country attend the annual Christian Mobilization, sponsored by Sojourners and Call to Renewal. Highlights: 8:30 a.m. DNC Chairman Howard Dean speaks. 9 a.m. Amos and Joseph Award ceremony, with Marian Wright Edelman and Sen. Barack Obama. At the church. 11 a.m. March to the Capitol. Begins at the church. 12 p.m. Rally with speakers from national religious denominations and organizations. Upper Senate Park. 5 p.m. Dialogue with Sens. Hillary Clinton, Blanche Lincoln, Sam Brownback and Rick Santorum. Room 902, Hart. Location: National City Christian Church, 5 Thomas Circle, unless otherwise noted.

POWELL-ALBRIGHT _ 8 a.m. US Global Leadership Campaign and US Chamber of Commerce hosts roundtable discussion with former secretaries of state Colin Powell and Madeleine Albright. Admiral Edmund Giambastiani, Vice Chairman, Joint Chiefs of Staff, also participates. Location: 1615 H St. NW.

WORKERS-JORDAN _ 8:30 a.m. The AFL-CIO sponsors a panel of international labor, economic, and trade policy experts discussing worker rights violations in Jordan. Speakers include AFL-CIO Policy Director and Chief International Economist Thea M. Lee, General Secretary of the General Federation of Jordanian Trade Unions Mazen al Ma'ayta, Center for American Progress President and CEO John Podesta, and CAP Senior Fellow Gene Sperling. Location: Center for American Progress, 10th floor, 1333 H St. NW.

COMMERCE SECRETARY GUTIERREZ _ 9 a.m. Commerce Secretary Gutierrez meets with Korean Minister of Commerce, Industry and Energy Dr. Chung Sye Kyun. Location: Commerce Department.

ELECTRONIC VOTING _ 10 a.m. Rep. Rush Holt, others, hold a news conference on electronic voting machines. Location: Room 2456, Rayburn.

FDA FAILURES _ 10 a.m. News conference with advocates of food- and drug/medical device-safety to condemn the FDA's failure to protect Americans from dangerous drugs and unsafe food ingredients and the agency's domination by the industries it regulates. Participants include Rep. Henry Waxman, Sidney M. Wolfe of Public Citizen's Health Research Group, and Michael F. Jacobson, of the Center for Science in the Public Interest. Location: Room 2203, Rayburn.

DOJ_NMG_0036892

FOREIGN INVESTMENTS _ 10 a.m. The National Foundation for American Policy releases a comprehensive study by Johns Hopkins University scholars examining the economic and jobs impact of foreign investment on America and individual states. Participants include Stuart Anderson of NFAP; Daniel Hamilton of Johns Hopkins; and Joseph Quinlan, SAIS. Location: National Press Club.

GULF COAST REBUILDING _ 10 a.m. The Commerce Department holds a briefing for U.S. businesses on Gulf Coast rebuilding opportunities. Highlights: 10:05 a.m. Donald Powell, Federal Coordinator for Gulf Coast Rebuilding. 10:15 a.m. Commerce Secretary Gutierrez. 10:30 a.m. Briefing with HUD Deputy Secretary Roy Bernardi, Beth Tucker of the IRS, Art Garcia of the Treasury Department, and Steve Stockton of the Army Corps of Engineers. 11:20 a.m. Louisiana briefing with Gov. Kathleen Blanco. 11:40 a.m. Mississippi briefing with Gov. Haley Barbour (taped), Gary Swoope of the Mississippi Development Authority and Leland Speed of the authority. Location: Willard Inter-Continental Hotel, 1401 Pennsylvania Ave. NW.

SECONDHAND SMOKE _ 10 a.m. Surgeon General Richard Carmona releases the new ``Surgeon General's Report on The Health Consequences of Involuntary Exposure to Tobacco Smoke." Location: The Great Hall, Hubert H. Humphrey Building, 200 Independence Ave., SW.

US-CANADA ENERGY _ 10 a.m. The Canadian American Business Council holds a telephone briefing to release a poll on U.S. voter attitudes toward Canada and energy security. Contacts: Amy Weiss, 202-203-0448. Notes: Callin number: 800-274-0873. Media RSVP requested.

DEMOCRATS-PRESCRIPTION DRUGS _ 10:45 a.m. House Democrats will hold a news conference to outline their proposed changes to the prescription drug program. With House Minority Nancy Pelosi, Congresswoman Hilda Solis and Congressman Rahm Emanuel. Location: H-204, The Capitol.

BOEHNER _ 11:30 a.m. House Majority Leader Rep. John Boehner holds a pen and pad only briefing. Location: Room H-107, Capitol.

WOMEN'S GROUP HONORS _ 11:30 a.m. National Partnership for Women & Families honors Sen. Christopher Dodd, D-Conn., as a champion of the Family and Medical Leave Act; Paul Sprenger for a career helping victims of employment discrimination, including a case depicted in the film ``North Country"; and Madelyn Antoncic, Chief Risk Officer at Lehman Brothers, as a Wall Street trailblazer for women. Location: Washington Hilton Ballroom, 1919 Connecticut Ave. NW.

CAPITAL MARKETS _ 12 p.m. The Heritage Foundation hosts a forum entitled ``Restoring American Leadership in World Capital Markets," with speaker Rep. Tom Feeney, R-Fla., and comments by Alex Pollock, resident fellow, American Enterprise Institute, and David John, senior research fellow, The Heritage Foundation's Thomas A. Roe Institute for Economic Policy Studies. Location: Lehrman Auditorium, The Heritage Foundation, 214 Massachusetts Ave. NE.

GUANTANAMO _ 12 p.m. The Council on American-Islamic Relations holds a panel discussion on the need to close the Guantanamo Bay prison camp. Location: Room 2226, Rayburn.

RADIO FREQUENCIES _ 12 p.m. The Internet Caucus Advisory Committee, others, launch the first roundtable discussion on Radio Frequency Identification with Jeff Richards, VeriSign; Shannon Kellogg, RSA Security; Paula Bruening, Center for Democracy & Technology; Elizabeth Board, EPCglobal; others. Location: Room B-339, Rayburn.

SADDAM HUSSEIN _ 12 p.m. Attorneys for Saddam Hussein, including former Attorney General Ramsey Clark, hold a news conference on the case, including presentation of new evidence. Location: National Press Club.

ISLAM-US _ 12:15 p.m. The New America Foundation holds a discussion with author Robert Dreyfuss about ``The U.S. vs. The Evil Caliphate: The Phony Clash of Civilizations." Location: 7th floor, 1630 Connecticut Ave. NW.

REPUBLICANS-FLAG PROTECTION _ 12:15 p.m. Republican senators to hold news conference on the Flag Protection Amendment. With Majority Leader Bill Frist; Sen. Arlen Specter; Sen. Orrin Hatch; Sen. Jim Bunning; Sen. Conrad Burns; Sen. Sam Brownback; Sen. John Thune; and (Ret) Army Maj. Gen. Patrick Brady. Location: S-230, U.S. Capitol.

FLAG BURNING _ 12:30 p.m. Rep. Roscoe Bartlett holds a news conference to discuss the anticipated approval of H.R. 42, the Freedom to Display the American Flag Act of 2005. Location: Room 2325, Rayburn.

HOYER _ 12:30 p.m. House Democratic Whip Rep. Steny Hoyer holds a pen and pad only briefing. Location: Room H-306, Capitol.

OMAN-TRADE _ 12:30 p.m. Reps. Michael Michaud, Linda Sanchez, others, hold a press conference on the Oman Free Trade Agreement. Location: Cannon Terrace.

US-AUSTRALIA _ 1:15 p.m. The American Enterprise Institute holds a discussion with Australian Defense Minister Brendan John Nelson on the U.S.-Australian security alliance's future. Location: 12th floor, AEI, 1150 17th St. NW.

IMMIGRATION _ 2:30 p.m. Sens. Lindsey Graham, Edward Kennedy, John McCain and Ken Salazar, others, hold a news conference to call for comprehensive immigration reform. Location: Room 430, Dirksen.

DOJ_NMG_0036893

DEMOCRACY AWARDS _ 3:30 p.m. - 7:30 p.m. The National Endowment for Democracy holds a roundtable discussion and the presentation of the 2006 Democracy Awards. Four African democracy activists have been chosen to receive the award this year. With Zainab Bangura, activist, Sierra Leone, and chief civil affairs officer to the U.N. mission in Liberia; Alfred Taban, publisher and chairman, Khartoum Monitor, Sudan; Immaculee Birhaheka, co-founder, Promotion and Support of Women's Initiatives, Democratic Republic of the Congo; and Reginald Matchaba-Howe, chairman, Zimbabwe Election Support Network. Location: Room 345, Cannon.

HUMAN RIGHTS _ 4 p.m. The UN Association holds a panel discussion on the new UN Human Rights Council. Location: UN Foundation, 4th floor conference room, 1225 Connecticut Ave. NW.

HENRY KISSINGER _ 4 p.m. - 5:30 p.m. Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars holds a seminar on ``Henry Kissinger and the Dilemmas of American Power.'' With Thomas Schwartz, professor of history, Vanderbilt University. Location: Flom Auditorium, Woodrow Wilson Center, 1300 Pennsylvania Ave., NW.

ALBERTA-ENERGY _ 5 p.m. Alberta Premier Ralph Klein meets with Sen. Pete Domenici. Photo op and media availability. Location: Room 328, Hart.

MATH-SCIENCE _ 5 p.m. The Tapping America's Potential coalition holds a math and science fair and reception to emphasize the importance of Congress moving ahead on innovation and competitiveness policies. Location: Room B-357, Rayburn.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

DOJ_NMG_0036894

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Wednesday, June 28, 2006 9:49 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Wednesday, June 28, 2006
Attachments:	dojclips060628.pdf; dojclips060628.doc

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: WEDNESDAY, JUNE 28, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

US A-G Warns Of 'home-grown Terror' (JERP) 6
GOP Bill Targets NY Times (HILL) 6
GOP Measure Slams NYT For Bank Story (RC) 7
Senator Calls For Review Of Leaks Damage (AP-Y2) 8
Damage Study Urged On Surveillance Reports (NYT) 8
Inquiry Sought Into News Reports (LAT) 9
Civil Liberties Group Files Complaint In 17 Countries Against U.S. Mining Of Banking Data For Anti-terrorism Investigation (FINDLAW/AP) 10
Patriotism And The Press (NYT) 10
Suspect In Miami Terror Case Makes First Court Appearance (AP) 12
Sears Tower May Not Have Been Terror Plot's Only Chicago Target (WLS-TV) 12
Editorial: Sears Tower Threat Shows Terrorism A Serious Concern (ROCKRS) 13
Big Talk, No Bullets (MH) 13
Anonymous Jury Sought For Trial Of Man Accused Of Funding Hamas (KCS) 14
High-profile Terror Arrests Yield Small Sentences (NBC) 15
Guantanamo Officials Say They Can't Stop All Suicides (LAT) 15
Official: Gitmo Prisoners Waging "Jihad" (AP) 17
EU Official: Suspects Were Handed To U.S. (USAT) 18
Britain: 2 More Terrorism Arrests (NYT) 19
State Dept. Urges Libya To Pay Families (AP) 19
Libya Says It Needn't Finish Payments To Flight 103 Victims' Families (WP) 19

Homeland Response:

Nation's Ports Remain At Risk, Study Shows (KRT) 20
Court Says Personnel Rules Harm Bargaining (NYT) 21
Appeals Court Vetoes Bush Plan To Alter U.S. Personnel Rules (WP) 22
DHS Ruling Deals Administration A Setback (WP) 23
Appeals Court Upholds Rejection Of Homeland Security Personnel System (FEDTIMES) 24

War News:

Bush Jogs With Wounded Soldier (AP-Y2) 24
Amputee Iraq Vet Fulfills Wish, Jogs With Bush (USAT) 25
He Came A Long Way For That White House Jog (LAT) 26
Kerry And Feingold Form Alliance On Iraq (AP-Y2) 26
Democrats Attack GOP On Iraq Bills (WT) 27
Staying On Message -- Nixon's Message (WP) 28
Turning To The U.N., Again (WP) 29
20 Held In U.S. Soldiers' Slaying (WT) 31
U.S. Tells Of Hunt For Kidnapped GIs (LAT) 31
Crackdown In Baghdad Going Slowly, U.S. Says (USAT/AP) 32
Fear And Posing In Baghdad (LAT) 33
Haircut, Shave Can Mean Life Or Death In Baghdad (WT) 35
Shi'ite Iraqi Militia Regroups Into 'Gang Of Thugs' (WT) 36
U.S. Military Expects To Meet Training Goal For Iraqi Security Forces (WP) 37
U.S. General Says Iraqi Army Will Be Built By End Of The Year (NYT) 37
Amnesty To Exclude Killers Of GIs, Iraqis (WP) 38
Iraqi Says Attacks On U.S. Won't Be Pardoned (NYT) 39
Iraq Leader Cites Rebel Interest In Amnesty (LAT) 40
A Road Map Home (WP) 42
Talking With Iraqi Insurgents (NYT) 43
U.S. Urged To Press Kurds In Iraq (WT) 44
Hussein To Face Genocide Charges In Anfal Trial (LAT) 45
Rice Strives To Close Afghan-Pakistani Rift (WP) 45
Rice Gently Prods Pakistan To Have Democratic Elections (NYT) 46
Rice Seeks To Ease Neighbors' Tensions (WT) 47
Condoleezza Rice Visits Pakistan (LAT) 48

Bomb Kills 2 Boys And Fighting Claims 2 Britons In Afghanistan (NYT) 49
Afghans Tell Troops: 'No Security, No Help' (CSM) 50
Websites Connecting Americans' Generosity, Servicemembers' Needs (USAT) 51

DOJ:

Justice Dept., Archives And IRS To Stay Shuttered Rest Of Week (WP) 52
Mid-Atlantic Region Braces For More Rain (AP-Y2) 53
Eastern States Preparing For More Rain And Floods (NYT) .. 54
Federal Agencies Still Recovering From Flooding (GOVEXEC) 55
U.S. Attorney In Brooklyn Is Said To Be Choice For Federal Bench (NYT) 55

Corporate Scandals:

VeriSign Receives Options Subpoena (AP) 56
Rambus Warns Stock Option Trouble May Wipe Out Some Past Profits (AP) 57
Rambus Stock-Options Errors May Require Restatements (WSJ) 57
UPDATE: Cyberonics Subpoenaed By U.S. Justice Department (DOW) 58
European Court Refuses To Halt Extradition Of Bankers (Update3) (BLOOM) 59
Enron Bankers' Extradition Moves Forward (FINDLAW/AP) ... 60
Barred Broker, Partner Get Prison For $14 Million Commodities Fraud (FINDLAW/AP) 61
Did Hilfiger Corp. Get Special Treatment From DOJ? (LAW) 61
Hedge Funds Sharpen Their Political Game (WSJ) 62
UPDATE: Senators To Scrutinize Hedge Funds (DOW) 64
Morgan Stanley Paying $10M Fine To Settle SEC Charges On Safeguarding Information (LAW/AP) 65
Morgan Stanley Settles With SEC On Systems Issue (WSJ) .. 65
Morgan Stanley Fined Over Insider Accounts (USAT) 66
CA To Add Shareholder Proposal After Court Refuses To Rule (WSJ/AP) 67

Criminal Law:

The Disaster Without End (NYT) 67
Venerable Church Burns In New Orleans (NYT) 68
Photo Shows Ney At Meeting He Can't Remember (NBC) 69
Photo Shows Ney In Meeting With Tribe (AP-Y2) 70
Lawmakers Tackle Online Child Porn (AP-Y2) 70
Senators Adopt Web Labeling Requirement (CNET) 71
Defense Says South Korean Businessman Was No Iraqi Agent (NSDY/AP) 72
Saddam Gave Bizman 2.5M : Feds (NYDN) 73
Feds Tell Jury: Say 'Enough' To Political Hiring (CHIT) 73
Prosecutors: 'The Fix Was In' (CHIST) 75
Tech Pair Indicted On Charges They Deleted E-mails In Fumo Probe (AP) 76
2 Computer Aides To Sen. Fumo Charged Formally (PHI) 76
2 Ex-computer Aides Of Fumo Indicted (PHI) 77
FBI Was Slow To Check Pellicano's Audio Lab (LAT) 78
Judge Declines To Release Galante, For Now (DANNT) 80
Judge Declines To Release Indicted Trash Magnate, For Now (AP) 80
Gotti Says He'll Leave NY If Cleared (SFC/AP) 81
GOTTI IS TRYING TO BURY MURDER EVIDENCE (NYPOST) 81
Ex-FBI Agent Testifies On Disputed Bulger Visit (BOS) 81
Hunt For Bulger Lands In Chicago (BOS) 82
Jury In Aryan Brotherhood Trial In U.S. Must Decide Whether To Believe Killers (FINDLAW/AP) 83
Charges Call Doctor A Fraud With Patients, Immigrants (FREEP) 84
Dearborn Physician Held On Fraud Charges (DEN) 84
"Railroad Killer" Executed In Texas Death (AP) 85
Texas Executes The 'Railway Killer' (NYT) 86
Tennessee Holds 1st Execution In 45 Years (AP) 86
US Justice Department Asked To Submit Brief In Oklahoma Case (AP) 87
Federal Judge Orders Missouri To Stop All Executions (LAT) 87
Research Center Created To Study Evolving Threats Of Identity Fraud (WSJ) 88
Judge Won't Release Hoffa Search Affidavit (FINDLAW/AP) ... 89
Jury Finds Serial Killer Guilty Of 4 Murders (LAT) 89
Reasonable Doubt At Duke (WP) 90
Coast Guard Cadet To Ask For Leniency (AP) 91

Civil Law:

State To Pay $8.3 Million To Settle Technology Fraud Claims (AP) 92
U.S. Asks Judge To Dismiss Budget Lawsuit (AP) 92
AT&T To Settle Fraud Case For $2.9M (BLOOM) 93
Charities Tied To Doctors Get Drug Industry Gifts (NYT) 93
FEC Unleashes Its Lawyers (HILL) 97
Court Rules Correctly On Clean Money (LAT) 99

Civil Rights:

Justice Agrees To Indiana Plan To Purge Voter Rolls (AP) 99
U.S. Probing Woodmere Officers' Firings (CLPD) 100

DOJ_NMG_0036897

Agreement Would Make Public Buildings More Handicapped Accessible (KTBS-TV) 100
Senator Wants IRS To Chase After Pimps (USAT) 101
In Senate, It's Déjà Vu All Over Again On Voting Rights Act Extension (HILL) 102
Rank And File Cut Out Of VRA Talks (RC) 103
Osceola To Take Hispanic Voting Rights Issue To Court (ORS) 104
A Single Person Could Swing An Election (WP) 104
Appeals Court Upholds Little Rock Order (FINDLAW/AP) 105
Senate Bars Constitutional Amendment On Flag Burning (Update1) (BLOOM) 105
Flag Amendment Narrowly Fails In Senate Vote (NYT) 106
Flag-Burning Amendment Fails In Senate By 1 Vote (WSJ) 108
Flag Amendment Rejected By One Vote In Senate (LAT) 108
Senate Rejects Flag Desecration Amendment (WP) 109
Senate Rejects Flag Desecration Amendment (AP-Y2) 111
Senate Nixes Old Glory Amendment (HILL) 112
Not Quite The Banner Day One Might Have Hoped For (WP) 113
US Senate Turns Down Constitutional Ban On Flag Burning (AFP) 114
Flag Amendment Fails In Senate (WT) 115
Senate Rejects Flag Bill By 1 Vote (USAT) 116
Senator Clinton And Liberals Split Over Flag Desecration (NYT) 116
Arresting Prison Reform (LAT) 117
Complain Without Fear (WP) 118

Antitrust:

PSC Considers BellSouth-AT&T Merger (AP) 119
McClatchy Closes Deal For Knight Ridder (AP) 120
McClatchy Completes Knight Ridder Purchase (MRKTWTCH) 120
Op-Ed: Are Employees' Statements Their Company's As Well? (LAW) 121
Proposal Would Reduce Companies' Civil Damages (BLOOM) 124
Investor Group Snags Univision; Televisa Fumes (WSJ) 125
Consortium Buys Univision For $12.3bn (FT) 126
Univision Agrees To Buyout Offer Of $12.3 Billion (WP) 127
Univision Accepts $12.3B Cash Offer (USAT) 128
Judge Clears Way For Adelphia Sale (WSJ/AP) 128
Citizens Banking Buys Midwest Rival For About $1 Billion (WSJ) 129
Steeled For Growth (WSJ) 129
EU May Fine Microsoft €2 Million A Day (IDG) 130
Cartels Face Bigger Fines From Brussels (FT) 131
EU Beefs Up Fines On Antitrust Activity (WSJ) 132

Environment/Indian Affairs:

Calls Grow Louder In Congress To Revamp US Energy Policy (CSM) 133
Ending Energy Dependence (WT) 134
An Outdated Ban (WP) 135
Domenici Offers Nuclear Waste Proposal (AP-Y2) 135
Plan For Nuclear-Waste Storage Is Cleared By Senate Subcommittee (WSJ) 136
Pollution In Overdrive (WP) 137
Gore's 'Truth' Largely Factual, Scientists Say (USAT) 138
A Warning On Hazards Of Secondhand Smoke (NYT) 139
Sioux Tribal Leaders Plan Beer Blockade (USAT/AP) 140

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Mistrial Declared In Shooting Of Officer (BOS) 140
Police: Lethal Drug Fentanyl Hitting Twin Cities Streets (AP) 141
By Ken Little (SN) 142
Man's Death Possibly Linked To Heroin (WOOD) 143
Officials Investigate Limbaugh After Finding Viagra In His Bag (AP) 143
Limbaugh Case Alerts Travelers To Rules For Prescriptions (USAT) 144
2 More Sentenced For Role In Danbury-area Drug Ring (DNT) 144
N.F.L. Strengthens Drug Policy (AP) 145
NFL Cracking Down On Amphetamines (USAT) 145
Bonds Says He Hasn't Heard From Mitchell (AP) 146
Armstrong Goes On The Offensive To State His Case (LAT) 147
Hamilton Faces New Doping Allegations (LAT) 147
U.S. Cyclist Hamilton Keeps Gold Medal (AP) 148
Amid Doping Scandal, Ullrich Is Cleared To Ride In Tour De France (NYT) 149
Cycling Suffers Toll For Role In Drug Testing (USAT) 150

Immigration:

Senate Warms To 'Border First' (WT) 151
Senate May Budge On Immigration (LAT) 152
As GOP Bickers Over Immigration, Boehner Criticizes Dem 'silence' (HILL) 153

Tax:

Court Says Prosecutors Pressure White-Collar Defendants Unfairly (WSJ) 154
Judge Blasts Pressure Put On KPMG Over Legal Fees (USAT) 156
Policy On Legal Fees Excessive, Judge Says (WP) 157

DOJ_NMG_0036898

Judge Faults U.S. In Tax Case (LAT) 158
Federal Judge Blasts U.S. Pressure On KPMG Case Fees (LAW) 159
Judge: U.S. Acted Unconstitutionally In Pressuring KPMG (AP)....162
Thompson Memo, R.I.P.? (WSJ) 163
IRS Employees Caught Peeking At Confidential Taxpayer Files (WSJ) 163
Diaz Tax Ordeal Is Over (BSH)....165
Republicans Lack Votes In Senate To Cut Estate Tax (WSJ)165
Senate GOP Leader Delays Estate Tax Vote (AP-Y2) 166
Senate Delays Vote On Estate Tax Reduction, Timber (Update2) (BLOOM)....167
Letters (WSJ)....168
Our Taxed Expats (WSJ)....170

Congress-Administration:

Bush Ignores Laws He Inks, Vexing Congress (AP-Y2) 171
White House Defends Bush's Limits On Bills (WT) 172
Democrats Accuse Bush Of Power Grab (FT) 173
Debate On Hill Over Power Of The President (CSM)....174
Bush's Challenges Of Laws He Signed Is Criticized (WP) 175
Bush's Use Of Authority Riles Senator (NYT)....176
Bush Urges Senate To Pass Line-item Veto (AP-Y2)....177
Bush Calls On Senate To Pass Line-Item Veto (WP) 178
President To Press For Line-Item Veto Power (NYT)....179
Bush Presses For Line-item Veto (WT) 180
Misunderestimated (WSJ)....181
Manhattan: A Call For An Investigation (NYT) 181
Paulson Defends Tax Cuts At Hearing (FT)....182
Treasury Nominee Gives Few Specifics On Bush Priorities (NYT) 182
Paulson Sticks To The Script (WP)....183
Treasury Nominee Urges Pressing China On Yuan (WSJ) ..184
Treasury Nominee Paulson Sounds A Lot Like Outgoing Snow (USAT) 185
Reading The Classifieds (WP)....186
Bush's Communications Director Leaves (AP-Y2) 187
W. BENCH PRESS (NYPOST)....188
Connaughton Named To Lead U.S. Maritime Agency (WP) 188
Chief Seeks $160.5M For VA Data Security (USAT) 189
$160 Million To Be Sought For VA's Credit-Monitoring Program (WP) 189
New Rules Force States To Curb Welfare Rolls (NYT) 190
Reid Threatens Member COLA (RC) 192
Raising Minimum Wage Will Not Hurt Jobs, Dean Says (WT)193
Tensions Running High (RC)....194
The Reliable Source (WP) 195

Other News:

Home Sales Sink; Rates, Inventory Rise (USAT) 196
Existing-Home Sales Fall 1.2% As Consumer Confidence Rises (WSJ) 197
Economists Expect More Rate Increases This Summer (USAT)....197
Higher Rates Begin To Slow Growth (CSM) 198
Wall Street Tumbles Ahead Of Fed Meeting (FT)....199
Stocks Sink Ahead Of Fed's Meeting (USAT)....200
Stocks Tumble In Broad Selling Ahead Of The Fed (WSJ)..201
As GOP Ties To Corruption Mount, Democrats Differ Over Strategy (AP) 201
Poll Shows Americans Keeping An Eye On Congress (USAT) 202
Lack Of Messenger Bedevils Democrats (RC) 203
Emanuel Puts Reynolds In The DCCC's Crosshairs (HILL) .205
Look Who's Missing DeLay (TIME)....206
GOP Offers 'Values Agenda' (RC) 207
... And Why Lieberman Can't Win His And Shoultn't Try (HILL) 207
A.F.L.-C.I.O. In Connecticut Gives Backing To Lieberman (NYT)....208
Poll Shows Ehrlich Lagging As He Opens Reelection Run (WP)....209
Summer Vacations Run On Empty (USAT) 212
Mr. Buffett's Gift (WSJ) 212
Testing Away HIV (WP)....213
Israeli Troops Move Into Gaza (WP)....214
Israeli Tanks And Troops Enter Gaza (FT)....216
Israeli Troops Move Into Gaza; Bridges Are Hit (NYT) 216
Israeli Attack Could Spark An End To Palestinian Authority's Grip (WSJ)....218
Israeli Troops And Armor Surge Into Gaza (LAT)....219
Abbas, Hamas Strike A Deal (WT) 221
Israel Launches Gaza Offensive Over Hostage (USAT) 222
Israeli Threat Unites Hamas, Fatah (CSM)....223
Stop Terror At Its Source (WSJ)....225
Iran's Leader Sends Mixed Signals On Nuclear Talks (NYT)226
Iranian Leader: U.S. Nuke Talks Not Needed (AP)....227
Iran Builds Support For Right To Nuclear Power (LAT) 228
Iranian Minister: WMD Outlawed In Islam (AP) 230
Senator Says North Korean Missile Firing May Not Be Imminent (NYT) 230
China Urged To Dissuade N. Korea From Test (AP)....231
US Warns North Korea Against Talks 'Bluff' (AFP-Y2)....233

DOJ_NMG_0036899

House Vote Lifts India Nuclear Deal Hopes (FT) 233
India Nuclear Bill Receives Support (WSJ).....234
Nuclear Proposal For India Endorsed (WT/AP).....235
US Congress Committee Backs Nuclear Deal With India
(AFP-Y2).....235
Press Celebrates Reception Plans For Koizumi Visit (WT)..236
Koizumi Visit Presents A Tougher Japan (CSM).....237
Ex-officials Hit Foreign Aid Cuts (WT).....239
Islamic Militia Accused Of Breaking Truce (AP) 239
With Caveats, U.S. Backs Session At U.N. On Curtailing
Illegal Arms (NYT).....240
U.S. Rejects Limits On Personal Guns (WT) 241
Russia Oil Tempers U.S. Sway (WSJ).....242
A King Of Roadblocks Works To Clear A Path In Presidential Race (WSJ) 243
Chávez's Image Becomes Tool For Attack In Mexican Presidential Race (WP).....244
Bringing Mexico Closer To God (NYT).....246
Mexico's Missing Prosperity (WP).....247
China Discloses $1.1 Billion Bank Fraud (WP).....248
One Riot Breaks Ground In China (WP).....250
Taiwan's President, Mired In Scandals, Survives Recall Vote
(WP) 252
Taiwan: President Survives Recall Vote (NYT/AP).....252
Groups Promise Big Fight Over Oman Trade Deal (RC).....253
Failure Of Geneva Talks Would Not Scupper WTO Round:
US (AFP) 254
US Lawmakers Prefer No Deal To Bad Deal In Trade Talks
(AP).....254
The Cry Of The Wild (NYT).....255

DOJ_NMG_0036900

TERRORISM NEWS:

US A-G Warns Of 'home-grown Terror' (JERP)

By Dan Izenberg

The Jerusalem Post, June 28, 2006

US Attorney-General Alberto Gonzales on Tuesday warned that the war against terrorism was evolving and that a new threat was in the making from homegrown terrorism, which was sometimes harder to defend against than international terrorism.

"They [home-grown terrorists] are much more difficult to find because they exist in our communities," said Gonzales in a speech at Tel Aviv University's Jaffe Center for Strategic Studies, during a short visit to Israel which was due to end Wednesday. "This is presenting additional challenges for us that we are now beginning to focus on."

Asked whether he thought the war against terrorism was succeeding, Gonzales replied, "The US and other countries, like Israel are safer today. [But] we are not safe."

Gonzales singled out US-Israel collaboration in combatting terrorism. "We are working closing in the war on terror," he said.

Gonzales that the improvement in US security was due to the establishment of the Homeland Security Department, new legislation such as the Patriot Act, the war against terrorism in Afghanistan and Iraq and strong international cooperation among law enforcement agencies, which he described as "fantastic."

Still, he said, he constantly reads intelligence reports about terrorist threats to the US and other countries, including Israel. "I sometimes wonder when it this ever going to stop," he added. "And it may not stop for a while."

Gonzales refused to say whether or not the Bush administration was seriously considering closing the prison facility at Guantanamo Bay. In the meantime, the US government is awaiting a Supreme Court ruling on a petition challenging the commissions established by the government to try some of the detainees imprisoned at the US facility.

Gonzales said the US had already released more than 300 detainees arrested since January 2002. He added that one of the problems preventing more detainees from being set free was that no country wanted to take them, and they would be in danger if they returned to their native countries. He gave an example of 16 Chinese detainees that the US did not want to repatriate for fear they would be tortured by Chinese authorities.

Human rights groups in the US have charged that many of the detainees at Guantanamo have been tortured or treated in a cruel, inhumane and degrading manner and in violation of international human rights law.

According to Gonzales, prisoners at Guantanamo receive "top-notch medical care, they receive good food, and good facilities."

Gonzales was also asked why the US refused to join the International Criminal Court, which was established to try alleged war criminals. He replied that the US had more at stake than other countries because it had more troops serving around the world and therefore the risk of indictments against US personnel was greater.

"No country would enter into an agreement that is contrary to their interests," he said. "Why would a country do that?"

Gonzales devoted the formal part of his address to the need for international cooperation in the fight against other transnational crimes in addition to terrorism, such as cyber crimes, drug trafficking, trafficking in humans and child pornography.

GOP Bill Targets NY Times (HILL)

By Patrick O'Connor And Jonathan Allen

The Hill, June 28, 2006

House Republican leaders are expected to introduce a resolution today condemning The New York Times for publishing a story last week that exposed government monitoring of banking records.

DOJ_NMG_0036901

The resolution is expected to condemn the leak and publication of classified documents, said one Republican aide with knowledge of the impending legislation.

The resolution comes as Republicans from the president on down condemn media organizations for reporting on the secret government program that tracked financial records overseas through the Society for Worldwide Interbank Financial Telecommunications (SWIFT), an international banking cooperative.

Rep. J.D. Hayworth (R-Ariz.), working independently from his leadership, began circulating a letter to House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) during a late series of votes yesterday asking his leaders to revoke the Times's congressional press credentials.

The Standing Committee decides which organizations and reporters can be accredited, according to the rules of both the House and Senate press galleries. Members of that committee are elected by accredited members of those galleries.

"Under no circumstances would we revoke anyone's credentials simply because a government official is unhappy with what that correspondent's newspaper has written," said Susan Milligan, a reporter for the Boston Globe, which is owned by the Times, who also serves the standing chairwoman of the Standing Committee of Correspondents. "The rules say nothing about the stories a newspaper chooses to pursue, or the reaction those stories provoke. The Times clearly meets our standards for credentials."

The Times, the Los Angeles Times and the Wall Street Journal all reported the existence of the program on their websites last Thursday.

President Bush criticized the reports during a press event Monday, calling the disclosure "disgraceful" and a "great harm" to national security. Vice President Dick Cheney, who voiced support for the program over the weekend, followed Bush's criticism with harsh words of his own.

In an open letter responding to these criticisms, Times Executive Editor Bill Keller wrote that a free press was the key check on government's abuse of power.

GOP Measure Slams NYT For Bank Story (RC)

By Ben Pershing

Roll Call, June 28, 2006

The House will vote today on a hastily written resolution that is expected to criticize The New York Times for its recent disclosure of the government's secret use of information from a massive international finance network to fight terrorism.

At press time Tuesday, the resolution was still being drafted by a handful of different committees under the direction of Majority Leader John Boehner's (R-Ohio) office. Republican sources said they expected the finished product would condemn both the leaking of the law enforcement program and its publication by the Times and a handful of other newspapers.

A House vote would mark only the latest Republican offensive against last week's story, which detailed the Treasury Department's use of information from the Brussels-based Society for Worldwide Interbank Financial Telecommunication.

The White House lobbied the Times and other newspapers not to publish their stories, and the administration has been vocal in its criticism since they appeared in print.

President Bush himself said Monday that the disclosure "makes it harder to win this war on terror," and Vice President Cheney also joined the chorus of complaints.

House Homeland Security Chairman Peter King (R-N.Y.) has called for an "investigation and prosecution" of the Times, and other Republicans have used similarly harsh language, making it likely that the vast majority of Republicans will vote for today's resolution.

What is less clear is how House Democrats will react. Both Democratic leaders and rank-and-file lawmakers have complained in the past about the administration's conduct of the war on terrorism, particularly after The New York Times disclosed last year that the National Security Agency was listening to some domestic phone calls without a warrant.

But in the case of the SWIFT story, most Democratic leaders have been noticeably silent. The administration even enlisted some Democrats, reportedly including Rep. John Murtha (Pa.) and ex-Rep. Lee Hamilton (Ind.), to try to lobby the Times not to publish its piece.

DOJ_NMG_0036902

Senator Calls For Review Of Leaks Damage (AP-Y2)

AP2, June 27, 2006

The government should conduct an inquiry into damage done by the recent disclosures of intelligence programs aimed at stopping terrorists, the Senate Intelligence Committee chairman said Tuesday.

"We cannot continue to operate in a system where the government takes steps to counter terrorism while the media actively works to disclose those operations without any regard for protection of lives, sources and legal methods," said Sen. Pat Roberts (news, bio, voting record), R-Kan., who as intelligence chairman has been briefed extensively on the efforts.

In a letter, Roberts asked National Intelligence Director John Negroponte to order an assessment of damage caused by the disclosure of the government's most classified programs. He said he was particularly interested in the impact of stories on the Bush administration's warrantless surveillance program and its program to monitor terror finances.

Administration officials have publicly confirmed both programs.

In December, President Bush acknowledged the National Security Agency's program to monitor the international communications of people on U.S. soil when terrorism was suspected. In a departure from past practice, no court approval was deemed necessary.

Last week, senior administration officials also confirmed that the Treasury Department and CIA were using administrative subpoenas to pull information from an extensive financial database, called Swift. The Brussels, Belgium-based system captures information on money moved in more than 200 countries.

The New York Times broke the NSA story and was one of three newspapers to lead the coverage on the terror-financing program. Said Roberts: "The New York Times has the right to print what it sees fit to print. But, just because you can, doesn't mean you should."

Damage Study Urged On Surveillance Reports (NYT)

By Scott Shane

The New York Times, June 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 27 — Senator Pat Roberts, the chairman of the Senate intelligence committee, asked the director of national intelligence on Tuesday to assess any damage to American counterterrorism efforts caused by the disclosure of secret programs to monitor telephone calls and financial transactions.

Mr. Roberts, Republican of Kansas, singled out The New York Times for an article last week that reported that the government was tracking money transfers handled by a banking consortium based in Belgium. The targeting of the financial data, which includes some Americans' transactions, was also reported Thursday by The Los Angeles Times and The Wall Street Journal.

In his letter to John D. Negroponte, director of national intelligence, Mr. Roberts wrote that "we have been unable to persuade the media to act responsibly and to protect the means by which we protect this nation."

He asked for a formal evaluation of damage to intelligence collection resulting from the revelation of the secret financial monitoring as well as The Times's disclosure in December of the National Security Agency's monitoring of phone calls and e-mail messages of Americans suspected of having links to Al Qaeda.

In London, meanwhile, a human rights group said Tuesday that it had filed complaints in 32 countries alleging that the banking consortium, known as Swift, violated European and Asian privacy laws by giving the United States access to its data.

Simon Davies, director of the group, Privacy International, said the scale of the American monitoring, involving millions of records, "places this disclosure in the realm of a fishing exercise rather than a legally authorized investigation."

The Belgian prime minister, Guy Verhofstadt, has asked the Justice Ministry to investigate whether Swift violated Belgian law by allowing the United States government access to its data.

The American Civil Liberties Union has condemned the program, and a Chicago lawyer, Steven E. Schwarz, filed a federal class-action lawsuit against Swift on Friday alleging that it had violated United States financial privacy statutes.

President Bush, Vice President Dick Cheney, Treasury Secretary John W. Snow and numerous Republicans in Congress have vigorously defended the financial tracking program as legal and valuable and condemned its public disclosure. They have suggested that the articles might tip off terrorists that their money transfers could be detected. Representative J. D. Hayworth, Republican of Arizona, circulated a letter to colleagues on Tuesday asking that The Times's Congressional press credentials be suspended.

DOJ_NMG_0036903

Tony Snow, the White House spokesman, said any effort to measure damage to intelligence collection would take some time.

"It's not as if the terrorists are going to say, 'Oops! Going to stop doing that,' " Mr. Snow said at a briefing. "But I think it is safe to say that once you provide a piece of intelligence, people on the other side act on it."

The electronic messaging system operated by Swift, the Society for Worldwide Interbank Financial Telecommunication, routes nearly $6 trillion a day in transfers among nearly 8,000 financial institutions.

At a confirmation hearing on Tuesday for Henry M. Paulson Jr., the nominee for Treasury secretary, Senator Max Baucus, Democrat of Montana, asked whether the monitoring might violate the Fourth Amendment's protection against unreasonable searches. "I think you'll agree that we could fight terrorism properly and adequately without having a police state in America," Mr. Baucus said.

Mr. Paulson did not express an opinion on the propriety of the Swift monitoring but pledged to study it. "I am going to, if confirmed, be all over it, make sure I learn everything there is to learn, make sure I understand the law thoroughly," he said.

Democratic staff members said they had pressed Treasury officials in recent days for a fuller accounting of which members of Congress were briefed on the program and whether notification requirements under the International Economic Emergency Powers Act, invoked by President Bush days after Sept. 11, were met.

Treasury officials have told Congressional staff members that they briefed the full intelligence committees of both houses about a month ago, after inquiries by The Times, according to one Democratic aide who spoke on condition of anonymity. Some members were told of the program several years ago, but the Treasury Department has not provided a list of who was informed when, the aide said.

Democrats said they hoped to get a clearer idea of the legal foundations for the program, how it was monitored, and how long it will be allowed to continue under the president's invocation of emergency powers.

Representative Carolyn B. Maloney, a New York Democrat who serves on the House financial services committee, said Tuesday: "The administration is basing its actions on a 1970's law that never envisioned a state of perpetual emergency. It wasn't meant to become the status quo. That is why Congress needs to look at its current use."

Victor Comras, a former State Department official who served on a United Nations counterterrorism advisory group, pointed out on The Counterterrorism Blog that a 2002 United Nations report had noted with approval that the United States was monitoring international financial systems.

While providing no details, the report mentioned Swift and similar organizations, saying "the United States has begun to apply new monitoring techniques to spot and verify suspicious transactions."

Inquiry Sought Into News Reports (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt

The Los Angeles Times, June 28, 2006

WASHINGTON — The chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee on Tuesday asked for a formal investigation into whether national security had been damaged by recent news reports unearthing details of two controversial Bush administration anti-terrorism programs.

"Numerous recent unauthorized disclosures of sensitive intelligence programs have directly threatened important efforts in the war against terrorism," Sen. Pat Roberts (R-Kan.) wrote in a letter to National Intelligence Director John D. Negroponte.

Roberts said he was particularly concerned with disclosures that the administration was monitoring phone calls and Internet traffic without a warrant and accessing an international database of bank transactions. "We have been unable to persuade the media to act responsibly and protect the means by which we protect this nation," he wrote.

DOJ_NMG_0036904

The Los Angeles Times, the New York Times and the Wall Street Journal were the first to report last week on the banking program in which the Treasury Department has acquired a vast database of personal financial information from a little-known Brussels-based industry cooperative to track possible terrorist activity.

The warrantless surveillance program run by the National Security Agency was disclosed by the New York Times in December and has generated concern because it involves the tracking of international communications where one of the parties involved was in the United States.

Administration officials have confirmed the existence of both programs but have said the media disclosures have aided terrorist groups. President Bush and Vice President Cheney have criticized the revelations as disgraceful.

In an op-ed article Tuesday, Los Angeles Times Editor Dean Baquet wrote that the newspaper "very seriously" weighed the national security concerns, but decided to publish because "there is an intense and ongoing public debate about whether surveillance programs like these pose a serious threat to civil liberties."

Roberts has proposed tougher criminal penalties on those who disclose classified information. But the Kansas Republican — who worked as a reporter and editor for several Arizona newspapers after serving in the Marine Corps — said Tuesday that he did not think journalists should be prosecuted for publishing the information.

The administration indicated in a recent court case that journalists could be prosecuted for publishing classified information under espionage laws.

Negroponte's office said in a prepared statement that Roberts' request was being "reviewed."

"The Intelligence community takes extremely seriously any unauthorized disclosure of classified information," the statement said.

Negroponte has previously condemned such disclosures. He said in a speech in April that "any public disclosure of intelligence-related information is going to hurt us in one way or another."

The harm such revelations pose, he said, includes disclosing sources and methods of intelligence-gathering, and "prejudicing … very important liaison relationships that we have with other intelligence services around the world."

Civil Liberties Group Files Complaint In 17 Countries Against U.S. Mining Of Banking Data For Anti-terrorism Investigation (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, June 28, 2006

(AP) - LONDON-A civil liberties group on Wednesday asked governments around the world to block the release of confidential financial records to U.S. authorities as part of American anti-terrorist probes.

London-based watchdog Privacy International said it had filed complaints with data protection and privacy regulators in 17 countries, arguing that disclosures of financial transactions "were made without any legal basis or authority whatsoever."

The complaint, sent to regulators in 13 European countries as well as Canada, Australia, New Zealand and Hong Kong, asks authorities to "intervene to seek the immediate suspension of the disclosure program pending legal review."

The U.S. Treasury acknowledged on Friday that since the Sept. 11, 2001 attacks on the U.S., it has tracked millions of financial transactions handled by the Belgium-based Society for Worldwide Interbank Financial Telecommunication, or SWIFT.

SWIFT oversees about 11 million financial transactions a day among banks and financial institutions worldwide, recording customers' names, account numbers and other identifying information.

Privacy International's director, Simon Davies, said the secret CIA-Treasury program "shows yet again how the U.S. willfully disregards the privacy rights not only of its own citizens, but also the rights of foreign nationals."

U.S. President George W. Bush has condemned newspapers that broke the story of the program, saying the reports made it "harder to win the war on terror."

The European Union's executive branch, the European Commission, has said it has no powers to investigate whether privacy laws have been violated in the transfer of the records.

It said it was for individual national authorities to decide whether the searches were legal.

Patriotism And The Press (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0036905

The New York Times, June 28, 2006

Over the last year, The New York Times has twice published reports about secret antiterrorism programs being run by the Bush administration. Both times, critics have claimed that the paper was being unpatriotic or even aiding the terrorists. Some have even suggested that it should be indicted under the Espionage Act. There have been a handful of times in American history when the government has indeed tried to prosecute journalists for publishing things it preferred to keep quiet. None of them turned out well — from the Sedition Act of 1798 to the time when the government tried to enjoin The Times and The Washington Post from publishing the Pentagon Papers.

As most of our readers know, there is a large wall between the news and opinion operations of this paper, and we were not part of the news side's debates about whether to publish the latest story under contention — a report about how the government tracks international financial transfers through a banking consortium known as Swift in an effort to pinpoint terrorists. Bill Keller, the executive editor, spoke for the newsroom very clearly. Our own judgments about the uproar that has ensued would be no different if the other papers that published the story, including The Los Angeles Times and The Wall Street Journal, had acted alone.

The Swift story bears no resemblance to security breaches, like disclosure of troop locations, that would clearly compromise the immediate safety of specific individuals. Terrorist groups would have had to be fairly credulous not to suspect that they would be subject to scrutiny if they moved money around through international wire transfers. In fact, a United Nations group set up to monitor Al Qaeda and the Taliban after Sept. 11 recommended in 2002 that other countries should follow the United States' lead in monitoring suspicious transactions handled by Swift. The report is public and available on the United Nations Web site.

But any argument by the government that a story is too dangerous to publish has to be taken seriously. There have been times in this paper's history when editors have decided not to print something they knew. In some cases, like the Kennedy administration's plans for the disastrous Bay of Pigs invasion, it seems in hindsight that the editors were over-cautious. (Certainly President Kennedy thought so.) Most recently, The Times held its reporting about the government's secret antiterror wiretapping program for more than a year while it weighed administration objections.

Our news colleagues work under the assumption that they should let the people know anything important that the reporters learn, unless there is some grave and overriding reason for withholding the information. They try hard not to base those decisions on political calculations, like whether a story would help or hurt the administration. It is certainly unlikely that anyone who wanted to hurt the Bush administration politically would try to do so by writing about the government's extensive efforts to make it difficult for terrorists to wire large sums of money.

From our side of the news-opinion wall, the Swift story looks like part of an alarming pattern. Ever since Sept. 11, the Bush administration has taken the necessity of heightened vigilance against terrorism and turned it into a rationale for an extraordinarily powerful executive branch, exempt from the normal checks and balances of our system of government. It has created powerful new tools of surveillance and refused, almost as a matter of principle, to use normal procedures that would acknowledge that either Congress or the courts have an oversight role.

The Swift program, like the wiretapping program, has been under way for years with no restrictions except those that the executive branch chooses to impose on itself — or, in the case of Swift, that the banks themselves are able to demand. This seems to us very much the sort of thing the other branches of government, and the public, should be nervously aware of. We would have been very happy if Congressman Peter King, the Long Island Republican who has been so vocal in citing the Espionage Act, had been as aggressive in encouraging his colleagues to do the oversight job they were elected to do.

The United States will soon be marking the fifth anniversary of the war on terror. The country is in this for the long haul, and the fight has to be coupled with a commitment to individual liberties that define America's side in the battle. A half-century ago, the country endured a long period of amorphous, global vigilance against an enemy who was suspected of boring from within, and history suggests that under those conditions, it is easy to err on the side of security and secrecy. The free press has a central place in the Constitution because it can provide information the public needs to make things right again. Even if it runs the risk of being labeled unpatriotic in the process.

DOJ_NMG_0036906

Suspect In Miami Terror Case Makes First Court Appearance (AP)

AP, June 28, 2006

MIAMI - Stanley Grant Phanor, one of seven men suspected of seeking to blow up the Sears Tower and with help from al-Qaida, made his first appearance in court Tuesday but did not enter a plea.

Phanor and five other co-defendants will return to federal court before U.S. Magistrate Judge Ted Bandstra Friday in downtown Miami for a hearing on whether the men should remain in custody prior to trial, the U.S. Attorney's Office said.

The seventh man, Lyglenson Lemorin, was scheduled to appear Thursday in federal court in Atlanta.

Attorney Roderick Vereen was appointed to represent Phanor. A phone message left by The Associated Press for Vereen at his office Tuesday afternoon was not immediately returned.

The group of men were arrested June 22 when authorities busted their alleged hide-out in a Miami warehouse. They had no explosives and lacked adequate funding. Their only link to al-Qaida was through an FBI informant fronting as a member of the terrorist group, authorities said.

Federal prosecutors said the men took an oath to al-Qaida and plotted to create an "Islamic Army" bent on violence against the United States.

The five other men made their initial court appearance on Friday, but Phanor was being held in a county detention center on an unrelated charge and was not among them.

Phanor was being held on violation of probation, said Alicia Valle, a spokeswoman for the U.S Attorney's Office in Miami.

Court records show that Phanor was convicted of carrying a concealed firearm in 2002 and sentenced to two years' probation.

Relatives have described the defendants as deeply religious people who studied the Bible and took classes in Islam.

Phanor's father Joseph said his son went to classes on Islam with a friend but that he read the Bible at his father's house.

Phanor's brother Michael said his brother and the other men they were trying to do community service in the area where they grew up, studying martial arts to keep in shape and setting a good example for neighborhood kids.

Sears Tower May Not Have Been Terror Plot's Only Chicago Target (WLS-TV)

By Chuck Goudie

WLS-TV, June 28, 2006

June 27, 2006 - Seven people were arrested last week for allegedly plotting to blow up the Sears Tower in Chicago. ABC7's Investigative Team learned there was another Chicago target.

The Chicago native accused of plotting to wage Jihad on his home town wasn't going to stop at the Sears Tower, according to newly released federal documents obtained by the I-Team.

Authorities now say that Narseal "Brother Naz" Batiste was interested in taking down the tower and taking out federal agents who would investigate such an attack.

What Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez failed to mention last week was that government buildings outside south Florida were also in the group's gunsights.

Until federal court records obtained Tuesday revealed it, the Sears Tower appeared to be the only Chicago target of the accused terrorists.

But the nation's tallest building wasn't alone. The FBI in Chicago was also on the terrorists' hit list.

The second Chicago target is identified in this motion to deny bond for the accused terrorists. Federal prosecutors say they men planned to use explosives to destroy the offices of the Federal Bureau of Investigation in Chicago and three other cities.

Had the bombing plot actually been carried out in Chicago, the alleged terrorists might well have attacked the wrong building. For years the FBI's Chicago headquarters was located in the Dirksen Federal Building. It was in this South Dearborn Street highrise at the time the bomb plot was allegedly being engineered last winter.

The current FBI center in Chicago is on the west side as a standalone building that just began full operations three weeks ago with very little fanfare.

DOJ_NMG_0036907

Authorities believe the Miami terror suspects-had their plan been executed-would have tried to attack the offices that are now empty in the Dirksen Building but will one day house federal prosecutors and US District court rooms.

Federal investigators said Tuesday night that Chicago terror suspect Narseal Batiste tried to recruit someone to travel to the Middle East on an Al Qaeda fundraising mission.

The newly released court documents reveal that Batiste wanted the emmissary to lobby Islamic extremists for money to fund the Sears Tower attack, the assault on the Chicago FBI and the other bombings.

According to prosecutors, that person did not go to the Middle East for Batiste but did go to the FBI about him.

Editorial: Sears Tower Threat Shows Terrorism A Serious Concern (ROCKRS)

Rockford (IL) Register Star, June 28, 2006

Did you hear the one about the terrorists who wanted to blow up the Sears Tower in Chicago but didn't think to ask the person they thought was their al-Qaida contact for explosives?

It's no joke. It happened and it shows that almost five years after the attacks of 9/11, efforts to combat terrorism must be taken seriously.

Some of our hearts skipped a beat when we heard seven men — five of them U.S. citizens — were arrested in Miami and charged with conspiracy to destroy the nation's tallest building and other buildings with the help of al-Qaida. It was frightening that terrorism could hit so close to home, about 90 miles east of Rockford.

Fortunately, the man the wannabe terrorists thought was from al-Qaida was a FBI informant.

"This group was more aspirational than operational," FBI Deputy Director John Pistole said.

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales described the group as "homegrown terrorists" who "came to view their home country as the enemy" and said there was no immediate threat because the group failed to get explosives.

Perhaps the attorney general and the FBI downplayed the threat to keep Americans calm or perhaps the seven men were truly the bunglers they've been portrayed as, but they could have caused plenty of damage with the machine guns they did ask for.

Are the five citizens in that group much different than Timothy McVeigh or Terry Nichols, other "homegrown terrorists?" McVeigh and Nichols succeeded in their Oklahoma City bomb plot. If the seven wannabes had stumbled upon a real al-Qaida representative, the story may have ended differently.

Remember hijackers brought down the Twin Towers in New York with weapons no more sophisticated than box cutters.

People have dismissed the threat on Chicago because the seven men are perceived as goofballs who spent their time lifting weights and sharpening their martial-arts skills.

We need to remember that it doesn't take many men or women, or much brainpower, to destroy and kill.

The law-enforcement system prevented tragedy this time.

This episode, and the more than 400 arrests for domestic terrorism since 2001, show that the government is paying attention to threats real and perceived.

We should be thankful for that.

Big Talk, No Bullets (MH)

By Michael Putney

The Miami Herald, June 28, 2006

As Butch said to Sundance, "Who are these guys?" He was talking about the relentless posse that was able to track the romantic bank robbers through the Badlands. The relentless posse in our latest terrorism drama was made up of FBI agents, aided by local police, who tracked seven homegrown "terrorists" to a nondescript warehouse in the badlands of Liberty City.

The FBI acted on information provided by a confidential informant (CI) who, judging by the guarded comments of Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Miami U.S. Attorney Alex Acosta, contacted the agency after hearing Narseal Batiste, the alleged ringleader, make admiring remarks about al Qaeda and violent ones about the U.S. government.

Until this is sorted out it's a good thing these guys are behind bars. People who reportedly swear allegiance to al Qaeda, vow to "levy war against the United States" and produce attacks "as good or greater than 9/11," as the indictment quotes them as saying, shouldn't be walking the streets. Or gathering late at night to do jumping jacks, push-ups and learn martial arts, as warehouse neighbors say they did.

DOJ_NMG_0036908

But I can't help wondering if the Feds swooped in too soon and merely gathered up some ''pathetic wannabes," as the editorial page of this paper called them. The Liberty City Seven may have said violent things, but they didn't commit violent acts. They pledged allegiance to al Qaeda (reportedly recorded on videotape), but I bet only to get the goodies and money the CI promised to supply. Because these guys had bupkus.

All the meetings between the mysterious CI and Batiste are apparently on audio or videotape. Defense attorneys will be chafing to hear and see them to determine if the CI was driving the conspiracy or just along for the ride. Either way they'll mount an entrapment defense, although those tapes will make it hard to prove that Batiste and the others weren't predisposed to commit the crimes they're accused of. Like blowing up the Miami Police Department building, some Metrorail stations, the FBI office in North Miami and the Sears Tower in Chicago.

Big talk, but these guys had no money, guns, bullets, bombs or explosives. They hadn't trained at al Qaeda camps in Afghanistan like the Buffalo Six, Yemenis who have pleaded guilty. Our guys were counting on the CI for cash, guns, boots, uniforms, bullet-proof vests, rental vans and, perhaps, motivation. By late May (the plot began last November), the indictment says, Batiste admitted his group was disorganized. The CI evidently pressed him to continue.

The group's plans were, as the attorney general conceded, "more aspirational than operational." The group members may have talked about violent acts, but never committed any. Their crime, if there was one, was conspiring to do so.

Enough for The Wall Street Journal to editorialize the day after the arrests that they should "serve as another wake-up call to the presence of a domestic threat from Islamic terror." True, that threat is real, but it's not clear that anyone but Narseal Batiste had read the Koran. And he reportedly belongs to a curious sect that embraces aspects of Christianity, Judaism and Islam. None of the conspirators, as far as we know, is an orthodox Muslim.

The indictment speaks of a plot to "kill all the devils we can." If those devils are white then it sounds more like racism than terrorism. These guys appear to be six poor, uneducated and disaffected day laborers who came under the spell of a forceful leader who also happened to sign their paychecks.

Ironically, on the day the Liberty City Seven were arrested, South Florida was celebrating the NBA champion Miami Heat, a team composed almost entirely of black men. Extremely talented and disciplined black men who earn unimaginable amounts of money for what they do. And yet neither money nor race mattered as our community turned out en masse to thank them and celebrate their victory.

My daily commute takes me home past a basketball court where black youths play. As the Heat moved through the playoffs and into the finals, the number of players kept growing. So, too, did kids making moves toward the basket that emulated Dwyane Wade. And you've no doubt noticed the number of white kids and adults around town wearing Heat jerseys with Wade's name and number. The Heat's "15 Strong" bring us together. The Liberty City Seven push us apart.

Anonymous Jury Sought For Trial Of Man Accused Of Funding Hamas (KCS)

By Jeff Coen

The Kansas City Star, June 28, 2006

CHICAGO - Federal prosecutors have asked a judge to seat an anonymous jury to hear the case of a Bridgeview, Ill., man accused of funding Palestinian terrorists.

Muhammad Salah and a co-defendant are to be tried this fall for allegedly taking part in a conspiracy to fund Hamas, which raises concerns for prospective jurors, the court filing states.

"The nature of the charges and the evidence supporting the charges are such as to place jurors in reasonable apprehension for their safety," the motion reads. The fact that the case has been highly publicized also could mean "the focus and work of the jurors may be interrupted by external influences or impeded by the specter of them," the document states.

The parties in the Salah case are expected to appear for a status hearing Wednesday before U.S. District Judge Amy St. Eve. The judge already has indicated she might want thorough criminal background checks performed on each prospective juror.

A lawyer for Salah could not immediately be reached for comment Tuesday.

Assistant U.S. Atty. Reid Schar said the government believes having an anonymous panel is the best way to handle the case given the charges.

The motion calls for only the general area of residence of any juror to be made public, such as a Chicago neighborhood.

Anonymous juries are not unheard of in the federal system. In the 1990s, anonymous juries considered the fates of El Rukn gang members and mob boss Ernest Rocco Infelice. Around the country they have been used in cases related to terrorism as well, including that of Zacarias Moussaoui and those convicted in the 1998 embassy bombings in Africa.

An anonymous panel was chosen to hear the case against Unabomber Theodore Kaczynski before he eventually pleaded guilty.

Salah is expected to be tried in October.

High-profile Terror Arrests Yield Small Sentences (NBC)

NBC News, June 28, 2006

Average sentence for more than 200 convictions is just one year

June 27: Dozens have been arrested in the U.S., suspected of terrorist ties, but the offenses are typically small and the sentences short. Is the government crackdown working? NBC's Pete Williams reports.

WASHINGTON - It was a high-profile arrest after a big raid in Dec. 2001: A Chicago man accused of helping Osama bin Laden himself.

"It is chilling that the origins of al-Qaida were discovered in a charity claiming to do good," said former Attorney General John Ashcroft when the arrest was announced.

Story continues below ? advertisement

"[He was] accused of running a charity to raise money for terrorists, including al-Qaida," reported NBC's Ann Curry.

But what Enaam Arnaout eventually pleaded guilty to two years ago was a single charge of providing boots and uniforms to fighters in Bosnia and Chechnya.

Some legal experts accuse the Justice Department overselling the arrests cases as terrorism arrests, generating dramatic headlines that actually end very differently.

"Our approach tends to be, I think, prosecutions by press conferences," says Juliette Kayyem, an NBC terrorism analyst and a professor at Harvard University. "A lot is promised at the front end, and then when you actually get to the facts of the case, it tends to fall apart."

Sensitive to that criticism, the government is now defending its record.

Just last week, the Justice Department said 261 people have been convicted in terror-related prosecutions since 2001. Many were solid wins — Iyman Faris, who plotted to attack the Brooklyn Bridge, for example. Would-be shoe bomber Richard Reid, and Mohammed Babar, who admitted providing support for al-Qaida operations overseas.

But of the total 261 convictions, the average sentence is only around a year, from plea agreements, to charges like immigration or document fraud. And sometimes the threat may seem remote, as with the Lackawanna Six, the group in Buffalo, N.Y., convicted of getting terror training but never charged with planning any specific attack.

Even so, in a recent speech, the deputy attorney general said all are examples of a new approach — prevention through prosecution.

"We could await further action by these men and then arrest and prosecute them," says Paul McNulty, U.S. deputy attorney general, "or we could prosecute at the moment our investigation reveals both a risk to our national security and a violation of our nation's laws,"

And the government cites one other statistic: Since Sept. 11, 2001, no further terror attacks in the U.S.

Guantanamo Officials Say They Can't Stop All Suicides (LAT)

By Carol J. Williams

The Los Angeles Times, June 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0036910

GUANTANAMO BAY, Cuba — In the sharpening debate about whether suicides among detainees here are political statements or the actions of hopelessly depressed individuals, officials at the federal detention center outlined sweeping efforts to prevent them — but admitted nothing could stop the most determined prisoners.

Contraband sweeps and a security overhaul have turned up evidence of prisoners trying to open their veins with the metal mesh walls of their cells, hoarding prescription medicine — one prisoner stored 16 painkillers in his artificial leg — and waging hunger strikes.

Twenty detainees considered most likely to try suicide have been outfitted in bulky quilted "suicide smocks" to prevent hangings.

But some of the top officials at the detention center said that despite extensive effort, they could do little to stop detainees from doing themselves harm.

"It is not possible to make a detention facility or a prison suicide-proof if you have detainees or prisoners bent on suicide," said Navy Rear Adm. Harry B. Harris Jr., commander of the prison and its interrogations operation.

Harris and the top two healthcare professionals at the prison complex separately met with a handful of journalists spending the week in Guantanamo. Their accessibility reflected Harris' view of public scrutiny, which is more liberal than that of previous prison administrations.

The interviews, rare until the new administration arrived earlier this year, also seemed aimed at preparing the American public for continued detention and interrogation operations no matter what ruling is handed down by the U.S. Supreme Court on the legitimacy of a war-crimes tribunal set to begin prosecuting 10 prisoners charged with conspiracy.

In command here for less than three months, Harris has been confronted with two incidents of detainees overdosing on hoarded prescription medicines, an uprising at the communal-living camp for the most compliant prisoners, a hunger strike involving almost 90 men, and the apparently coordinated suicides on June 10 of two Saudis and a Yemeni prisoner.

Harris stood by his characterization of the suicides as acts of "asymmetrical warfare" by hardened holy warriors, a comment that provoked accusations of insensitivity by human rights advocates and civilian lawyers who say depression is widespread among the 450 detainees.

Harris suggested the prison guards and administrators had been lulled into believing many of the men had come to terms with their circumstances. Most prisoners had managed to get into the two most lenient detention sites, the barracks-like Camp 4 where detainees can congregate and play sports most of the day, and Camp 1, where more "comfort items" are available.

But it was at Camp 4 that detainees ambushed guards on May 18, setting off a clash that pitted prisoners armed with fan blades and broken light fixtures against soldiers who had to retreat and return with riot gear to quell the uprising. Two prisoners at Camp 1 had overdosed earlier that day, and three detainees there committed suicide a few weeks later.

"The campaign against us, the operations against us, are less about the length of their detention than about the effect they think they'll have," Harris said of recent incidents, rejecting the notion of Guantanamo critics that despair over indefinite detention was driving detainees to harm themselves.

President Bush and other administration officials have lately acknowledged the international diplomatic disaster created by the detentions and court operations here.

Bush told European allies at a summit in Vienna last week that he was waiting for the high court ruling, which could come as soon as today, to guide his decisions about the prison.

U.S. allies now understand that Washington is not resisting their calls for closing Guantanamo, said John Bellinger, State Department legal advisor, upon return from two weeks of meetings in Europe.

"We want to get out of the Guantanamo business while continuing to protect our interests," he said Monday. Those interests include preventing any released or transferred detainees from threatening U.S. security as well as ensuring the prisoners are not subjected to torture, abuse or execution in their home countries.

The suicide attempts and other acts of protest are seen by prison commanders as an effort to intensify outside pressure for Guantanamo's closure.

The Navy captain in charge of the prison hospital said everything that could have been done to identify potential suicides had been done. The three prisoners who hanged themselves had been through medical and psychological evaluations in the two weeks before their deaths because they had taken part in a hunger strike that began in late May. None showed signs of psychological distress — including the Saudi who had just ended a 180-day hunger strike during which he was repeatedly force-fed through a nasal tube.

"If you ask my opinion, I agree with the admiral that this was somewhat of a political statement," said the prison hospital commander, who under military policy cannot be further identified. Noting that it is impossible to know when a suicide bomber will be moved to act, he said, "I don't know if there's a medical way to pick up on that."

To avert future misuse of drugs, the prison medics have cut back significantly on the pills given out to detainees and stepped up monitoring of those medications still being issued, said the senior medical officer, a Navy commander.

A guard now accompanies each hospital corpsman on his medication rounds, twice checking detainees' hands and mouths to ensure that the pills have been swallowed, the commander said. The more potent medications are being administered in crushed or liquid form.

Several hoards of drugs have been found nonetheless, including the 16 painkillers discovered in the artificial leg.

Other measures imposed to deter suicides have included daily collection of bedsheets after the eight-hour sleep period and removal of clothing from any prisoner who shows signs of trying to shred it to make ligatures for hanging.

At least 20 detainees have been outfitted in the quilted suicide smocks that fasten at the sides and shoulders with Velcro hook and loop fasteners and are made of a tightly woven, ripstop vinyl. New mattresses covered in sturdier, plastic-coated fabric that can't be torn or used to hide pills or weapons also have been put in the cells.

Official: Gitmo Prisoners Waging "Jihad" (AP)

By Stevenson Jacobs

AP, June 28, 2006

Guantanamo Bay detainees are staging suicide attempts and hunger strikes to undermine American policy in the war on terror, a senior U.S. military official said, calling the acts a "jihad" against the United States.

"The detainees view this as a struggle. They view this as a jihad ... They're trying to figure out ways that they can continue the fight," Navy Rear Adm. Harry Harris, the commander of the U.S. prison on Cuba's southeastern tip. "They do that with hunger strikes, overdosing on medicines. And now they've succeeded in killing themselves."

Three detainees — two Saudis and a Yemeni — committed suicide in their cells on June 10. The U.S. military said the men hanged themselves by fashioning nooses from bed sheets. Harris said the deaths and other suicide attempts were coordinated acts of resistance — not acts of desperation prompted by their indefinite detention.

"I think it is less about the length of their detention ... It's less about that and it's more that they continue to fight their fight," Harris told reporters, adding that defiance in the prison was widespread. "I think the vast majority of detainees are resisting us."

President Bush has said he wants to close the detention center but is seeking guidance from the nation's top court on the matter. The U.S. Supreme Court could rule as early as Wednesday on the legitimacy of military tribunals ordered by Bush, the first such trials since World War II.

Harris, who took over command at Guantanamo on March 31, said he believed a ruling by the court wouldn't affect operations at the prison, which he said served a vital role in the U.S.-led war on terror.

"Given the battle that we're fighting as a nation, I believe there is a need for places like Guantanamo," Harris said.

The suicides of the three detainees prompted renewed calls from European countries and human rights groups to close Guantanamo, which holds about 450 men on suspicion of links to al-Qaida or the Taliban.

A spokesman for Boston-based Physicians for Human Rights said that whether the suicides were a political act or the product of desperation does not change "the fact that U.S. detention and interrogation practices have violated basic tenets" of the Geneva Conventions and the McCain Amendment, which prohibits torture or cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment of prisoners.

"Regardless of the motivation that caused the three detainees at Guantanamo to commit suicide, those being held without charge are still entitled to due process and to receive treatment that is in accordance with basic human rights standards," said spokesman Nathaniel A. Raymond from Boston.

DOJ_NMG_0036912

A military doctor at the prison said the three detainees received psychological exams only days prior to their suicides and showed no signs of being depressed. He spoke on condition of anonymity to protect his personal safety.

The doctor suggested the exams, performed by mental health professionals one to two weeks before the suicides, supported assertions by military officials that the prisoners killed themselves as a political act — not because they were despondent about their prolonged detention.

"None had showed any signs of being depressed or having a mental condition," said the doctor, who is the medical officer in charge of the prison. He said medical personnel examined the detainees some 10 minutes after they were found and "did everything we could" to revive them, including using defibrillators.

Since the deaths, the military has implemented strict measures to guard against future suicides, including only giving out bed sheets and blankets during sleeping hours and monitoring detainees in their cells every three minutes.

Officials have also lowered the threshold to determine when a detainee is at risk of being suicidal, the doctor said. Now, any detainee thought to be a suicide risk is placed in a tear-proof anti-suicide smock — which can't be fashioned into a makeshift noose — for 72 hours and given a psychological exam, he said.

There are currently about 20 detainees in green anti-suicide smocks, the doctor said.

The doctor said there have been no suicide attempts since the June 10 suicides, but there have been several incidents of detainees harming themselves, such as cutting themselves with paint chips or beating their heads against walls.

Associated Press writer David McFadden contributed to this report from San Juan, Puerto Rico.

EU Official: Suspects Were Handed To U.S. (USAT)

USA Today, June 28, 2006

Terrorism suspects have been transferred to U.S. intelligence agents in Europe, but it's not clear whether the moves were illegal, the European Union's top justice official said Tuesday. Justice and Home Affairs Commissioner Franco Frattini said it also isn't clear whether governments knew about or cooperated in the transfers.

Frattini spoke after Europe's leading human rights watchdog, the Council of Europe, voted to continue its inquiry into alleged CIA flights and secret prisons in Europe. The council's lead investigator, Dick Marty of Switzerland, has complained that European governments weren't eager to help him establish the facts.

Pakistani Foreign Minister Khursheed Kasuri challenged Afghanistan to identify terrorist hide-outs that Afghan President Hamid Karzai alleges are in Pakistan.

“We promise to investigate and take action,” Kasuri told U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice in Islamabad at a meeting with President Pervez Musharraf. Rice meets today with Karzai. “We have two good friends and two fierce fighters in the war on terror,” she said.

Nine people were convicted in Denmark of murder or of being accessories in the “honor killing” Sept. 23 of a woman shot by her brother because her Pakistani family disapproved of her husband. Ghazala Khan, 19, was killed in Slagelse two days after her wedding. Her husband, Emal Khan, was shot twice but survived. Akthar Abbas was convicted of murder. His father, Ghulum Abbas, was convicted of incitement to murder and masterminding the plot. They face 16 years in prison. The others, all relatives or friends, face lesser terms.

Three decades after the communist north won the Vietnam War and unified the country, reformers from the more open and industrious south were named prime minister and president.

The National Assembly elected Nguyen Tan Dung, 56, as the youngest prime minister since reunification in 1975. Nguyen Minh Triet, 63, the Communist Party chief of Ho Chi Minh City, formerly Saigon, was elected president. Both were unopposed. Vietnam moved toward a market economy in the mid-1980s, and foreign investment and trade have exploded recently.

Three British bankers lost their last chance to avoid extradition to the USA on wire-fraud charges in the collapse of energy giant Enron.

The European Court of Human Rights rejected the appeal of David Bermingham, Gary Mulgrew and Giles Darby. The three former executives at Greenwich NatWest, part of Royal Bank of Scotland Group, have until July 17 to leave Britain for

DOJ_NMG_0036913

Texas, where Enron is based. They've said any trial should be in Britain because that's where most of the offenses allegedly occurred.

Britain: 2 More Terrorism Arrests (NYT)

By Sarah Lyall

The New York Times, June 28, 2006

The police arrested two people under terrorism legislation in Bolton, outside of Manchester, in the latest in a series of antiterrorism raids — some linked, some independent — across England in the last few weeks. The two suspects, who have not been formally charged, were taken into custody in the aftermath of a search of eight properties in order to target "individuals suspected of possession of information that could be used for a terrorism purpose," a police spokesman said. The spokesman said the operation was not linked to other antiterrorism investigations in London and elsewhere.

State Dept. Urges Libya To Pay Families (AP)

AP, June 27, 2006

The State Department urged Libya on Tuesday to provide fair compensation to the families of victims in the 1988 bombing of a Pan Am flight over Scotland.

"Obviously, we support justice for the Pan Am 103 families, and we support their efforts to receive due compensation," deputy spokesman Adam Ereli said.

According to published reports, Libya has concluded it no longer has a legal obligation to make final payments of $2 million to each of the families of those killed in the attack.

Libya has accepted repsonsibility for the bombing and agreed to pay compensation to the families of the 270 victims. Part of the $2.7 billion has been paid. A final $2 million installment to each family is outstanding.

On Wednesday, Libya is due to be removed formally from the State Department's list of countries that sponsor terror. The payments arrangement and Libya's renunciation of weapons programs spurred good relations with the United States.

"We are actively involved in encouraging the Libyan government to extend escrow arrangements made under the settlement so that the final payment can be effected," Ereli said.

"In this matter, we want to see it resolved fairly," the U.S. official said.

Libya Says It Needn't Finish Payments To Flight 103 Victims' Families (WP)

By Bradley Graham

The Washington Post, June 27, 2006

Libya declared yesterday that it no longer has a legal obligation to make final payments of $2 million to each of the families of those killed in the bombing of a Pan Am flight in 1988, saying the agreement calling for the payments had expired. But it left open the possibility that it still might turn over the money.

Under international pressure, Libya took responsibility four years ago for the attack on Flight 103 over Lockerbie, Scotland, and agreed to pay as much as $10 million in three installments to each of the families of the 270 dead. The payments were linked to a series of conditions aimed at easing restrictions on the government of Moammar Gaddafi.

The first installment of $4 million came when the United Nations ended its sanctions, and a second $4 million followed the lifting of some U.S. sanctions. A third and final payment was due if the United States removed Libya from the list of nations sponsoring terrorism -- a move decided last month and scheduled to take effect Thursday.

But in a statement yesterday, the Libyan legal team handling the case said the deadline in the original agreement for dropping Libya from the list had passed at the end of 2004, after several extensions. Consequently, the statement said, the escrow account set up to hold the money for the final payments was dissolved early last year and the funds returned.

At the same time, the statement created a measure of ambiguity about Libya's intentions by stopping short of saying that Tripoli would refuse to make the last payments.

In recent talks with lawyers representing the victims' families, the Libyan legal team indicated that opposition to making the final payments exists within the Gaddafi government. But James P. Kreindler, a lead U.S. lawyer in the case, said the absence of an explicit rejection in yesterday's statement leaves the door open for Libya to meet its initial financial commitment, a view shared by some State Department officials who are following the case.

DOJ_NMG_0036914

"I believe that Libya will do the right thing and make the last payment," Kreindler said in a telephone interview. "But we haven't gotten confirmation of that."

Speculation about Libya's motives in issuing yesterday's statement centered on the possibility that the government simply wanted to assert its legal rights and rebut allegations that it has not acted in good faith in the settlement.

U.S. lawyers have argued that Libya remains obligated to pay the third installment, regardless of whether the escrow account expired. But Libyan authorities have insisted they are no longer bound by the original agreement.

Apart from the legal arguments, U.S. representatives have urged the Libyans to follow through on their initial commitment as a matter of smart politics. Libya has been enjoying an end to two decades of international isolation as a result of its willingness to accept responsibility for the plane attack and its subsequent decision in 2003 to abandon its nuclear, chemical and biological weapons programs after secret negotiations with U.S. and British officials.

Calls to Libyan officials in Washington yesterday were not returned.

In the event no further payments are forthcoming after Thursday, Kreindler said, the victims' families would probably take legal action against Libya in federal court in New York.

"We would argue there's been a breach of the good-faith provision," he said. "But letting this drag out for another two or three years is not good for anyone. "

Reflecting strong congressional sentiment to compel the final payments, some House members are backing a proposed amendment to the State Department's appropriations bill that would block funds for restoring diplomatic relations with Libya until it honors its financial commitments to the families.

"How can the U.S. possibly be expected to trust Libya when they are depending on a legal technicality to absolve them from their promise to pay restitution to the families?" Rep. John E. Sweeney (R-N.Y.), the amendment's sponsor, asked in a statement yesterday. "Libya must follow through as a show of good faith to the world that they regret past actions by making full and immediate reparations to the families."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Nation's Ports Remain At Risk, Study Shows (KRT)

By John Simerman

Knight Ridder, June 28, 2006

WALNUT CREEK, Calif. - The nation's seaports remain vulnerable to attack and a lack of coordination among agencies could worsen the economic aftermath of a terrorist attack, a leading policy group says.

Inadequate federal funding and staffing has slowed or stalled a raft of security initiatives that lawmakers scurried to create after the threat to the nation's 361 ports came into focus following the Sept. 11 attacks, according to the study by the Public Policy Institute of California.

The federal push for better port security has also failed to recognize the importance of minimizing the economic impact of a terrorist strike.

"The only reason terrorists would attack a port is the impact on the economy," said Jon Haveman, co-editor of the report. "But if you can reduce the economic damage, the less likely they are to attack."

The report adds to a growing chorus of criticism over the federal response to the threat of nuclear, radiological, biological or chemical weapons being smuggled inside one of the millions of containers that flow into U.S. ports each year. About five percent of them are opened and inspected.

According to U.S. Coast Guard estimates, it would take about $7.3 billion over a decade for the ports to meet the demands of the maritime security law passed in 2002. So far, a little more than $700 million has been awarded in five rounds of port security grants.

DOJ_NMG_0036915

The Inspector General of the Department of Homeland Security last year found that almost 80 percent of the grant money wasn't being spent. Some projects that received funding appeared to have little security benefit, the office reported.

A follow-up report this year found improvement, but also said "it is not clear that (Homeland Security) knows how much actual risk reduction has been achieved."

California's largest seaports, in Los Angeles, Long Beach and Oakland - three of the nation's four busiest - have received just 19 percent of federal port security grant funds, though they handle 40 percent of all containers coming through U.S. ports, the PPIC study found.

The Port of Oakland, the fourth busiest, has received a little more than $11 million. It has a backlog of $89 million in unfunded security projects, said Mike O'Brien, head of security for the port.

"We've gotten a pretty good chunk of change," said O'Brien. "We still need more."

The federal agency this year moved to a "risk-based" formula designed to grant homeland security money based more on the threat than politics.

That helps bigger ports such as Los Angeles, Long Beach and Oakland, but may leave smaller ones more vulnerable, said Susan Monteverde, vice president of government relations for the American Association of Port Authorities. It represents 86 large public ports.

"Because of limited money, they only focused on the big guys," Monteverde said. "But they are all international borders. We don't want to have a soft underbelly."

The Bush administration has placed more than 1,200 radiation detectors in the nation's ports, and ports have used federal grant money to physically secure their entries. Customs officials inspect and boards ships at dozens of foreign ports, and the government has a "trusted shipper" program that allows it to focus on high-risk ships.

But a plan for background checks and identification cards for millions of port and transportation workers is far behind schedule.

Physically inspecting every container would bring commerce to a crawl, experts say. Instead, the checks on most containers rely on documentation that can be manipulated or falsified. That makes a focus on response vital, said Jon Haveman, co-editor of the report.

An attack on the ports of Los Angeles and Long Beach could cost as much as $45 billion to the economy, the report estimates. "That's really an upper bound," said Haveman. "But there are a lot of things that . . . can mitigate the damage."

Haveman said the federal port security program has largely ignored critical funding and planning to quickly recover from a port attack that can not be prevented.

One obstacle is a lack of a clear line of authority for emergency response. In areas like Los Angeles, as many as 15 different agencies may have jurisdiction, the study found.

O'Brien, security chief at the Port of Oakland, said local, state and federal agencies work together on drills and exercises, and that the FBI has been designated as the lead agency if the port is attacked.

"We're talking about what-ifs and sorting out those jurisdictional issues," said O'Brien.

A House bill authored by two Californians would dedicate $400 million a year to the port security grant program and require the Department of Homeland Security to develop specific policies and strategies for reopening ports after an attack.

One of the House members said Congress' lack of focus on recovery could lead to other ports being shut down as a precaution.

"A lot of what we did after 9/11 was to think of how we stop another attack," said Rep. Dan Lungren, R-Calif. "We're significantly less vulnerable today than we were five years ago, but nowhere near where we need to be . . . we can't ignore the possibility there could be a successful terrorist attack."

The money would come from customs fees on shippers. The bill cleared the House on a 421 to 2 vote in May. A similar bill is being held up in the Senate.

Court Says Personnel Rules Harm Bargaining (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

DOJ_NMG_0036916

The New York Times, June 28, 2006

The United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit upheld a lower court decision that overturned personnel rules at the Homeland Security Department, saying they failed to ensure employees' right to bargain collectively. "The regulations effectively eliminate all meaningful bargaining over fundamental working conditions," the ruling said. The department set up the system in January 2005, saying it would allow salaries to be based on performance. A department spokesman said officials were considering what to do about the ruling.

Appeals Court Vetoes Bush Plan To Alter U.S. Personnel Rules (WP)

By Eric M. Weiss

The Washington Post, June 28, 2006

A federal appeals court delivered another legal blow to the Bush administration's broad plan to overhaul the federal employee personnel system, ruling yesterday that the proposed changes would illegally limit the scope of collective bargaining.

The opinion by a panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit said new Department of Homeland Security personnel rules that deal with working conditions and employee appeals were illegal. The court upheld two rulings by a federal district judge that found the government had overstepped the authority given by Congress to rewrite personnel rules when it created the department in 2002.

Elated union leaders said the decision could scuttle the broader attempt to replace the 15-grade General Schedule pay system with one that has wide salary ranges known as pay bands, and to more strongly tie annual raises to performance evaluations. The administration hopes to expand the proposed DHS system throughout the government.

"I think the whole pay system is up in the air," said Colleen M. Kelley, president of the National Treasury Employees Union, which led a group of five unions that sued DHS. "Time is running out with this administration."

Kelley said she will ask Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff to meet and discuss reworking the personnel plans with more union input.

The new system is the product of more than three years of work. It could dramatically change the way many of the department's 180,000 workers are paid, promoted, deployed and disciplined. A similar system being developed at the Defense Department would affect 746,000 workers and has been challenged in a separate lawsuit filed by labor unions.

Bush administration officials have argued that such changes are necessary to make the federal bureaucracy more nimble and responsive in the fight against terrorism and, more generally, to improve government efficiency.

"DHS will be discussing the impact of today's ruling and potential next steps with the Department of Justice and the Office of Personnel Management," said Larry Orluskie, a DHS spokesman. "Meanwhile, DHS is moving forward with implementing a key element of MAX-HR, performance management, for most non-bargaining unit employees."

Last August, U.S. District Judge Rosemary M. Collyer found that Homeland Security's new personnel system falls short of guaranteeing collective bargaining rights because the department can override any provision in a labor agreement by issuing a department-wide directive.

Collyer faulted the department's plan to limit the ability of the independent Merit Systems Protection Board to mitigate punishment handed out to employees who have successfully appealed firings and demotions to the board. And she ruled that the plan would go too far in altering the role of the independent Federal Labor Relations Authority, many of whose duties would be taken over by an internal labor relations board.

Yesterday's opinion, written by Judge Harry T. Edwards on behalf of a three-judge panel, agreed with Collyer's findings on the DHS appeals process and on the proposed ability to unilaterally break negotiated contracts, which it called "plainly unlawful."

But the appeals court went further, saying the DHS plan, by limiting collective bargaining to employee-specific personnel matters, leaves most decisions on working conditions up to management only.

"In no sense can such a limited scope of bargaining be viewed as consistent with the Act's mandate that DHS 'ensure' collective bargaining rights for its employees," the court said.

The administration could still decide to ask the full D.C. Circuit for review or could appeal to the Supreme Court.

DOJ_NMG_0036917

"Today's ruling once more demonstrates the shortsightedness of this administration in developing personnel systems that ignore the rights of federal workers -- especially collective-bargaining rights," said Sen. Daniel K. Akaka (D-Hawaii), one of nine senators to vote against the creation of DHS, in part because of concerns about the personnel system. "Now is the time for the department to sit down with the federal employee unions to work out a personnel system that is fair, contemporary, flexible, and has the support of employees and the department's leadership."

Sen. George V. Voinovich (R-Ohio), a supporter of the new personnel system, said: "In light of today's ruling by the court, I encourage the department to renew discussion with its employees over the sections of the regulations enjoined by the court."

DHS Ruling Deals Administration A Setback (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, June 28, 2006

A federal appeals court left no doubt yesterday that the Bush administration overreached in fashioning new workplace rules for the Department of Homeland Security.

The department's regulation "renders 'collective bargaining' meaningless; and it is utterly unreasonable and thus impermissible, because it makes no sense on its own terms," the three-judge panel found.

The judges, at another point in a 50-page opinion, said, "The government's position not only defies the well-understood meaning of collective bargaining, it also defies common sense."

To imagine that a contract is not binding on both parties, as the Bush administration contended, "is simply bizarre," the judges wrote.

For three years, Bush administration officials have defended their plans for new workplace rules at Homeland Security and the Defense Department, contending that managers should not feel any hesitation to respond to emergencies or terrorist threats because of a union agreement. Unions responded that their contracts already contained emergency clauses that gave managers ample flexibility, and they filed lawsuits against the new rules.

Yesterday, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, said the Homeland Security rules failed to ensure that employees could bargain collectively and went too far in limiting the topics that could be put on the negotiating table. [Story, Page A23.]

"The obvious problem," the ruling said, "is that very few 'conditions of employment' are subject to meaningful bargaining, and the few conditions over which the parties can negotiate may be unilaterally abrogated by management. A system of this sort does not even give an illusion of collective bargaining."

The opinion, written by Judge Harry T. Edwards and joined by Judge A. Raymond Randolph and Judge Thomas B. Griffith, leaves the White House with a tough decision to make -- file for a review at the Supreme Court or go back to the drawing board.

Administration officials, who spoke only on condition that they not be identified, acknowledged that the ruling was a heavy blow. One official said the new Homeland Security personnel system was "dead in the water" and added: "There is no leadership on this."

Clearly, much is at stake. The Pentagon lost on similar grounds in U.S. District Court, and its appeal will be handled by the federal appeals court here. Additional adverse rulings could jeopardize other administration efforts as well, most notably the push to retool the federal pay system to include more performance-based standards.

Two senators who oversee federal workforce issues urged the Bush administration officials and labor leaders to meet and discuss their differences.

"In light of today's ruling by the court, I encourage the department to renew discussions with its employees over sections of the regulations enjoined by the court," Sen. George V. Voinovich (R-Ohio) said.

Sen. Daniel K. Akaka (D-Hawaii) said, "Now is the time for the department to sit down with the federal employee unions to work out a personnel system that is fair, contemporary, flexible, and has the support of employees and the department's leadership."

The National Treasury Employees Union argued the case in court and union president Colleen M. Kelley yesterday called the appeals court ruling "a sweeping legal victory."

DOJ_NMG_0036918

She said she would ask Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff for a meeting to "work out a system that can be supported and will allow employees to do their jobs."

But Kelley also suggested she was not certain a deal could be reached between unions and the administration. "They have been pretty tireless in their efforts to impose change, whether legal or not. . . . Now we will see what they do."

NTEU President Kelley will take your questions about the appeals court ruling at noon today on Federal Diary Live athttp://washingtonpost.com. My e-mail address isbarrs@washpost.com.

Appeals Court Upholds Rejection Of Homeland Security Personnel System (FEDTIMES)

By Stephen Losey

Federal Times, June 28, 2006

The Homeland Security Department's new personnel system violates laws guaranteeing workers the right to collectively bargain with their employers over workplace matters, a federal appeals court ruled June 27.

The ruling likely will force the department to rewrite the labor relations sections of its new personnel rules, some observers say.

As part of its new rulebook for hiring, paying, appraising and managing employees, Homeland Security sought to include rules that would allow department managers to overturn agreements with employee unions — which the court called "plainly unlawful" — and to limit what unions can bargain over.

The ruling of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit backs up an October ruling by U.S. District Court Judge Rosemary Collyer, which also struck down the employee relations portions of the department's personnel system. This latest ruling came after the department appealed that earlier ruling.

The appeals court also broadened the earlier decision by ruling that the department cannot restrict negotiations to "employee-specific" matters. Such limitations would be unprecedented and would "effectively eliminate all meaningful bargaining over fundamental working conditions, thereby committing the bulk of decisions concerning conditions of employment to the department's exclusive discretion," the court ruled.

The National Treasury Employees Union, which was lead plaintiff in the case, said the appeals court decision effectively settles the matter and strikes down what it calls "a regressive personnel system." NTEU president Colleen Kelley said she hopes to soon meet with Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff to begin crafting new regulations that uphold collective bargaining rights.

Homeland Security spokesman Larry Orluskie said the department will soon discuss the impact of the ruling with the Justice Department and Office of Personnel Management and decide what their next steps will be.

Orluskie said Homeland Security continues to move forward with its pay-for-performance plan for most nonbargaining unit employees as part of its new human resources system, called MAXHR. Orluskie said the department is putting supervisors and managers through performance leadership training to prepare them for this transition.

"The human capital flexibilities contained in MAXHR remain critical to DHS mission accomplishment and our goal of creating a 21st century department," Orluskie said.

In other union news, the Federal Labor Relations Authority on June 27 began counting votes from Customs and Border Protection employees to determine once and for all whether NTEU or the American Federation of Government Employees will represent them. Kelley said a final vote tally should be finished by the morning of June 28.

WAR NEWS:

Bush Jogs With Wounded Soldier (AP-Y2)

By Jennifer Loven

AP2, June 27, 2006

President Bush took a jog Tuesday with a soldier who lost part of both legs in Iraq, following through on a bedside promise even the president had doubts about at the time.

DOJ_NMG_0036919

Despite a slight drizzle, Bush and Staff Sgt. Christian Bagge took a slow jog around a spongy track that circles the White House's South Lawn. About halfway through their approximately half-mile run, Bush and Bagge paused briefly for reporters.

"He ran the president into the ground, I might add," Bush said, as the two gripped hands in an emotional, lengthy shake. "But I'm proud of you. I'm proud of your strength, proud of your character."

The president met the soldier on a New Year's Day visit to Brooke Army Medical Center in San Antonio, where Bagge had been recuperating from his injuries for months. Bagge, now 23 and a native of Eugene, Ore., was in a convoy hit by roadside bombs a year ago in the remote Iraq desert south of Kirkuk.

Bagge's left leg was amputated just above the ankle, and his right leg ends just above the knee.

He told Bush during their January visit that he wanted to run with him. Bush was an avid runner who had mostly traded the activity for mountain biking in the last couple of years because of knee problems.

"I looked at him, like, you know, there's an optimistic person," Bush said. "It's an amazing sight for me to be running with a guy who, last time I saw him, was in bed wondering whether or not — I was wondering whether or not he'd ever get out of bed."

But, the president added, in tribute to the hard work Bagge did to realize this goal, "There was no doubt in his mind that he would."

"It's a privilege," commented Bagge, who had changed in the Oval Office into a special set of prosthetic legs that he uses to jog.

And then the pair took off for the remainder of their run.

Amputee Iraq Vet Fulfills Wish, Jogs With Bush (USAT)

By Richard Benedetto

USA Today, June 28, 2006

WASHINGTON — Shortly after Army Staff Sgt. Christian Bagge lost parts of both legs in Iraq when a roadside bomb tore through his Humvee last June, he vowed to not let the injury prevent him from doing things he could do before he was wounded.

“I want to run. I want to swim. I want to mountain bike. The biggest goal of all is just to do what I did before,” Bagge, 23, told CNN in an interview last month.

On Tuesday, he did one of those things. He ran side-by-side with President Bush on the spongy black jogging track that rings the South Lawn of the White House.

“And he ran the president into the ground, I might add,” Bush said after jogging about a quarter-mile.

While Bush spoke with reporters, Bagge, in an Army T-shirt and black shorts, stood next to the president, resting his hand on Bush's shoulder.

The run, under drizzly gray skies in the rain-drenched capital, was the fulfillment of a request Bagge made when Bush visited him and 50 other wounded soldiers last New Year's Day at the Brooke Army Medical Center at Fort Sam Houston in San Antonio.

Lying in a hospital bed, Bagge told his commander in chief that he wanted to run with him sometime. Of course, Bush said, admitting now that he was skeptical that the young soldier would ever be able to do it. The payoff came less than six months later, thanks to two prosthetic legs and a lot of determination on Bagge's part.

Bagge's left leg was amputated below the knee, his right leg just above the knee. He put on his special running legs — each a springy, C-shaped device that takes the place of the foot and lower leg — in the Oval Office.

Bush, 59, who swapped his once-manic running regimen for mountain biking due to pain in his knees, said he was inspired by Bagge's courage.

“It's an amazing sight for me to be running with a guy who, last time I saw him, was in bed,” Bush said. “I was wondering whether or not he'd ever get out of bed. There was no doubt in his mind that he would.” As they stood before reporters Tuesday, Bush thanked Bagge, a member of the Oregon National Guard, for his service: “Good man. God bless you.”

“It's a privilege,” Bagge said.

Then Bush waved reporters away. “We're not through running yet,” he said. “Get out of the way.” They ran another quarter-mile and retired to the White House.

DOJ_NMG_0036920

He Came A Long Way For That White House Jog (LAT)

By Heather Gehlert

The Los Angeles Times, June 28, 2006

WASHINGTON — One year and 14 surgeries after Army Staff Sgt. Christian Bagge lost both legs during a roadside bomb explosion in Iraq, he is out of a wheelchair and back on his feet — and jogging at the White House.

"He ran the president into the ground," President Bush told reporters Tuesday afternoon as the two men took a break from a turn around the nearly quarter-mile track on the South Lawn.

They first met in January at Brooke Army Medical Center in Texas. Bagge was bedridden.

"He said, 'I want to run with you,' " Bush said. "I looked at him, like, you know, there's an optimistic person. But I could tell in his eyes that he meant it.

"It's an amazing sight for me to be running with a guy who, last time I saw him … I was wondering whether or not he'd ever get out of bed," the president said. "There was no doubt in his mind that he would."

Because Bagge cannot feel his feet hitting the ground, he has had to relearn the mechanics of jogging, relying on the energy return from carbon fibers in his prosthetic limbs, instead of his own calf and ankle muscles, to propel him forward.

"It's very strange to get used to … you learn to feel the vibration of the prosthetic in your limb," Bagge, 24, said in an interview the night before the presidential jog. "The prosthetic becomes an extension of you."

His father, Doug, described his son as so agile that "many times, if you didn't look down at his feet, you'd never know he doesn't have them."

Bagge, a member of an Oregon National Guard unit, and nine other soldiers were injured last June in the blast near Kirkuk.

He was trapped in the Humvee for about 45 minutes — aware of his blood-soaked body, the left boot that was pointed in the wrong direction and the pain. After being pulled from the vehicle, he waited another 45 minutes for a helicopter.

"At first, I thought that I may have been dead because my driver wasn't calling my name, and he was calling other people's names," he said. "I thought maybe for a minute I was hearing things outside my body."

Bagge's right leg was amputated above the knee, his left leg just below the knee. For many months, he said, he needed narcotics for the severe phantom pain and post-surgical agony.

"To see him in the early days, having to scoot around on his bottom or falling out of his wheelchair — that was hard," said Bagge's father. "But he's an overcomer."

Bagge has four sets of limbs: one for walking, one for running, one for swimming and one as a backup. And he's not ashamed of his injuries: When he was awarded a Purple Heart last year, Bagge wore shorts to the ceremony.

"I'm very proud of what I've done for this country," he said. "I'm proud of my wounds."

The hardest part of his recovery, he noted, has been mental.

"Even today, a year later, I find myself self-conscious on this trip [to Washington]," he said. "I get funny looks all the time…. Obviously people are shocked to see somebody with two fake legs walking around. Some people will drop their jaw and watch you walk away. And sometimes it's just extremely rude.

"It can be very easy on certain days for me to get down and depressed," Bagge continued. "But if I could ask an Iraqi who was oppressed by Saddam: 'Hey, is this worth the loss of two legs of an American soldier?' I think they would say, 'Yes.' "

Kerry And Feingold Form Alliance On Iraq (AP-Y2)

By Frederic J. Frommer

AP2, June 27, 2006

One epitomizes the Washington political establishment as the Democratic Party's most recent presidential nominee. The other is the quintessential Democratic outsider, proud to be the only senator to vote against the USA Patriot Act.

Notwithstanding their different histories, Sens. John Kerry and Russ Feingold joined forces last week to push a proposal that would have required troops to leave Iraq by July of next year. And they may soon have something else in common: Both are considering presidential races in 2008.

DOJ_NMG_0036921

"It seems to be a marriage of convenience," said Democratic consultant Dan Payne, a former Kerry Senate campaign strategist. "Feingold wants to be considered of presidential stature, and Kerry wants to look like he can work with others to reach a compromise."

Both Kerry, D-Mass., and Feingold, D-Wis., insist that politics has nothing to do with it.

"Not on subjects of war and peace," Kerry said in a telephone interview. "Not on subjects that involve young Americans in uniform in harm's way. As far as I'm concerned, the only consideration is what's the best policy, how do you advance the security of our country, and what do we do to do it?"

Feingold, who voted against the Iraq war resolution in 2002, last year became the first senator to call for a troop withdrawal timetable. He said he didn't mind that many news stories referred to the "Kerry" proposal.

"I'm not in this game for ego, and I'm not in this game for trying to figure out who should go first and who should go second," Feingold said in a separate telephone interview. "This is a matter of life and death. This is a matter of our national security. And I was proud to join with another senator whom I respect to do this."

Ann Marie Hauser, a spokeswoman for the Republican National Committee, mocked the coupling.

"Whether it's John Kerry's indecisiveness or Russ Feingold's extremism, Democrats across the board support an approach that results in surrendering to our enemy," Hauser said. "But as 2008 looms, it is interesting to watch these two senators trip over each other as they rush to the far left of their party."

While the Senate defeated, on a 60-39 vote, a nonbinding resolution that would have urged the administration to start withdrawing troops by year's end, the Feingold-Kerry proposal went down on an 86-13 vote. By Feingold's standard, that was progress.

"You know, I was the only one in this position a year ago," he said. "Now you have 13 senators, including our presidential standard-bearer, John Kerry."

Feingold certainly doesn't mind standing alone. In 2001, he cast the only vote in the Senate against the Patriot Act, the post-Sept. 11 federal law that greatly expanded the government's authority to investigate terrorism suspects at the cost, according to its critics, of some civil liberties. His proposal to censure President Bush for a warrantless surveillance program has attracted only three co-sponsors — one of them Kerry.

Those positions have made Feingold popular among liberal anti-Bush activists.

Feingold has been openly critical of Democrats who voted to authorize the Iraq war, even those who have since said that vote was a mistake — a group that includes Kerry.

But Feingold said that was one reason he was so encouraged to work with Kerry.

"Let's face it — he was our standard-bearer, he had voted for the war," Feingold said. "And yet, I was able to bring him together with me to do exactly what I've believed all along, that this wasn't a good idea, and that we needed to reverse course."

Kerry reiterated his position, dating back to the 2004 presidential election, that he would not have gone to war had he been president — "wrong war, wrong place and wrong time."

But he added: "Russ made the right vote, I made the wrong vote, it's that simple."

Feingold said the two men started working together on the issue when they both staked a position in meetings with fellow Democrats calling for a timetable to bring the troops back. Neither could persuade the group to go along.

"So we just decided to cooperate in order to strengthen our hand, and not just be operating on our own," Feingold recalled.

"We've worked together on a lot of things," Kerry said. "We share a lot of strong beliefs about how badly the system needs to be reformed, and how screwed up Washington is."

Payne, the former Kerry strategist, said the alliance poses risks for Feingold and Kerry.

"It's a trick for both of them because there's the potential that Kerry can look like he's backtracking, and Feingold has to be careful not to appear to be co-opted or bought off," he said.

Democrats Attack GOP On Iraq Bills (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, June 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0036922

Senate Democrats yesterday accused Republicans of using a "Karl Rove playbook" to make the minority party seem weak on defense and to defeat a Democratic plan to begin withdrawing troops from Iraq.

They called Senate Republicans a "rubber stamp" for the White House.

Sen. Carl Levin of Michigan called Republicans hypocritical for opposing his "phased redeployment" plan because top military officials have announced there is likely to be some troop withdrawal this year.

Republicans "tried and failed" to put the Democrats on the defensive during last week's heated debate, said Mr. Levin, the ranking Democrat on the Armed Services Committee.

"The public wants a debate on Iraq," he said. "The Republicans looked like they are rubber-stamping whatever the White House wants and using a play out of the campaign playbook of Karl Rove to attack your opponents as being weak on defense instead of talking about policy pros and cons."

Mr. Levin and Sen. Jack Reed, Rhode Island Democrat, last week sponsored a nonbinding resolution that called for starting a phased withdrawal of troops from Iraq by Dec. 31. It was rejected Thursday on a nearly party-line vote of 60-39, with Republicans accusing Democrats of trying to "surrender" or "cut-and-run" in Iraq.

On the same day, the Senate voted 86-13 to reject a separate proposal to withdraw combat troops by July 2007.

Gen. George Casey, the top U.S. military commander in Iraq, said last week that more Iraqi forces are prepared to take the lead, showing "great progress."

"I'm confident that we'll be able to continue to take reductions over the course of this year," he said shortly after the Senate votes, adding that the first U.S. troop reductions in Iraq could begin in September.

"Within two hours [of Thursday´s votes,] our commander on the ground is saying he still believes fairly substantial reductions can take place over the course of this year," Mr. Levin said, adding that Democrats are "very much in sync with General Casey."

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee said yesterday that he "wholeheartedly disagrees." Mr. Frist said Gen. Casey is qualified to craft plans for troop withdrawals, but senators are not.

White House spokesman Tony Snow said Gen. Casey has offered several options and warned reporters against focusing on the withdrawal plan. "Certainly that's under consideration," Mr. Snow said.

House Majority Leader John A. Boehner said those who support "prematurely withdrawing" troops clearly were defeated in the Senate and in the House earlier this month.

When asked about Gen. Casey's plan, the Ohio Republican said the commander and President Bush should make the decision based on conditions on the ground.

"It should not be left to the Congress to set some arbitrary timetable for the draw-down of the troops," Mr. Boehner said. "The [generals] are the people on the ground. They're there, charged with making those decisions. And they will make those decisions, not us."

"We were not calling for some arbitrary deadline; we were asking the president to initiate withdrawal of forces this year," Mr. Reed said. "Frankly, that's what General Casey suggested rather strongly."

Democratic leaders will hold a press conference today on Iraq policy, during which several Democratic senators "will call on Bush Republicans to put aside their failed policies and join Democrats, Gen. Casey and the Iraqis in working to change course in Iraq," according to an announcement.

Staying On Message -- Nixon's Message (WP)

By Harold Meyerson

The Washington Post, June 28, 2006

Let's give credit where credit is due: Nobody knows how to take the worst political hand imaginable -- responsibility for a failing war -- and turn it to their own advantage like the Republicans. That was the defining political accomplishment of Richard Nixon in Vietnam. It may yet be the defining political achievement of George W. Bush in Iraq.

Nixon, of course, had an easier time of it. When he took office in 1969, he inherited a war that his Democratic predecessors had made and that had long since descended into a blood-drenched, stalemated disaster. He could have opted to end the war early in his term, particularly since neither he nor his national security adviser, Henry Kissinger, believed it was winnable. But by continuing the conflict, and even expanding it into Cambodia, he enraged the 40 percent of the nation that wanted us out of Vietnam. Millions of demonstrators took to the streets; some of the student movement embraced a wacky, self-marginalizing anti-Americanism; and mainstream Democrats grew steadily more antiwar.

DOJ_NMG_0036923

And by nurturing such deep divisions in the body politic, Nixon created the very kind of political landscape on which he was a master at maneuvering. Just 10 months into his presidency, Nixon was championing what he termed the "silent majority" of his countrymen against the protesting hordes. Democrats railed against the war in Vietnam; Nixon railed against the demonstrators and Democrats, whom he gleefully conflated, at home. It was an asymmetric conflict, and Nixon won it going away, defeating George McGovern in 1972 by more than 20 percentage points.

Today Republicans in general and Karl Rove in particular have resurrected the Nixon game plan. They are not mounting a point-by-point defense of the administration's plan for Iraq, not least because the administration doesn't really have a plan for Iraq. When Senate Democrats brought two resolutions to the floor last week, each calling for a change in our policy, the Republicans defeated them both, but they pointedly failed to introduce a resolution of their own affirming the administration's conduct of the war. That, they understood, would have been a loser in the court of public opinion. Instead, they walked a tightrope: not really defending the war per se but attacking the Democrats for seeking to end it. This was Nixonism of the highest order.

But Bush Republicans face a tougher challenge than their Nixonian forebears. There aren't really demonstrators in the streets. No one is being rude or disorderly. Most congressional Democrats advocate nothing more than a phased redeployment of our troops, though polling shows the public is split on the more radical alternative of setting a hard deadline for withdrawal.

In the face of such raging moderation, the Republicans have nonetheless opened a two-pronged attack on the Democrats. First, they argue, the Dems are defeatists, calling for a withdrawal of our forces that would dishonor the men and women in the military who've given their lives in the course of the war. But the selectivity with which Republicans invoke this equation of withdrawal with dishonor undermines the equation altogether. After all, who among them argues that Ronald Reagan's withdrawal of our forces from Lebanon, or Nixon's withdrawal from Vietnam, disgraced our dead?

The more serious, and innovative, Republican claim isn't that Democrats are defeatists, however; it's that the Democrats are ditherers. "I believe [the Democrats'] real challenge is that they have no common unified position on Iraq as a party," Oklahoma Republican Rep. Tom Cole said recently. "Whether we are right or wrong on our side of the aisle, we do have a common position."

Repeatedly, Republicans have accused the Democrats of having what the president termed an "interesting internal debate" on the war. The implication is that the Democrats are all talk (or, worse, all thought) but no action, and in a post-Sept. 11 world, what really matters is resolve. That the president's war of choice has created a disaster in Iraq so profound that no course of action is likely to result in a safe, livable nation, then, may perversely work in the president's favor. Of course, the Democrats are conflicted about what to do in Iraq. They think about it (at least, some of them do) and can't totally agree on how best to mitigate the catastrophe.

The Democrats think too much, say the Republicans; such men are dangerous. Vote for us; we're dumb but tough. This may not be a surefire prescription for electoral success, but given the hole the Republicans have dug themselves into, I think Nixon would be proud.

Turning To The U.N., Again (WP)

By Richard Holbrooke

The Washington Post, June 28, 2006

In a little-noticed announcement in President Bush's news conference on June 14, the day he returned from Iraq, he said that he would send two personal emissaries to New York to consult with U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan on the political and economic future of Iraq. The next day, still with remarkably little public attention, Philip Zelikow, the counselor of the State Department, and Deputy Treasury Secretary Robert Kimmitt met with Annan and his deputy, Mark Malloch Brown, at the secretary general's Sutton Place residence. There was no one else present.

DOJ_NMG_0036924

The two presidential envoys asked Annan to use his unique "convening powers" to help organize international meetings that would lead (by this fall, the Americans hope) to the unveiling of a new "Iraq Compact" -- an agreement between the Iraqi government and major international donors that would commit Baghdad to a series of political and economic reforms in return for substantially more international aid. (Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki called Annan the same day to make an identical request.)

This is a good idea -- and quite similar to suggestions from many administration critics. With the battle for Baghdad raging, it remains to be seen whether an Iraq Compact will work -- or even get off the ground -- but it is certainly an important step in the right direction for Iraq and for American policy.

For Annan and the United Nations, Bush's request poses an ironic and difficult challenge. On the one hand, the administration is asking for help on the worst problem it faces, acknowledging, however belatedly and reluctantly, that once again, the United Nations is not only relevant but at times indispensable to the United States. On the other hand, the resentment among the majority of U.N. member states over the way the institution has been treated recently, especially by Washington's current U.N. ambassador, makes any effort to get the United Nations to help the United States far more difficult.

How to treat the United Nations has been a particular dilemma for President Bush, since opponents of the organization form an important part of the administration's core constituency. Internal disagreements over the past five years about whether to support it or abandon it, to use it or bypass it, have both weakened the organization and led to reduced U.S. influence even as more and more intractable issues are thrown into its hands.

The United Nations is facing major budgetary problems caused primarily by American insistence on a six-month budget cycle instead of the normal two-year cycle. It must deal with growing shortfalls in the U.S. contribution to peacekeeping funding, despite Washington's calls for more peacekeepers in Darfur and elsewhere. And it is confronted by a deadlock over rebuilding the headquarters complex in New York -- a deadlock whose main cause is the administration's failure to push Congress for proper funding. (This is particularly difficult to understand, since the U.N. signature building, its 38-story East River office tower -- built in 1950 and never subject to modern safety codes -- is widely acknowledged to be the major building in New York most vulnerable to a terrorist attack. For example, when the president visits it, the Secret Service closes down FDR Drive beneath it -- but what about the rest of the time?)

Still, even though Annan and the world body have been diminished by Washington, he and his colleagues simply cannot refuse to help on the Iraq matter; it is their responsibility as international civil servants to go where the problems are worst and then to do their best. And, on the basis of private talks with Annan, Malloch Brown and administration officials, I have no doubt that they intend to do just that. In fact, Malloch Brown has already agreed to travel to Baghdad very soon for preliminary meetings that the United Nations and the United States hope will culminate later this year in a high-level conference in the region. As Annan moves into his last six months as secretary general, this would be the right way to end a turbulent decade in that office -- with a genuine contribution to the cause of peace in Iraq.

It is, however, impossible not to note the irony and the implications of what has happened in the past two weeks between Washington and the United Nations. Once again, an administration that has underfunded, undersupported and undermined the United Nations has turned to it, almost in desperation, for help.

The lesson should be clear: Despite the enormously self-destructive actions of many other member states, especially the group of developing nations called the G-77, the United Nations still serves U.S. foreign policy interests in many important ways. Not only Iraq but also Iran, Darfur, Afghanistan and the difficult negotiations just started over Kosovo's final status -- all issues of vital importance to the United States -- have now ended up in the United Nations. To weaken this institution further, as has happened in recent years, serves no clear American national security interest. To strengthen it would make it more valuable to the United States and to every nation that seeks conflict resolution, stability and economic progress. With the maneuvering over the selection of Annan's successor underway, it is time for Washington -- and this must include Congress -- to put behind it a sorry period of confusion and offer the United Nations more support, both financial and political, in return for the things it needs in Iraq and elsewhere.

Richard Holbrooke, a former U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, writes a monthly column for The Post.

DOJ_NMG_0036925

20 Held In U.S. Soldiers' Slaying (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, June 28, 2006

The U.S. military has detained 20 persons with knowledge of the brutal deaths of two American soldiers south of Baghdad and thinks al Qaeda in Iraq was responsible, an Army general said yesterday.

Maj. Gen. James Thurman, who commands U.S. operations in and around Baghdad, said at a press conference that more than 8,000 Americans and Iraqis searched for the soldiers after their traffic checkpoint was attacked on June 16.

The bodies of Pfc. Kristian Menchaca, 23, and Pfc. Thomas Tucker, 25 were found three days later in a village in the "Triangle of Death," so called because of the large presence of insurgents. The troops' bodies had been booby-trapped with improvised explosive devices, and it took demolition teams half a day to clear a path to the bodies. Another soldier, Spc. David J. Babineau, 25, was found killed near the checkpoint.

Asked who was suspected in the killings, Gen. Thurman said, "This is a terrorist and foreign fighter area where al Qaeda operates. And I will tell you I believe al Qaeda is associated with the majority of the attacks in south Baghdad, and in and around the area where we found the soldiers ... I think we've hurt them very bad down there, and I'll tell you that. I believe we have."

The general said investigators are still piecing together what happened on June 16. He declined to say why three junior-rank soldiers were left alone, in one armored Humvee, to man a checkpoint in one of Iraq's most violent neighborhoods.

He also did not reveal whether the soldiers were killed at the scene and their bodies mutilated or whether they were tortured to death, as an Iraq general has said.

"That's why we're investigating it," Gen. Thurman said. "We go through intensive efforts to look at DNA, to look at autopsies and things like that to make sure that we can determine the cause of death and that sort of business."

He said searchers captured 36 suspected insurgents, 20 of whom had "direct or indirect links to the attack."

At the Pentagon, Army Lt. Gen. Martin Dempsey, the man in charge of training and equipping the growing Iraqi security forces (ISF), said that newly minted army battalions are still not able to operate independently of U.S. forces but that they continue to make progress. The ability of the ISF to fight is the key to President Bush being able to order home large number of U.S. troops.

"They are not independent at this point in time," Gen. Dempsey said. "They will become independent as we see the new government take on some of the issues related to things like national reconciliation, which has the potential to reduce the threat, which then could over time allow them to become more independent in terms of military operations."

He said the Iraqi army not only has to learn how to fight, but also how to administer to a fighting force with such support activities as pay, promotions, procurement and budgeting.

"If we were having this conversation 18 months ago, there were still U.S. personnel helping Iraq figure out how to pay its soldiers and policemen," he said. "That entire process has been transitioned over to Iraqis. We have no part in their pay process right now."

U.S. Tells Of Hunt For Kidnapped GIs (LAT)

By Solomon Moore

The Los Angeles Times, June 28, 2006

BAGHDAD — The U.S. military released a timeline Tuesday that detailed its response to the abduction of two American soldiers south of the capital and the discovery of their mutilated and booby-trapped bodies more than a week ago.

But the briefing failed to explain why Pfc. Kristian Menchaca, 23, of Houston; Pfc. Thomas L. Tucker, 25, of Madras, Ore.; and a third soldier, who was killed at the site of the kidnapping, Spc. David J. Babineau, 25, of Springfield, Mass.; were outside their base camp with a single armored Humvee on the night of June 16, a Friday.

Maj. Gen. James D. Thurman declined to answer questions about possible procedural lapses that would have allowed the soldiers to leave their camp unaccompanied, saying the inquiry was continuing. U.S. military vehicles in Iraq almost always travel in groups of two or more.

U.S. and Iraqi forces staged a massive 8,000-troop, three-day search for the missing servicemen through at least a dozen villages in the Yousifiya area south of Baghdad, described by Thurman as a "hot bed of terrorist and foreign fighter activity."

DOJ_NMG_0036926

He said U.S. forces had entered the area only intermittently before October 2005 and had since established six patrol bases, counted 2,296 attacks and encountered 1,630 hidden bombs.

By the time the search for the missing troops concluded, Thurman said, U.S. and Iraqi forces had detained 36 people, 20 believed to have had links to the attack on the American soldiers. Two alleged insurgent leaders were killed during the operations, he said, and troops found 29 hidden bombs, documents and a global positioning system. Thurman said the documents and the detainees had provided useful intelligence.

On the evening of the abduction, Thurman said, U.S. soldiers stationed near Yousifiya heard gunshots and rocket blasts coming from an observation post overlooking a canal that joins the Euphrates River.

Fifteen minutes later, U.S. soldiers arrived at the site and found Babineau's body. Five minutes later, military officials stopped traffic in the area, and by 8:29, just more than half an hour after they heard the initial gunfire, they had launched an unmanned aerial drone and helicopters to search for the two missing soldiers.

U.S. and Iraqi special operations forces, along with dive teams, began scouring the area and searching the Euphrates for the GIs.

By early Saturday, shortly after midnight, 400 U.S. soldiers had cordoned off and searched areas north and south of the observation post. Helicopters dropped off Iraqi special operations forces at the Yousifiya power plant, an abandoned square kilometer of storage tanks, generators, towers, tunnels and other structures.

After daybreak, U.S. soldiers found a trail of evidence that led them into the power plant complex.

By Sunday morning, as search teams continued to sweep along the west bank of the Euphrates, troops started finding bombs, and a blast wounded a soldier shortly before 8.

At 6 a.m. Monday, a detainee told U.S. soldiers that the remains of the missing GIs were near a village called Mufaraji, north of the Yousifiya power plant. About four hours later the bodies were spotted.

U.S. officials said the bodies were badly mutilated, and efforts to recover the remains were delayed by six bombs planted to kill anyone who attempted to approach the corpses.

A group linked to Al Qaeda has claimed to have abducted and killed the two soldiers. Thurman declined to name groups he believed might be responsible, but pledged that the military would "be relentless in pursuing the perpetrators of this event."

Crackdown In Baghdad Going Slowly, U.S. Says (USAT/AP)

By The Associated Press

USA Today, June 28, 2006

BAGHDAD — The U.S. military issued a sober assessment Tuesday of the Baghdad security crackdown, saying violence had decreased only slightly in the two weeks since 75,000 American-backed Iraqi soldiers flooded the capital.

Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, spokesman for U.S. forces in Iraq, said the overwhelming security operation launched two weeks ago to rein in violence was moving slower than hoped.

“It's going to take some time. We do not see an upward trend. We … see a slight decrease (in violence) but not of the degree we would like to see at this point,” he said at a news conference in the heavily fortified Green Zone.

Meanwhile, an influential Sunni Arab cleric endorsed the reconciliation plan of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, a Shiite. Ahmed Abdul Ghafour al-Samaraie said he saw some cause for optimism and called on the government to implement it quickly.

Al-Samaraie, the head of the Sunni Endowment, the state agency responsible for Sunni mosques and shrines, threw his support behind al-Maliki's 24-point reconciliation plan, which was presented to the parliament Sunday.

He urged the government to provide details and said the plan should include the disbanding of Shiite militias, as well as the release of all prisoners who have not been charged with a crime.

“We see a glimmer of hope in this plan, but at the same time, we are noticing that some people are pushing the armed groups to attack some areas in Baghdad, spreading terror and chaos in the city in order to make this plan a failure,” the cleric said.

Deputy Prime Minister Salam Zikam Ali al-Zubaie said he met secretly in Jordan with exiled Sunni tribal leaders to win their support for al-Maliki's plan.

DOJ_NMG_0036927

Al-Zubaie said he also met and discussed the security situation with tribal leaders from volatile Anbar province, an insurgent stronghold, before al-Maliki unveiled the plan Sunday.

"We have reached positive results so that they (can try to) convince members of the honorable resistance to join the political process," he told the Associated Press in a telephone interview. Many Iraqis refer to those who have only attacked foreign troops in Iraq as the "honorable resistance" because they do not target Iraqis.

"There is no dialogue with those who targeted Iraqis," said al-Zubaie, a member of the influential Sunni Arab Zubaa tribe.

In other Iraq news Tuesday:

•The U.S. military announced the deaths of a Marine and three soldiers, and police reported 18 more Iraqis fell victim to sectarian and insurgent violence, including five people whose bodies were found dumped in the capital.

•The Iraqi High Tribunal said Saddam Hussein and six members of his ousted regime will stand trial Aug. 21 in connection with the 1980s Anfal campaign that killed an estimated 100,000 Kurds and saw thousands of their villages razed. The Anfal trial will be the second for Saddam. His first trial is in recess until July 10.

•The United Nations said 150,000 Iraqis have been displaced by sectarian violence sparked by the bombing of a 1,200-year-old Shiite shrine Feb. 22. The U.N. now estimates that 1.3 million people are displaced in Iraq. That's about 5% of the country's population.

Fear And Posing In Baghdad (LAT)

By Megan K. Stack

The Los Angeles Times, June 28, 2006

BAGHDAD — You don't want to draw attention, so you keep a battered car even if you can afford a fancier model. You don't wash it; better to let dust smear the windows. Night falls, curfew clamps down, and all those dirty old cars wend their way back to the homes of the capital. The eyes of neighbors slide after them.

Where are the drivers coming from? Some work for the government. Some fight with insurgents or death squads. Some are employed by Americans. No one asks, and no one tells; nobody knows who's who.

Bloodshed has turned Iraq into a country defined by disguise and bluff. Violence in the streets has begun to defy logic, and this is part of the fallout: A lively city where people used to butt gleefully into one another's business has degenerated into a labyrinth of disguises, a place where neighbors brush silently past one another like dancers in a macabre costume ball.

"Everything is hidden among Iraqis; people are very suspicious of one another," said 66-year-old Hayawi Mahdi Abaasi, a successful lawyer who says he won't repair his tumble-down house or replace his 1982 Toyota for fear the wrong people would notice.

"Why should I call the attention of terrorists to me? I try to be very common like everyone else," he said.

Rich people hide their jewelry and dig frayed clothes from the back of their closets to evade ransom-seeking kidnappers. Muslims claim to be Sunni or Shiite, depending on circumstance. Christians pose as Muslims. Lying about employment is de rigueur. Street police wrap their faces in masks so nobody will recognize them.

Everybody, it seems, is pretending to be somebody else, adopting a fake identity in the terrified hope of staying safe. Baghdad residents reason that no matter who you are, you're probably on somebody's hit list.

"It's not a matter of lying or not lying," said Ali Abdullah. "It's a matter of life or death."

Abdullah is a 31-year-old Sunni with dark skin, a strapping build and a bushy strip of mustache. Like most people in Baghdad, he is a man of secrets.

He was trained as an engineer in Saddam Hussein's Iraq but now works for an American nonprofit organization. His life has been threatened and his wife begs him to quit, but he says he can't — the money is too good, and they have a 3-year-old son to think about.

Abdullah takes a taxi to work so his car won't be recognized. He uses different streets each time and changes his telephone number every few months.

He splurged on a $100 Swatch watch in neighboring Jordan, but now he's afraid to wear it in public. When people ask about his job, he lies and says he owns a computer shop.

DOJ_NMG_0036928

Rule No. 1, he says: Never, under any circumstance, intimate to the neighbors on his predominantly Sunni street that he's sold out to the foreigners.

"This is a killer, if my neighbors find out where I work," he said. "This is the first thing that must be maintained, that my neighbors can't know what I do."

For Abdullah and his family, that has meant isolation. He shrinks from possible conversations, taking care not to linger in his doorway, make eye contact or trade small talk. When he caught sight of an old college friend across a crowded restaurant recently, he turned on his heels and rushed away to avoid conversation.

When they talk about the loss of intimacy, many Iraqis are mournful. Like members of most Middle Eastern societies, Iraqis have traditionally prized warmth and valued social interchange over what Westerners might regard as personal privacy. In the old Iraq, it was better to err on the side of nosiness than to appear cold or distant. It was perfectly normal to grill strangers on their marital status and the price of their possessions.

Little by little, that warmth has been bled away by war. Tension pulls on the city now. The atmosphere is thick with intrigue; it feels film noir, cloak-and-dagger. Except it is real — and deadly.

"Behavior has changed from rational behavior into instinctive, animalistic behavior," said Ehsan Mohammed Hassan, one of Iraq's leading sociologists and a professor at Baghdad University. "The individual is not safe from the others. He has to hide. He doesn't want people to see him because he thinks the people are evil."

Amid the fear and loathing, a long-standing tribal tradition has disappeared. Etiquette used to require men to ask one another about their jobs; it was a way of showing concern for a friend's livelihood and to demonstrate willingness to help a man if he had fallen on hard times.

These days, though, to ask about jobs is impolite — perhaps even dangerous. Instead, men find themselves throwing out other questions: How are you? What are you doing here?

"A lot of people are killed for no reason. So what do you think they'll do if you work for the Americans?" Abdullah asked. "That's it. You're a traitor."

Working for the Iraqi government is no better — everybody from university professors to national athletes to traffic police has been slaughtered by insurgents determined to bludgeon civic and social life to a standstill.

Iraq may be the only country in the world where militia members and anti-government insurgents walk the streets with bare faces while government workers, soldiers and cops cower behind masks.

"I wear a mask because I don't want people to know I'm working for the police," a 34-year-old officer named Ahmed Ali said on a recent afternoon. It was lunch hour, and he and some of his colleagues had driven across Baghdad through the 110-degree heat to gobble down lamb kebabs in a neighborhood where they knew fewer people.

The men are stationed in the volatile Dora area, south of downtown and one of Baghdad's bloodiest sectarian battlefields. Clad in matching blue button-downs and navy trousers, their pistols holstered on their waists, they said they didn't dare bring their badges or uniforms home, not even to launder them.

They described slipping from the house in civilian clothes, creeping into the station and changing hurriedly into their uniforms.

"In Dora, I'm well known," Ali said. "I have to wear a mask and sunglasses." Gunfire rattled a few blocks away as he spoke, but none of the police officers so much as glanced in that direction.

Amid the fear, some profit. The document forger, for one.

Assad Kheldoun, a 29-year-old who operates out of the religiously mixed neighborhood of Shaab, grinds out fake identity cards for about $30 apiece. "Exactly like the original," he boasts. But with one difference: a false name.

He's not selling to hustlers or mischief makers. Most of his clients are bus drivers, highway workers or car repairmen — people forced to make their living in Iraq's mean streets.

Last names are sectarian giveaways in Iraq, often deriving from tribes commonly known to be either Sunni or Shiite. Jaabour or Dulaimi, for instance, mean "Sunni" to Iraqis; so does the first name Omar.

Bayati is a popular surname for Iraqis looking to hide behind an adopted handle. So are Obeidi and Saadi. Those names are deliberately ambiguous, common to both Sunnis and Shiites. With a name that can go either way, Iraqis hedge their bets.

DOJ_NMG_0036929

"People are getting killed because of their names," Kheldoun said. "In the past few months, everybody is asking for a false identity card. It's a phenomenon now. The people are scared."

At the nearly deserted Abu Tariq car dealership, the owners loitered wearily among their polished models on a recent afternoon. Business is grinding along slowly for the car salesmen — even those Iraqis reaping enough cash to treat themselves to new wheels are terrified of conspicuous consumption.

"A car like this could mark the end of your life," said the owner of the dealership, 60-year-old Abu Tariq.

His partner, 48-year-old Faiq Ubaidi, pointed a finger toward a $19,000 Toyota Avalon and an $11,000 Super Saloon Toyota. The pair have been gathering dust for the last year without a single inquiry, he griped.

"People say if they buy a car like this today, they'll be killed tomorrow," he said. "I myself would like to drive it downtown with my family and enjoy the air conditioning, but I wouldn't dare."

Fear gets fundamental in today's Baghdad: The Christian woman in an Islamic headdress won't give her name for fear of getting killed. She is 33, lives with her parents on a street dominated by Muslims and risks her life after breakfast every morning by slipping into the Green Zone for work.

She is terrified that word of her job will leak out to neighbors — even her cousins don't know that she works in the heart of the U.S.-backed Iraqi government.

"I deny everything," she said.

But religious isolation has been the most painful of all. She and her family no longer dare attend church on Sundays. And she has been forced to hide her identity with Islamic dress — a head scarf, or hijab, and robe, or abaya.

"It scares me: There are people who believe that all Christians are with the Americans," she said. "We can't trust each other now. I have to keep all my secrets and everything to myself, because I don't know the people in front of me."

Haircut, Shave Can Mean Life Or Death In Baghdad (WT)

By Sharon Behn

The Washington Times, June 28, 2006

BAGHDAD -- In a country where people are killed because their names mark them as Shi'ites or Sunnis, having the wrong haircut can be lethal, too. So for barber Abu Saif, staying in business requires keeping up with the latest religious edicts.

"Being completely clean-shaven is not right," Mr. Saif explains as he draws his razor down a customer's cheek, then sweeps it back up toward his upper lip. He takes time over the cut -- a perfect upside-down question mark shave around the cheek that is most popular with Baghdad's religious Shi'ites.

"The 'Marine' cut, or shaven head, is forbidden. It is considered to be something of the foreigners," said Mr. Saif, 52, who has been cutting hair and shaving beards in his small Mansour barber shop since he was a boy of 12.

Above all, he said, Iraqi barbers have given up "threading" -- a practice common in the Middle East and Asia that involves removing facial hair with two threads tied together, rather than with a razor.

For some, the punishment for doing so was death.

"I put a poster in the window of my shop, that I apologized for threading and I said we were not doing that anymore," Mr. Saif said. "This is terrorism. One day they attack bakers, the next day they attack barbers."

The shape of a beard or haircut often marks its wearer as Shi'ite or Sunni, ensuring support in some neighborhoods but putting him at risk in others.

Religious Sunnis, for example, do not remove any neck hair, and fundamental Wahhabis never shave or trim their beards, but will cut down their mustaches to almost nothing -- "zero to one" on the razor notch, Mr. Saif said.

The customer in his chair, a Shi'ite named Abu Sara, wears his hair short and has his beard trimmed every three weeks to a tight one-week growth.

A few people have changed their cuts to match ethnicities or religious leanings other than their own, he said. Mr. Saif dismisses them as cowards: "I know some are doing that, but as Shi'ites we don't need that 1 percent."

Young men who are not religiously minded have their own models.

DOJ_NMG_0036930

"They get their ideas from actors on television, or some famous Iraqi singers or Brazilian soccer players," said Mr. Saif, who has about 20 customers a day. "Some cut most of their hair short then leave it long in front. Others wear their hair long but slicked back with a lot of gel."

Even boys come into the barber shop asking for specific cuts, he said, sometimes adding gel and perfume.

Weddings are big days at the local barber shops. A "wedding cut" includes a facial massage, eyebrow thinning, a good haircut, an extra-fine trimming of the beard and removal of unsightly ear hair.

"When I got married, I had curly hair, so I used a heating iron to straighten it out. After the wedding, my hair went back to normal and my wife was so surprised," Mr. Saif said with a laugh.

But the war and constant conflict have taken a toll on the typical barber-shop banter, he said. Customers still comment on social and political matters, and still ask for marriage advice, but politics have become a dangerous topic.

Mr. Saif recalls an argument with one of his customers over Saddam Hussein's trial, and said one of his clients took offense to another's comments after one of Baghdad's daily bombings.

"One of the customers informed on him, and then one of his friends came over and warned him not to speak like that anymore," he said.

Shi'ite Iraqi Militia Regroups Into 'Gang Of Thugs' (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, June 28, 2006

Prominent Shi'ite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, a foe of the U.S. military presence in Iraq, has lost control of his Mahdi Army, which has embarked on a wide range of criminal activity, defense officials said.

The officials said the Mahdi Army, which once confined most of its activities to protecting the firebrand cleric's religious turf and trying to dominate towns in Shi'ite southern Iraq, has become a criminal organization that commits homicides, kidnappings and robberies in the Baghdad area.

"They are killing Sunnis. Looting," said a defense official briefed on the Mahdi Army's growing violence. "It has become a gang of thugs. Sadr has lost control."

Sources said Army Gen. George Casey, during his trip to Washington last week for talks with President Bush and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, raised the Mahdi Army as a growing obstacle to peace.

Gen. Casey, the top U.S. commander in Iraq, gave no indication that U.S. forces will move against the thousands of Mahdi Army militiamen. But it was clear to those who heard Gen. Casey's talks that the new government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki will have to confront the militia with force if he is to carry out his goal of reducing violence in Baghdad.

Officials said they think the Mahdi Army is responsible for many of the execution-style killings of Sunni Muslims, whose bodies are found regularly dumped in the city and its suburbs.

The Mahdi Army is backed financially by Shi'ite-dominated Iran, which has poured agents and cash into southern Iraq since the fall of Saddam Hussein in 2003.

"Iran is encouraging lawlessness," the defense source said.

In a press conference Thursday, Gen. Casey listed "illegal armed groups" as one of four major security challenges in Iraq, along with meddling from Iran, the Sunni insurgency and al Qaeda in Iraq. He did not mention the Mahdi Army by name, but officials said he considers it an illegally armed group.

"These illegal armed groups are operating outside the rule of law," he said. "They need to be dealt with through a combination of political influence and security forces, and they will be. The government has stepped up to the challenge, has issued instructions for enforcing weapons bans in and around Baghdad and is committed to dealing with the illegal armed groups issue to protect their citizens."

Sheik al-Sadr created the militia shortly after U.S. forces ousted Saddam. U.S. intelligence sources said it has grown from a few hundred to perhaps 10,000, armed with AK-47s, mortars and explosives.

Twice in 2004, the U.S. Army launched successful offensive operations when the militia gained control of towns and villages. American soldiers, backed by Abrams main battle tanks, killed hundreds of Sheik al-Sadr's armed followers.

DOJ_NMG_0036931

But the Mahdi Army has risen again, capitalizing on the withdrawal of some U.S. forces from the south and its ability to infiltrate the Iraqi police force and army.

Iran backs the army through training and money, defense officials said. Tehran's meddling has reached the point where Gen. Casey singled out the regime for criticism.

"We are quite confident that the Iranians, through their covert special operations forces, are providing weapons, [improvised explosive device] technology and training to Shi'a extremist groups in Iraq," Gen. Casey said.

U.S. Military Expects To Meet Training Goal For Iraqi Security Forces (WP)

By Josh White

The Washington Post, June 28, 2006

U.S. military commanders expect to meet their goal of training and equipping more than 325,000 members of the new Iraqi security forces by the end of this year, an important step in developing Iraq's self-defense, Lt. Gen. Martin Dempsey, who leads the training effort, said yesterday.

Top officials remain optimistic that they will meet targets that call for training 137,000 troops for the Iraqi military and 188,000 people for Interior ministry units such as local police and the border patrol. But they warned that there is a long way to go before the Iraqis will be able to independently fight the insurgents.

"It's just not appropriate yet to be thinking in terms of independent anything in Iraq," Dempsey said. "This, remember, is a nation at war, and although they have taken responsibility for battle space, and large swaths of it . . . they are not independent at this point in time."

Dempsey, speaking to reporters at the Pentagon yesterday, said that Iraqi army troops are becoming increasingly capable as time goes on and that they share combat efforts with U.S. and coalition forces. Still, the Iraqi forces are not yet able to operate on their own, and the fact that they are learning while facing combat has created hurdles.

The development of Iraqi security forces is the cornerstone of the U.S. plan to give the new Iraqi government control of the war-torn nation. Even if the desired number of troops becomes available in six months, Dempsey said, they will need time to develop before they can take control from U.S. forces, especially in the contested areas of Baghdad and Anbar province to the west.

Nor are U.S. military leaders saying that a trained Iraqi military means that U.S. forces can leave Iraq soon.

"It's my belief . . . that we're going to be in Iraq for a long time," Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker, the Army chief of staff, told the House Armed Services Committee yesterday. "It's open-ended."

Dempsey said major progress has been made in the development of the Iraqi police, which number more than 100,000. He said officials expect 24,000 of 25,000 members of the border police will be trained and equipped by the end of July. And U.S. officials plan to provide nearly 2,800 armored Humvees to Iraqi forces to fight the insurgency.

Dempsey said the training effort's biggest challenge is finding capable leaders. In an effort to find 2,500 officers, trainers recalled about 3,800 who were in Saddam Hussein's military. After screenings and a six-week training program, 1,800 remained. But Dempsey said three military academy classes have produced 2,500 newly minted officers.

U.S. General Says Iraqi Army Will Be Built By End Of The Year (NYT)

By Thom Shanker

The New York Times, June 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 27 — The American general in charge of training Iraqi security forces said Tuesday that the new army would be formed and at full strength by the end of the year. But he cautioned that the new military in Iraq still faced a shortage of qualified officers and the infrastructure required to carry out independent operations.

The officer, Lt. Gen. Martin E. Dempsey, said the threat of armed militias could be resolved only by negotiations with religious leaders commanding those illegal groups, and by taking away their foot soldiers by offering them the choice of a role within government-controlled security services, an opportunity to disarm — or punishment.

DOJ_NMG_0036932

And in a statement of battlefield realism rarely heard from a lecturn in Washington, General Dempsey said it was certain that a national reconciliation plan offered by the new Baghdad government would include amnesty for at least some who had engaged in insurgent acts.

"Isn't there some sense of inevitability about that?" General Dempsey said. But he quickly noted that Iraqi and United States officials would discuss in private how best to "establish the white lines" that would deny amnesty or pardon to those who had killed any Iraqis or troops from the American-led forces.

Political figures in Washington have loudly criticized members of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki's government for even considering an amnesty that would include insurgent fighters. In Baghdad on Tuesday, Mr. Maliki clarified his plans for amnesty, assuring that it would not be given to anyone who killed troops or Iraqi civilians.

General Dempsey said that without a national reconciliation plan that reaches out simultaneously to Sunni insurgents and Shiite militia members, neither side would disarm out of fear of the other.

The general's training efforts are the foundation of the Bush administration's plans for withdrawing troops as indigenous security forces grow in number and competence, and he spoke as Washington was boiling with debate over timetables for American troop reductions in Iraq.

"The Iraqi Army will be built by the end of this calendar year," General Dempsey declared at a Pentagon news conference.

General Dempsey said that by the end of the year, the army would be "fully capable of recruiting, vetting, inducting, training, forming into units, putting them in barracks, sending them out the gate to perform their missions."

But he expressed concerns about the ability of the Iraqi ministries to carry out military operations independent of American support, and about "leader development."

While military and police cadets "come out of a training base at a very high level of motivation," General Dempsey said, "we then turn them over to a police chief who maybe has bad habits from former times or a midgrade army officer who believes that leadership is an entitlement, not a responsibility."

Amnesty To Exclude Killers Of GIs, Iraqis (WP)

By Joshua Partlow And Bassam Sebti

The Washington Post, June 28, 2006

BAGHDAD, June 27 -- Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki vowed Tuesday that no one who has killed Americans or Iraqis would be pardoned under his government's national reconciliation plan.

"The fighter who did not kill anyone will be included in the amnesty, but the fighter who killed someone will not be," Maliki said in his first interview with Western print reporters since he became prime minister last month. "This is an international commitment, an ethical commitment: Whoever kills is not included in amnesty."

Sitting at the head of a polished wood conference table, beneath a framed Koranic verse -- "Consult with others and when you reach a decision, trust in God" -- Maliki spoke for nearly an hour about the need to build up the Iraqi army before U.S. and other foreign forces could withdraw, his desire to disband violent militias and the terms of his two-day-old reconciliation plan.

The question of who should receive amnesty has been fiercely debated, and the issue was not settled with the vague terms first offered on Sunday, when the plan was brought before parliament. Some politicians argue that only a broader amnesty has any real chance of bringing the violent Sunni Arab insurgency into the Iraqi political process in a peaceful way. But Maliki, a Shiite Muslim who heads a government led by Shiite religious parties, said the Iraqi and American families who have lost loved ones in the three-year war would not stand for such pardons.

"We have people who have confessed to killing 10, 20, 50, sometimes 100 Iraqis or Americans," he said. "And I think if a general amnesty was announced, it would have a very negative reaction."

Maliki said lesser offenses, such as minor acts of sabotage or participation in former president Saddam Hussein's Baath Party could be forgiven.

Maliki spoke on a day when the U.S. military announced that three American soldiers and a Marine had been killed in Iraq. Two of the soldiers and the Marine died over the past two days from fighting in the embattled western province of Anbar. The third soldier was killed by a roadside bomb Tuesday while on a foot patrol south of Baghdad.

DOJ_NMG_0036933

During the interview, Maliki refused to set a date for when he wanted U.S. troops to withdraw. "As the readiness of Iraqi troops goes up," he said, "the need for American or international troops goes down."

"I would also say that all the Iraqis are looking forward to the day when all foreign troops" are gone, he said.

In the two days since Maliki set forth the outline of his reconciliation plan during a speech in parliament, response from Iraq's Sunni Arab minority has been disparate. Some elder Sunni politicians, such as Adnan al-Dulaimi, as well as the Sunni Endowment, the government body that oversees Sunni mosques and religious affairs, have endorsed the plan.

In addition, Maliki said, seven insurgent groups have expressed through a third party their desire to enter in discussions with the government. Maliki declined to name the groups.

To further the reconciliation, government employees who had been detained and then released would be reinstated in their jobs with no detrimental effect on their bonuses or chance at promotion, the Council of Ministers said in a statement Tuesday. Students who spent time in prison would not be failed for missing class and could make up final exams.

The Mujaheddin al-Shura Council, an umbrella group of insurgents including al-Qaeda in Iraq, derided the reconciliation plan in an online statement, saying that "there will be no reconciliation with the apostates, nor will our swords be put in their sheaths."

A member of the Islamic Army of Iraq, an insurgent group, said this week that violent attacks would continue until all American troops left Iraq.

Adnan Thiyab al-Jubouri, a Sunni member of parliament, has already decided negotiations with insurgents are over.

"We worked hard trying to make one of the resistance armed groups accept the reconciliation project but we failed," he said. "We've been in direct contact with most of them, except al-Qaeda. They said it is impossible for the Iraqi armed resistance to stop. They insist that this is their right to get rid of the occupation."

Another Sunni in parliament, Hussein Shukr al-Falluji, said it is too soon to say whether insurgent groups will embrace Maliki's proposal but described the reconciliation plan as "born crippled."

"This thing is not as easy as some people have said. I think it follows an American ideology, not an Iraqi one," he said. "If it is not agreed that the foreign forces in Iraq are occupiers and the people fighting them are resistance, then there is no way of thinking of reconciliation, never."

The violence targeted by the government's olive branch has shown no sign of abating. Bombings killed scores of Iraqis over the past two days, including a suicide car bomb that exploded Tuesday at a gas station in the northern city of Kirkuk, killing at least three people and wounding 14.

Also Tuesday, the Iraqi tribunal prosecuting Hussein for crimes against humanity said a second trial, in the killings of tens of thousands of Iraqi Kurds in 1988, will begin on Aug. 21. Hussein and six of his aides, including Ali Hassan al-Majeed, known as "Chemical Ali" for his alleged use of chemical weapons against the Kurds, will be tried.

Prosecutors have recommended the death penalty for Hussein in the first trial, on charges of ordering the killing of 148 Shiites from the village of Dujail after an assassination attempt against him there in 1982.

Iraqi Says Attacks On U.S. Won't Be Pardoned (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise And John F. Burns

The New York Times, June 28, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, June 27 — Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki said publicly on Tuesday for the first time that attacks on American soldiers would not be pardoned under the rules of a new Iraqi amnesty plan.

In his first meeting with Western journalists since he became prime minister a month ago, Mr. Maliki sought to allay concerns raised by many in the United States that the plan, which he unveiled Sunday as part of a broad effort to reduce insurgent violence, could lead to pardons for some who had killed American soldiers and spur attacks on American units.

Americans, he said, came to Iraq to help make it free. "Therefore, out of respect for their contribution to Iraq," no pardon will be offered to their killers, or to insurgents who have killed Iraqi soldiers and police officers, he said.

It was the most unequivocal statement by any Iraqi official about the amnesty, which had caused confusion among Iraqi political leaders as well as American officials since it was announced in broad terms on Sunday.

DOJ_NMG_0036934

The amnesty is part of a "national reconciliation" program that Mr. Maliki, a Shiite, offered in an effort to find a political solution to the violence that continues to kill dozens of people a day, a vast majority of them Iraqi civilians. Iraq now has an elected government with a four-year term, but it has failed to improve security here in the battered capital, where Sunni and Shiite militias continue to kill with impunity, and some neighborhoods have sunk into conditions resembling anarchy.

Insurgent violence on Tuesday claimed the lives of 21 Iraqis and 2 American servicemen, and wounded an additional 41 people. The American military also announced the deaths of 2 service members killed Monday in fighting in Anbar Province.

Mr. Maliki was at pains on Tuesday to explain his reconciliation plan, which emerged from long consultations with the competing political blocs in his national unity government, but drew criticism for the vagueness of its amnesty provisions. They reflected the deep divisions in the government.

Religious Shiites strongly opposed amnesty for Sunni insurgents, while Sunni Arabs said it would be meaningless without provisions to encourage insurgents to disarm. The Americans strongly favored reaching out to the insurgents, but opposed anything amounting to a pardon for rebels who participated in killing Americans, more than 2,500 of whom have died in the three-year war.

Despite the vagueness of the amnesty terms, Mr. Maliki said the plan had drawn widespread interest from groups important to its success, including members of political militias, tribal groups, religious leaders and insurgent groups. He would not identify the insurgent groups.

Asked to identify the sort of groups and individuals who would be eligible, he cited Iraqis who had carried out "sabotage" against the government, though only "minor" acts, as well as to those who had joined the insurgency out of hostility for the American-sponsored political process but had not killed anyone. He said it also would apply to members of the Baath Party of Saddam Hussein who renounced that allegiance. Insurgents who face trial over attacks would be eligible for pardons if they were found not guilty of any killings.

"Whoever can prove himself innocent of murder in the judicial process will be allowed to join the political process," he said.

Allies of Mr. Maliki have said that the amnesty, presented by American officials and the prime minister's aides among many initiatives that would give momentum to the new government, reflected his relative political weakness.

"Maliki's intentions are good, but he is not free to do as he likes," said Mahmoud Othman, a Kurdish member of Parliament. "He is part of this Shiite bloc, and they don't believe in this initiative to begin with."

Also on Tuesday, American military commanders released new details about three American servicemen killed by insurgents last week near Yusufiya. Maj. Gen. James Thurman, the commander of American forces in Baghdad, said 8,000 American and Iraqi troops followed a trail of "evidence," in a power plant, in a pickup truck there and on a canal road that helped lead to the bodies of two of the soldiers who had disappeared after an attack on June 16. The third soldier, who was killed in the initial attack, was found in the canal, he said.

"We did not know the demise of the two soldiers at that point," he said. Also on Tuesday, the Iranian Fars News Agency reported that President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad of Iran would visit Iraq to meet President Jalal Talabani. A spokesman for Mr. Talabani, Kameran Qaradaghi, said he had no details about the visit.

Iraq Leader Cites Rebel Interest In Amnesty (LAT)

By Solomon Moore

The Los Angeles Times, June 28, 2006

BAGHDAD — The Iraqi government has had contact with several insurgent organizations through intermediaries since the announcement of a partial amnesty plan, Prime Minister Nouri Maliki said Tuesday.

Under Maliki's proposal, amnesty would be offered to insurgents who have not killed anyone, in return for their disarming and submitting to Iraqi law.

"Many people contacted me on the day I announced the reconciliation plan, and there is a lot of support even from militias and … armed [insurgent] groups," Maliki said during a rare interview with six Western and Iraqi journalists. "We welcome their assistance, but we are still waiting until we can meet directly with these groups and talk to them in a civilized way in order to bring them into the political process. These groups contacted us indirectly through mediators."

DOJ_NMG_0036935

Maliki declined to identify the groups.

The ambitious reconciliation plan announced Sunday comes on the heels of security clampdowns in Baghdad and Basra. Maliki is also developing economic and reconstruction proposals meant to present his government as strong and decisive, focused on national rather than sectarian concerns.

Although many have criticized the amnesty plan as not ambitious enough, vague or too conciliatory toward insurgents, Iraq's disparate political groups appear to be giving Maliki a great deal of political leeway on the basis of his reputation as a pragmatic and objective leader.

"Since his first days in office, he's shown a great understanding and support of the national project," said Ammar Wajih of the Iraqi Islamic Party, the main Sunni Arab parliamentary coalition.

"He is the first elected Iraqi prime minister who addressed the issue of reconciliation matched with a security plan," the lawmaker said. "The reconciliation is an official recognition of the existence of the resistance … as distinguished from the terrorist groups."

Abbas Bayati, a Shiite lawmaker, said Maliki's efforts showed that he was willing to take a tack different from that of his predecessors.

"Maliki … wants to send a message to the neighboring countries and the U.S. that he will not only use force to handle the security" issue.

Maliki also "would like to give space for policy and dialogue with the resistance," Bayati said. "He would like to use the policy of stick and carrot."

U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad, at a news conference Sunday, said there had been "a lot more dynamism and activity" by Maliki than his predecessor, fellow Islamic Dawa Party member Ibrahim Jafari.

"Quite a lot has already been done in terms of considering issues and deciding on them," Khalilzad said.

Despite Maliki's nonsectarian reputation among Iraq's political elite, he has been constrained by members of his Shiite bloc who are wary of any plan that might appear to appease the Sunni-led insurgents.

Maliki insisted that "amnesty doesn't include those who have killed Iraqis or even coalition forces, because those soldiers came to Iraq under international agreements to help Iraq."

"The fighter who did not kill anyone will be included in the amnesty," he said. "But the fighter who killed someone will not be included."

It was not immediately clear how the program would go about categorizing each fighter.

Maliki said that extending amnesty to violent insurgents was impossible.

"There are demands for general amnesty, but in my opinion this is wrong," he said. "We have people we have detained who have confessed to killing 10, 20, 50, 100 Iraqis and Americans.

"It would result in a very bad reaction among Iraqis whose family members have been killed by those people, or even Americans with families who have been killed by those people."

Shiites are not alone in opposing a general amnesty. A bipartisan group of U.S. lawmakers strongly condemned any move that would pardon insurgents who had attacked American soldiers.

Asked to specify who would be eligible for amnesty, Maliki said it would apply to those who had not committed violent acts.

"We divide crimes into two parts," he said. "One is related to blood and killing and the other is related to opposing the government and sabotaging government institutions."

Also eligible would be "those involved with illegitimate parties, like the Baathists, who want to come back into the political process but not under their old ideology."

The reconciliation plan concerns Mahmoud Othman, a prominent Kurdish lawmaker, who said that a peace process that excludes the violent insurgents will fail.

"Insurgents in general have spilled blood," Othman said. "If you just reconcile with people who haven't caused any violence, then the violence will continue."

Othman said that Maliki probably would prefer to offer more concessions to insurgent groups but that he must be careful not to appear to be soft on terrorism.

DOJ_NMG_0036936

"He's not free to do what he wants, so when he talks publicly he talks that way to avoid pressure here and there, but in his mind he wants to go further," Othman said. "I know him — he's realistic and he wants to be serious."

Othman said Maliki's recent contact with insurgents proved his willingness to go further than his comments might indicate. The lawmaker said the rebel groups had been put in contact with Maliki by Sunni tribal figures, American officials and even President Jalal Talabani, who has been holding his own talks with insurgent sympathizers.

"Some of these moderators are living in Amman [Jordan], some in Anbar, some in Syria," Othman said. "They have contacts with the other side and with us."

During the interview, Maliki appeared relaxed and eager to answer journalists' questions. The session took place in a conference room at his presidential complex as assistants served fruit juice and tea. A framed verse of the Koran in florid script read, "Take counsel with others and when you have reached a decision together, put your faith in Allah."

Maliki, a member of the Shiite opposition during the reign of Saddam Hussein, led Dawa Party guerrilla operations while in exile in Syria and Lebanon. Upon his return to Iraq in 2003, he served on the De-Baathification Committee formed to purge members of the former regime and sat on the national constitution-drafting committee.

Since he was chosen prime minister in April, Maliki's precarious position between so many competing agendas has engendered sympathy even from prominent Sunni leaders such as Ahmed Abdel Ghafour Samaraie, head of the Sunni Waqf endowment, the government agency that maintains Sunni houses of worship. The influential group endorsed Maliki's plan Tuesday.

Hassan Sunayed, a Dawa Party member and acquaintance of Maliki's for 25 years, said the prime minister's deliberate style was necessary in Iraq's fractious political environment.

"He is wise and open and never rushes things," Sunayed said. "He is strict and forceful when it comes to the law…. I lived with him a long time and lived under the same roof with his family. He consults about everything — even his tie!"

Samaraie acknowledged Sunni discontent with some aspects of Maliki's proposal and his cautious pace but said he trusted his intentions and understood his limitations.

"He's the proper man for this period and we hope he can succeed," Samaraie said. "Actually, whatever his successes, it is not just his gain, it is for all of Iraq. This is why we are now supporting him."

A Road Map Home (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, June 28, 2006

"Every war must end," says Zalmay Khalilzad, America's ambassador to Baghdad. And while termination of the brutal conflict in Iraq is hard to imagine right now, top U.S. officials are sketching a road map to begin stabilizing the conflict and withdrawing American troops.

Khalilzad outlined the Bush administration's current thinking about Iraq in a telephone interview from Baghdad on Monday. The items on his agenda include a joint U.S.-Iraqi committee to discuss the details for a gradual withdrawal of American troops over the next several years, a conditional amnesty for Iraqi insurgents as part of a broader reconciliation effort, and negotiations with insurgent groups about terms and conditions for ending the fighting.

What was clear in Khalilzad's comments (but is rarely so in the partisan Washington debate about Iraq) is how badly the Bush administration wants to find a way out of the Iraq morass. Last week was an example of this disconnect, with Republican legislators blasting Democrats for advocating phased troop withdrawals, even as Gen. George Casey, the U.S. military commander in Iraq, was quietly discussing just such a withdrawal timetable at the Pentagon. As is usually the case with Iraq, the Baghdad version of what's going on is far more useful than the Washington version, so it's worth paying careful attention to Khalilzad's account.

Reconciliation sounds fine in principle, but in practice it can be agonizing. I asked Khalilzad how he would answer members of Congress who are indignant that insurgents who opposed the U.S. occupation might be pardoned by the Iraqi government. "They need to understand that we want this conflict to end," he said, and stressed that Iraqi and American hopes of reducing U.S. forces can be achieved only if the insurgents agree to stop fighting and recognize the Iraqi government's authority.

DOJ_NMG_0036937

"The biggest thing we can do to honor those who sacrificed here is to achieve the cause they fought for" by creating a peaceful and democratic Iraq, he said.

"Ending a war is as difficult as fighting a war," Khalilzad went on. He noted that many conflicts in American history have ended with a general or partial amnesty -- from the Whiskey Rebellion to the Civil War to the U.S. Army's battle against insurgents in the Philippines. "To end a war, you must balance the requirements of reconciliation with the requirements of justice," he explained. Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki seemed to be trying to strike such a balance yesterday when he said any amnesty shouldn't apply to insurgents who had actually killed Americans or Iraqis.

A key part of the Bush administration's strategy is to involve Maliki's government in discussions about withdrawal of U.S. troops. Gen. Casey briefed the Pentagon last week on his hopes to cut the number of U.S. combat brigades in Iraq by more than half by the end of 2007, according to a story in Sunday's New York Times. Casey will soon meet with Maliki to form the joint U.S.-Iraqi committee that can oversee the buildup of Iraqi security forces and the corresponding drawdown of U.S. troops.

"When we establish that committee," Khalilzad explained, "the subject will be the withdrawal of U.S. forces, and the conditions related to a road map for an ultimate withdrawal of U.S. troops." He stressed, however, that there was no automatic timetable for withdrawal and that he expected Maliki "will be on the cautious side."

The political-military strategy embraced by Khalilzad and Casey over the past year has combined aggressive military operations against die-hard insurgent groups with outreach to elements of the Sunni insurgency that (in theory) can be co-opted. After killing the worst of the worst, Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, U.S. and Iraqi forces have pushed hard on both fronts -- taking down Zarqawi's networks and simultaneously talking with Sunni groups. Khalilzad said Monday that this outreach effort had made significant progress in the past few days.

"Contacts have been made with the Iraqi government and the coalition, by people who say they are associated with the insurgency, about reaching an agreement," he said. Among the issues under discussion, he said, is whether some of the Sunni insurgent groups can be melded into the Iraqi security forces, as is being done with Shiite and Kurdish militias. "I would not rule it out," Khalilzad said.

Listening to America's ultra-realist ambassador, it's obvious that the buzzwords of the Washington political debate -- "cut and run," "troops out now" -- don't have much relevance for what the generals and diplomats are trying to achieve. This messy war won't end with a victory parade but with a process that is messy itself -- slow, precarious, ambiguous. But the alternative is an open-ended U.S. military occupation of Iraq that nobody wants. As Khalilzad put it: "If you don't want reconciliation, it means you must fight on."

Talking With Iraqi Insurgents (NYT)

The New York Times, June 28, 2006

It is a measure of how far Washington has scaled down its expectations on Iraq that this week's most encouraging news consisted of some highly tentative feelers for direct talks between the armed Shiite parties that dominate Iraq's government and some of the armed Sunni insurgent groups that have been fighting it.

Don't get us wrong. We, too, are encouraged that Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki has announced a promising, though not fully spelled out, national reconciliation program aimed at attracting wider support from the restive Sunni Arab minority. We are even more encouraged that several Sunni insurgent groups have reportedly approached the government with the idea of beginning negotiations.

If these approaches lead to successful talks with important elements of the insurgency, it would be a crucial breakthrough. Productive negotiations could help transform the newly formed Maliki cabinet into a true government of national unity, not just a symbolic parceling out of cabinet jobs among Shiite, Kurdish and Sunni politicians.

An agreement with major insurgent groups would also be an important step toward eventually enabling the Iraqi government to stand on its own, without having to rely indefinitely on tens of thousands of American troops to hold down the Sunni western provinces. Such an agreement could stabilize some areas enough to allow the kind of infrastructure repair and economic reconstruction that could generate genuine support from ordinary Iraqis.

DOJ_NMG_0036938

Nobody should underestimate the obstacles. But if Mr. Maliki is prepared to be a strong national leader, rather than a captive of the Shiite parties that put him in power, there is a chance that they can be overcome.

One big issue is amnesty. Insurgent groups are unlikely to agree to lay down their arms without some assurances of amnesty for their fighters. Yet the Iraqi government talks about denying amnesty to insurgents who have killed other Iraqis, and Washington has insisted on excluding those who have killed Americans. That is understandable on both counts, but it would seem to leave few, if any, real insurgents eligible for any amnesty.

There is also the question of dropping employment restrictions and other penalties against all but the highest echelons of former Baath Party members — those with direct responsibility for the major crimes of the Saddam Hussein era. For most of the rest, party membership was often a condition for employment, promotion and, in some cases, survival. But many Shiites and Kurds, who suffered systematic discrimination under Baath rule, want to penalize even lower-level Baathists.

Any reconciliation broad enough to matter will require embracing unsavory people and forgiving unsavory deeds. That won't be pretty or popular. But it is Iraq's best remaining hope for peace, reconstruction and national survival.

U.S. Urged To Press Kurds In Iraq (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, June 28, 2006

The United States' Kurdish allies in northern Iraq have provided arms, shelter and equipment to a violent Kurdish separatist movement in Turkey, and the U.S. government should do more to disrupt the links, Turkey's ambassador to Washington said yesterday.

Ambassador Nabi Sensoy said Ankara has evidence that as many as 3,000 fighters from the Kurdistan Workers' Party (PKK), considered a terrorist organization by the U.S. government, recently had moved from positions in northern Iraq to the Turkish border to carry out operations inside Turkey.

The PKK units, Mr. Sensoy said, have received arms, safe passage and other logistical help from the two leading Iraqi Kurdish parties -- both of which are strongly allied with Washington.

"The United States is on record saying it is an enemy of terrorism wherever it is in the world," Mr. Sensoy told editors and reporters at The Washington Times yesterday. "We take the United States at its word."

Turkey long has feared that the emergence of an independent Kurdish state on its border after the breakup of Iraq could revive the bloody separatist strife that has killed an estimated 35,000 people since 1984.

Mr. Sensoy said his government understands that U.S. forces face grave security challenges in other parts of Iraq and that an armed intervention against the PKK was unlikely. He said the United States also had helped disrupt Kurdish funding links in Western Europe.

But he said Washington should use its influence on its Iraqi Kurdish allies to end their links to the PKK, and to disrupt the militants' command-and-control networks.

"You have great influence over these people," he said, adding that average Turks were increasingly frustrated by the apparent inability to contain the PKK threat from Iraq.

On Cyprus, Mr. Sensoy said he thought the Bush administration was close to revealing a series of measures to ease the isolation of Turkish Cypriots after the April 2004 vote on a United Nations-endorsed plan to reunify the long-divided Mediterranean island state.

The Turkish enclave, which is recognized only by Ankara and protected by Turkish troops, voted in support of the plan, while the majority Greek Cypriots overwhelmingly rejected it.

"The United States is very much aware of what happened," Mr. Sensoy said, adding that ending the U.S. ban on direct flights to the Turkish enclave "is a very good bet."

He said eventual membership in the European Union is a central pillar of Turkey's foreign policy, but no Turkish government could make concessions on Cyprus when the European Union membership talks barely have begun.

DOJ_NMG_0036939

Turkey remains central to U.S. foreign policy on a variety of fronts, including Iran's nuclear program, the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and relations with the Islamic world. Mr. Sensoy said Turkey, an overwhelmingly Muslim nation with a rigorously secular democratic government, was a key to avoiding a "clash of civilizations" in the post-September 11 world.

"The success of Turkey's secular state is a very important project for the Islamic world and for the world at large," he said. "We are a litmus test. We have to succeed."

Hussein To Face Genocide Charges In Anfal Trial (LAT)

By J. Michael Kennedy

The Los Angeles Times, June 28, 2006

BAGHDAD — Saddam Hussein and six high-ranking members of his regime will be indicted on charges of genocide this summer in the mass killings of Iraqi Kurds during a seven-month operation in 1988, the court trying the former Iraqi president announced Tuesday.

The defendants, including Hussein's cousin, Ali Hassan Majid, also known as Chemical Ali because of his alleged role in gas attacks on the Kurds, are scheduled to appear before the court Aug. 21.

"We will hear the reading of the accusations against the defendants, some testimony and other procedural matters," said Jaafar Mousawi, a prosecutor serving in the Iraqi High Tribunal.

Iraq's minority Kurds, who inhabit the northern portion of the country, have long sought justice for the Anfal campaign, in which at least 2,000 villages were destroyed and tens of thousands of people were arrested, deported, tortured and killed, often in remote desert camps.

Anfal, which means "the spoils," is taken from a Koranic verse calling for the striking of fear in nonbelievers. Iraqis use the term to refer to the campaign between Feb. 23 and Sept. 6, 1988, when an entire swath of the Kurdish population was eradicated. The Iraqi army used mustard gas and nerve agents to wipe out Kurdish villages during that period.

The announcement of the Anfal trial came as a current trial of Hussein and seven others winds down. The former Iraqi leader and his codefendants are being tried in the killings of 148 Shiite Muslim residents from the town of Dujayl in 1982. Final defense arguments in the case are scheduled for July 10, and a verdict is expected in September. Prosecutors are seeking the death penalty for Hussein and at least two other defendants in the case.

Iraqi President Jalal Talabani, a Kurd, has said that Hussein will be tried for all his alleged crimes before any of the sentences are carried out. Under Iraqi criminal law, the second trial will begin with a detailed indictment of the charges against the former Iraqi military commanders, including Hussein.

Besides the former president, the best known of those who will go on trial in August is Majid, who is accused of playing a leading role in the Anfal killings.

He has been accused of directing a gas attack against the Kurdish village of Halabja in March 1988, killing an estimated 5,000 people. The alleged perpetrators will be tried separately, even though that attack took place in the same period as Anfal.

The other five defendants in the Anfal case were identified by the Associated Press as former Defense Minister Sultan Hashim Ahmad Jabburi Tai; former intelligence chief Sabir Abdel-Aziz Douri; former Republican Guard commander Hussein Tikriti; former Nineveh provincial Gov. Taher Tawfiq Ani; and former top military commander Farhan Mutlaq Jubouri.

Many of the Anfal victims are believed to have been buried in mass graves. Those burial sites are being systematically investigated and the findings are expected to be presented as evidence at the trial.

Rice Strives To Close Afghan-Pakistani Rift (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, June 28, 2006

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan, June 27 -- Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice sought Tuesday to heal a rift between Pakistan and Afghanistan, two Muslim allies of the United States, but tensions spilled over during a news conference in which Pakistani Foreign Minister Khursheed Kasuri angrily accused the Afghan government of making false charges.

DOJ_NMG_0036940

Rice smiled tightly during Kasuri's emotional, five-minute outburst, which was prompted by a question about Afghan claims that Pakistan is allowing its largely lawless border areas to shelter insurgents who are mounting their biggest offensive in Afghanistan since the Taliban was ousted in 2001.

With close to 10,000 international troops conducting sweeps in rugged southern Afghanistan, Rice's trip here was organized on short notice in an effort to end feuding that many analysts say is undermining efforts to stabilize the government of President Hamid Karzai.

Kasuri said Pakistan would add 10,000 troops to the 80,000 now operating in areas bordering Afghanistan. He noted that already "we have 650-plus martyred soldiers." Officials offered few other details of the content of the talks.

Rice flew Wednesday to Kabul to meet with Karzai, who is facing mounting international criticism over his performance. As she traveled to Islamabad on Monday, Rice hailed Karzai as "an extraordinary leader" and said the United States would "back him fully."

Rice's visit comes as Karzai is straining to hold his country together but is losing popular support because of increasing violence, corruption, drug trafficking and an inability to demonstrate tangible progress since the fall of the Taliban. A failure of the Karzai government would undermine Bush administration claims that Afghanistan has become a symbol of rising freedom and democracy in the world.

It is a sensitive time in Pakistan, too. With elections scheduled for next year, there are signs that Gen. Pervez Musharraf -- whose military efforts in the border areas are not popular in Pakistan -- is maneuvering to extend his presidential term. He seized power in a bloodless coup nearly seven years ago, and Rice reiterated her belief that the 2007 elections would be "free and fair."

But U.S. officials have been wary about pressing Musharraf too hard, seeking to balance demands for action against extremist groups with tangible U.S. rewards, such as sales of F-16 fighter jets, many analysts say.

In the news conference, Kasuri said he had recently met with Afghan Foreign Minister Rangin Dadfar Spanta. They had pledged not to debate each other through the media, he said, but he told reporters he could not remain silent. He said he told Spanta, "Excellency, brother, you are a scholar and professor, give me a motive why we would willingly destabilize you."

Kasuri pointedly said Pakistan could not be blamed for recent riots in Kabul, which were sparked when a U.S. military truck crashed into a crowd. He said that Afghanistan, for all its complaints about terrorists taking sanctuary in Pakistan, has provided little intelligence that was useful.

"Tell me, brother, have you ever given us actionable intelligence?" he said he asked Spanta, noting that intelligence that Karzai personally gave President Bush was later deemed "out of date" by the CIA.

"Tell us where they are hiding," Kasuri demanded. "We promise to investigate and take action."

Pakistan is eager for oil and gas deals and greater trade with Central Asia, which would be dependent on a secure Afghanistan, Kasuri said, asking, "Which country has a greater stake in peace and stability in Afghanistan?"

After Kasuri's statement, Rice minimized the dispute, saying that "our view is that we have two good friends and two fierce fighters in the war on terror." She said the key to success was greater unity, not division.

"We, Afghanistan and Pakistan are going to unify all our efforts, as we have done over the last several years, towards the goal of eliminating the threat of al-Qaeda and the Taliban," Rice said.

Rice Gently Prods Pakistan To Have Democratic Elections (NYT)

By Helene Cooper

The New York Times, June 28, 2006

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan, June 27 — Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice sought Tuesday to prop up two troubled leaders whose success is crucial to the administration on two fronts: the fight against terrorism and relations with the Muslim world.

Arriving here on Tuesday evening, Ms. Rice met with President Pervez Musharraf, whom she prodded, gently, to allow democratic elections. "We've had a discussion about the role of continuing democratization," Ms. Rice said after the meeting. "It's a good start to talk about a good and moderate Pakistan."

Ms. Rice refrained from wading into the continuing fight between Pakistan and Afghanistan over who is doing more to root out terrorism on the lawless border between the countries amid surging Taliban attacks.

DOJ_NMG_0036941

She had strong words of praise for the besieged Afghan president, Hamid Karzai, whom she will see Wednesday morning in Kabul.

"This is an extraordinary leader and we're going to back him, and back him fully," Ms. Rice said. "And when he has problems, we're going to sit with him and we're going to find ways to resolve those problems."

State Department officials did not announce that Ms. Rice was going to Pakistan until a few hours before she boarded the flight to Islamabad. In Pakistan, Ms. Rice had to play referee in the bickering between Afghanistan and Pakistan. Afghan officials, including Mr. Karzai, have accused the Pakistanis of failing to do enough to rein in the recent spate of Taliban-fueled violence.

That subject is clearly a touchy one with the Pakistanis, and on Tuesday, when a reporter asked the Pakistani foreign minister, Khurshid Mahmood Kasuri, about the Afghan complaints, he became very animated.

With Ms. Rice standing next to him looking straight ahead, Mr. Kasuri went through a lengthy list of all he said Pakistan had given to fighting terrorism. He said Pakistan has deployed 80,000 troops on the border, and would add 10,000 shortly.

"We have had 650 martyred soldiers" since the border effort began, he said. "We have more troops than Afghanistan and the U.S. put together."

The United States has about 25,000 troops in Afghanistan, but is in the process of turning over control of some areas to NATO forces. A springtime offensive by Taliban fighters has turned into the strongest show of force since American forces chased the Taliban from power in late 2001, and Afghan and foreign officials and local villagers blame a lack of United States-led coalition forces on the ground for the resurgence.

Pakistani officials also had criticism on Tuesday for the American nuclear deal with India. The deal, which needs Congressional approval, would allow the United States to share civilian nuclear technology with India despite Delhi's refusal to sign the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty. Pakistan, which also has not signed the treaty and, like India, has tested nuclear weapons, wants the same deal.

Bush administration officials say they will not get it, in part because the architect of Pakistan's nuclear program, Abdul Qadeer Khan, is believed to have shared nuclear knowledge and material with North Korea, Iran and other countries.

Waiting outside the hall at the presidential palace while Ms. Rice was meeting with Mr. Musharraf, Tasnim Aslam, the spokeswoman for the Foreign Ministry, got almost as riled up as her boss did when a reporter mentioned Mr. Khan's proliferation activities as the stumbling block to Pakistan getting a similar deal.

"Who has not proliferated?" she said. "What about all those U.S. scientists who proliferated? Where do you think the Manhattan Project comes from?"

She said Pakistanis believed that Mr. Khan's house arrest was punishment enough.

Rice Seeks To Ease Neighbors' Tensions (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, June 28, 2006

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan -- Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice began a brief visit to Pakistan and Afghanistan yesterday aimed at easing recent tensions between the two neighbors over fighting remnants of the Taliban militia along their common border.

Miss Rice thrust herself into the middle of the squabble, standing beside Pakistani Foreign Minister Khurshe ed Kasuri at a press conference and smiling tightly while he rejected Afghan accusations that Pakistan is sending terrorists across the bord er in an emotional monologue.

As she urged the two countries to trust each other more, the secretary also said the U.S. military would step up joint efforts with both of them to quell the resurgence of Taliban activity along the frontier, which she called "a very difficult and some what stubborn problem."

"The piece we need to work harder on is the cooperation that is U.S.-Afghan-Pakistani in that region," Miss Rice told reporters traveling with her. "Our military people have had discussions with the Pakistanis about what more can be done."

Violence in Afghanistan, particularly in the south, is at its worst since the Taliban was driven from power after the September 11 attacks. More than 1,100 people have been killed so far this year.

DOJ_NMG_0036942

Pakistan says it has deployed about 80,000 troops in the lawless tribal region of North Waziristan, and that they have killed about 300 militants in the past year.

But last week, Afghan President Hamid Karzai accused Islamabad of sheltering Taliban militants and, in effect, sending them to kill Afghan civilians. He also said the U.S.-led coalition forces were not doing enough to protect his citizens.

Mr. Kasuri, who hosted Afghan Foreign Minister Rangin Spanta last week, said they agreed not to resolve their differences through the press. Nevertheless, he said he felt an obligation to respond to the accusations, insisting that Pakistan had no reason to destabilize its neighbor.

"Who can understand Afghanistan better than Pakistan?" he asked rhetorically. "Which country has a greater stake in peace and stability in Afghanistan?"

He said Pakistan wants cross-border oil and gas pipelines, more trade and investment that could not take place until Afghanistan stabilizes.

Mr. Kasuri challenged the Afghan government to substantiate its claims that militants are hiding out in the Pakistani city of Quetta by providing "actionable intelligence" -- a phrase widely used by the Bush administration in its argument that the September 11 attacks could not have been anticipated.

"Tell us where they are hiding," the minister said. "We promise to investigate and take action."

Miss Rice, who flies to Kabul, Afghanistan, early this morning, discouraged Mr. Karzai from his intention to use tribal militias to provide security in parts of Afghanistan that security forces cannot reach.

"He's always talked about trying to do things in the context of moving toward regular police and army forces, because he is the one who initiated, after all, the demobilization of militias, and I don't think he wants to take a step backwards," she said.

Condoleezza Rice Visits Pakistan (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, June 28, 2006

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan — A top Pakistani official delivered a muscular defense Tuesday of his nation's effort to track down Al Qaeda and Taliban insurgents in its territory and to help ease warfare in neighboring Afghanistan.

Foreign Minister Mian Khursheed Mehmood Kasuri's response to suggestions that Pakistan had not done enough to rein in the militants came after he and the country's leader, President Pervez Musharraf, met with U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

Rice in turn offered praise to Pakistan and Afghanistan, saying they were united in their efforts to counter the threat posed by Al Qaeda and the Taliban.

The secretary was beginning a two-day visit to the South Asian nations to shore up anti-terrorism efforts, promote democracy and demonstrate anew U.S. support for Afghan President Hamid Karzai. She is scheduled to meet today with Karzai during a roughly five-hour visit to Afghanistan.

Her trip, which will also include Russia, encapsulates major goals of the Bush administration's foreign policy: seeking to promote democratic growth as a weapon against terrorism and to undercut potential nuclear proliferation.

Visits by senior U.S. officials to Pakistan regularly revolve around questions of how devoted Musharraf, an army general who has refused to give up his military post, is to pushing his country toward democracy and how quickly he will move. Those issues drew attention during President Bush's visit here in March.

On the final two days of the trip, Rice will meet in Moscow with foreign ministers of the Group of 8 industrialized nations, which consist of the United States, Russia, Britain, Canada, France, Germany, Italy and Japan. The conference is expected to focus largely on efforts to restrain what the officials see as Iran's efforts to develop a nuclear weapon.

The question of PakistaniAfghan cooperation to fight militant groups along their shared border has drawn renewed interest recently as insurgent attacks have intensified in the Kandahar region of southern Afghanistan.

Kasuri, growing animated, said he recently met with his Afghan counterpart, addressing him as "brother." He insisted that no country was more interested than Pakistan in seeing Afghanistan become a stable democracy, given the latter's potential role in helping ship energy supplies from Central Asia to market.

DOJ_NMG_0036943

He spoke at a news conference with Rice, and was responding to a questioner who cited Karzai's often-voiced complaint that Pakistan had not done enough to root out insurgents hiding in what is widely referred to as its ungoverned tribal area along the border.

Pakistan, he said, had given refuge to 4 million people from Afghanistan who fled during a decade of Soviet control, a period followed by chaos and the eventual rise of the Taliban regime. The radical Islamic group was routed in the U.S.-led invasion in 2001 that followed the Sept. 11 attacks.

Kasuri said Pakistan had dispatched 80,000 troops to the border region.

Referring to a Pakistani city that is believed to be a refuge for Afghan insurgents, Kasuri said his government was trying to support the building of stable institutions in Afghanistan and that "saying so-and-so is hiding in Quetta will get you nowhere."

His energetic response suggested that Pakistan, which walks a line between Islamic fundamentalism and more moderate politics, is sensitive to having its commitment to fighting terrorism challenged.

Rice said the U.S., Pakistan and Afghanistan were working "toward the goal of eliminating the threat" posed by Al Qaeda and the Taliban.

Bomb Kills 2 Boys And Fighting Claims 2 Britons In Afghanistan (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

The New York Times, June 28, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, June 27 — Two British soldiers were killed Tuesday in fighting in southern Afghanistan against combatants suspected of being Taliban members, and a suicide bomber detonated his car next to German peacekeepers in northern Afghanistan, killing two boys.

The violence occurred a day before Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's visit to Afghanistan. The increase in activity by the Taliban-led insurgency in southern Afghanistan and of bomb attacks in the north appeared to be an effort by Islamic militants to unsettle NATO forces as they take over command from American forces in the south, military officials here said. British, Canadian and Dutch soldiers have clashed daily with insurgents in southern Afghanistan while mounting a large offensive against them, and attacks in more peaceful northern Afghanistan have increased in recent weeks.

The British military said from its news media office in Helmand Province in the south that British forces "were caught in an incident" in the Sangin district of Helmand. The BBC reported that the soldiers had been hit by a rocket-propelled grenade as they returned from a planned operation, then had fought off a group of Taliban until air support arrived.

Besides the two British soldiers killed, one was wounded and four enemy fighters were killed in the subsequent airstrikes, a statement from the American-led force in Afghanistan said. Two Afghan soldiers were killed in the area in a clash earlier this week.

Muhammad Omar, the governor of Kunduz Province, said the two boys, ages 12 or 13, who had been killed in the suicide bombing, near the German peacekeepers' convoy in Kunduz city, were bystanders. Nine civilians were wounded in the blast, three of them critically, he said.

The governor blamed "Al Qaeda and terrorists" for the attacks. "Most of the suicide attacks are by those foreigners, and they are the enemies of Afghanistan," he said. Investigators had found the car license plate and the cellphone of the bomber and hoped to discover his origins, the governor said.

Fifty-three soldiers of the multinational force in Afghanistan have been killed this year, most of them Americans. At current rates the total could easily surpass the 86 soldiers killed in Afghanistan in 2005, which was the highest annual casualty total since American-led forces routed the Taliban in 2001.

Italy to Withdraw 400 Soldiers

ROME, June 27 (AP) — Italy's governing coalition agreed Tuesday to withdraw as many as 400 soldiers from its 1,400-member force in Afghanistan, Italian news agencies reported Tuesday. The coalition has already committed to removing all its troops from Iraq by year's end.

DOJ_NMG_0036944

The remaining soldiers in Afghanistan will focus on civil duties, Giovanni Russo Spena, a Communist Refoundation Party member, said after lawmakers met with Foreign Minister Massimo D'Alema and other officials, the ANSA and Apcom news agencies reported.

Afghans Tell Troops: 'No Security, No Help' (CSM)

By Brian Calvert

The Christian Science Monitor, June 28, 2006

SARKONI DISTRICT, AFGHANISTAN

Capt. Floy Rodriguez, leader of a US Marine advisory team to the Afghan National Army (ANA), was listening to Johnny Cash at a forward operating base deep in the arid mountains of northeast Afghanistan when the group of about 30 insurgent fighters attacked last month with rocket-propelled grenades and machine-guns. The base, called Lumberyard, had been established in early May, as a foothold for Afghan and US troops pushing north into Kunar and Nuristan Provinces.

The attack, and the killing of a local informant whose information could have prevented it, typify the difficulties faced by US and Afghan forces as they push farther into this rugged corner of Afghanistan, often mentioned as a possible hiding place of top Al Qaeda figures. As coalition forces move into remote insurgent havens, but they have been unable to provide security locals say they need in order to help oust insurgents completely. Villagers who do help coalition forces suffer, or die, for it.

"Whoever shows up with guns on that day, [the villagers] are that guy's friend," says Rodriguez, who spent more than a month patrolling the area with Afghan soldiers and meeting with villagers both inside and outside Lumberyard. Those patrols were too short and too spread out to secure the valley, which remains full of "bad guys," he says.

The inability to provide security for villagers in these areas hampers the long-term effectiveness of operations, such as Mountain Thrust, a large-scale coalition offensive launched recently in southern Afghanistan following an upswing in insurgent activity there. Insurgents hold sway in parts of the countryside surrounding operating bases in the southern provinces.

In lieu of securing whole areas like those in the southern deserts or northeastern mountains, the US has set up bases like Lumberyard, from which they conduct patrols, meet with village elders, and constantly travel the roads in search of bombs. And while coalition soldiers are able to glean some intelligence from locals in their areas, many are hesitant to give up information for fear of retribution by insurgents.

Kunar Province remains one of the most dangerous regions in the country. One US soldier was killed June 13 in Kunar, and two US soldiers were killed three days later when the all-terrain vehicle they were driving hit a roadside bomb, according to Pentagon statements. On Sunday, another coalition soldier was fatally wounded.

Afghan commanders say they are fighting Taliban and Al Qaeda remnants who have safe zones in Pakistan and are able to cross easily into Kunar. They are also fighting followers of Gulbuddin Hekmatyar, a powerful warlord who has refused to join Afghanistan's nascent government. There are also locals who once gave up the gun when economic development seemed likely, but who are now picking up the fight again.

Some US officials say troop strength is enough in these areas but that more development will bring stability where soldiers cannot. Meanwhile, they continue to push north. Last week, four US soldiers were killed "while conducting security operations to interdict enemy movement through northern Nuristan," the province north of Kunar, according to a Pentagon statement.

Staff Sergeant Shawn Nedari, a National Guard adviser to the Afghan Army who grew up in Manhattan and whose parents are Afghan, fought and patrolled in the mountains of Kunar during a recent coalition push into the area. Villagers told him that they would be unable to provide information without security.

"The problem is, we don't stay there long enough to keep [the insurgents] out," he says. "We don't have enough bodies."

Brigadier General Zemari, who commands the brigade of the Afghan Army operating in Kunar, has been wounded 15 times in battle and knows how hard it can be to fight insurgents in the mountains without the help of locals.

"The problem is not knowing, not having exact intelligence reports and no indication of the enemy from the people," he says. "[Without intelligence], we cannot separate the enemy from the locals. So if we do something, we will bring damage to the locals, and the people will not get along with the army and will not be happy with the army."

DOJ_NMG_0036945

Building schools, roads, and clinics is more important than putting more troops on the ground, Zemari says, a statement echoed by US officials.

"As the Afghan government builds the capacity to extend their reach, security will improve even more," coalition spokesman Paul Fitzpatrick wrote in an e-mail. "This is not about US troop levels in Kunar or anywhere else. The solution lies within the Afghan government and its people."

Development, meanwhile, is practically impossible without security from insurgents who target aid efforts - not to mention the rugged terrain that has hindered progress even in years of peace.

Websites Connecting Americans' Generosity, Servicemembers' Needs (USAT)

By Oren Dorell

USA Today, June 28, 2006

'There's definitely more support than there ever was'

— and the Internet offers new ways to demonstrate it

Americans are increasingly turning to high-tech methods to send gifts and supplies to U.S. troops serving in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Veterans say today's care packages are more numerous and creative — and get to servicemembers much faster — than those of the past.

In previous wars, letters from home were sometimes accompanied by cigarettes or magazines. Today, several websites designed specifically for supporting the troops overseas allow anyone with a credit card to order cellphone minutes, snacks, books — even armor and sniper accessories.

Air Force Senior Airman Hollis Vernetti went through the website Any Soldier (anysoldier.com) to request hair conditioner and other items for herself and 21 other women in her group while they were stationed in Afghanistan last year.

"Sometimes, the PX, they do the best they can, but the high-priority items, like laundry soap and coffee, go fast," says Vernetti, who is now stationed at Al Asad Air Base in Iraq. She says she was deeply moved by the messages people included with their gifts. "The letters and the cards, they made me cry."

Allison Barber, a deputy assistant secretary of Defense, says: "In today's environment, people like to customize everything they do. Back in the good old days you'd just write a letter to any servicemember. Now you have 225 choices." That's how many non-profit support organizations the Defense Department lists on the website of America Supports You (americasupportsyou.mil), a program created to spread the word about such efforts.

"There's definitely more support now than there ever was," says Judith Young, national president of American Gold Star Mothers, an organization of women who have had children die in military action. Young's son, Jeffrey, was a Marine who died in an attack on his barracks in Beirut in 1983.

"I think technology is the main difference," Young says. "These moms and the troops that are over there now, they get to talk to them every day. … I was lucky if I talked to him once or twice a month."

Among websites offering support:

•Soldiers' Angels (soldiersangels.org). This site, started by the mother of an Iraq war veteran, takes donations for Kevlar blankets that can protect Humvee crews from roadside bombs and sniper fire. It also provides troops with "cool scarves" — fabric filled with polymer crystals that can provide up to 15 hours of relief from the heat after a 15-minute soaking in cold water.

•Operation Uplink (operationuplink.org). This Veterans of Foreign Wars program solicits online donations to provide servicemembers with prepaid phone cards to call home.

•AmericanSnipers.org. A group of police and military sharpshooters created the "Adopt a Sniper" program. Donors help provide supplies such as spotting scopes, holsters and ammunition wallets to snipers deployed in combat zones around the world.

•Freedom Calls Foundation (freedomcalls.org). This non-profit uses donations to provide free videoconferences between soldiers and their families. Marine Sgt. Mitch Selco, stationed in Fallujah, Iraq, got to see his daughter by teleconference after she was born in Denver. Another Marine in Iraq, Cpl. Terrence Lambert, saw his daughter's birth in Jacksonville, Ala., via satellite on Fathers Day.

DOJ_NMG_0036946

•Operation Gratitude (opgratitude.com). The program celebrated its 150,000th care-package delivery to servicemembers on Father's Day weekend.

Marty Horn, a Vietnam-era military policeman, founded Any Soldier in 2003 when his son, Brian, went to Afghanistan with the Army. Horn has 3,000 contacts in the military who post messages on his site about what their buddies need. Goods are distributed to 92,000 troops in 11 countries and at sea.

"These have to be the best-supported troops in history," Horn says.

Tom Clarkson, a Vietnam War veteran working in public relations for the Army Corps of Engineers in Iraq, says that what the troops receive now is "completely different" from the packages servicemembers received in Vietnam. Those care packages typically came from family members and contained items like Kool-Aid, socks and popcorn.

"I can't recall anyone getting boxes and boxes of stuff," Clarkson says.

Robert Houston, a civilian working at Fort Monroe in Virginia, says the only package he received during his time in Vietnam were some cookies from his mother. "They were stale and broken up by the time I received them," he says.

Horn says there can be problems associated with being able to send almost anything anywhere. He says many troops ask for synthetic Under Armour T-shirts because they're more comfortable than Army-issue cotton — even though the Marine Corps banned synthetic materials this spring for Marines outside their operating bases. A Marine was badly burned when his synthetic T-shirt melted on his skin in a roadside bomb attack near Ramadi in Iraq.

Sometimes technology cannot improve on the old ways. Sgt. Brian Horn, 26, who recently returned from leading a sniper team in Iraq and Afghanistan, said the thing that's most appreciated is still an old-fashioned letter. "(There are) always smiles and some disbelief, and some teared up a little bit," Horn says in describing how troops react to a letter.

"It's kind of hard to explain," he says. "You have to go out for a week and get shot at a bunch and not hear from anyone, from your family, and (you) come back and it's there — a letter from someone who's (in the USA) right now — and it's positive energy, it's 'thank you,' and it's real."

DOJ:

Justice Dept., Archives And IRS To Stay Shuttered Rest Of Week (WP)

By Paul Schwartzman And Megan Greenwell

The Washington Post, June 28, 2006

The downtown D.C. headquarters of the Justice Department, Internal Revenue Service and National Archives will remain closed for the rest of the week because of damage wrought by Sunday's torrential downpour, officials said yesterday.

As emergency workers braced for more rain and pumped out flooded basements, the archives brought in industrial-size dehumidifiers to protect its historical documents and papers from page-curling mildew.

"There's no damage," said Susan Cooper, an archives spokesman. The Constitution, Bill of Rights and Declaration of Independence, which are in protective cases, were never at risk, she said.

Nearly two days after the region's first deluge, at least four government offices in the Federal Triangle remained shut, including the Old Post Office building and the Ariel Rios Federal Building. The Commerce Department, at 15th Street NW and Pennsylvania Avenue NW, reopened yesterday after closing Monday.

Even with the closures, most of the federal government's Washington offices were open yesterday, officials said.

"The bottom line is that there are more federal employees in town working than have been told not to come in because of various problems," said Mike Orenstein, a spokesman for the Office of Personnel Management.

At Justice Department headquarters, at Ninth Street NW and Pennsylvania Avenue NW, crews pumped water from the subbasement and parking garage and worked to repair the seven-story building's electrical and air-conditioning systems.

Officials plan to keep the building shut for the next three days and possibly as many as seven, according to an e-mail sent to reporters by the General Services Administration late yesterday.

DOJ_NMG_0036947

The nearly 2,000 employees assigned to the building were scattered elsewhere, some at offices a few blocks away. Brian Roehrkasse, a Justice spokesman, declined to specify the location for security reasons.

Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzalez is in the Middle East for the rest of the week on a scheduled trip. "The Department of Justice is fully operational and able to carry out its essential functions," Roehrkasse said.

The rain flooded the basement and subbasement at the IRS, at 11th Street NW and Constitution Avenue NW, damaging the building's air-conditioning and electrical systems.

Terry Lemons, the agency's chief spokesman, declined to set a date for the building's reopening, saying, "We'll continue assessing the situation.

"We have not had a situation like this in 20 years," he said, speaking from his home in Northern Virginia. "The building sustained significant damage in the basement. Before we can open, we need to have our electrical system and air conditioning working."

Lemons said he did not know how many of the 2,400 employees assigned to the building were working. But he said: "We're continuing our tax administration work. The tax system continues to operate."

At the National Archives, crews worked to repair a subbasement transformer that had been submerged in eight feet of water, knocking out the electricity and air conditioning. Officials plan to keep the building, on Pennsylvania Avenue NW, closed through Monday. The archives will host its annual Fourth of July ceremony on the front steps, but the public will not be allowed inside.

Yesterday, dozens of tourists arriving at the archives were turned away by a handwritten sign taped to a garbage can telling them that flooding had closed the building.

Justin James, 10, of Frankfort, Ky., had hoped for a peek at the Constitution.

"I was going to show pictures to my friends. Now, they're not going to believe I saw it," he told his mom before heading to the International Spy Museum, which was open and dry.

Mid-Atlantic Region Braces For More Rain (AP-Y2)

By Stephen Manning, Associated Press Writer

AP2, June 28, 2006

Workers pumped water from the IRS headquarters' flooded basement Tuesday and mopped up at other government buildings Monday after heavy rain swamped the nation's capital.

A brief break from the two-day deluge gave crews a chance to reopen commuter routes and set up sandbags to prevent more water from getting inside buildings.

More than 7 inches of rain fell on the nation's capital in a 24-hour period Sunday and Monday, shutting down several federal buildings and closing some of the city's busiest tourist attractions just days before the Fourth of July weekend.

Forecasters warned that more rain is likely every day this week.

States of emergency were declared for Sussex County, Del., and the District of Columbia.

In downtown Washington, the Justice Department, the IRS and the National Archives — where the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution were safe under glass — were among several buildings still closed because of flooding or other storm-related problems. Some streets also were shut down because water from the flooded buildings was being pumped into the city sewers.

None of the flooded buildings had structural damage, but water in the basements damaged air-conditioning, wiring and other building systems, said Mike McGill, a spokesman for the General Services Administration, which manages federal buildings.

Officials at the Justice Department said it could take a week to clean up and reopen the building.

The storm also toppled a 100-year-old elm tree on the White House lawn Monday. Claudia Dickens, a spokeswoman for the Bureau of Printing and Engraving, said the elm might be one of the trees depicted on the back of the $20 bill.

But she said it is also possible that the artist and the engraver took artistic license in depicting the greenery at the White House.

DOJ_NMG_0036948

Commuters and tourists slogged through the muddy aftermath. With the continuing threat of flash flooding, government employees were given the option of taking a personal day.

Flood warnings and watches remained in effect Tuesday along the Sastern Seaboard, and the National Weather Service warned that some places could get up to 8 inches rain. That could be dangerous for soaked communities that already absorbed as much as 10 inches of rain Sunday and Monday.

In Laurel, just outside Washington, some residents voluntarily evacuated their homes as the local water utility opened floodgates on a reservoir dam, sending water gushing into the Patuxent River. By midday Tuesday, nearly 60 people who left homes downstream in the middle of the night had gathered at two shelters.

In Pennsylvania, countless small streams and creeks overflowed their banks. The weather service predicted severe flooding along the Philadelphia area's Schuylkill River by Wednesday afternoon.

In Alexandria, Va., officials urged residents and businesses to prepare for high water on the Potomac River. Rescuers searched for an 8-year-old girl swept away by floodwaters in Alleghany County.

___

Associated Press writers Marty Niland and Derrill Holly in Washington contributed to this report.

Eastern States Preparing For More Rain And Floods (NYT)

By Gary Gately

The New York Times, June 28, 2006

BALTIMORE, June 27 — Relentless rain continued drenching the East Coast on Tuesday as the region braced for overnight downpours that prompted evacuations of homes and businesses, knocked out power to tens of thousands, shut down government office buildings and led to flash flood warnings from upstate New York to North Carolina.

Heightening anxieties, the National Weather Service said a tropical storm forming near Cape Fear in North Carolina would bring more precipitation and heavy winds up the Atlantic coast to the lowlands of eastern Maryland and Northern Virginia, which in the past few days have been battered by storms and flooding.

The flooding was blamed for car crashes that killed two people in Maryland and New Jersey and for the disappearance of an 8-year-old girl swept away by rushing floodwaters Tuesday afternoon in southwestern Virginia.

On Tuesday evening, the National Weather Service called for four to six inches of additional rain in the Washington area, where more than seven inches fell Sunday and Monday. The deluge sent residents to emergency shelters in Maryland and Pennsylvania. Rescuers pulled stranded motorists and pedestrians from floodwaters, and workers heaved sandbags in front of office buildings in the nation's capital.

"This has probably been the most intense rainfall in a 24-hour period in the history of Washington," said Michael McGill, a spokesman for the General Services Administration, which oversees buildings closed because of flooding, including the headquarters for the Justice Department and the Internal Revenue Service. Both are expected to stay closed through at least Friday, he said, mostly because of basement flooding and damage to electrical systems.

"We're still in the process of evaluating the damage to those systems," Mr. McGill said. Because of flooding and power failures, popular attractions like the National Museum of Natural History and National Museum of American History remained closed Tuesday.

In Maryland, the flooding heavily damaged dozens of roads, the authorities said, and the forecast made highway officials anxious. "We're spread so thin already, getting another three, four, five inches of rain Tuesday night would be devastating," said David Buck, a spokesman for the State Highway Administration.

Flooding, Mr. Buck said, closed at least 35 Maryland roads, many on the Eastern Shore, and in some cases, torrents washed away huge chunks of asphalt and created a hole that closed lanes on I-95 and flooded Route 29 in suburban Washington.

In Annapolis, the county executive of Anne Arundel County, Janet S. Owens, urged several dozen residents of low-lying areas to leave their homes after officials opened seven floodgates of the Howard Duckett Dam on the Patuxent River. "I am asking these residents to be proactive and leave as early as possible," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0036949

Ms. Owens said the county had shelters ready to take in at least 200 more people if necessary, and officials in other Maryland counties also prepared shelters.

Tides, she said, are expected to be two to three feet above normal with winds of 20 to 30 knots. Like other wary government officials in the region, Ms. Owens said the National Hurricane Center was closely monitoring the conditions that could lead to a tropical storm off the coast of North Carolina.

In Pennsylvania, Gov. Edward G. Rendell said the state was preparing to respond quickly to possible flooding in areas along several rivers, including the Schuylkill and the Susquehanna River. Some residents had been evacuated.

Based on forecasts, Mr. Rendell said, "Moderate to major flooding will likely affect parts of the commonwealth overnight and through Thursday."

In Scranton, The Associated Press reported, the American Red Cross set up an evacuation center at Green Ridge Assembly of God church, and other towns throughout eastern Pennsylvania reported flooding.

In southwestern Virginia, disabled children in Craig County, some in wheelchairs, waited for their parents at a high school after being evacuated from an Easter Seals camp Monday night. Nearby, officials continued searching for an 8-year-old girl swept away in Alleghany County.

Outside Washington, in Prince George's County, about 70 Maryland residents who had been evacuated, some by rescue boats, returned to their homes Tuesday, said Mark Brady, a Prince George's County fire and rescue spokesman. "We're just keeping our eye on the sky and hoping for the best," Mr. Brady said.

Flooding also occurred in Delaware and New Jersey.

Federal Agencies Still Recovering From Flooding (GOVEXEC)

By Jonathan Marino

Government Executive, June 28, 2006

More government building closings were announced late Monday and early Tuesday as federal agencies prepared for what forecasters warned could be a continuation of heavy rains that have pounded the capital region.

The Justice Department's Robert F. Kennedy headquarters building will be closed for the next three to seven days as repairs are made to its flooded basement and lost power is restored.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said in a statement that fewer than 2,400 workers were affected by the weather-related damage, but that he remains unsure of when the headquarters will open.

IRS headquarters will be closed until Friday, according to the General Services Administration, which manages many of the federal government's buildings. Flooding in the basement is delaying clean-up, GSA said. Offices in the Old Post Office, which uses the same power source as the IRS, also are closed, but shops in the building remain open.

The Environmental Protection Agency released a statement saying its Ariel Rios north and south buildings at its headquarters would remain closed Tuesday and that employees working in the facility's east and west basements would remain on administrative leave due to flooding.

The National Archives' Washington building also remained closed Tuesday, and an early-afternoon statement said it would stay that way at least through Wednesday. The archives reported no damage to original records at the rotunda and stack areas.

The heavy rains also caused several Crystal City buildings leased by GSA to lose power and some Federal Technology Service employees lost e-mail access when the e-mail server went down.

But the Commerce Department, closed Monday, said its facilities were fully repaired and operational by Tuesday afternoon.

A statement posted late Monday night by the Office of Personnel Management said federal agencies would be open under an unscheduled leave policy, meaning that taking the day off requires taking leave time. Emergency workers are expected to show up.

Kimberly Palmer contributed to this report.

U.S. Attorney In Brooklyn Is Said To Be Choice For Federal Bench (NYT)

By William K. Rashbaum

The New York Times, June 28, 2006

The United States attorney in Brooklyn, Roslynn R. Mauskopf, has been selected to serve as a federal judge, according to several people briefed on the matter. The move will open up one of the most important law enforcement posts in New York City.

While Ms. Mauskopf has not yet been formally nominated, the people briefed on the matter said that she had already been interviewed by the White House and that the required F.B.I. background investigation had begun.

Such investigations are not undertaken until the selection is made, several of the people said. When the investigation is complete, the people said, the White House will formally submit the nomination to the Senate.

Ms. Mauskopf, 49, who oversees the prosecution of federal crimes in Brooklyn and Queens and on Staten Island and Long Island, was selected for the judgeship by Gov. George E. Pataki, several of the people said. She served him for six years as the state inspector general, a post in which she was responsible for investigating corruption, fraud and abuse in state government.

Before that, she served for 13 years as an assistant prosecutor in the office of the Manhattan district attorney, Robert M. Morgenthau.

Mr. Pataki, who had also backed her for the prosecutor's post, to which she was nominated in 2002, will lose his authority to make such selections when he leaves office next year.

Ms. Mauskopf, through a spokesman, declined to comment yesterday.

When President Bush nominated her to the prosecutor's post — one of the busiest in the country, commanding an office of nearly 150 lawyers — some Democrats questioned her qualifications, noting that she had never worked as a federal prosecutor. During her tenure in Albany, critics raised questions about whether she had been aggressive enough in investigating state officials.

A spokesman for Mr. Pataki, Michael E. Marr, said, "Roz Mauskopf has been an outstanding law enforcement professional at the local, state and federal levels, and we are confident that if she were nominated and confirmed, she would also make an excellent federal judge."

Ms. Mauskopf will be appointed to the United States District Court for the Eastern District of New York, according to the people briefed on the matter. She will fill a position that was opened up when Judge David G. Trager, himself a former United States attorney in Brooklyn, recently moved to senior status.

During her tenure, prosecutors in her office conducted several high-profile prosecutions, winning convictions against a Yemeni cleric for financing terrorism, and decimating the ranks of the Bonanno crime family. There have also been losses, including the acquittals of a hip-hop producer and his brother on money-laundering charges and of two waterfront union officials on fraud and other charges.

Several people said a possible successor to Ms. Mauskopf was Chauncey G. Parker, the director of the State Division of Criminal Justice Services and a former federal prosecutor in Manhattan.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

VeriSign Receives Options Subpoena (AP)

AP, June 28, 2006

VeriSign Gets Grand Jury Subpoena Over Stock Options Grants; Shares Fall

MOUNTAIN VIEW, Calif. (AP) -- VeriSign Inc., a provider of infrastructure services for Internet and telecom networks, said Tuesday it received a grand jury subpoena from the U.S. Attorney for the Northern District of California asking for documents relating to its stock option grants.

VeriSign said it also received a similar request from Securities and Exchange Commission as part of an informal inquiry.

The company said it intends to cooperate fully with both the SEC and the U.S. Attorney's office, and added that its board had already began an internal investigation prior to the two requests.

About 48 companies in addition to VeriSign are being questioned by the SEC or Justice Department about their stock-option granting practices. At issue is whether executives backdated stock options grants to time them at low points of the stock price, thus boosting the payouts.

Shares fell $1.16, or 5.1 percent, to $21.62 in afternoon trading on the Nasdaq. In the past 52 weeks, the stock has changed hands between $19.01 and $30.99.

Rambus Warns Stock Option Trouble May Wipe Out Some Past Profits (AP)

By Michael Liedtke, AP Business Writer

AP, June 28, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO -- Computer chip supplier Rambus Inc. on Tuesday warned some of its previously reported profits might evaporate because the timing of stock options granted to its employees wasn't properly recorded - a problem that could haunt scores of other companies as they review their past compensation practices.

The news, which caused Rambus's stock price to drop by more than 5 percent in extended trading, was the latest jolt in a budding scandal that threatens once again to shake investor confidence just as corporate America recovers from the accounting fiascos exposed after the fall of Enron Corp. nearly five years.

Like dozens of other companies, Los Altos, Calif.-based Rambus has been scrutinizing stock options distributed years ago to determine whether company insiders rigged the system to increase the likelihood that management would reap huge windfalls.

Under the practice, the options are backdated to an ebb in a company's stock price instead of pegging the exercise price to the prevailing market value at the time of the award.

Stock options become more valuable as the market price rises above the exercise price, so backdating fattens the recipient's profit.

At least 44 companies have launched their own internal inquiries into possible stock option abuses or have become targets of government investigations into the practice. Some companies already have gone so far as to fire some of their top executives after learning about the manipulation of past stock options.

The number of companies responding to government inquiries continued to expand Tuesday. Cnet Networks Inc., VeriSign Inc., Foundry Networks Inc. and Cyberonics Inc. all disclosed they had received subpoenas seeking more information about their stock option awards from the U.S. Justice Department.

The Silicon Valley has become a focal point in the brewing tempest over stock options because the region's high-tech companies relied heavily on the awards to attract and motivate employees.

Backdating stock options isn't necessarily illegal, but it can cause a company to improperly deduct employee compensation expenses - a misstep that could exaggerate profits and result in an underpayment of taxes.

Without providing specifics, Rambus said its audit committee had uncovered discrepancies between the dates that some stock options went on the books and the dates that they should have been recorded under accounting rules.

If the committee's continuing investigation determines the company has to absorb substantial charges to correct the error, Rambus said it may have wipe out some of its past profits. The potential restatements aren't expected to affect Rambus's revenue.

Rambus said it hadn't yet determined whether the accounting trouble will force it to amend its taxes.

The news, released after the stock market closed, agitated investors. Rambus shares fell 71 cents to close at $23.13 Tuesday on the Nasdaq Stock Market, then dropped $1.23, or 5.3 percent, in extended trading.

Rambus's results during the past decade have been a mixed bag - ranging from a $33.7 million profit last year to a $106.1 million loss in 2000.

Rambus Stock-Options Errors May Require Restatements (WSJ)

By Charles Forelle

The Wall Street Journal, June 28, 2006

Rambus Inc. said a preliminary board review found improperly dated stock-option grants that may lead to a restatement of prior financial results.

DOJ_NMG_0036952

The Los Altos, Calif., designer of memory-chip technology provided little detail about the results of the review in its news release, but the language of the release -- and the indication that the company may take an accounting charge -- implies the grants were wrongly timed in a manner that benefited insiders by giving them a lower exercise price.

The disclosure raises the question of whether Rambus's grants were deliberately backdated from their real date of approval to a day when the company's stock was trading lower. That would make the grants more valuable to recipients.

Separately, six other companies -- VeriSign Inc., CNET Networks Inc., Foundry Networks Inc., Applied Micro Circuits Corp., Cyberonics Inc. and Progress Software Corp. -- announced new federal inquiries into their options practices.

Rambus's board "has reached a preliminary conclusion that the actual measurement dates for certain stock option grants issued in prior years differ from the recorded grant dates for such awards," the company said.

It didn't specify who the recipients were, how many grants were at issue or when the suspect grants occurred. A Rambus spokeswoman declined to elaborate. She said the Securities and Exchange Commission has been "apprised" of the review.

MORE ON OPTIONS

• How to Remedy Backdated Options?1

• Options Scorecard: Companies under scrutiny2

• FAQ on backdating3 and complete coverage4

Rambus said it isn't sure whether any charge would be material and thus require restatement. It also says the board hasn't evaluated whether it will face a tax impact.

About 50 companies are being examined by federal regulators and prosecutors in a wide-ranging probe of option-granting practices that is focusing on possible backdating and other forms of manipulation.

Backdating could lead to fraud charges for executives, particularly if they conducted the practice behind the backs of directors in order to enhance their potential profit from option grants. Granting options discounts via backdating or other means can violate federal securities laws when not disclosed to shareholders. It can also lead to accounting problems and tax bills for companies.

VeriSign, of Mountain View, Calif.; CNET, of San Francisco; and Foundry Networks, of San Jose, all said they received options-related subpoenas from the U.S. attorney for the Northern District of California. The companies said they are cooperating. VeriSign, which provides infrastructure services for the Internet, and Foundry, a network-equipment maker, both said they are subjects of informal SEC inquiries. CNET, a Web site operator, previously disclosed an SEC probe.

Applied Micro, of Sunnyvale, Calif., said it received an options-related subpoena from the U.S. attorney for the Northern District of California. The semiconductor company also said the U.S. attorney for the Southern District of California has opened its own investigation of the company's stock-option practices. Applied Micro noted that a self-initiated review of stock option grant practices is continuing.

Cyberonics said it received an options-related subpoena from the U.S. attorney's Office for the Southern District of New York. The Houston medical-device maker previously disclosed that it is the subject of an informal SEC probe. A securities analyst earlier this month raised questions over a grant made just ahead of good news from a federal regulatory panel for a Cyberonics product. The company says it is cooperating and has hired outside counsel.

Progress Software, of Bedford, Mass., said in a securities filing that it is the subject of an SEC probe relating to options. The business-software company had earlier said it was conducting its own review.

UPDATE: Cyberonics Subpoenaed By U.S. Justice Department (DOW)

Dow Jones, June 28, 2006

BOSTON (Dow Jones) -- Shares of Cyberonics moved lower Tuesday, the day after it reported it has been subpoenaed by the Department of Justice over stock- options practices.

Shares of Cyberonics (CYBX) were down 4% at $20.40 in midday trades.

According to a regulatory filing Monday, the U.S. attorney's office for the Southern District of New York issued a subpoena for documents related to its stock-option grants. Cyberonics said it is cooperating with the request.

DOJ_NMG_0036953

"In furtherance of such cooperation, the audit committee of the company's board of directors will retain independent counsel to assist it in reviewing the company's stock option grants, procedures, and practices, including compliance with Generally Accepted Accounting Principles and all applicable statutes, rules, and regulations," wrote Cyberonics in the filing.

"Given the ongoing nature of these matters, the company is not in a position to comment further at this time," Cyberonics added.

Earlier this month, Cyberonics said it was the focus of an informal investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission into stock options.

European Court Refuses To Halt Extradition Of Bankers (Update3) (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, June 28, 2006

June 27 (Bloomberg) -- Three British bankers will be sent to the U.S. to face Enron Corp.-related fraud charges within three weeks after a European court refused to block their extradition, their final forum for an appeal.

David Bermingham, Giles Darby and Gary Mulgrew are wanted in Texas for allegedly bilking their former employer, Royal Bank of Scotland Group Plc's Greenwich NatWest unit, out of millions from the sale of an Enron off-the-books partnership. The European Court of Human Rights in Strasbourg, France today declined to suspend their extradition, six days after Britain's highest court also rejected their appeal.

The case has been at the forefront of calls from Britain's business and legal community to scrap its ``fast-track" extradition arrangements with the U.S. Lobbying groups claim the legislation, introduced in 2004 mainly to clamp down on terrorism, is instead being used to target white-collar offences, unfairly increasing the risks for executives.

``I urge U.K. Prime Minister Tony Blair to intervene to defend the human rights of British citizens that are being abused by a country which is supposedly our greatest ally," Digby Jones, director general of the Confederation of British Industry, said in a statement. The bankers ``represent no threat to society, yet they will still be banged up in a U.S. prison with rapists and drug addicts."

The European Court of Human Rights said that while it would review the merits of the men's appeal, the court wouldn't intervene to suspend extradition proceedings, according to a letter sent to the bankers' lawyers.

July Deadline

Bermingham, Darby and Mulgrew, who each face more than 20 years of prison if convicted on all counts, must now be extradited to the U.S. by July 17, their lawyers said. They may be detained for as long as two years in a high-security U.S. prison awaiting trial, U.K. courts have been told.

The three men were charged with seven counts of wire fraud in 2002 for allegedly skimming $7.3 million by duping Greenwich Natwest over the value of an Enron partnership known as ``Swap Sub." The indictments were the first criminal fraud charges to emerge from the U.S. Justice Department's probe into the energy trader's collapse.

Texas Trial

The bankers claim that as British citizens, accused of defrauding a British bank, any charges against them should have been brought in the U.K. They have also argued that they won't get a fair trial in Texas, where Enron was based, due to public animosity toward the company and its senior officers.

Former Enron Chairman Kenneth Lay and ex-Chief Executive Officer Jeffrey Skilling were convicted last month of fraud and conspiracy in connection with Enron's 2001 implosion, which wiped out thousands of jobs and more than $1 billion in retirement funds virtually overnight. They each face at least 25 years in prison.

``We have now done everything possible to establish the rights of three U.K. citizens to be investigated and, if appropriate, prosecuted in the U.K.," Mark Spragg, a lawyer for Bermingham, Mulgrew and Darby, said in a statement. ``All we have established is that U.K. citizens have no such rights against an extradition request made by the U.S."

Under the fast-track legislation, known as the Extradition Act 2003, the U.S. was added to a list of countries that no longer have to provide evidence of a crime when seeking to extradite a U.K. citizen. The U.K. must still show ``probable cause" that an offence has been committed when requesting a U.S. citizen, as prescribed by the U.S. Constitution.

Demonstration

DOJ_NMG_0036954

Around 200 U.K. businesspeople are expected to participate in a demonstration against those rules, led by Internet entrepreneur Karl Watkin, in London later this week, according to the event's organizers.

``The feeling is that it's a very unbalanced, one-sided piece of law," Colin Passmore, the head of litigation at London- based Simmons & Simmons, said in an interview. ``There are no escape routes, as this case has shown."

The European Court of Human Rights didn't provide specific reasons for refusing the three bankers' application for a temporary stay in the letter sent to Spragg's law firm, Jeffrey Green Russell. The court said it will review the merits of the men's appeal in ``due course," the letter says.

Britain's Home Office, which is responsible for extradition requests, had agreed to suspend proceedings pending the outcome of the men's application to the Strasbourg court. The department said today that extradition arrangements are now being considered, but that it isn't in a position to comment on how and when the extraditions will take place.

Lawyers specializing in extradition said it was likely the men would be removed within days.

The European Court of Human Rights confirmed that the request for interim measures had been rejected.

To contact the reporter on this story: Megan Murphy in London at mmurphy41@bloomberg.net. Last Updated: June 27, 2006 12:37 EDT

Enron Bankers' Extradition Moves Forward (FINDLAW/AP)

By Jane Wardell, Ap Business Writer

AP, June 28, 2006

(AP) - LONDON-The European Court of Human Rights on Tuesday refused to halt extradition proceedings against three British bankers wanted in the United States on Enron-related fraud charges.

David Bermingham, Gary Mulgrew and Giles Darby, former executives at Greenwich NatWest, a unit of Royal Bank of Scotland Group PLC, had asked the European court to freeze a British court ruling for their deportation ahead of a fuller appeal.

However, the European court said in a letter to London law firm Jeffrey Green Russell on Tuesday that it saw no immediate cause to overturn the decision of the British courts to send the trio to face trial in the United States.

A court official wrote that it had been decided "in the circumstances, not to indicate to the government of the United Kingdom ... the interim measure you are seeking."

It added that the "remaining issues, namely the merits of the application, will be examined in due course."

"However ... any such examination of the remaining legal issues will not stop the applicants' proposed removal," it said.

The so-called Bermingham Three have been fighting against their extradition since a High Court ruling in February. They ran out of British avenues of appeal last week when the House of Lords said it would not hear the case.

The three men have consistently argued that most of the alleged offenses took place in Britain and that any trial should be held here. Being forced to stand trial in Enron's home state of Texas would be unjust and incompatible with European human rights law, the men argued.

"We have now done everything possible to establish the rights of three U.K. citizens to be investigated and, if appropriate, prosecuted in the U.K. but all we have established is that U.K. citizens have no such rights against an extradition request made by the U.S.," said the men's lawyer, Mark Spragg.

Spragg said that all the witnesses and documents for the defense case would now be sent to Houston for the trial "which could, and should, take place in the U.K."

The trio, all British citizens, were charged in the United States in 2002 with bilking National Westminster Bank of $7.3 million and each face seven counts of wire fraud.

They allegedly advised NatWest in 2000 to sell part of an Enron business it owned for less than the stake was worth, in a scheme allegedly devised with Andrew Fastow, former finance chief of the collapsed energy trader Enron Corp., and his colleague, managing director Michael Kopper.

The three men then left NatWest, bought into the firm themselves and sold it off for a much higher fee, each pocketing about $2.6 million in the process, according to prosecutors.

Enron filed for bankruptcy in 2001 after revealing that it inflated its profits and filed false accounts to hide debts.

DOJ_NMG_0036955

Barred Broker, Partner Get Prison For $14 Million Commodities Fraud (FINDLAW/AP)

By Jeffrey Gold, Ap Business Writer

AP, June 28, 2006

(AP) - NEWARK, New Jersey-A man barred from selling leveraged commodities and his partner in an illicit operation have been sentenced to prison for cheating about 1,000 investors out of $14 million (â,¬11 million).

The barred broker, Charles Paul Hoffecker, who owned Amitex Investment Services Ltd., and his partner, Charles Edward Myers, told clients that Amitex would buy gold, silver and other commodities for them. But evidence at their trial showed that no purchases were made, federal prosecutors said Tuesday.

Hoffecker, 53, was sentenced June 19 to 17 1/2 years in prison, while Myers, 65, was sentenced Monday to nine years. They were ordered to pay a total of $2.67 million (â,¬2.12 million) in restitution by U.S. District Judge Katharine S. Hayden.

The restitution figure was smaller than the total losses since not all victims have been found, mostly due to incomplete records at Amitex, Assistant U.S. Attorney Bohdan Vitvitsky said.

Hoffecker and Myers, who were convicted in March, were charged in 2003 after a sting operation in which investigators used an undercover business to infiltrate fraudulent telemarketing investment schemes.

Amitex told would-be clients that their money would be used to buy commodities and that Amitex would finance up to 80 percent of the purchases at 12 percent interest, the indictment said. However, Amitex did not buy any commodities and charged investors for loans that were never made, the indictment said.

Even before this case, Hoffecker had been barred in 1991 from selling or offering to sell precious metal on a financed basis. That resulted from a lawsuit brought by the Federal Trade Commission.

Amitex was incorporated in Nassau, Bahamas, and the indictment alleged that Hoffecker and Myers claimed that their transactions were not regulated by U.S. authorities.

On the Net:

U.S. Attorney's Office in Newark:

http://www.njusao.org/break.html

Did Hilfiger Corp. Get Special Treatment From DOJ? (LAW)

By Sue Reisinger, Corporate Counsel

Corporate Counsel, June 28, 2006

Did Tommy Hilfiger Corp. get special treatment when it negotiated a nonprosecution agreement with the U.S. Department of Justice last summer? The question has come to light in recent weeks as the now-private company defends itself against a class action shareholders' suit.

Typically, when the government completes a deferred or nonprosecution agreement, it makes the deal public. The Manhattan U.S. Attorney's Office departed from this practice with Hilfiger, however.

On Aug. 10, 2005, then-U.S. Attorney David Kelley announced that his office had reached an agreement with the retailer's American subsidiary. While Kelley's press release outlined the general features of the pact, it wasn't accompanied by an actual copy of the deal. Ten months later, neither Hilfiger nor the government has made the agreement public. (Hilfiger was represented in the nearly year-long tax evasion investigation by one of Kelley's former colleagues -- Mary Jo White -- a former Manhattan U.S. Attorney who is now a partner at Debevoise & Plimpton.)

The secret agreement is a problem for the shareholders who filed suit against Hilfiger after the government started investigating the company in 2004. In most deferred and nonprosecution agreements, the corporate defendant admits the government's criminal allegations. Without access to the details of the Hilfiger deal, the company's shareholders say that they don't know how the retailer responded.

Hilfiger has moved to dismiss the suit, in part, because prosecutors didn't file charges against the clothing chain. The company, which was acquired this spring by Apax Partners Worldwide, a private equity fund, is being defended in the shareholders' litigation by Wachtell, Lipton, Rosen & Katz. Hilfiger supports its position by citing Kelley's August 2005 press release, which it says doesn't confirm any wrongdoing at the retailer.

According to a transcript of a May hearing, Wachtell's John Savarese told Manhattan federal district court Judge Richard Owen that the release is "far from confirming that there was some basis to the initially announced U.S. Attorney investigation or that some great liability would emerge for the company from that, or some criminal case." But Savarese cited only the government's press release in his argument, and not the nonprosecution agreement itself. Savarese did not return calls for comment for this article.

The shareholders' lead attorney, Samuel Rudman, says that he finds it unusual that the agreement was not made public, given that the government "always make them public." It's especially unusual, Rudman adds, "when [Hilfiger's] lawyers are in court arguing what the agreement says." Rudman is a partner with Lerach, Coughlin, Stoia, Geller, Rudman & Robbins. Rudman's observation is supported by Corporate Counsel research. Corporate Counsel completed an extensive review of the Justice Department's and many U.S. Attorneys' Web sites and found that 14 deferred and nonprosecution agreements were completed in the past 12 months. Of these 14 deals, only the Hilfiger agreement was not made public.

A spokesperson for the Manhattan U.S. Attorney's Office declined to comment when asked why Hilfiger was treated differently. Former U.S. Attorney Kelley, now a partner at Cahill Gordon & Reindel in New York, also declined to comment. A Justice Department spokesperson in Washington, D.C., would only say that the publication of agreements "is within the discretion of individual U.S. attorney's offices."

A Hilfiger spokesperson says that the company won't make the agreement public "because it has no obligation to." Debevoise's White did not return calls for comment.

What is known from Kelley's press release is that the nonprosecution agreement ended an investigation into two related areas. One was whether Hilfiger paid inflated service commissions to its overseas subsidiaries in an effort to lighten its U.S. tax burden. The other was whether some, or all, of the services were actually performed in Hong Kong, but with the commission payments sent elsewhere in an effort to avoid paying Hong Kong taxes.

Under the deal, according to the press release, Hilfiger agreed to implement new ethics and compliance programs, to cooperate with the U.S. Attorney's Office for the next three years, and to amend four years' worth of U.S. tax returns from 2001 to 2004 to reflect a lower rate of commissions. Hilfiger also agreed to pay the IRS about $18.1 million in additional taxes and interest, and to cooperate fully with the Hong Kong tax authorities.

Subject to the company fulfilling its part of the deal, the government agreed to close the U.S. tax case but left open the Hong Kong part of the case. If Hilfiger cooperates with Hong Kong authorities, the government agreed not to prosecute for activities "which may constitute mail fraud or wire fraud on the Hong Kong taxing authorities," according to the press release. Hilfiger, which was still a public company at the time of the deal, disclosed in various filings with the Securities and Exchange Commission that it had reached a nonprosecution agreement. But the company did not furnish a copy of the pact with its quarterly filing in December 2005. Hilfiger's spokesperson says that the clothing chain believes it is not required to file a copy with the SEC.

Asked whether businesses are required to file copies of nonprosecution agreements, an SEC spokesperson cited regulation S-K 229.601, which requires a public company to include with its quarterly and annual reports a complete copy of "any material contract" made outside "the ordinary course of business." The spokesperson wouldn't comment on any specific case, or on whether the SEC considers a nonprosecution agreement to be a "material contract."

Hedge Funds Sharpen Their Political Game (WSJ)

By Kara Scannell And Brody Mullins

The Wall Street Journal, June 28, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Amid increased scrutiny by lawmakers and regulators, hedge funds are stepping up their defenses in the nation's capital.

DOJ_NMG_0036957

A small group of fund managers are behind a campaign to head off new regulations from Congress and the Securities and Exchange Commission. In the past year, funds have boosted political contributions, hired a string of new lobbyists and established a second trade association to make their case in Washington.

A hearing by the Senate Judiciary Committee today will focus on industry tactics such as short-selling and allegations of collusion between independent research firms and hedge funds to manipulate stocks. (See related article on page C1.)

Separately, the Senate Banking Committee and some House lawmakers are examining whether the hedge-fund industry should face new regulations.

Employees of the 25 largest hedge funds and the Managed Funds Association, the industry's main trade group, have contributed a combined $1.2 million to congressional candidates and the Republican and Democratic parties so far in the 2005-2006 campaign. While that figure goes only through March 31 of this year, it represents nearly a 50% jump over donations made by the same organizations for the entire 2001-2002 election cycle, the last midterm election year, according to the nonpartisan Center for Responsive Politics.

For the 2003-2004 campaign, a presidential cycle, which tends to draw bigger campaign spending, the same funds contributed $1.9 million.

Hedge funds have hired more than a dozen lobbying groups since early 2005, according to PoliticalMoneyLine, a nonpartisan organization. In 2005, the industry paid $1.5 million for Washington lobbyists, up from $1.2 million in 2004 and $565,000 in 2003.

"Hedge funds have come of age as a capital-market force. There's no denying it," said Jack Gaines, president of the MFA, which represents more than 1,000 individual members with $500 billion in assets. The MFA hopes to double its staff over the next year and recently hired a lobbyist to help communicate with lawmakers and help with fund raising.

Meanwhile, James Chanos, a hedge-fund manager and well-known short-seller, in March started his own alliance of 16 hedge funds as a rival to the MFA. He has argued the industry needs to take a more aggressive stance in Washington. To lobby for the Coalition of Private Investment Companies, Mr. Chanos hired former aides to Senate Banking Committee Chairman Richard Shelby (R., Ala.) and committee member Sen. Chris Dodd (D., Conn.), who will become the panel's top Democrat next year.

In the days after Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R., Pa.) announced today's hedge-fund hearing, the lobbyists met with half the members of the Judiciary panel.

Hedge funds still devote fewer resources to Washington than Wall Street firms. Citigroup Inc. and its employees have made just about as many campaign donations so far this election cycle as the entire hedge-fund industry, according to the Center for Responsive Politics, and spent nearly five times as much on lobbyists in 2005.

The emerging hedge-fund lobby parallels the growth of the high-tech lobby in the late 1990s. Like the hedge-fund industry, high-tech companies paid scant attention to Washington during their early growth years. That changed when policy makers began looking closer at regulations, and one of the industry's biggest players, Microsoft Corp., became the target of a Justice Department antitrust investigation.

Hedge funds haven't yet faced a similar threat. But they may: The SEC is investigating one independent research firm for possible market manipulation and has subpoenaed documents and correspondence from a well-known hedge fund as part of the probe. The SEC also has an investigation into improper trading in the private-issuer market, which has resulted in charges against several hedge-fund managers.

Hedge funds also are coming under attack from mostly small corporations that accuse fund managers of manipulating stock prices by betting that stocks will decline, and then spreading negative information about the companies.

The SEC estimates hedge-fund advisers manage now more than $2.4 trillion in assets, up from an estimated $870 million in 2004. By comparison, mutual funds manage now roughly $8 trillion.

Hedge funds manage large pools of capital for wealthy individual investors, pension plans and endowments. They typically invest in ways traditional money managers can't, such as by placing bets that stocks will drop and profiting by the decline, a practice known as selling short; investing in currency arbitrage; and taking stakes in credit default swaps, a type of insurance play.

DOJ_NMG_0036958

Historically, hedge funds were passive short-term traders, yet they are now buying large stakes in corporations and influencing board decisions about companies' strategic directions. They have also had their share of high-profile scandals from abusive trading of mutual funds to fund managers running away with hundreds of millions of dollars in investor money.

For years hedge funds were mainly regulated, lightly, by the Commodity Futures Trading Commission, which has oversight of the futures markets. In 2004, a divided SEC moved to impose its own rules, requiring hedge-fund advisers to register with that agency and opening them up to compliance and inspection measures. That rule was thrown out by a federal appeals court last week and the SEC is re-evaluating its approach to hedge-fund activity.

As hedge funds have increased their political activities, some have become more bipartisan, giving more to the Republicans in power. Like many young high-tech companies, newly formed hedge funds tended to give largely to Democrats. From 1990 to 2005, for example, employees of Mr. Chanos's Kynikos Associates made about $200,000 in political contributions to candidates for Congress and the White House. All but a $500 check to President George Bush in 2003, went to Democratic candidates.

So far this year, employees of the fund have given all of their $15,360 in donations to Republicans. Most of that, $15,000, has been directed in three checks to Mr. Shelby, the Senate Banking Committee chairman who will have enormous influence over possible regulations for the industry.

UPDATE: Senators To Scrutinize Hedge Funds (DOW)

By Robert Schroeder

Dow Jones, June 28, 2006

WASHINGTON (Dow Jones) -- Washington and Wall Street may get a rare public look at how securities regulators track hedge funds' behavior on Wednesday, when a former Securities and Exchange Commission lawyer goes before a Senate panel probing the industry.

Attorney Gary Aguirre told Congress that he was running the SEC's investigation into whether prominent hedge fund Pequot Capital Management engaged in insider trading. Aguirre said that he was fired in September after he sought the testimony of a Wall Street executive, reported to be John Mack, chief executive of Morgan Stanley (MS) .

The SEC won't confirm or deny it's investigating Pequot. But the hearing in the Senate Judiciary Committee may shed light on the methods regulators use to catch potential cases of wrongdoing involving hedge funds -- the big, lightly regulated pools of money serving mostly wealthy investors.

The hearing will focus on the relationships between hedge funds and independent analysts.

"Everyone is very concerned about conflicts of interest," said Darren Sherman, a former SEC official and chief executive of Regulatory Advisory Services.

But the Wall Street-policing agency itself may come in for a drubbing over the dismissal of former lawyer Aguirre, for allegedly getting too close to a big- time executive who happens to be a major fund-raiser for President Bush.

Revelations of Aguirre's inquiry -- first reported Friday by the New York Times -- come as the agency's ability to oversee funds like Pequot is facing a major challenge. On Friday, a federal court threw out a rule requiring hedge- fund advisers to register with regulators as investment advisers. The agency must now go back to the drawing board and redesign new oversight guidelines.

Pequot probe

The committee, chaired by Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., will likely grill Aguirre about his motives for seeking Mack's testimony, and about what evidence he has concerning possible insider trading at Pequot. The firm hasn't been charged and denies wrongdoing.

Aguirre stated in a letter dated Sept. 2, 2005, his last day on the job, that Pequot received insider information from a source believed to be John Mack, who at the time was chief executive of Credit Suisse First Boston. Aguirre told Congress that stock exchange officials referred cases involving suspicious trades by Pequot to the SEC 18 times.

While exchanges and regulators have systems in place to catch insider trading, the volume of trades makes it difficult to catch improper activity without a tip-off, according to analysts.

DOJ_NMG_0036959

"If the technology were good enough to detect this on a regular basis, there'd be no insider trading at all," said Octavio Marenzi, chief executive of Celent, a consultancy for financial institutions.

Daniel Strachman, managing partner of A&C Advisors, said that people knowledgeable about the trades in question may have alerted exchange officials and regulators.

"Somebody dropped a dime on them," he said about Pequot.

Two top law-enforcement officials also are scheduled to testify at the Senate hearing Wednesday. They are Matt Friedrich, the Justice Department's principal deputy assistant attorney general for crime, and Connecticut Attorney General Richard Blumenthal.

Heightened scrutiny

The hedge-fund industry has grown rapidly in recent years, with the total number of funds climbing to about 8,000 and overseeing more than $1 trillion in assets. The SEC has brought more than 50 cases against the industry since 2000. The court's rejection of the SEC rule notwithstanding, analysts predict regulators will step up efforts to scrutinize the investment pools.

Meanwhile, the Senate Banking Committee and Senate Finance Committee are investigating Aguirre's firing.

The Judiciary Committee's hearing is scheduled to begin at 9:30 a.m. on Wednesday.

Morgan Stanley Paying $10M Fine To Settle SEC Charges On Safeguarding Information (LAW/AP)

The Associated Press

AP, June 28, 2006

Wall Street powerhouse Morgan Stanley on Tuesday agreed to pay a $10 million civil fine to settle federal regulators' charges that it failed to maintain safeguards to prevent the misuse of inside information.

The Securities and Exchange Commission also censured Morgan Stanley under the settlement. The investment house neither admitted nor denied the SEC's allegations but did agree to refrain from future violations of the securities laws.

Morgan Stanley, the third-largest U.S. securities firm by market value, also agreed to hire an independent consultant to review its policies and practices for preventing misuse of confidential company information.

In a civil lawsuit, the SEC said Morgan Stanley for years failed to adequately maintain and enforce procedures to prevent the misuse of inside information regarding companies whose securities are held in hundreds of thousands of employee and employee-related accounts. The agency did not say whether any illegal insider trading or other improprieties had occurred using inside information as a result of the alleged lapses.

From at least 2000 to 2004, Morgan Stanley failed to conduct needed surveillance of hundreds of thousands of employee and employee-related accounts to detect possible insider trading, the SEC alleged.

"We are pleased to have resolved this matter with the SEC," New York-based Morgan Stanley said in a statement. "We have implemented substantial compliance system and process enhancements, and will continue to strengthen these as part of our ongoing commitment to having a best-in-class compliance culture."

It was the second SEC fine against the firm within a few weeks. On May 10, Morgan Stanley agreed to pay $15 million to settle the regulators' charges that it repeatedly failed to provide tens of thousands of e-mails which they sought in major investigations over several years.

Morgan Stanley Settles With SEC On Systems Issue (WSJ)

By Judith Burns

The Wall Street Journal, June 28, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Morgan Stanley will pay $10 million to settle allegations of a massive breakdown in systems to prevent misuse of inside information, the Securities and Exchange Commission said.

Morgan Stanley settled without admitting or denying the SEC's claims that for years it lacked adequate policies and procedures to safeguard against misuse of nonpublic information, even though it was legally required to have them.

DOJ_NMG_0036960

"Due to a systemic breakdown in this critical compliance function, Morgan Stanley failed to conduct any surveillance" of trading in a massive number of employee accounts held at the firm, the SEC said. As a result, it said, "Morgan Stanley may have failed to detect illegal insider trading" by the firm, its employees or their relatives.

While the New York securities firm put stocks on a "Watch List" when its bankers had inside information on a company, the SEC said that over a four-year period it failed to scrutinize employee trading in most or all of the Watch List shares. The omission went "virtually undetected and uncorrected" for years, the SEC added.

"We are pleased to have resolved this matter with the SEC," said Morgan Stanley spokesman John Franklin. "We have implemented substantial compliance system and process enhancements and will continue to strengthen these as part of our ongoing commitment to having a best-in-class compliance culture."

In addition to the $10 million fine, Morgan Stanley was censured and agreed to cease and desist from future violations. The settlement also requires it to hire an outside consultant to conduct a comprehensive review of its policies and procedures, including a plan to make up for the scrutiny it didn't do in the past with a "retrospective surveillance" of all trading and accounts it should have examined over the four-year period.

Any evidence of insider trading uncovered in the course of the retrospective surveillance must be turned over to the SEC staff "promptly," the agency said. Under the settlement, Morgan Stanley has as many as 22 months to complete the retrospective surveillance.

Richard Grime, SEC assistant enforcement director, said he would be surprised if other Wall Street firms had similar-size problems in tracking potential insider trading, and declined to comment on why Morgan Stanley's compliance failures weren't detected in the course of routine SEC inspections.

According to the SEC, from at least 1999 to 2003, Morgan Stanley put more than 3,000 stocks on its Watch List, but didn't conduct any surveillance of them. The firm didn't track trading in certain derivative securities, single-stock futures and stock options of Watch List shares until 2004, the SEC added.

Regulators said at least 434,000 employee and employee-related accounts escaped scrutiny from mid-2000 to April 2004 because Morgan Stanley's compliance staffers didn't realize the reports they received tracked trading only by a smaller group of employees who were most likely to have access to inside information.

About 900 employee accounts held outside the firm and about 30,000 employee accounts that weren't flagged as such also didn't undergo any surveillance, the SEC added.

Once the surveillance problems were discovered, the SEC said Morgan Stanley reviewed its processes and began taking steps to correct the problems it identified. It said Morgan Stanley cooperated with the SEC staff investigating the matter and was quick to report its findings as additional surveillance issues were identified.

Morgan Stanley Fined Over Insider Accounts (USAT)

By Elliot Blair Smith

USA Today, June 28, 2006

Morgan Stanley was ordered Tuesday to pay a $10 million fine and to scrutinize employee trading records for the last four years after the Securities and Exchange Commission discovered a “systemic breakdown” in how the Wall Street firm controlled inside information.

It is the latest black eye for Morgan Stanley, which has paid $155 million since 2003 to settle regulatory investigations into alleged wrongdoing involving its analysts' research, mutual fund fees and allocations of initial public offerings. In addition, the firm paid $54 million in 2004 to settle a U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission lawsuit on behalf of many of its female employees.

Richard Grime, the SEC's assistant director of enforcement, said Morgan Stanley “failed to conduct any surveillance of a massive number” of its employee accounts until the agency discovered recordkeeping gaps during a routine investigation of potential inside trading.

“Once we scratched the surface, we found this problem,” Grime said. Many of the recordkeeping deficiencies arose as a result of the firm's failure to fully integrate employees' records after its 1997 merger with Dean Witter Reynolds, the agency said, but investigators also found that the firm's compliance department had failed to update and enforce many of its surveillance procedures.

The SEC says internal auditors at the firm lost track of 251,000 employee and related accounts from mid-2000 to April 2004, because of a change in how they reviewed surveillance reports. During that same period, the firm allegedly mislabeled 183,082 employee accounts because of a computer coding error. From 1997 to 2004, it allegedly failed to monitor 900 employee accounts at other brokerages.

"As a result of these systemic failures, Morgan Stanley may have failed to detect illegal insider trading," the SEC said in a cease-and-desist order that required no admission of wrongdoing. Under the order, Morgan Stanley is required to hire an independent consultant to review its surveillance procedures, and to audit employee and related accounts that should have been monitored previously.

Morgan Stanley has 22 months to finish its review. But, Grime said, "If they find anything that looks suspicious, they shall promptly notify us, which is within 10 days."

The statute of limitations related to securities laws is five years.

Morgan Stanley spokeswoman Jennifer Mooney said, "We are pleased to have resolved this matter with the SEC. We have implemented substantial compliance system and process enhancements, and will continue to strengthen these as part of our ongoing commitment to having a 'best-in-class' compliance culture."

The recordkeeping fine is small relative to previous penalties imposed on Morgan Stanley but is the largest ever related to a firm's failure to safeguard material non-public information, Grime said.

David Callahan, author of The Cheating Culture, said, "What Morgan Stanley has received in the past is a relative slap on the wrist. … If you have no individuals who are ever held responsible for wrongdoing at these large financial companies, and if you have the financial penalties being relatively minor, given how large these organizations are, that's not a great deterrent."

CA To Add Shareholder Proposal After Court Refuses To Rule (WSJ/AP)

By Associated Press

The Wall Street Journal, June 28, 2006

NEW YORK -- CA Inc. said it will add to its July proxy a shareholder proposal that seeks to change the company's bylaws after a Delaware court refused to rule on the company's original decision to reject the proposal.

CA shareholders will be able to vote on the resolution, which seeks to limit the company's poison-pill provisions, at the shareholders' annual meeting, which is scheduled for late August.

The Islandia, N.Y., technology company originally denied a request to add the proposal to its upcoming proxy statement, claiming the proposal was a violation of Delaware law. The rejection resulted in a court challenge by the drafter of the resolution, Harvard professor and shareholder rights activist Lucian Bebchuk.

Last week, a Delaware judge refused to rule on the legality of CA's decision to reject the proposal, saying the issue wasn't "ripe" for a decision.

A ruling by the court would have shed light on the currently murky issue of whether shareholders have the power to decide bylaw issues, which are normally governed by directors. A company's bylaws are the official rules that govern its management.

CRIMINAL LAW:

The Disaster Without End (NYT)

The New York Times (opinion), June 28, 2006

It turns out that thieves and wastrels feasting in the wake of Hurricane Katrina have been doing a heck of a job too — pushing the tote in government loot toward $2 billion and counting. Government investigators have found fraud and waste consuming more than 1 in every 10 dollars of the $19 billion spent so far on Katrina and Hurricane Rita — double the usual rate after a disaster. Thousands of criminal investigations are under way, with hundreds of people already charged with price-gouging and fraud. Even frontline workers with the Red Cross and the Federal Emergency Management Agency are being charged with profiteering.

DOJ_NMG_0036962

The most graphic evidence of FEMA mismanagement is the 10,000 mobile homes, costing $34,500 each, that proved useless in post-storm Louisiana and now sit empty at an Arkansas airfield at a storage cost of $250,000 a month. Meanwhile, contractors billed taxpayers for phantom hotel guests, phantom emergency meals and phantom caravans of storm debris. Even prison inmates allegedly gamed the system for housing aid. As much as 21 percent of the $6.3 billion sent directly to victims was improperly distributed, according to a detailed report by The Times's Eric Lipton.

The widespread fraud, waste and bungling was abetted by FEMA' s failure to put a high priority on existing tools for catching schemers and thieves, according to the Government Accountability Office. FEMA officials, wary at the advent of a new hurricane season, insist that tougher accountability precautions are now in place. But there's been no credible evidence of the top-to-bottom revamping that FEMA needs.

Venerable Church Burns In New Orleans (NYT)

By Adam Nossiter

The New York Times, June 28, 2006

NEW ORLEANS, June 27 — Newly burned-out lots pockmark the city, evidence of a fearsome new challenge as firefighters here say they are confronting a tough post-Hurricane Katrina landscape of abandoned buildings, water mains cracked by the storm and fire engines with smaller crews.

Historic structures are burning to the ground — the latest was the Coliseum Place Baptist Church, a venerable red brick church that until Friday had towered over Coliseum Square in the Lower Garden District since 1855. Preservationists here described the loss as heartbreaking; it followed a February fire that destroyed a cherished World War I-era theater in the same square.

The newest threat to New Orleans is a direct outcropping of the storm, in many respects. Vagrants, squatting in empty buildings, lighting candles and cooking without electricity, are setting fires, the authorities say. Pipes broken during Hurricane Katrina have been leaking 85 million gallons of water a day. Manpower in the Fire Department is down by a third, on a good day. And inadequate flood insurance has been an inducement to arson, officials say.

"We have more fires, burning hotter and burning faster, and we have reduced water pressure," said Capt. Nick Felton, president of the New Orleans Firefighters Association, Local 632. "We've got a recipe for disaster. We've really got our back against the wall."

Staircases leading to nowhere amid charred, twisted building fragments can be found here and there on desolate lots in the Uptown neighborhood. In the Lower Garden District, one of the city's oldest, leafiest neighborhoods, at least six significant structures have been lost to fire since the hurricane. In May, two 100-year-old wooden wharves on the Mississippi River burned, sending a column of smoke high above the Central Business District.

The Fire Department's spokesman, Chief Norman Woodridge, agreed that the volume and size of fires appeared to have increased.

"We've got many large fires," Chief Woodridge said. "We're going out two, three, four times a week. That's unusual." Meanwhile, the department worries that it will soon lose two firefighting helicopters, on temporary loan from the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

Water pressure is down to 20 pounds per square inch, from 90, in some areas because of the leaks, Captain Felton said. It is yet another legacy of the storm: trees, blown down by Hurricane Katrina, uprooted water mains, cracking them.

Adding to the fire problems, a drought described by climatologists as severe has settled over the region, drying up vegetation. Fires, more common in winter here, are particularly unwelcome with the mercury stuck in the mid-90's. Working conditions are as bad as they have ever been, firefighters say.

"It's very hot and it's very tiring," said one firefighter, Pekitha West. "Very stressful. We're at more fires, by us having to cross over districts."

DOJ_NMG_0036963

A vacant apartment complex, struck by lightning, burned to the ground in eastern New Orleans earlier this month. Firefighters had battled more than two dozen large blazes previously in June.

In many ways, Hurricane Katrina created an ideal landscape for unchecked blazes. Gutted structures, stripped of sheetrock, leave room and air for fire to spread, Captain Felton said. Rising rents mean people are crowding into closer quarters. And armies of demolition workers are breaking into empty houses to sleep on undamaged second floors.

The result: "We're makin' a whole lot of fires," Captain Felton said, using a local idiom that translates roughly as "the firefighters are busy."

The blaze at the Coliseum Place Baptist Church, the oldest Baptist church in New Orleans, was a heavy psychological blow to the struggling city. The deep red of its Gothic brick tower made an arresting counterpoint to the pastel Greek Revival houses and dark green foliage on the square. The austere church was said to have sheltered troops on both sides during the Civil War.

The cause of the fire was under investigation. The building had been vacant for quite some time, and largely unused; residents reported chasing off vagrants. The remnants of its congregation had previously sought to tear it down, but the Historic District Landmarks Commission had refused the request.

Friday, in front of the smoldering ruins — the spire was intact, though badly damaged — distraught residents milled about the square, trying to head off the wrecking crew. An engineer brought in by local residents said parts of the church could be saved. But the report was to no avail; demolition went ahead after a nearly daylong standoff.

"I've got a role here, to protect the public," said the city's director of safety and permits, Mike Centineo. Patricia Gay of the Preservation Resource Center called it "a terrible architectural and historical loss," a sentiment echoed by other preservationists.

The square's residents, meanwhile, spoke as if their neighborhood's heart had been ripped out. "No tourists are going to want to come here if we lose all of our historic buildings," said Rene Padilla, who lived next door to the church.

Photo Shows Ney At Meeting He Can't Remember (NBC)

By Joel Seidman, Producer

NBC News, June 28, 2006

Picture connects congressman to tribe that was an Abramoff client

WASHINGTON - The Tigua of El Paso, an Indian tribe and former client of disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff, released a photo Tuesday of a meeting that members had with Ohio Republican Rep Bob Ney — a meeting the congressman told Senate investigators he did not remember having.

The photo, which was taken on Aug. 14, 2002, in a House hearing room, shows the Tigua tribe's Lt. Gov. Carlos Hisa and tribal council member Raul Gutierrez with Ney. Less than a week earlier, Ney had returned from an expenses-paid golf junket to Scotland with Abramoff, Ralph Reed, David Safavian, Neil Volz and others.

On Nov. 12, 2004, in an interview with Senate investigators, Ney said that "he was not familiar with the Tigua." But the report quotes tribal representatives as testifying that they met with Ney for about two hours and he assured them he could help with legislation.

Story continues below ? advertisement

Ney told the investigators that he "could not recall ever meeting with any member of the Tigua." Ney's lawyer later said the congressman's schedule for that day showed a half-hour meeting with the "Taqua." A spokesman for Ney, Brian Walsh, said the congressman simply could not recall that the tribe was also known by another name, the Ysleta del Sur Pueblo Indian Tribe of El Paso, Texas.

Hisa said in a telephone interview that Ney "had a terrible sunburn. He was red like a lobster from that Scotland trip." Hisa said his tribe was asked to pay $50,000 for the trip, but they refused — other tribal clients of Abramoff's paid more than $100,000 to cover the expenses.

Hisa also said it was "strange" that Ney told Senate Indian Affairs Committee investigators that he didn't remember meeting with the Tigua.

Accepts money from tribe

Ney accepted $32,000 from the tribe and had agreed to put legislative language in a bill to reopen a closed gambling casino it owned. The measure never became law because it lacked Senate support. E-mails released by the committee show that Abramoff and Ney knew in July 2002 that the Tigua's provision in the Election Reform Bill was dead in the Senate but didn't tell the tribe until that October.

Ney's comments to the committee could complicate his problems with the Justice Department.

Ney told the committee he never knew that tribal money financed the golf trip. He said he thought the costs were covered by a private foundation. The report said: "Congressman Ney said the purpose of the trip was to raise money for underprivileged kids in Scotland and Washington, D.C. The itinerary consisted of golfing, meeting two parliamentarians, and watching the Marine Band."

The meetings with Scottish parliamentarians never took place. And according to testimony by Ney's former chief of staff Neil Volz, the trip amounted to $100 rounds of drinks, $400 rounds of golf and expensive hotel rooms.

Volz, Reed, Ney, Abramoff and David Safavian — who was convicted of four counts of lying and obstruction — were all part of the golf party to Scotland and London in 2002.

Walsh, Ney's spokesman, has said the Senate report merely shows just how far Abramoff and his conspirators, who "have pleaded guilty to deceiving their clients, employers and members of Congress, would go to further their own greed."

Five people have pleaded guilty or been convicted of influence peddling — Volz, Abramoff and two former aides to former Texas Republican Rep. Tom DeLay, Tony Rudy and Michael Scanlon. Safavian has been the only person caught up in the Abramoff scandal to be convicted at trial.

The Justice Department's investigation is continuing.

The Associated Press contributed to this story.

Photo Shows Ney In Meeting With Tribe (AP-Y2)

AP2, June 27, 2006

An Indian tribe that was a client of disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff has released a photograph of tribal leaders meeting with Rep. Bob Ney (news, bio, voting record), who had told investigators he wasn't familiar with the tribe.

The photo shows the Tigua tribe's Lt. Gov. Carlos Hisa and tribal council member Raul Gutierrez with Ney in a House hearing room on Aug. 14, 2002, less than a week after Ney finished an expenses-paid golf trip to Scotland with Abramoff and others.

On Nov. 12, 2004, while being interviewed by Senate investigators, Ney said he could not recall meeting with the Tigua.

After the interview, Ney's lawyer said the congressman's calendar did list a half-hour meeting with the "Taqua." Ney's spokesman Brian Walsh now says Ney may not have recognized the name "Tigua" because of the tribe's formal name, the Ysleta del Sur Pueblo.

"Ney takes literally thousands of pictures with people visiting D.C. every year and he is supposed to remember every one of them?" Walsh said.

According to testimony by Hisa and tribal spokesman Marc Schwartz, Ney met for 1 1/2 hours with Hisa, Gutierrez, Schwartz and Abramoff, and assured them that he was working to put a provision in an election-reform bill that would allow the tribe to reopen its shuttered casino. Ney also praised Abramoff as "the man to work with for changes in Washington," Hisa said. The Tigua provision did not make it into the final legislation.

Lawmakers Tackle Online Child Porn (AP-Y2)

By Erica Werner, Associated Press Writer

AP2, June 28, 2006

Internet providers told Congress on Tuesday they're doing all they can to combat online child pornography, but they were told to expect legislation.

Several voiced skepticism about creating new laws that would force them to retain data about their users' online activity.

Any such measure would be costly and easily circumvented and would "fall far short of its intended goal," America Online chief counsel John Ryan told a House Energy and Commerce subcommittee hearing.

The focus should be on improving existing child porn laws — not "new mandates," said Verizon Online general counsel Thomas Dailey.

Lawmakers, however, said more must be done to stop the availability of child porn on the Web and chart rooms where pedophiles troll for young victims.

"The parents of America and I think the Congress is tired of just talking about it. I think we're ready to take action," Energy and Commerce Chairman Joe Barton, R-Texas, told a panel of executives from seven companies including Yahoo Inc. (Nasdaq:YHOO - news), Google Inc. and Microsoft Corp.

Barton said that after hearings by his committee's investigative subcommittee wrap up Wednesday he plans to develop a comprehensive anti-porn bill. He didn't offer details, but getting companies to maintain customer records was a focus Tuesday.

Top Justice Department officials including Attorney General Alberto Gonzales have met recently with Internet executives to discuss the issue. There's currently no legal requirement for companies to hang onto records of their customers' activities, and according to testimony Tuesday, industry practices vary dramatically.

EarthLink Inc. archives customer records for seven years; Comcast Corp. now keeps it only for 31 days, but plans to implement a 180-day policy by Sept. 1.

The lack of uniformity "is seriously hindering investigations," said Rep. Diana DeGette (news, bio, voting record), D-Colo., who is writing a bill to require certain customer-identifying records to be kept for one year.

Companies already are adjusting their practices in response to the attention from Congress and the Justice Department.

Five companies — Time Warner Inc.'s AOL, Yahoo, Microsoft, Earthlink and United Online Inc. — announced Tuesday they will jointly build a database of child-pornography images and develop other tools to help prevent distribution of the images. The companies pledged $1 million and will work with the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children.

Google came under the most criticism Tuesday, with lawmakers brandishing printouts of a search using the terms "pre-teen," "sex" and "video" that yielded 2.9 million hits on the massive search site.

Nicole Wong, Google's associate general counsel and chief privacy officer, said that search was an aberration based on the company's failure to flag the word "pre-teen" when it's hyphenated, but that it's been corrected. She said the company's policy was to block access to child porn sites as soon as they're detected.

"We do the best we can," Wong said.

Senators Adopt Web Labeling Requirement (CNET)

By Declan McCullagh And Anne Broache, Staff Writer, CNET News.com

CNET News, June 28, 2006

Web site operators posting sexually explicit information must slap warning labels on their pages or face prison terms of up to 15 years, according to a proposal adopted by a U.S. Senate committee on Tuesday.

During a day of debate on a wide-ranging communications bill, the Senate Commerce Committee approved an amendment backed by the Bush administration that proponents claim would help clean up the Internet and protect children online.

It says that commercial Web sites must not place "sexually explicit material" on their home pages upon pain of felony prosecution--and, in addition, they must rate "each page or screen of the website that does contain sexually explicit material" with a system to be devised by the Federal Trade Commission.

"This will protect children from accidentally typing in the wrong address and immediately viewing indecent material," said Sen. Conrad Burns, a Montana Republican who is the co-founder of the Congressional Internet Caucus.

Burns said that politicians "have to take a bold step in this world of danger to our kids, and there are some people out there who prey on young children and they use the Internet and other methods to feed their sickness."

Civil libertarians have opposed the mandatory labeling proposal, saying it violates the First Amendment's guarantee of freedom of speech. Also, courts have taken a dim view of mandatory rating systems: In a 1968 case called Interstate Circuit v. Dallas, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that Dallas' ordinance requiring that movies be rated was unconstitutional because the criteria for rating were unclear and vague.

DOJ_NMG_0036966

Burns' seven-page amendment is virtually identical to a standalone bill introduced earlier this month by Sen. Jon Kyl, an Arizona Republican. Both proposals follow from a speech in April during which Attorney General Alberto Gonzales called on Congress to "promptly" enact such a law.

Sen. John Kerry, the Massachusetts Democrat, had planned to offer a "very similar" amendment and Senate aides would combine the two before a floor vote, said Ted Stevens, the Alaska Republican who serves as the committee chairman.

Stevens also postponed discussion of what has proven one of the thorniest provisions of the massive telecommunications bill: Net neutrality. Senators plan to begin debate on that topic on Wednesday at 10 a.m. ET, with votes on a number of amendments expected.

The entire communications bill won't become law unless it receives final approval by the committee and, later, the full Senate. It must also be reconciled with a House of Representatives version that differs in many respects, including having no Internet labeling requirements.

Senate committee says that sexually explicit Web sites must be labeled as such--or their operators will go to jail.

Defense Says South Korean Businessman Was No Iraqi Agent (NSDY/AP)

By David B. Caruso, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, June 28, 2006

NEW YORK -- A South Korean businessman accused of secretly lobbying the United Nations on behalf of Saddam Hussein's government was "simply a middleman" who didn't intend to break any U.S. laws, his attorney told a federal jury Tuesday.

Tongsun Park, 71, is charged with acting as an unregistered agent for Iraq in the mid-1990s at a time when the country was trying to influence the design of the U.N. oil-for-food program.

Prosecutors said Park _ already infamous in the United States for his role in a 1970s influence-peddling scandal known as "Koreagate" _ was no ordinary lobbyist.

In his opening statement Tuesday, Assistant U.S. Attorney Michael Farbiarz told jurors that Park was promised millions of dollars by Iraq for his help influencing top U.N. officials, including former Secretary-General Boutros Boutros-Ghali.

Being an agent of a foreign government isn't itself illegal, but prosecutors said Park failed to follow U.S. laws requiring such lobbyists to disclose their relationships.

"There's a right way and a wrong way," Farbiarz said. "He hid his relationship with Iraq."

Park's attorney, Michael Kim, acknowledged that the case was "full of intrigue."

"It almost sounded like a Tom Clancy novel," he said of Farbiarz's opening statement, which described secret meetings in cafes and cash being smuggled out of Iraq through the desert.

But he insisted that Park committed no illegal acts, and urged jurors to ignore the sensational elements of the case.

"He is not charged with taking money from a foreign government. ... He is not charged with intelligence gathering or spying," Kim said. "He is not charged with selling his access to the United Nations."

Kim repeatedly described Park as "a middleman, a facilitator" who was little different from other people who had an interest in the final design of the oil-for-food program, including several big American companies.

He also asked jurors not to convict him simply because he dealt with the government of Saddam Hussein.

"The question is not, 'Do you like the Iraqi government?'" Kim said.

From 1996 to 2003, the oil-for-food program allowed Iraq to sell oil on the condition that most of the money go toward humanitarian supplies.

Authorities say the program was horribly corrupted, and that it allowed Hussein to evade U.N. sanctions and collect huge kickbacks from thousands of international companies. By some estimates, $1.8 billion was looted from the program.

Park, a citizen of South Korea, was indicted last year. If convicted, he could face more than 12 years in prison.

In the mid-1970s, Park was heavily involved in the Koreagate scandal, in which he was accused of helping intelligence services in his native South Korea funnel bribes and favors to U.S. politicians.

DOJ_NMG_0036967

Park was granted immunity in exchange for his cooperation with prosecutors, and testified that he doled out $850,000 worth of bribes.

The trial in the oil-for-food case began Tuesday with testimony from the government's star witness, Samir A. Vincent, who has already pleaded guilty to being an illegal lobbyist for Iraq.

Vincent, an Iraqi-born American businessman, testified that he worked for years to influence U.S. and U.N. officials over the design of the oil-for-food program, partly because companies he was affiliated with were poised to get a percentage of the revenue generated by the plan.

He testified that his lobbying efforts had largely stalled until he was introduced to Park, who quickly arranged meetings with high U.N. officials.

The trial was to resume Wednesday.

Saddam Gave Bizman 2.5M : Feds (NYDN)

By Paul H.b. Shin, Daily News Staff Writer

New York Daily News, June 28, 2006

A South Korean businessman pocketed at least $2.5 million from Saddam Hussein in a cloak-and-dagger scheme to siphon off Iraq's oil profits, federal prosecutors said yesterday.

Using cash-stuffed envelopes and back-channel talks under cover of night, Tongsun Park secretly lobbied UN officials to rig the oil-for-food program to fatten Saddam's regime, Assistant U.S. Attorney Michael Farbiarz told a Manhattan jury in opening statements of the first trial linked to the scandal-ridden program.

"Iraq wanted to buy Tongsun Park's United Nations contacts and for millions of dollars, Tongsun Park was willing to sell it," Farbiarz said.

Park, who was at the center of the Capitol Hill influence-peddling scandal dubbed Koreagate during the 1970s, is charged with acting as an unregistered agent for Iraq in the mid-1990s.

But Park did nothing illegal, said his attorney Michael Kim, who likened the prosecution's descriptions of clandestine meetings to "a Tom Clancy novel."

Park was "simply a middleman, a facilitator, just like almost everyone else involved in the oil-for-food program," Kim said, accusing the prosecution of trying to arouse the jury's passions by repeating the name of Saddam Hussein.

The oil-for-food program was established in 1996 to ease the economic strain of sanctions imposed in the wake of Iraq's invasion of Kuwait. It was intended to allow Iraq to use oil profits to buy food and medicines under UN supervision. But investigators later revealed the $64billion program was rife with corruption, with nearly 2,400 firms paying $1.8billion in kickbacks to Saddam's regime.

If convicted, Park faces a maximum of five years in prison and a $250,000 fine.

Park, 71, has been in jail since January, when he was nabbed in Mexico while traveling from Canada to Panama. At the time, he was carrying $45,000 in cash, FBI officials said. Despite his age and failing health, he has been denied bail repeatedly because judges have deemed him likely to flee the country.

The U.S. Justice Department has charged Park and six others, including Texas oil tycoon Oscar Wyatt, with illegally doing business with Iraq while UN sanctions were in place. Wyatt has been charged with paying bribes to Saddam's regime in exchange for millions of barrels of Iraqi oil on the cheap.

Feds Tell Jury: Say 'Enough' To Political Hiring (CHIT)

By Rudolph Bush And Dan Mihalopoulos, Tribune Staff Reporters

Chicago Tribune, June 28, 2006

Federal prosecutors urged jurors in the City Hall corruption trial Tuesday to end the illegal political hiring that they say has pervaded Mayor Richard Daley's administration.

"This machine doesn't have any brakes. That's you," Assistant U.S. Atty. Philip Guentert told jurors. "It's time to say enough."

Defense lawyers for three former city officials argued that prosecutors brought insufficient and misleading evidence against Daley's former patronage chief Robert Sorich and three co-defendants.

The lead attorney for Timothy McCarthy, who worked with Sorich in the mayor's Office of Intergovernmental Affairs, told jurors that prosecutors want them to "speculate and guess" that the defendants are guilty.

"You didn't always hear the whole story," said McCarthy's lawyer, Patrick Deady.

Prosecutors have alleged that Intergovernmental Affairs was the hub of a widespread scheme to fix jobs and promotions in favor of politically connected candidates.

Guentert had the last word Tuesday, and he used it to sound a warning to co-schemers who have not yet been charged as members of the "corrupt clout machine."

"For those who are out there and are responsible for this scheme, there's another day," he said.

Guentert acknowledged that Sorich did not invent the scheme to steer jobs to workers in pro-Daley campaign groups. But he said Sorich and the other defendants played important roles in an illegal process involving many others.

"City Hall is chock-full of the schemers," he said.

Although Guentert did not specifically name other alleged co-schemers, prosecutors in the trial have referred repeatedly to the involvement of former top Daley aide Victor Reyes and retired Streets and Sanitation Commissioner Al Sanchez. Reyes and Sanchez are leaders of the powerful Hispanic Democratic Organization.

The mayor's patronage office illegally handed out 5,000 jobs to applicants with political clout, Guentert said.

To emphasize the significance of the hiring investigation, he said the alleged scheme helped candidates for local, state and federal offices: "It affected the course of how people in this city were governed."

Sorich, McCarthy and former Streets and Sanitation Department official Patrick Slattery face fraud charges. A fourth defendant, former high-ranking city official John Sullivan, is charged with lying to federal agents.

U.S. District Judge David Coar is expected to instruct the jury on the law Wednesday morning, and deliberations will begin once that is complete.

Deady, McCarthy's attorney, argued Tuesday that the evidence regarding his client's actions in Intergovernmental Affairs shows he was never part of any scheme.

The prosecution alleged that McCarthy ordered the hiring of 19-year-old Andrew Ryan as a building inspector in 2004 because he was the son of a powerful union leader, even though Ryan was unqualified for the job.

"If it was really a scheme to conceal, the last person you would want to hire is a 19-year-old kid," Deady said.

He argued that the testimony of Christopher Kozicki, a former managing deputy commissioner in the Buildings Department, proves that it was Buildings Commissioner Stan Kaderbek—and not McCarthy—who ordered Ryan's hiring.

Kaderbek wanted to appease Ryan's father, a union official, Deady said.

He said that Sorich and McCarthy recommended job applicants to city departments but never ordered the hiring of anyone.

Deady highlighted Kozicki's testimony that the Buildings Department hired only two of 10 people referred by McCarthy on one occasion.

If the department had failed to accept orders from the mayor's office, Deady said, then "one of two things should have happened. Mr. Kozicki should have been called on the carpet, or his boss should have been fired."

Deady also argued that McCarthy had nothing to gain from the alleged scheme.

"Why is it he would engage in this scheme at all?" Deady asked. "He's not getting any money."

In his rebuttal argument, Guentert answered that the city handsomely compensated Sorich and McCarthy. Until they were charged and fired a year ago, Sorich was paid $101,100 a year, and McCarthy's annual salary was $90,564.

"That was their job," Guentert said. "They were in charge of patronage. It's more than insult to injury that the city had to pay these guys to do it."

After Deady's closing argument, Sullivan's lawyer said he should be acquitted. Prosecutors allege that Sullivan, who was the managing deputy in Streets and Sanitation, misled investigators about his knowledge of two political groups that helped campaign workers get jobs in his department.

Cynthia Giacchetti, Sullivan's lawyer, noted that FBI agent John Hauser waited more than five months to transcribe one of two face-to-face interviews with Sullivan. She also pointed out that Hauser did not take verbatim notes of the interviews.

She contrasted that to federal prosecutors' interview of Daley last year, which was transcribed word-for-word.

DOJ_NMG_0036969

"John Sullivan is not as powerful as the mayor ... but he is certainly deserving of the same protection and rights," Giacchetti said.

Sullivan had been accused of participating in the fraud scheme, but that charge was dropped last week.

An attorney for Slattery argued his client was charged in the case because he is a close friend of Sorich.

"This is a squeeze job on a childhood friend," said Patrick Blegen, Slattery's lawyer.

Blegen also said the key witness against Slattery, Streets and Sanitation lawyer Catharine Hennessy, could not be believed. He reminded jurors of testimony from a union official who called Hennessy's honesty into question.

rrbush@tribune.com

dmihalopoulos@tribune.com

Prosecutors: 'The Fix Was In' (CHIST)

By Natasha Korecki And Steve Warmbir, Staff Reporters

Chicago Sun-Times, June 28, 2006

Mayor Daley's patronage chief and three others ran "a corrupt clout machine" greased with political workers who stole city jobs from deserving candidates, prosecutors charged Monday.

"All of this was a charade, ladies and gentlemen," federal prosecutor Julie Ruder said of a scheme to falsify job tests and hold bogus interviews so that hundreds of jobs went to predetermined, clout-backed winners. "The fix was in."

In the first day of closing arguments to cap the six-week City Hall hiring trial, prosecutors said four former city workers scammed taxpayers and qualified applicants who thought the city hiring was legitimate.

"They put their trust in a corrupt clout machine," Ruder said.

The scheme continued because Robert Sorich ordered computer tapes to be erased and city documents destroyed and one of his co-defendants, John Sullivan, lied repeatedly to the FBI, prosecutors said. "Concealment was part of the scheme from day one," Assistant U.S. Attorney Barry Miller said.

Defense rips 'pig Tomczak'

Pacing with his hands in his pockets, Sorich attorney Tom Durkin went on his own attack. He called prosecutors "intellectually dishonest" for bringing such a weak case.

"Sometimes people with good intentions go too far. That time has come today," Durkin said.

The verbal sallies came as the federal courtroom was packed to overflowing, including about 25 relatives and supporters of the four defendants.

Sorich, patronage chief and top official in Daley's Office of Intergovernmental Affairs, and three others are accused of cheating the system to ensure jobs or promotions went to campaign workers.

"It was not about qualifications. It was not about merit," Ruder said. "It was about politics. It was about clout. It was about who you knew and whose palm you were greasing."

Not with money, she said but a currency more valuable: "bodies." Ruder said jobs went to those who donated their labor to political groups by ringing doorbells, distributing flyers and making calls for candidates backed by the mayor.

Durkin said IGA took job recommendations from politicians and tracked city jobs by race, but never made guarantees. He blasted the prosecution's top witnesses, including Daniel Katalinic and Donald Tomczak, who admitted in plea deals to taking bribes, unlike Sorich.

Durkin ended his argument at the lectern staring right at the jury. His voice rising, he vouched for Sorich's credibility, causing several of the defendant's family members to dab tears from their eyes. Durkin's voice cracked as he pleaded with jurors not to see Sorich as an orchestrator of some complicated fraud scheme. He said his client had no criminal intent, and asked for a motive.

"Which was what? To be a big shot?" Durkin asked, noting there was no testimony Sorich took money or boasted about his connections. "That pig Tomczak did," Durkin said. To use Tomczak's name in the same sentence as Sorich "sickens me," he said.

'Don't try to run Daley out'

Durkin attacked City Corporation Counsel Mara Georges for saying she was unaware of IGA's role in hiring. He pointed to computer evidence the city turned over to federal prosecutors in 1997 that included IGA job lists.

"Was the stench worse from her testimony or was the stench worse that they tried to get you to believe her testimony?" Durkin asked.

Durkin, who did not put on witnesses, asked why the prosecution never brought in someone to explain the 1983 Shakman decree, which prohibits political influence from factoring into job hires and what prosecutors say the four men flouted. Durkin, who has suggested IGA's role in hiring went on before Sorich was hired, urged jurors not to convict if only they were displeased with the mayor.

"Don't try to run Daley out of office by voting to convict these guys," Durkin said.

Fighting over holes

Ruder worked to show there were victims to the scheme by spotlighting an experienced plumber, Laura Miller, who was edged out of a promotion despite being more qualified, the only union candidate and African-American. She used Miller's experience to attack the notion that IGA was trying to diversify the workforce.

She said the scheme endured because of years of concealment.

"Deny Deny Deny," Ruder said, referencing a supervisor's testimony that she was told to always hide IGA involvement in hiring. "That is what she learned her first day of work, just like a child learns ABCs on the first day of kindergarten," drawing a loud sigh from a Sorich supporter.

Durkin tried to portray Sorich as a trusted, well-liked city employee who helped people, including one city worker who agreed Sorich literally helped get him out of working in a hole, with a promotion.

Ruder, though, asked about all the other workers in low-level, back-breaking jobs, who didn't do political work.

"Mr. Sorich didn't get them out," Ruder said, her voice ringing with outrage. Unless a person did political work, Ruder said: "you were stuck in that hole for good."

Tech Pair Indicted On Charges They Deleted E-mails In Fumo Probe (AP)

By Maryclaire Dale, The Associated Press

AP, June 28, 2006

PHILADELPHIA (AP) — Weeks after their arrest, a pair of computer technicians assigned to state Sen. Vincent Fumo were indicted on charges of obstructing a federal investigation by deleting years worth of Fumo's e-mails.

The 34-count indictment returned Tuesday charges Leonard P. Luchko, 50, of Collingdale, and Mark C. Eister, 36, of Camp Hill, with conspiracy, destroying evidence and obstruction.

Federal authorities are investigating whether Fumo extorted millions in corporate donations for a South Philadelphia nonprofit, Citizens' Alliance for Better Neighborhoods, and used the nonprofit for political purposes. Fumo has not been charged in the case.

The FBI last month arrested Luchko and Eister in pre-dawn raids on their homes, although defense lawyers complained that their clients had been willing to surrender.

An FBI affidavit filed previously cites e-mails from staffers depicting Fumo as increasingly worried about leaving an electronic trail and allegedly ordering his large staff to delete his e-mails along with any relating to the nonprofit.

U.S. Attorney Patrick Meehan has said that the three-year investigation is far from over, but defense lawyers noted that Tuesday's indictment did not name any new defendants.

"It suggests that the government is not ready to indict others," said lawyer William A. DeStefano, a former federal prosecutor.

Luchko was charged Tuesday with 30 criminal counts and Eister with five counts.

Neither their lawyers nor Fumo's lawyer, Richard Sprague, immediately returned phone messages seeking comment Tuesday afternoon.

2 Computer Aides To Sen. Fumo Charged Formally (PHI)

By John Shiffman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, June 28, 2006

A federal grand jury yesterday indicted two former state Senate aides, accusing them of deleting e-mails to thwart a federal corruption and extortion investigation of State Sen. Vincent J. Fumo.

The 34-count indictment is considered a formality. The aides were arrested May 31, and prosecutors had a month to bring the case before the grand jury. Yesterday's indictment did not offer any new charges. It simply repeated FBI allegations that computer technicians Leonard P. Luchko and Mark C. Eister deleted files at Fumo's direction.

The indictment, however, did trigger the random selection of a judge for the case: Senior U.S. District Judge William H. Yohn Jr. If others are indicted in this case, Yohn would preside over their trial as well.

Yohn, a former state representative and Montgomery County Court judge, was appointed to the federal bench by President George H.W. Bush in 1991. He is a Republican and a graduate of Princeton University and Yale Law School. He has presided over several high-profile corruption cases, including this year's trial of former Norristown Mayor Ted LeBlanc.

"He's one of the brightest judges in the courthouse and not afraid to take a stand," said J. Michael Farrell, a defense lawyer who represented Mumia Abu-Jamal before Yohn in 2001. In a controversial decision, Yohn affirmed Abu-Jamal's conviction but overturned his death sentence, ordering a new hearing.

Lawyers involved in the Fumo aides' case said yesterday it would be inappropriate to comment on Yohn's selection.

No one else has been charged in the case, but Fumo and his former deputy chief of staff, Ruth Arnao, remain targets of the investigation. Until this month, Arnao was executive director of Citizens' Alliance for Better Neighborhoods, the charity at the center of the probe.

Fumo and Arnao are not mentioned by name in yesterday's indictment. The 70-page document refers to them by job title numerous times, beginning on Page 1.

The indictment says that authorities are trying to determine whether Fumo engaged in extortion by soliciting contributions for the South Philadelphia charity and whether any contributions were used improperly to benefit Fumo politically or personally.

The investigation, which began in early 2003, began focusing on the corporate donations after The Inquirer reported in late 2003 that Peco Energy Co. - engaged in negotiations with Fumo about deregulating electricity rates - had secretly given $17 million to Citizens' Alliance.

On Jan. 25, 2004, after The Inquirer reported the federal probe was under way, Luchko sent a mass e-mail to Fumo and his staff saying Fumo had ordered tighter computer security.

"The FBI probe into the senator has really set him off," Luchko wrote in another e-mail that night. "He wants us to start doing a number of security checks starting tomorrow... He wants all of the Blackberries wiped... S- has hit the fan."

In a statement yesterday, prosecutors John Pease and Robert Zauzmer said that Luchko and Eister and others "succeeded in deleting and destroying substantial amounts of electronic evidence relevant to the investigation."

Deleted files included all e-mail sent or received before 2005 by Fumo or Arnao, prosecutors said. All e-mail about Citizens' Alliance was deleted from Fumo's computers, the prosecutors said.

Fumo's attorney, Richard A. Sprague, has said the two technicians were "unfortunate victims" of a campaign to bring down the powerful Philadelphia Democrat. Sprague's office declined to comment yesterday.

Luchko and Eister resigned their Senate jobs after their arrests. Their lawyers, who were unavailable for comment yesterday, have said they would fight the charges at trial.

The indictment charges Luchko with 30 counts - including 19 counts of destroying evidence and nine counts of persuading others to destroy evidence. If convicted, the 50-year-old Collingdale resident could face about three years in prison under the advisory federal sentencing guidelines.

Eister, who is 36 and lives in Camp Hill, Pa., is charged with five similar counts. If convicted, he likely also faces three to four years.

ONLINE EXTRA

To read the indictment, go to http://go.philly.com/probe

2 Ex-computer Aides Of Fumo Indicted (PHI)

By Michael Hinkelman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, June 28, 2006

Two former computer aides of state Sen. Vince Fumo were indicted yesterday by a federal grand jury on charges of obstructing justice.

Leonard Luchko, 49, and Mark Eister, 36, were arrested at their homes on May 31 and charged in a criminal complaint accompanied by a 65-page affidavit from an FBI agent.

Yesterday's 70-page, 34-count indictment was basically a formality, and there were no new bombshells in the charging papers.

A federal grand jury charged that Luchko and Eister, who resigned their Senate jobs last month, conspired to delete and destroy e-mails between November 2003 and October 2005 to foil a federal criminal probe of Fumo and a Fumo-backed community group, the Citizens Alliance for Better Neighborhoods Inc.

The feds are investigating whether Fumo used his office to extort donations for the group and whether those donations improperly benefitted him personally or politically.

Fumo has not been charged with any wrongdoing, and his attorney, Richard A. Sprague, has said that Luchko and Eister are "victims" of a process that is attempting "to get" Fumo.

Ruth Arnao, the community group's former executive director and a one-time top aide to Fumo, has been informed by federal prosecutors that she is a target of the investigation.

The indictment, which identifies only Luchko and Eister by name, alleges that the two men:

• Systematically destroyed e- mails sent to or received from Fumo and Arnao;

• Created and implemented schedules to run computer programs that erased any trace of deleted electronic files from computer hard drives;

• Instructed Fumo's employees not to save any e-mails sent to or received from Fumo;

• Logged in to e-mail accounts of Fumo's employees to scan their e-mail to see if they were saving any Fumo-related e-mail; and

• Deleted and wiped other electronic devices, such as BlackBerries, used by Fumo and Arnao, among others.

The indictment also alleges that Luchko and Eister, as well as their unindicted co-conspirators, succeeded in permanently erasing virtually all such e-mails before 2005.

If convicted, Luchko and Eister could face up to four years in prison under federal sentencing guidelines.

James C. Schwartzman, Luchko's attorney, and Brian J. McMonagle, Eister's attorney, could not be reached for comment yesterday.

They have said that both Luchko and Eister intend to contest the charges at trial.

FBI Was Slow To Check Pellicano's Audio Lab (LAT)

By Greg Krikorian And Andrew Blankstein, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, June 28, 2006

Agents waited almost two months to seize the taping equipment, court documents show.

Court documents released Tuesday show that FBI agents did not examine private investigator Anthony Pellicano's sophisticated audio lab during their initial November 2002 search of his Sunset Strip offices, raising new questions about the handling of the probe.

After the November search, the court documents show, FBI agents waited almost two months to seize computers and other items from the lab.

With prosecutors publicly acknowledging that they have only one allegedly wiretapped conversation on tape, the time lapse between searches raises the possibility that Pellicano or others could have removed audio files or potential evidence in the case from computers in the lab.

In recent court proceedings, federal prosecutors said they had seized 1,300 audio recordings from Pellicano's offices, nearly 300 of which remain encrypted.

The newly released documents also show that Anita Busch, a former Los Angeles Times reporter who was allegedly threatened at Pellicano's behest in June 2002, also told authorities that someone had hacked into her personal computer and tapped her telephone.

So far, Pellicano and 13 others have been charged in the federal probe of wiretapping, racketeering, witness tampering and other crimes. Seven of Pellicano's co-defendants already have pleaded guilty to charges ranging from lying to the FBI to hiring Pellicano to engage in illegal wiretapping.

He and his remaining co-defendants have pleaded not guilty to charges that they used wiretaps and illegal background checks to obtain "confidential, embarrassing or incriminating" information, typically to help attorneys and other clients gain an advantage in civil or criminal litigation.

They are scheduled to go on trial in October.

The court papers released Tuesday relate to three of six searches conducted by authorities in their investigation of Pellicano, which began after he was allegedly linked to the threat against Busch.

Investigating the threat, the FBI first raided Pellicano's offices in November 2002 and hauled away computers, data storage devices and other items, according to the search warrant documents, including affidavits, signed by the lead agent in the case, Stanley Ornellas.

In a January 2003 affidavit, Ornellas said he had spoken to an agent who had participated in the earlier search and was told that nothing was taken from the audio lab at Pellicano's offices.

"Moreover," Ornellas wrote, "a number of computers located within the audio lab were not searched or seized, as the searching agents in their discretion determined that the items to be seized pursuant to the initial warrant … were unlikely to be found in that portion of the premises."

The FBI and U.S. attorney's office declined to comment Tuesday about the handling of the searches.

Former federal prosecutor Orin Kerr said it was not clear if the searches should have been handled differently. "The bottom line is it's hard to tell whether this was a missed opportunity or poor judgment," said the cybercrimes specialist and George Washington University law professor.

"The problem with computers is that you don't know what is in them until you look at them. So when [authorities] enter a business with dozens of computers, they need to decide: do they take every one or be more selective … it's a classic problem with digital evidence."

The threat that triggered the Pellicano probe was made to look like a mafia warning. Busch, then a Times reporter who has since left the paper, found a note that said "Stop" and a dead fish with a rose in its mouth on the windshield of her car.

A few days later, she reported that someone had hacked into her computer and stolen e-mails from two online accounts, according to the newly released documents.

Over the next two months, she also found her computer hard drive had been infected with a virus that intercepted passwords and document files and sent information through e-mail to an unknown location. She deleted the virus, and her hard drive crashed.

After detecting problems with her telephone answering machine, she contacted a technician at Pacific Bell in November 2002.

The technician told Busch that he had "never seen a problem like hers." Busch contacted Pacific Bell a second time and was told by an employee that a "half tap" — or wiretap — had been placed on her second home phone line.

The court papers also included additional details about the involvement of Alexander Proctor, an ex-convict who was arrested for allegedly placing the note and dead fish on Busch's windshield.

According to the search warrant affidavits, Proctor told a government informant in August that he owed Pellicano $14,000 and claimed that actor Steven Seagal had hired Pellicano to threaten a reporter who was preparing an article on the actor.

Authorities have since said they found no convincing evidence that the actor was involved.

Proctor said Pellicano had agreed to pay him $10,000 "for the job involving the reporter," but was so pleased with Proctor's work that Pellicano wiped out the debt and told him they were even, the affidavit said.

DOJ_NMG_0036974

Proctor told the informant a week later that he was waiting to hear from the private eye about "other jobs," but that Pellicano was waiting for up-front payments from those clients. For one of the jobs, Pellicano allegedly said he would pay Proctor $100,000 to get a wanted Israeli murder suspect out of the U.S.

Judge Declines To Release Galante, For Now (DANNT)

By Karen Ali, THE NEWS-TIMES

Danbury News-Times, June 28, 2006

NEW HAVEN — A federal judge is open to the idea of releasing Danbury trash kingpin James Galante from federal detention and putting him under some type of house arrest while his racketeering case is pending.

At a lengthy hearing on Tuesday, U.S. District Court Judge Ellen Bree Burns said she wants more information from Galante's defense lawyer, Hugh Keefe, on how such an arrangement would work before letting Galante out of jail.

While she is "amenable" to such an arrangement, she won't allow Galante to go back to work at the helm of Automated Waste Disposal in Danbury, Burns told Keefe.

"Don't suggest to me he go to work because that would put him in contact with witnesses," Burns said. She said "there is a danger with him tampering with witnesses."

Several of the co-defendants are Galante's employees.

Earlier in the hearing, Keefe asked Burns to let Galante go back to work if she released him from custody.

Keefe asked the judge to place Galante under "house arrest," to wear an ankle bracelet and to have a home monitoring system.

Burns wants more specifics, however, and in writing. So, Burns continued the case for 72 hours, which is also the amount of time it takes for electronic monitoring to be set up, she said.

Burns said she understood the issue Keefe raised at the hearing, which is that Keefe is having difficulty communicating with his client because his client, for most of the 18 days since his indictment, has been jailed in a federal prison in Rhode Island. Keefe told Burns it would be much easier for him to communicate with his client if he was living in Danbury.

Judge Declines To Release Indicted Trash Magnate, For Now (AP)

Associated Press

AP, June 28, 2006

NEW HAVEN, Conn. -- A federal judge on Tuesday declined to release a Danbury businessman imprisoned in an investigation of the mob's influence on the trash industry, after federal prosecutors alleged a pattern of witness tampering.

U.S. District Judge Ellen Bree Burns, however, gave the lawyer for businessman James Galante 72 hours to come up with conditions for his proposed release that would guard against witness tampering.

Hugh Keefe, Galante's attorney, questioned why Galante is being detained while other suspects in the investigation have been released on bond. He also said it has been difficult to communicate with Galante in the Rhode Island federal detention center where he is being held.

Burns said she understood Keefe's concerns.

"At the same time, however, I am persuaded there is a danger that there may be some tampering with witnesses," Burns said. "I can't permit that."

The judge's comments came after a lengthy hearing Tuesday in which prosecutors played tapes of intercepted phone calls and cited other evidence of what they said were attempts to influence witnesses.

Galante, whose businesses handle about 80 percent of southwestern Connecticut's garbage, was arrested earlier this month in a Mafia case and ordered held without bail. He has been charged with racketeering, extortion and witness tampering.

Federal prosecutors say Galante carved out exclusive routes for his companies and paid Genovese crime family boss Matthew "Matty the Horse" Ianniello $120,000 a year for mob muscle to enforce his territories. That meant higher prices for businesses and homeowners, authorities said.

Most of the other defendants in the investigation were arraigned Monday. Former Waterbury Mayor Joseph Santopietro pleaded not guilty Monday to charges he participated in the scheme.

DOJ_NMG_0036975

Keefe argued that Galante is being treated unfairly. He is the only person among 29 charged being held without bail, his family's bank accounts are frozen and his multimillion-dollar trash conglomerate is being run by federal marshals.

Keefe questioned why Galante is being held when Ianniello has been released on bond.

"I think what they want to do is deprive him of effective assistance of counsel," Keefe said. "All I want for you, here, is to even the playing field."

Prosecutors said they were concerned Galante would try to influence witnesses, but Keefe said that was speculative.

Prosecutors cited telephone conversations recorded by the FBI in which Galante at times talks menacingly about his competitors.

"What I have to do, tell him, is hurt you," Galante was recorded instructing a subordinate during a 2005 dispute with a rival company.

Most of the threats played in court, however, were delivered by subordinates who were released on bail.

Gotti Says He'll Leave NY If Cleared (SFC/AP)

San Francisco Chronicle, June 28, 2006

(06-27) 06:44 PDT New York (AP) --

Facing his third trial on racketeering charges, the son of the late mob boss John Gotti says he will leave New York this time if he's exonerated.

"I can't stay in New York," John "Junior" Gotti, whose father died in prison, told the Daily News. "I'm alone in this world. I'm a man without an island."

Gotti, 42, is scheduled to go on trial again in August after two previous juries deadlocked on charges alleging he arranged the beating of Guardian Angels founder and radio host Curtis Sliwa.

Gotti's lawyers have argued that he gave up all mob activities after he pleaded guilty in another racketeering case in 1999.

"There are men dying in prison for that life," Gotti said. "It's like a religion. But it's their religion, not my religion."

He said his father — "the consummate tough guy" — didn't understand why he pleaded guilty in the 1999 case.

"I told him I got children. I got a son named John Gotti Jr. What can he expect to be in this life?" he told the Daily News. He said his father eventually understood his obligations to his family.

"To this day, my father is a god to me," Gotti said.

GOTTI IS TRYING TO BURY MURDER EVIDENCE (NYPOST)

By Kati Cornel

The New York Post, June 28, 2006

Faced with an onslaught of new charges, John "Junior" Gotti is fighting to keep damaging evidence of his alleged role in a double murder and a money-laundering scheme away from jurors at his upcoming racketeering trial.

In a strange twist of logic, Gotti's lawyers conceded that the government has "ample evidence" to show that the former mob leader was involved in "murders or violence" - and therefore don't need to touch on the slayings of Thomas and Rosemary Uva.

Prosecutors are seeking to show how Gotti put the wheels in motion for the 1992 double hit on the husband and wife robbery team, who raised the ire of the Gambino crime family by targeting Mafia social clubs.

Gotti is not charged with the Uva murders, but the feds are seeking to show the killings were among many crimes that he had a hand in as a powerful member of an ongoing criminal enterprise.

Ex-FBI Agent Testifies On Disputed Bulger Visit (BOS)

By Shelley Murphy, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, June 28, 2006

A retired FBI agent testified yesterday that he had just finished having dinner with informants James ``Whitey'' Bulger and Stephen ``The Rifleman'' Flemmi at a South Boston home in 1983 when Bulger's brother, then-Massachusetts Senate President William Bulger , showed up unexpectedly.

DOJ_NMG_0036976

``He had some photographs from a recent trip to Ireland," said James Ring , recounting how William Bulger stayed for about 10 minutes at Flemmi's parents' home, showing off photos.

Ring's testimony was a repeat of his statements during federal court hearings in 1998 about William Bulger's appearance at a meeting of his brother with FBI agents. William Bulger, testifying three years ago before a congressional committee investigating his brother's relationship with the FBI, said he had no memory of any such dinner.

Then-FBI agent John J. Connolly Jr., who was later convicted of racketeering for his handling of James Bulger and Flemmi, had arranged the dinner and was present, Ring said yesterday. Ring said he was surprised by William Bulger's arrival and said Connolly told him later that the politician lived next door to Flemmi's elderly parents and that the Bulgers ``somewhat looked after" Flemmi's folks.

Ring, who supervised the organized crime squad in the FBI's Boston office from January 1983 through 1990, testified for the government, which is facing a $50 million wrongful death suit over its handling of Bulger and Flemmi. The suit has been brought by the family of John McIntyre, which blames the government for the Quincy fisherman's murder. Flemmi has testified he and Bulger killed McIntyre, 32, on Nov. 30, 1984, because Connolly had warned them that McIntyre was cooperating against them in their unsuccessful effort to ship guns to the Irish Republican Army.

Flemmi, who is serving a life sentence for 10 murders, also has testified that he and Bulger gave money or gifts to FBI agents, including Ring. He said that they gave Ring an expensive meerschaum pipe and alleged that Ring telephoned him at his mother's house in 1980 to warn him that an associate's telephone was tapped.

Ring, who joined the FBI's Boston office in 1983, testified yesterday that he never warned Flemmi of the wiretap and had never called Flemmi's mother's house. He also said he had never received any gifts from Bulger and Flemmi. Ring acknowledged that he has two meerschaum pipes -- one given to him by his ex-wife's grandfather in 1960, and another, cheaper version he bought for $10.

As for the Bulger dinner, US District Judge Reginald C. Lindsay asked Ring whether he thought it inappropriate to share dinner with informants.

``I didn't think it was inappropriate at the time," said Ring, who said there was ``a certain amount of bonding with informants" and ``many good reasons" to sit and share a meal with them.

Ring is expected to retake the stand today.

Hunt For Bulger Lands In Chicago (BOS)

By Shelley Murphy, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, June 28, 2006

The hunt for fugitive gangster James ``Whitey" Bulger has led to Chicago, where investigators from Boston delivered subpoenas to two labor union officials last week and seized a Palm Pilot from one of them, lawyers involved in the investigation said.

The PDA was taken Thursday during a search of the union office of Charles Dunn, a business representative for Chicago's Local 134 of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, said Chicago attorney Patrick Deady, a partner in the law firm Hogan Marren, which represents the union.

The Bulger Task Force is seeking to question Dunn and Michael Caddigan, the office manager of Local 134, as part of its investigation, Deady said.

``We're unaware of any contact between these two guys and Whitey Bulger," said Deady, adding that authorities told the union the FBI was following up on a lead in its hunt for Bulger. He was unaware what that lead was.

Robert Krekorian, chief of staff for US Attorney Michael J. Sullivan, said last night that he could ``not confirm or deny any specific investigative activity."

The search for Bulger, 76, has led investigators to Chicago in the past. Bulger's former associate, Kevin J. Weeks, has told investigators that he delivered phony identification to Bulger in Chicago in August 1996.

DOJ_NMG_0036977

A statement released by Hogan Marren last night said the union ``is not a target of any federal investigation" and had cooperated with federal agents who came to the Union Hall to discuss ``an ongoing investigation of a case in Boston totally unrelated to IBEW, Local 134."

Neither Caddigan nor Dunn could be reached for comment last night.

Bulger, who fled Boston just before his January 1995 federal racketeering indictment, is one of the FBI's 10 Most Wanted. After he fled, he was outed as a longtime FBI informant and charged in a new indictment with 19 murders.

His former handler, retired FBI agent John J. Connolly Jr., was convicted in 2002 of racketeering for protecting Bulger and warning him to flee in advance of his indictment. Connolly is serving 10 years in prison.

Jury In Aryan Brotherhood Trial In U.S. Must Decide Whether To Believe Killers (FINDLAW/AP)

By Gillian Flaccus, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 28, 2006

(AP) - SANTA ANA, California-Convicted murderers, gang members and jailhouse informants have paraded past jurors for nearly four months in the U.S. federal government's racketeering case against the notorious Aryan Brotherhood prison gang.

Now, with the trial about to enter its final weeks, the jury will soon have to decide who to believe: the government, whose case rests on the testimony of admitted killers, or attorneys for the white supremacists accused of plotting and ordering many of those murders from behind bars.

Even the defense team, which has chided the U.S. Attorney's Office for its reliance on jailhouse snitches, plans to present testimony this week from a rival gang member and other inmates in a trial peppered with tales of violence and racial strife.

Attorneys on both sides are "using and choosing from the best of the worst," said Melissa Carr, an Anti-Defamation League special projects investigator monitoring the trial.

"There were a couple instances where I caught jurors rolling their eyes and looking around for confirmation, like 'Did I just hear that? Did he say what I thought he said?'"

The trial is set to resume Tuesday after a break of nearly three weeks. Closing arguments are expected early next month.

The four defendants are alleged Aryan Brotherhood leaders implicated in many of the 32 murders and attempted murders detailed in the federal indictment against the white supremacist gang.

Of the 40 men initially charged, as many as 16 could face the death penalty in a series of trials that together make up one of the biggest federal death penalty cases in U.S. history.

On trial in Santa Ana are Barry "The Baron" Mills, Tyler "The Hulk" Bingham, Edgar "The Snail" Hevle and Christopher Overton Gibson. Among other things, Mills and Bingham are accused of ordering a 1997 race war at a prison in Lewisburg, Pennsylvania, that led to the deaths of two black inmates.

From the beginning, the testimony has been disturbing.

Jurors have heard graphic descriptions of dozens of murders and attempted murders, including one in which the attacker licked the dead man's blood from his hands while laughing hysterically.

Nearly all of the witnesses have been former members of the Aryan Brotherhood. In their testimony, they described schemes to transmit messages in invisible ink made from urine and the use of "runners" - usually inmates' female friends - who hid knives and drugs in their rectums or genitals when they visited.

The government's first witness, Clifford Smith, took the stand wearing an eye patch and casually admitted killing 21 people, including a man whom he said he stabbed 37 times for calling him a "punk" in front of his daughter.

Smith also admitted - under vigorous cross-examination by the defense - that he had perjured himself while testifying for the government in a death penalty case involving the Hells Angels.

"I would stick with the script that we had wrote and try to sell whatever we was trying to sell," Smith said. "You caught me - what can I do?"

Trial-watchers said the government had little choice about using the witnesses but wonder if the jury will buy their testimony. The U.S. Attorney's Office declined to comment.

DOJ_NMG_0036978

Defense lawyers have portrayed their clients as aging inmates who were forced to join a gang to survive. The men arrive in court each day wearing tortoise-shell eyeglasses and shirts with button-down collars. All have graying handlebar mustaches.

Charges Call Doctor A Fraud With Patients, Immigrants (FREEP)

By Naomi R. Patton, Free Press Staff Writer

Detroit Free Press, June 28, 2006

A Dearborn-based physician was indicted Friday in federal court on 39 counts of fraud in health care and immigration.

The indictment accuses Dr. Ali S. Makki, 46, of boosting his reimbursement payments by billing Medicare for:

Seeing patients when he was not in his Greenfield Road office and for office visits that never occurred.

Reporting services, tests and procedures that were not performed.

Ordering tests and procedures that were medically unnecessary.

Selling prescriptions for painkillers to people he did not regularly see as patients.

Harold Gurewitz, Makki's attorney, waived a reading of the indictment, preventing testimony from a government witness.

U.S. Magistrate Mona Majzoub entered a plea of not guilty.

According to the indictment, Makki ordered dozens of unnecessary diagnostic tests for new Medicare patients, including blood tests, x-rays and echocardiograms.

He falsely certified giving medical examinations and vaccinations, such as tuberculosis skin tests, the indictment says.

Between May 2003 and July 2004, the indictment says, Makki charged more than 500 patients $150 each in cash -- a total of more than $76,000 -- to complete medical forms for green card applications.

The indictment says Makki also charged immigrants $300-$400 for a separate INS form, saying a "mental or medical condition" prevented the applicants from taking and passing both English and civics tests required for U.S. citizenship.

If convicted, Makki would be forced to forfeit at least $75,980 seized from his home in July 2004. He could lose his medical license. He would also face a maximum 10-year prison sentence and a $250,000 fine.

Makki is in the Wayne County Jail pending a detention-bond hearing scheduled for Monday afternoon. He was arrested Friday afternoon at Detroit Metro Airport, returning from an extended trip to Lebanon.

Assistant U.S. Attorney James Mitzelfeld requested that Makki be detained as a potential flight risk.

Gurewitz said he didn't see the basis for detaining Makki.

"He obviously has substantial ties to the community," Gurewitz said.

Majzoub said she agreed, but added a detention hearing was necessary.

Dearborn Physician Held On Fraud Charges (DEN)

Detroit News, June 28, 2006

U.S. attorney's 40-page indictment alleges doctor billed Medicare for tests he never gave to patients.

DETROIT -- Federal officials arrested a Dearborn physician on health care fraud charges Friday.

An indictment alleges the doctor billed for office visits while away on a Caribbean cruise and other vacations and certified 512 immigrant patients as tuberculosis-free when he had not given them the skin tests for which he billed Medicare.

Dr. Ali Makki, 46, is accused of defrauding the federal government of more than $500,000. If convicted, he faces loss of his medical license and up to 10 years in prison on each fraud count.

Makki also provided two immigrants who tested positive for syphilis with "negative" test results, because he signed the paperwork before the test results were available, the U.S. attorney's office alleges in a 40-count indictment unsealed Friday.

Agents arrested Makki at Detroit Metropolitan Airport when he returned on a flight from Lebanon by way of Paris.

Makki pleaded not guilty at his arraignment in U.S. District Court late Friday afternoon and was ordered held until Monday for a detention hearing.

The indictment also alleges Makki billed Medicare for complicated medical procedures he did not perform. He also was said to have ordered and billed for thousands of unnecessary medical tests, and dispensed controlled drugs without a legitimate medical purpose.

One patient paid $55 to $60 cash for each of his 246 visits to Makki during a 19-month period to get the painkiller Vicodin, the indictment alleges.

You can reach Paul Egan at (313) 222-2069 or pegan@detnews.com.

"Railroad Killer" Executed In Texas Death (AP)

By Michael Graczyk, ASSOCIATED PRESS WRITER

AP, June 28, 2006

HUNTSVILLE, Texas -- The last ride for infamous train-hopping serial killer Angel Maturino Resendiz was in a Texas prison van, from death row to the death house.

Resendiz, 46, received lethal injection Tuesday evening for the fatal stabbing and beating of a Houston-area physician 7 1/2 years ago. He had roamed the country by jumping aboard freight trains and was linked to at least 15 indiscriminate murders near railroad tracks around the nation, earning him the nickname the "Railroad Killer" and a spot on the FBI's Most Wanted list.

The Mexican drifter, speaking from the death chamber gurney, asked for forgiveness from God and from relatives of some of his victims watching through a glass a few feet away. He then was executed for the slaying of Claudia Benton, 39, at her West University Place home during a deadly spree in 1998 and 1999.

"You did not deserve this," he said, looking at them, his feet nervously tapping under a white sheet. "I deserve what I am getting."

Seven minutes later, he was pronounced dead.

Benton's husband, George, was among those watching him die.

"It was very hollow," Benton said of Resendiz's final comments. "He never experienced any sense of remorse or sense of guilt in the past. He was very manipulative. He was a very smart man, he knew how to manipulate society. He knew how to manipulate our system, so I found it very shallow."

The punishment, the 13th this year in the nation's busiest death penalty state, was delayed for two hours while multiple appeals were considered by the U.S. Supreme Court.

Benton was stabbed with a kitchen knife, beaten 19 times with a 2-foot-tall bronze statue and raped in her home eight days before Christmas in 1998 in the Houston enclave, just down the street from a railroad track.

Her death was among eight in Texas linked to Resendiz. Two more were tied to him in both Illinois and Florida, and one each in Kentucky, California and Georgia.

At midday Tuesday, Resendiz, handcuffed and shackled, was put aboard a van at death row at a prison near Livingston and transferred to the death chamber at the Texas Department of Criminal Justice Huntsville Unit, about 45 miles to the west.

"He was very polite and listened silently as the warden talked," prison spokesman Michelle Lyons said of Resendiz's arrival in Huntsville. "He wanted to make phone calls to some of his family."

Appeals that delayed the punishment focused on his competency, the constitutionality of the lethal injection procedure and a lower court's ruling that barred additional appeals because an earlier court-appointed lawyer missed legal deadlines for appeals. Another appeal claimed the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights, a Washington-based international group that investigates human rights violations, should have had time to review Resendiz's case. The Mexican government filed an appeal of a lower court ruling that said Mexico could not be party to the Resendiz case.

Resendiz's lead appeals lawyer, Jack Zimmermann, of Houston, argued Resendiz believed he was half-man and half-angel and told psychiatrists he couldn't be executed because he didn't believe he could die. Federal courts have ruled inmates are ineligible for execution if they don't understand they will be put to death, when they are being put to death and why they are being put to death.

"I thought the evidence was overwhelming in our favor," Zimmermann said.

Late Tuesday afternoon, several people from the Mexican consulate in Houston were in Huntsville but did not see Resendiz. Capital punishment is not allowed in Mexico.

"The execution was carried out despite the existence of medical evidence of severe mental problems that, in principle, should have excluded the application of this penalty," Mexico's Foreign Relations Department said in a statement.

DOJ_NMG_0036980

George Benton said Mexican citizens "who have come to pursue a better life through hard work and sacrifice should be ashamed and embarrassed of the Mexican government's financial support for the death penalty appeals of this killer."

"And I would be every bit as ashamed in my government if they were supporting a U.S. citizen who had gone into Mexico and killed random Mexican citizens without cause," Benton added.

The Border Patrol picked up Resendiz for illegal entry in June 1999 near El Paso and released him back into Mexico, saying they were unaware Resendiz - who used some 30 aliases - was on the FBI's Most Wanted list. He committed four slayings after his release.

Resendiz's killings began with a murder in San Antonio in 1986. Benton was among 13 people killed over a 16-month period that ended in June 1999 with a double slaying in Illinois.

A month later, Resendiz walked across the international bridge at El Paso and surrendered to a Texas Ranger as part of a deal arranged by his sister in New Mexico.

The sister, Manuela Karkiewicz, was among six people Resendiz selected to watch him die.

Resendiz initially was tied to more than one slaying through DNA matches from the Benton killing and the slayings 4 1/2 months later of Weimar church pastor Norman "Skip" Sirnic, and his wife, Karen.

The couple was fatally beaten May 2, 1999, with a sledgehammer as they slept in their house adjacent to their church and across the street from a railroad track that runs through the heart of their small town about 100 miles west of Houston. Like Benton, Karen Sirnic was raped.

In an interview with The Associated Press shortly after arriving on death row in 2000, Resendiz said he remembered each of his attacks and compared them to watching something through a tunnel.

"Everything you see is in a distance," he said. "Everything is slow and silent."

He said some murders were in response to the deaths of the Branch Davidians in Waco, others on Serbian atrocities. Others he blamed on his anti-abortion beliefs or because he believed the victims may have been homosexual.

Texas Executes The 'Railway Killer' (NYT)

By Steve Barnes

The New York Times, June 28, 2006

Ángel Maturino Resendiz, a Mexican known as the railway killer who was convicted of one murder and linked by the authorities to at least 12 others, was executed last night by injection at the Huntsville, Tex., prison. Repeated appeals to state and federal courts ended when the United States Supreme Court declined to intervene, and a protest by the Mexican government was unavailing.

A jury sentenced Mr. Resendiz, 46, to death for the rape and murder in 1998 of Dr. Claudia Benton, a medical researcher, at her house in Houston. Investigators said forensic evidence and, in some cases, Mr. Resendiz's statements implicated him in two years of killings in California, Florida, Georgia, Illinois, Kentucky and Texas that ended in 1999, when his half-sister helped arrange his surrender.

Catching Mr. Resendiz was made more difficult, detectives said, by his 30 aliases and a nomadic style of life, in which he hopped freight trains. Many of his suspected victims were found near rail lines and buildings.

Defense lawyers insisted that Mr. Resendiz was a paranoid schizophrenic, unable before or after Dr. Benton's murder to know right from wrong. A succession of judges found that Mr. Resendiz met the Supreme Court standard of sanity. He was pronounced dead at 9:05 Eastern time. "Lord forgive me," Mr. Resendiz said on the gurney in the death chamber. Turning to his victims' relatives in the observation room, he said, "I deserve what I am getting."

One appeal had argued that the drugs used in his execution could produce a silent but agonizing death in defiance of the prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment.

Tennessee Holds 1st Execution In 45 Years (AP)

By Rose French, Associated Press

AP, June 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0036981

NASHVILLE, Tenn. -- The state carried out only its second execution in 45 years early Wednesday after a federal appeals court panel lifted a stay of execution granted by one of its own judges.

Sedley Alley's execution had been scheduled to take place within hours of another, but a federal judge issued a stay late Tuesday afternoon for the other condemned man.

Alley, 50, was pronounced dead at 3:12 a.m. EDT Wednesday. He had confessed to killing 19-year-old Marine Suzanne Collins in 1985 while she jogged near a Navy base north of Memphis.

Alley claimed at trial that he was not responsible for the murder because he had multiple personalities. But in 2004, he recanted his confession, argued he was innocent and said DNA testing could prove it.

Judge Gilbert S. Merritt on the 6th Circuit Court of Appeals had issued a stay for Alley after a last-minute appeal was delivered to his home in Nashville.

But his colleagues on the appeals court -- Chief Judge Danny J. Boggs and Judge James L. Ryan -- overruled the order. A third judge on the panel was unavailable to participate in the decision.

The judges suggested it was improper for a single judge to "take under consideration a matter for which the district courts and the court of appeals are competent to consider."

Gov. Phil Bredesen and the U.S. Supreme Court had already rejected all requests for a stay Tuesday.

Alley's stay came only hours after federal Judge Todd Campbell halted the scheduled execution of another inmate, Paul Dennis Reid.

Campbell's stay was to give time to determine whether Reid was mentally competent to drop his appeals of seven death sentences tied to a string of 1997 murders in the Clarksville area.

Tennessee Attorney General Paul Summers appealed both stays.

Alley was scheduled to die May 17, but got a reprieve to seek court permission for the DNA testing. His defense team, led by Barry Scheck of the nonprofit legal clinic Innocence Project, failed to persuade the state courts to release crime-scene evidence for testing.

Reid, 48, a former Texas drifter with music ambitions, was convicted of murdering seven people at three Tennessee restaurants in 1997 after he was fired from his job as a dishwasher. He came within hours of execution in 2003 before he was talked into resuming his appeals and got a stay.

Reid and Alley have been on death watch since the weekend at Riverbend Maximum Security Institution in Nashville.

The last Tennessee inmate executed was a convicted child rapist and murderer put to death in 2000. Before that, the last execution was by electric chair in 1960.

Tennessee has 103 inmates on death row.

Only four states -- Arkansas, Illinois, South Carolina and Texas -- have conducted double executions since the death penalty was reinstated in 1976, according to the Death Penalty Information Center in Washington.

Associated Press writers Kristin M. Hall and Lucas L. Johnson II in Nashville contributed to this report.

US Justice Department Asked To Submit Brief In Oklahoma Case (AP)

AP, June 28, 2006

OKLAHOMA CITY (AP) _ The US Supreme Court is asking the Justice Department to file a brief in an appeal filed by an Oklahoma death row inmate.

Attorneys for Patrick Murphy are asking for a new trial on the grounds that Murphy and the victim are Indians, the crime took place on tribal land and the case should've been prosecuted in federal court instead of state court.

Murphy was convicted and sentenced to die for killing George Jacobs in 1999 in McIntosh County.

A state appeals court has rejected Murphy's appeal and now the Supreme Court is asking the US solicitor general for an opinion on whether a new trial is deserved.

Federal Judge Orders Missouri To Stop All Executions (LAT)

By Henry Weinstein

The Los Angeles Times, June 28, 2006

A federal judge in Missouri has ordered a halt to all executions carried out by that state until it changes its lethal-injection procedures.

The current system, U.S. District Judge Fernando J. Gaitan Jr. said in a Monday ruling, creates an unnecessary risk that an inmate could be subjected to "unconstitutional pain and suffering when the lethal-injection drugs are administered." He gave corrections officials until July 15 to come up with new procedures.

In a related development, a federal judge in Little Rock, Ark., on Monday stayed an execution on grounds that if the condemned inmate "remains or becomes conscious during the execution, he will suffer intense pain that will never be rectified." Judge Susan Webber Wright postponed the execution until there could be a full hearing on the issue, which could be months away.

The U.S. Supreme Court in May ruled that inmates could challenge lethal-injection procedures. The two rulings this week, said Fordham University law professor Deborah W. Denno, show that "courts are taking this seriously, and there will be more challenges."

In recent years, lethal injection has become the dominant mode of execution in the U.S. The 38 states that have capital punishment laws, including California, use a three-stage procedure that masks pain during an execution, rather than preventing it.

The first drug administered, the sedative sodium thiopental, is meant to deaden pain; the second, pancuronium bromide, is a paralytic that immobilizes the prisoner; the third agent, potassium chloride, stops the heart.

Sedative dosages at times have been inadequate to anesthetize inmates, according to testimony in cases asserting that lethal-injection procedures violate the 8th Amendment prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment.

U.S. District Judge Jeremy Fogel in San Jose has scheduled a two-day hearing in September to review California's procedure. Earlier this year, Fogel raised questions about the lethal-injection protocol, which prompted the state in February to call off the execution of Michael A. Morales.

In Missouri, the challenge was raised by Michael Taylor, who was sentenced to death for the 1989 murder of a 15-year-old girl. Missouri has executed 66 people by lethal injection, the fourth highest total in the nation.

Gaitan said he was particularly troubled that the doctor — identified only as John Doe 1 — who mixes the three-drug cocktail used in Missouri executions is dyslexic and admitted during a hearing that he has difficulty reading numbers.

"The court … is gravely concerned that a physician who is solely responsible for directly mixing the drugs which will be responsible for humanely ending the life of condemned inmates has a condition which causes him confusion with regard to numbers," Gaitan wrote in his 15-page ruling.

In addition, Gaitan said, Missouri does not have a formal written protocol for how lethal injections are to be administered. John Doe 1, in a recent deposition, said that he had administered only 2.5 grams of the sodium thiopental, rather than the normal 5 grams, in several executions.

Dr. Mark Heath, an assistant professor of clinical anesthesiology at Columbia University in New York who has testified in numerous lethal-injection challenges, testified that he believed Missouri was the only state without a written protocol.

Gaitan said he wanted the Missouri Department of Corrections to require that a board-certified anesthesiologist mix the drugs; institute better monitoring so that adequate anesthetic is given to the inmate; and formulate a contingency plan in the event a problem develops during the execution.

John Fougere, a spokesman for Missouri Atty. Gen. Jay Nixon, said his office would work with corrections officials to comply with Gaitan's order.

"We want to make sure execution in Missouri is predictable, humane and efficient," Fougere said.

Research Center Created To Study Evolving Threats Of Identity Fraud (WSJ)

By Christopher Conkey

The Wall Street Journal, June 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0036983

WASHINGTON -- A group of government agencies, corporations and universities are launching a research center dedicated to studying the evolving threat of identity fraud.

The Secret Service and Federal Bureau of Investigation today will join with International Business Machines Corp. and information-services firm LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Group PLC, to announce the Center for Identity Management and Information Protection, or CIMIP, at Utica College in New York. The center, initially funded with a combination of grants and corporate donations totaling about $500,000, aims to integrate various public and private efforts to study the national-security implications and other threats posed by identity fraud.

"We looked around and said, 'Who's taking a leadership role in pulling together the various stakeholders?' " said Norm Willox, chief executive of special services at LexisNexis, the company's unit that provides risk-management tools to government agencies. "There was a void."

CIMIP will be led by Gary Gordon, a professor of economic crime management at Utica College, who has long ties to federal agencies like the Secret Service, which investigates financial crimes. Brian Nagel, deputy director of the Secret Service, said the agency's criminal division will share its case files with CIMIP so it can identify criminal patterns, something that is hard for agents immersed in individual cases to do.

Identity fraud is a broad term referring to the illegal use of another's personal data, from common "transactional" crimes involving credit and debit cards to more pernicious activities such as opening new accounts and taking over existing ones. Recent data security breaches at the Department of Veterans Affairs and other agencies have heightened concerns, and Congress is weighing proposals to combat identity crimes. Studies have shown that identity fraud costs businesses $50 billion annually and that roughly 4% of the adult population is affected each year.

Aside from causing personal harm to victims and added costs to businesses, identity fraud can also make it harder for the government to track or stop potential terrorists. "They can hide in plain sight," said Mr. Willox of LexisNexis. "It's a big problem for us."

Identity theft has "potentially disastrous effects on U.S. national security," said James H. Burrus, acting assistant director of the FBI's criminal investigative division in a statement. "The FBI looks forward to the opportunity to apply CIMIP research to more effective law enforcement and protection against threats to national security."

Judge Won't Release Hoffa Search Affidavit (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, June 28, 2006

(AP) - DETROIT-A U.S. district judge refused to order the release of an affidavit the FBI used to get a search warrant to dig for Jimmy Hoffa's remains at a southeastern Michigan horse farm.

"Granting public access to sensitive information in a sealed affidavit would not play a significant, positive role in the investigation," Judge Marianne Battani wrote Monday in response to a request by the Detroit Free Press to release the document.

Battani said the affidavit included "the details of a threat made to a witness" and other information that should not become public.

The FBI spent two weeks last month searching the Hidden Dreams Farm, 30 miles northwest of Detroit in Oakland County's Milford Township. Officials said they found no evidence of Hoffa's remains.

The former Teamsters union president was last seen July 30, 1975, the day he was supposed to meet a New Jersey Teamsters boss and a Detroit Mafia captain at a restaurant about 20 miles from the farm. Both of those men are now dead.

The newspaper had argued that the estimated $250,000 cost of the search gave the public an interest in the contents of the affidavit.

"Judge Battani didn't engage in a critical analysis of the government's claims," said Free Press lawyer Herschel Fink. He said editors would decide whether to appeal.

Jury Finds Serial Killer Guilty Of 4 Murders (LAT)

By Maeve Reston

The Los Angeles Times, June 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0036984

Serial killer Wayne Adam Ford was found guilty of four counts of first-degree murder today, making the former long-haul trucker eligible for the death penalty for the grisly slayings of four women across California.

A San Bernardino County jury delivered the verdict in the afternoon after deliberating for just over a week.

Ford, 44, walked into a Humboldt County sheriff's station in November 1998 with a woman's severed breast in a plastic bag in his pocket, and confessed to the sayings.

The Arcata trucker claimed the deaths were accidental, and had occurred during rough sex play. However, San Bernardino County Deputy Dist. Atty. J. David Mazurek told jurors that Ford preyed on young women to "satisfy his sexually sadistic appetite", and "got off" on their suffering when he tortured them.

Between 1997 and 1998, Ford allegedly picked up the women — prostitutes or hitchhikers — and bound, strangled, raped and, at times, beat them before dumping their bodies in waterways, Mazurek said.

The victims were found in Humboldt, Kern, San Joaquin and San Bernardino counties. Some of the bodies were dismembered.

Ford's attorney, Deputy Public Defender Joseph D. Canty, tried to convince the jury to find Ford guilty of a lesser charge — second-degree murder or manslaughter — that would have spared him from California's death row.

Canty said Ford realized that "something was wrong with him," and showed he was remorseful when he turned himself in. Canty argued that Ford, a retired U.S. Marine, was mired in depression, angry at his former wife — who he claimed was preventing him from seeing his young son — and struggling with other psychological problems, including borderline personality disorder.

The body of Ford's first victim was so mutilated that she has not been identified, and is known as Humboldt County Jane Doe. Ford is also charged in the deaths of prostitutes Patricia Ann Tamez, 29, of Hesperia; Tina Renee Gibbs, 26, of Las Vegas; and Lanett Deyon White, 25, of Fontana.

The cases were consolidated, and the San Bernardino County district attorney's office is prosecuting Ford for all the slayings. Ford's sentencing hearing is pending.

Reasonable Doubt At Duke (WP)

By Ruth Marcus

The Washington Post, June 28, 2006

At the start, I presumed they were guilty. The rape charges against three members of the Duke lacrosse team sounded like a plausible case of Jocks Gone Wild. It wasn't hard to imagine that a bunch of rowdy, hard-drinking players could have crossed the line from watching a paid dancer to sexually assaulting her.

After all, these were students who had plunked down $800 for a pair of strippers and were angry that their cash had bought only a few minutes of bare flesh. The show was called off when one player asked about sex toys and "said he would use the broomstick on us," according to the second dancer.

As the two women drove off, a neighbor reported hearing one of the partygoers yell a racial insult at the African American dancers: "Hey . . . thank your grandpa for my nice cotton shirt." Later that night, another teammate wrote a disgusting e-mail about plans to kill and skin "some strippers." One of the accused, Collin Finnerty, is to stand trial here next month in an incident in which he and two high school lacrosse buddies allegedly taunted a man, saying he was gay, and then beat him.

These don't sound like young men you'd want your daughter to date.

But the more evidence that has emerged in the case, the more it appears that there is way more than reasonable doubt that the three accused committed rape.

The paucity of physical evidence; the accuser's prior unsubstantiated rape charge; her changing stories that night; sloppy and unreliable identification procedures -- any of these alone, and certainly all of them together, make it hard to understand why the prosecution is going forward and impossible to imagine that it could win a conviction.

True, much of the evidence that's emerged so far has been selectively released by defense lawyers. But after a review of court filings and other material, here's what makes me doubtful:

DOJ_NMG_0036985

? There's almost no physical evidence. Two rounds of DNA testing failed to produce any evidence of semen from Duke players -- as might have been expected, given the accusation that the woman was orally, vaginally and anally penetrated, along with being choked, beaten and kicked. (DNA from one of the students, David Evans, may match material taken from the accuser's fake fingernail.) Indeed, although the prosecutor claimed the medical report found injuries consistent with sexual assault, the nurse-in-training who examined the woman found only swelling of the vaginal walls -- something that might be explained by the fact that the woman reported using a vibrator as she performed for a couple hours earlier.

? The second dancer told police that the rape charges were a "crock" and that she and the accuser had been apart for only five minutes at the party.

? The accuser made an earlier, seemingly unsubstantiated allegation of being the victim of a gang rape. She said she was attacked by three men in 1993, when she was 14, but didn't file a police report until three years later. The matter was dropped after she failed to provide a statement to the investigating officer.

? She gave six different accounts of what happened the night of the incident: She did not originally mention rape to the police when they found her in a car outside a grocery store; raised the rape allegation after being taken to a substance abuse facility; later said that "no one forced her to have sex"; and gave accounts of the alleged incident that differed in various ways, including the number of attackers and the type of assault.

? It's true, and totally understandable, that rape victims often provide inconsistent accounts. But even if a sexual assault did occur in this case, there's ample reason to question whether the right students were charged. The accuser said her attackers were named "Bret, Adam and Matt"; the indicted students are Reade, Collin and David.

Reade Seligmann's lawyer has presented evidence that during the post-midnight time frame in which the attack allegedly occurred, Seligmann called his girlfriend six times and another person twice (12:05 to 12:14); was picked up by a cab (12:19); used an ATM (12:24) and returned to his dorm (12:45). The lawyer tried to present this evidence to the prosecutor before the indictment but was rebuffed.

? In contravention of accepted practice, the photographs shown to the accuser included only members of the lacrosse team, no similar-looking "fillers." According to papers filed by David Evans's lawyer, the accuser failed to identify him in a photo lineup eight days after the party. In another test, three weeks after the incident, she selected his photo, telling investigators, "He looks like one of the guys who assaulted me, sort of." She said that she was "about 90 percent" certain but that the attacker had a mustache; Evans's lawyer says he's never had a mustache.

Perhaps there are facts yet to emerge to support Durham County District Attorney Mike Nifong's continuing certitude that a rape occurred -- though the confluence of Nifong's political interests and the prosecution is itself another reason for discomfort. He brought the first charges just before a primary in which the black vote played a key role.

In an odd way, I hope Nifong's proved right, because the alternative -- that he began with a dubious case and stuck with it as it became shakier -- is so troubling. As it stands now, the case isn't expected to go to trial until spring 2007. That seems like an awfully long time to wait to find out.

Coast Guard Cadet To Ask For Leniency (AP)

By Matt Apuzzo

AP, June 28, 2006

NEW LONDON, Conn. -- A Coast Guard Academy cadet was acquitted of rape charges but convicted on other sex-related charges in the institution's first-ever court-martial of a student.

Webster M. Smith was expected to ask the military jury for leniency at a sentencing hearing scheduled Wednesday.

Jurors on Tuesday deliberated eight hours before finding Smith, 23, of Houston, guilty of indecent assault, extortion, sodomy, failure to obey an order and absent without leave.

Smith, the first student in the school's 130-year history to be court-martialed, was stoic as the verdict was read, but wept afterward with his parents and lawyers by his side.

"This is an extraordinarily emotional time for him right now," said his attorney, Merle Smith, who is not related to the cadet. "There's so much emotion right now, both relief and also disappointment."

DOJ_NMG_0036986

Smith faces up to 13 1/2 years in prison, but his attorney said he would argue for little or no jail time.

Prosecutors, who declined to comment after the verdict, said Smith was a predator who took advantage of women when they were vulnerable.

The allegations were brought by four female cadets. The jury acquitted him of sexual misconduct charges involving three of the female cadets.

The rape case involved Smith's on-again, off-again girlfriend, who said she drank two bottles of wine at a party in Annapolis, Md., last summer and can't remember anything. She said she learned the next morning that they had had sex.

Smith testified Monday that the sex was consensual. He said the woman had been drinking but wasn't drunk when they had sex in his car outside a bar. Prosecutors say the sex happened much later that night, when she was passed out.

The indecent assault, extortion and sodomy charges stemmed from allegations by one of the other women.

That woman described a night in which she and Smith had a series of sexual encounters in her dorm room. The woman said she never protested because she was relying on Smith to keep a secret involving a crime that could have jeopardized her career.

Prosecutors said Smith held that secret over her, extorting her for sexual favors.

Smith said he never mentioned the secret and that the two had consensual oral sex.

Smith was not allowed to graduate with his class this spring and almost certainly will be kicked out of school and the Coast Guard.

CIVIL LAW:

State To Pay $8.3 Million To Settle Technology Fraud Claims (AP)

AP, June 28, 2006

INDIANAPOLIS - The state has agreed to pay nearly $8.3 million to settle allegations that an agency violated federal rules by not seeking competitive bids on Internet services and charging inflated prices.

The U.S. Department of Justice and the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Southern District of Indiana announced the settlement in a news release Tuesday.

The settlement covers allegations that the Intelenet Commission, which has been disbanded, failed false claims to the Federal Communications Commission's E-rate program, which provided money for Internet technology in schools and libraries.

The federal government claimed the state charged inflated prices for services provided to Indiana schools and libraries, falsified invoices, disregarded the requirement that schools and libraries make co-payments for expenses and failed to seek competitive bids.

The state cooperated with the investigation, the Justice Department said.

"The E-Rate Program makes federally mandated funds available to the poorest schools in the nation for Internet access and wiring," Peter D. Keisler, Assistant Attorney General for the Civil Division, said in the release. "False claims to this very important federal program will not be tolerated."

The Intelenet Commission has since been replaced by a new Office of Technology created by Gov. Mitch Daniels.

U.S. Asks Judge To Dismiss Budget Lawsuit (AP)

By KEN THOMAS, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 28, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) - The Justice Department on Tuesday asked a federal judge to dismiss a lawsuit filed by House Democrats trying to stop a $39 billion deficit-reducing bill because the House and Senate failed to approve identical versions.

Lawyers for the government said the 11 House members lacked standing because they are not renters of medical equipment covered by the section of the bill or are in "any way personally affected or injured" by other provisions in the measure.

House Democrats have accused GOP leaders of abusing the legislative process and contend they were denied their right to vote on legislation signed into law by President Bush.

DOJ_NMG_0036987

Rep. John Conyers, D-Mich., the ranking member of the House Judiciary Committee and lead plaintiff, called the government's response "legally tenuous."

"In terms of standing, there is no more fundamental right in Congress than the right to vote, yet the administration would not only take this right away, but prevent duly elected members from asserting that right after it is taken away," he said.

The Senate version of the bill said Medicare can pay to rent some types of medical equipment for 13 months, as congressional negotiators had sought. A clerk erroneously wrote down 36 months before the bill was sent back to the House for a final vote, and the language was approved by the House on Feb. 1.

When the bill was sent to Bush for his signature, the number was back to 13 months as approved by the Senate.

The White House and Republican leaders in Congress have said the matter is settled because the mistake was technical and top House and Senate leaders certified the bill before transmitting it to the White House.

Conyers and 10 Democrats sued in late April in U.S. District Court in Detroit, asking a judge to declare that the act is not law and provide a temporary restraining order to bar its implementation.

Similar lawsuits have been filed in other states by an Alabama attorney and a Florida-based student loan consulting firm.

Brian Kennedy, a Justice Department attorney, wrote in the motion to U.S. District Judge Nancy Edmunds that the discrepancy would not have made a difference to the lawmakers' votes.

"They were opposed to the bill in either event," he wrote.

AT&T To Settle Fraud Case For $2.9M (BLOOM)

By Robert Schmidt, BLOOMBERG NEWS

Bloomberg, June 28, 2006

A unit of AT&T, the largest U.S. phone company, agreed to pay $2.9 million to resolve allegations that it defrauded the federal government.

The civil suit against AT&T Communications East, brought by a whistleblower and joined by the government, said the company defrauded the General Services Administration from 1998 to 2001 by passing on to government customers certain costs and fees in violation of its contract.

The U.S. Justice Department announced the settlement Tuesday in Washington.

The charges, known as Presubscribed Interexchange Carrier Charges, are a fee that long-distance companies pay to local phone companies to recover part of the cost for linking customers to the telephone network.

A spokesman for San Antonio-based AT&T didn't immediately return a call seeking comment.

Charities Tied To Doctors Get Drug Industry Gifts (NYT)

By Reed Abelson

The New York Times, June 28, 2006

As she presented research results indicating that a new medical device was "an important breakthrough," the doctor's enthusiasm was clear. Less evident were some of the financial links between the researchers and the device's maker.

Dr. Maria Rosa Costanzo, making her presentation at a March conference of cardiologists, said the study found that a $14,000 blood filtering device was better than intravenous diuretic drugs at removing excess fluid from patients with heart failure.

Although outside researchers raised questions about the study's conclusions, the doctor betrayed little doubt. "We believe these results challenge current medical practice and recommendations," said Dr. Costanzo, who predicted many patients might benefit.

Dr. Costanzo did disclose to the audience that she was a paid consultant with stock in the device's maker, a Minnesota company called CHF Solutions. But she omitted another potentially important detail: CHF Solutions was also one of the largest donors to the nonprofit research foundation that had overseen the study. The company contributed about $180,000 in 2004, according to the foundation's federal filings.

Nor did she note that the nonprofit entity, the Midwest Heart Foundation, was in turn an arm of the thriving for-profit medical group outside of Chicago where Dr. Costanzo and more than 50 of her fellow doctors treat heart patients — in many cases using products and drugs made by CHF Solutions and other big donors to their charity. Although the CHF Solutions device has generally been slow to catch on, physicians at Dr. Costanzo's medical group have treated many patients with the company's filtration system.

The Midwest Heart Foundation, and the way it has become quietly interwoven into its doctors' professional lives, is far from unique. Around the country, doctors in private practice have set up tax-exempt charities into which drug companies and medical device makers are, with little fanfare, pouring donations — money that adds up to millions of dollars a year. And some medical experts see that as a big problem.

The charities are typically set up to engage in medical research or education, and the doctors involved defend those efforts as legitimate charitable activities that benefit the public. But because they operate mainly under the radar, the tax-exempt organizations represent what some other doctors, as well as regulators and industry consultants, say is a growing conduit for industry money. The payments, they say, can bias the treatment decisions of physicians, may lead to suspect research findings and at times may even risk running afoul of anti-kickback laws.

Federal officials are starting to take notice of such tax-exempt charities, which critics say are becoming increasingly popular as other forms of industry support to physicians — like lucrative consulting agreements that involve little actual work — have come under scrutiny from regulators and others worried about the potential conflicts.

The potential for abuse by these charities is clear, critics say. "It obviously sets a fertile ground for conflict of interest and misuse of funds," said Dr. Robert M. Califf, vice chancellor for clinical research at Duke University Medical Center.

The charities at issue are not philanthropies like the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation that dispense grants for medical research but remain independent of any one group of doctors or medical practice. Instead, the charities drawing scrutiny are set up by doctors in private practice and are closely linked to those doctors' for-profit medical groups.

The Midwest Heart Foundation, which has received millions of dollars from medical industry donors, including the drug makers Amgen and AstraZeneca, and the Cordis and Scios units of Johnson & Johnson, says it stands behind its charitable work, which currently involves about 30 studies and dozens of doctor-education lectures each year.

Dr. Mark Goodwin, a managing partner for the Midwest Heart for-profit practice, said the foundation was created to help prevent potential conflicts by keeping the industry money separate from the doctors' private practice. Companies contribute to the foundation, he said, because they can rely on its research and the doctors involved can enroll large numbers of patients in studies. "We are able to deliver excellent research to our community in a timely fashion," Dr. Goodwin said, "and we are proud of it."

But some of its research has drawn criticism from federal regulators. Earlier this year, moreover, the foundation received a Justice Department subpoena as part of an investigation into the marketing activities of one of its big contributors, Scios.

Experts aware of the various doctor-run charities say that even if much of the donated money is spent on legitimate medical research or education, the funds can also go toward studies that while lending prestige to the doctors and luster to the companies, may do little to advance scientific understanding. The tax-exempt money also sometimes flows to the for-profit medical groups affiliated with the charities, sometimes covering business expenses or even paying parts of the salaries of doctors.

Too often, the critics contend, the industry donations amount to a form of "relationship funding" — to use one skeptical doctor's term — in which companies hope to sell more drugs and devices by currying favor with the doctors. That skeptic, Dr. John Cherf, is a knee surgeon at the Neurologic and Orthopedic Institute of Chicago who also consults for a market research firm specializing in health care topics. He says the donor arrangements are fraught with potential conflicts of interest and are likely to come under greater scrutiny as the costs of devices and drugs rise.

"There's undoubtedly corruption in the system," Dr. Cherf said. "We need healthy relationships between physicians and industry. Both parties have been too aggressive."

Number of Charities Is Unknown

No one knows precisely how many of these doctor-run charities exist. Although each one files with the federal government as a tax-exempt entity, they are hard to discern among other health-related charities. And because in many cases each has no more than a few hundred thousand dollars in annual revenue, they tend to escape the attention of the federal and state regulators who oversee charities.

DOJ_NMG_0036989

"The reality of it is that these are small organizations that are off the radar screen," said Douglas M. Mancino, a lawyer at McDermott Will & Emery in Los Angeles who specializes in health care law and nonprofit groups.

As long as the activities being financed benefit the public rather than the doctors or companies involved, they are legitimate charities, according to lawyers who specialize in nonprofits.

But concerns can arise when a corporate donation appears to be helping pay the salary of an additional doctor at a for-profit medical practice — through a fellowship, for example — that brings in additional revenue to the practice. Another problem area, they say, would be when donations go toward expenditures that would normally be part of the practice's business cost.

Lawyers say that determining whether a charity's activities are legitimate tax-exempt activities would typically require a close look at the facts in each case.

"If they're really underwriting normal business expenses to the group, then I think you have a problem," Mr. Mancino said.

As a group, these relatively obscure charities are attracting sizable amounts of corporate money. And many of their activities focus on the companies that have made the donations or the doctors' medical groups.

Consider the Arizona Orthopedic Education Foundation, which was created by a surgeon in Phoenix and which in 2003 received a $200,000 donation from a unit of the orthopedic device company Stryker. Most of the charity's efforts are devoted to public education, according to the founder, Dr. Anthony K. Hedley. But its activities also include teaching other doctors how to use Stryker products.

Stryker said this training was "critical" for surgeons.

Dr. Hedley says the fact that he mainly uses Stryker devices with his own patients may account for Stryker's contributions. "That was probably why I was able to leverage support," Dr. Hedley said.

Another charity is the Blue Ridge Bone and Joint Research Foundation, run by Dr. Joseph T. Moskal, an orthopedic surgeon in Roanoke, Va. It received a $75,000 contribution from the DePuy Orthopaedics unit of Johnson & Johnson in the year ended July 31, 2004, according to federal filings. The Blue Ridge foundation appears to have paid $30,000 of that money to the for-profit Roanoke Orthopaedic Center, where Dr. Moskal practices, to defray the costs of a fellowship program there.

Dr. Moskal did not return repeated phone calls seeking comment. DePuy, in a brief response to questions, said in part, "Fellowships are vital to advance the education and training of orthopaedic surgeons."

Corporate donors are also major contributors to the Vascular Specialists Education Foundation, which is led by a vascular surgeon in Norfolk, Va., Dr. Marc H. Glickman. The foundation spent $30,000 in 2003 to pay for the further medical education of doctors in his for-profit practice.

Although the public filings offer few details about the charity's activities, Dr. Glickman said such expenditures are part of the foundation's mandate, which includes offering fellowships to doctors being trained and paying for continuing medical education for those doctors. One of Vascular Specialists' two big donors, the device maker Guidant, now part of Boston Scientific, said it contributed $25,000 in 2003 and $40,000 the next year, through its own foundation. The company says the money was given with the understanding that it would go to finance the group's fellowship program.

The other big donor, the device maker Medtronic, says it gave Dr. Glickman's charity $80,000 last year to help pay for the group's fellowship program. "Dr. Glickman and his colleagues have trained hundreds of physicians and fellows on life-saving procedures associated with vascular disease — a notable accomplishment," Medtronic said in a written statement.

Donors have been so generous to Dr. Glickman's foundation that he says it is currently sitting on $100,000 he has not yet decided how to spend. "I'm very cautious with what I do," he said.

Whatever the issues of tax-exempt status among the various charities, federal regulators say the groups could find themselves in trouble in another way — in violation of federal anti-kickback laws — if donations appear to be little more than a way for companies to funnel money to doctors.

If the contributions amount to payments or gifts to doctors who then use or recommend a certain drug or device, companies could be breaking the law, said Vicki Robinson, a top lawyer in the Office of Inspector General at the federal Health and Human Services Department.

"From a legal perspective, it's really no different," Ms. Robinson said.

DOJ_NMG_0036990

Patrick L. Meehan, the United States attorney in Philadelphia, whose office has a long history of prosecuting health care fraud, said the doctors' charities could warrant scrutiny. "What we would be concerned about are end runs around the system," Mr. Meehan said. "We want to be sure there is independent and fully informed medical judgment at the heart of the physician-patient relationship."

For their part, Midwest Heart officials defend the activities of their foundation. Contributions to the charity, which was created in 1988, have more than doubled in the last few years — to $1.7 million in 2004, the most recent period for which federal filings are available.

In a written statement, the foundation said it had "strict internal controls and systems in place to ensure the independence and integrity of all research and education activities."

Questions About Research

Outside researchers have questioned some of the foundation's work. Some doctors say the study of the CHF Solutions filtration device that Dr. Costanzo presented in March may have been flawed, for example, because heart failure patients who were given conventional diuretic drugs may not have received enough medicine to provide meaningful comparisons.

One heart doctor critical of those findings was Dr. JoAnn Lindenfeld, who was quoted in a cardiology publication, Heartwire, in March as saying, "I wouldn't view these data as persuasive enough to use it full-scale in a million patients a year with acute decompensated heart failure." Dr. Lindenfeld did not dispute the accuracy of that quote but declined to comment further.

Through the Midwest Heart Foundation, Dr. Costanzo declined to comment. Both CHF Solutions and the foundation say she no longer has stock or stock options in the company.

CHF Solutions said that most of its contributions to the Midwest Heart Foundation covered the cost of conducting the research project that Dr. Costanzo led and the company helped design.

John L. Erb, CHF's chief executive, said "we were very careful" in designing the research, but he conceded that it was "not the perfect study where we could answer all the questions."

Dr. Goodwin, at the foundation, said the research was only a starting point. "We fully agree that further investigation is needed to validate the findings and carry them forward to a larger number of patients," he said.

Some of Midwest Heart's research has also fallen short of federal rules governing clinical studies. In August 2004, the Food and Drug Administration sent the foundation a warning letter about a study of a new carotid stent — a device designed to open up a major artery in the head and neck.

The F.D.A. said Midwest Heart had failed to get necessary approval before beginning its research, which involved different types of stents and 168 patient procedures. The regulators also found that some patients were not properly informed and that the foundation was too slow in reporting serious complications. The results of the study were never published, although the foundation says they were submitted to the F.D.A.

The shortcomings were simply "record keeping" issues, said Wendy Landow, the chief executive of the Midwest Heart Foundation, who said her organization had in fact received the necessary approval to do the study but had poorly documented it. The issue has been resolved, she said, adding that the foundation had adopted tighter procedures to avoid future lapses.

A separate controversy surrounds the heart failure drug Natrecor made by Scios, which gave the Midwest Heart Foundation a total of more than $300,000 for the years 2003 and 2004, according to federal filings. The Justice Department, which is investigating whether Scios improperly marketed Natrecor, has issued a subpoena to the foundation.

Scios said that most of its Midwest Heart contributions went toward educational programs that Scios had no influence over. It said it could not comment on the Justice Department investigation. Midwest Heart said it was cooperating with federal officials and had been told it was not a target of the investigation.

Natrecor was approved by the F.D.A. in 2001 for use in hospitals for patients only in an extreme, or decompensated, stage of heart failure. But it also became heavily used by doctors who administered it intravenously in outpatient clinics for periodic patient "tune-ups," as they were sometimes known. Natrecor's enthusiasts included some Midwest Heart doctors, who participated in studies of the drug and also used it in outpatient settings.

While doctors can use federally approved drugs for any purpose they see fit, a pharmaceutical company is prohibited from actively encouraging such off-label uses.

DOJ_NMG_0036991

A Debate Over Drug's Merits

In mid-2005, after researchers elsewhere published an article in a scholarly medical journal raising concerns that Natrecor could seriously impair kidney function, one of Midwest Heart's cardiologists, Dr. Mitchell T. Saltzberg, continued to staunchly defend the drug. Dr. Saltzberg, who has also been a paid Scios consultant, wrote to Medicare officials in July 2005 to argue that the drug was being "unfairly targeted."

Dr. Saltzberg's letter cited a study of Natrecor's outpatient use — a study for which the foundation had provided some work — saying that this research and "the body of anecdotal experience" indicated the drug posed no kidney risks.

His comments to Medicare, though, came a few days after Scios itself sent a safety alert to doctors warning against the outpatient use of Natrecor. The Scios alert, issued in consultation with the F.D.A., relied on the findings of an expert panel that the company had asked to look into issues involving the drug's safety.

The Scios alert referred to the very study Dr. Saltzberg had cited and found it lacking. That study "was not powered to adequately assess the effectiveness or safety of serial infusions of Natrecor," the alert said. "The size of the study, its design and its findings provide an inadequate basis to recommend the use of intermittent, serial or scheduled repetitive infusions of Natrecor." Through the foundation, Dr. Saltzberg declined to comment. Foundation officials, though, said they agreed with the Scios panel's findings.

Outpatient use of Natrecor around the country has fallen precipitously. Scios has said it plans to conduct further research into the drug's safety.

The Midwest Heart Foundation said that only one of its patients, who is part of a study, is still being given the drug as an outpatient. But while the foundation says it believes more research is needed, Dr. Goodwin also said that he believes that many doctors had positive results with the drug and that he had seen it keep patients out of the hospital.

"It worked great," he said.

FEC Unleashes Its Lawyers (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, June 28, 2006

The Federal Election Commission (FEC) is being accused of attempting to intimidate soft-money donors to 527s by targeting the donors for questioning.

The agency, which is tasked with policing national and congressional political campaigns, is targeting some of the wealthiest Republican and Democratic donors.

Typically such people have escaped tough scrutiny unless suspected of deliberately evading contribution limits through the use of straw donors or other tactics. But recently the FEC appears to have aimed at donors even though it is the 527s that are suspected of evading campaign-finance law.

One prominent GOP strategist has charged that the new tactic is intended to scare big donors away from giving to 527s, which Congress and the White House have struggled to curb.

This is happening despite the FEC decision last month not to implement new regulations for 527s this election cycle. That was widely interpreted as a green light for 527s to act without restriction, as groups such as America Coming Together and Swift Boat Veterans for Truth did during the 2004 election. This was expected to mean such groups would spend even more money this year and in 2008.

But the FEC has not left the same rules in place that allowed 527s to spend $400 million in the 2004 cycle. Late that year, it subtly modified its rules, which would apparently bolster investigations of 527s in response to a series of complaints filed against the groups in 2004.

The new regulation, which took effect in January 2005, stated that 527s would be subject to regulation if, when seeking money, they "indicated" to donors that the money would be spent to support or oppose a federal candidate.

Election-agency commissioners such as Ellen Weintraub and Hans A. von Spakovsky declined to discuss the investigations. But strategists close to the 527s say donors are being targeted.

DOJ_NMG_0036992

"I know for a fact that the FEC has subpoenaed donors who may have contributed to 527s in past election cycles and believe that technique is more rooted in preventing future donation to other 527s than anything else," said Chris LaCivita, a former senior adviser to Swift Boat Veterans for Truth and former head of Progress for America, both right-wing groups.

Another strategist connected with a prominent conservative 527 group, the Club for Growth, confirmed that the FEC is targeting donors.

"I've heard that lots of other groups have gotten subpoenas and requests for depositions of donors," said David Keating, the executive director of the Club for Growth, which is tied up in litigation with the FEC. Keating said he was not talking about donors to his group.

"If you look in the 2004 cycle, complaints were filed against virtually every group out there," Keating said. "None of these matters under review have been dismissed."

In 2004, a coalition of pro-campaign-finance-regulation groups including Democracy 21, the Center for Responsive Politics and the Campaign Legal Center filed at least five complaints against the major 527s: America Coming Together, the Media Fund, the Leadership Forum, Progress for America Voter Fund, Swift Boat Veterans for Truth and Texans for Truth.

Fred Wertheimer, president of Democracy 21, said that he believes all of his group's complaints are pending but that he had no further knowledge of the probes.

Because the complaints, which are 2 years old, have not been dismissed it is assumed that the FEC has given its lawyers the go-ahead to investigate them.

One Democratic lawyer said the FEC general counsel's office is asking donors to recall the specifics of their conversations and other interactions with 527s to determine whether those groups indicated that donations would be used to support or oppose federal candidates such as President Bush and Sen. John Kerry (Mass.), the Democrats' presidential nominee.

"They're asking a lot of questions of donors about what they were told when they were asked to contribute," the lawyer said. "Who knows what the six-member commission will do with whatever is presented them? There's little doubt that the general counsel's office feels responsibility to show evidence of a violation and this is the route to get there."

Once the general counsel presents his case to the commission, its members must vote on whether there is probable cause to believe the law was broken. It is not known if the commissioners specifically approved subjecting donors to subpoenas and depositions.

"Their attorneys have been let loose to look into whether … the entities violated the law," the Democratic lawyer said. "They're out there trying to gather the evidence. You don't have the FEC as a six-person office approving these inquiries."

Former FEC Chairman Scott Thomas, who retired last year, declined to comment on an ongoing investigation but said scrutinizing donors would fit the legal approach that the FEC has adopted in regulating 527s. Citing the newly enacted Section 100.57, Thomas said commissioners agreed in 2004 that 527s could be policed most effectively case by case by looking at how they solicited donors.

Thomas said solicitation is a key element in the FEC's litigation against the Club for Growth. He said FEC investigators are likely to look at "whether there was some indication given to donors in the solicitation process that the funds would be used to support or oppose federal candidates. The focus is what was said when the money was coming in."

Thomas said past enforcement actions focused on what groups communicated to voters to determine whether they should have political-committee status, a designation that would subject them to contribution limits. Thomas said that approach created gridlock.

Thomas said the regulation change in January 2005 could be used to prosecute groups for activity in 2004. He said it would not apply retroactively in the technical sense but could be held up as a point of consensus among the FEC commissioners about how the laws on the books before 2004 should be interpreted.

"It's going to be arguing that the same analytical concept can be applied for figuring out what happened in '04 cycle," Thomas said in response to claims that the general counsel is focusing on conversations with donors. "That's probably why the FEC was digging for this information, because four commissioners agreed that concept was the best way to analyze these political-committee cases."

DOJ_NMG_0036993

Court Rules Correctly On Clean Money (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, June 28, 2006

BY RAPPING THE KNUCKLES of some over-exuberant political reformers in Vermont, the U.S. Supreme Court has sent a welcome signal that it will continue to scrutinize well-intentioned efforts to limit the role of money in politics with at least one eye on the 1st Amendment.

With Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. joining the lead opinion by Clinton appointee Justice Stephen G. Breyer, the court this week told Ben & Jerry's home state that it went too far when it imposed strict limits on what candidates for public office could spend and on what citizens could donate to political campaigns. The ruling suggests that a landmark 1976 campaign-finance decision is still good law.

In that decision, Buckley vs. Valeo, the high court upheld a post-Watergate law's restrictions on what individuals could contribute to candidates for federal office, but it struck down on 1st Amendment grounds the law's limits on how much a candidate could spend. Drawing a distinction that remains controversial 30 years later, the court explained that although spending limits and contribution limits raise 1st Amendment concerns, a Congress worried about corruption could put reasonable limits on how much an individual donates to a candidate, because the viewpoint conveyed by a $1,000 donation is the same "general expression of support" that would be conveyed by a larger gift.

By contrast, the Buckley ruling said, a candidate spending his own money is entitled to greater 1st Amendment protection because he is espousing his own views. The same point holds of truly independent expenditures by a candidate's supporters.

It's easy to mock this distinction. After all, both campaign contributions and campaign expenditures represent the use of money to produce political results. But Buckley's two-tier approach makes sense. It was a pragmatic attempt to balance a need for elections uncontaminated by large special-interest contributions with the guarantees of the 1st Amendment, which above all protects political speech.

In striking down Vermont's expenditure limits, the Roberts court clearly is being faithful to Buckley vs. Valeo. But what about its decision to invalidate Vermont's limits on contributions? Breyer argued in his opinion that there is no inconsistency because the court in Buckley said that even contribution limits must be "closely drawn" and must not be so low that they prevent candidates from "amassing the resources necessary for effective advocacy."

Whether Breyer is right about Vermont's limits, Congress and the states can still impose reasonable limits on contributions. But limitations on spending — unless candidates voluntarily accept them, in exchange for public financing — remain off-limits. Buckley's distinction between expenditures and contributions is still the law of the land. That's good news for both clean elections and free speech.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Justice Agrees To Indiana Plan To Purge Voter Rolls (AP)

The Associated Press

AP, June 28, 2006

The Justice Department agreed Tuesday to an Indiana plan designed to eliminate the names of people who have died and those who are listed more than once from the state's voter registration rolls.

Indiana Secretary of State Todd Rokita last week announced the plan to purge the rolls, following negotiations between state Republicans and Democrats. It would also target convicted felons and voters who no longer live in Indiana or in the county of their registration.

"We're very pleased to be able to do this and get our voter roll cleanup under way," Rokita's chief of staff, Paul Okeson, said Tuesday.

"Last night, we started printing the first mailer (to registered voters) and started getting them ready to be sent out this week. I imagine as early as the end of this week, the first pieces of mail will begin to drop in voters' mailboxes," Okeson said.

The letters will be sent to every registered voter in the state. Any that cannot be delivered will be flagged as potential mistakes, and the state will then send follow-up mailers to those addresses.

DOJ_NMG_0036994

If any of those are also returned, the voters would be placed on inactive status.

Inactive voters could still cast ballots this year, but their files would be flagged. If they did not vote in the 2006, 2007 or 2008 elections, their names could be removed by the end of 2008.

The agreement, designed to bring Indiana into compliance with the National Voter Registration Act, followed a Justice Department investigation that found the state had hundreds of thousands of ineligible voters on its registration lists, including possibly 29,000 who were deceased, and 290,000 duplicates.

The agreement still must be approved by the U.S. District Court in Indianapolis, but Okeson said that is likely only a formality.

"All parties are on the same page," he said. "So the District Court will simply say, `We see there's an agreement that has been reached; we'll watch to see if that agreement is kept.'" >

U.S. Probing Woodmere Officers' Firings (CLPD)

By Tasha Flournoy, Plain Dealer Reporter

The Cleveland Plain Dealer, June 28, 2006

Woodmere -- The U.S. Justice Department has launched an investigation of village officials for suspending a police chief and refusing to reinstate two police officers who contend they were fired because they are white.

Mayor Yolanda Broadie and Law Director Janet Beck acknowledged the investigation Tuesday, but provided no details. Justice Department officials were not available for comment.

The investigation comes a year after the U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission ruled that the village violated the civil rights of Chief Lamont Lockhart and officers Amy Mengay and Timothy Ellis.

Mengay and Ellis told the EEOC that Broadie, who is black, unfairly fired them and allowed black officers with similar or more serious infractions to keep their jobs.

Broadie later suspended Lockhart for what she called "failure to properly lead and supervise the Police Department." Lockhart in turn filed his own complaint with the EEOC, which found that the suspension was retaliation for his support of the two officers. Lockhart has since resigned.

The commission ordered the village to attempt a settlement, reinstate the officers and give them back pay. But village officials refused. So, the commission referred the case to the U.S. Justice Department.

Avery Friedman, who represents Ellis, Lockhart and Mengay, said federal attorneys interviewed village officials and gathered public records this week.

He said the village could either agree to settle with the officers or face a federal lawsuit. He called it a unique discrimination case.

"It is an unusual case because you have a black mayor telling a black chief, Get rid of the white ones,' " said Friedman. "The truth is the village of Woodmere is in a world of trouble."

Friedman said Ellis is now an officer in Sagamore Hills Township, Lockhart serves as deputy police chief for the Greater Cleveland Regional Transit Authority, and Mengay is an officer in Newburgh Heights.

Longtime Councilman James Jordan said Tuesday that he still honors the village's decision not to settle with the fired officers.

"Our opinion is the village isn't wrong," he said. "We haven't done anything wrong."

To reach this Plain Dealer reporter:

tflournoy@plaind.com, 216-999-4961

Agreement Would Make Public Buildings More Handicapped Accessible (KTBS-TV)

By Jim Roberts

KTBS-TV, ABC 3, Shreveport, LA, June 28, 2006

The city of Shreveport could have to spend up to $4 million over the next three years to bring all city buildings into compliance with the Americans with Disabilities Act.

DOJ_NMG_0036995

Mayor Keith Hightower this afternoon offered a proposed agreement with the U.S. Justice Department to make the upgrades. It would need City Council approval.

A Justice Department task force came to town, looked at public buildings and made hundreds of "suggested" improvements.

Dwayne Ebarb's home has been modified due to his handicap. Much of what the federal government wants the city to do can be easily accomplished, he said.

"Most of the stuff they brought up was minor," Ebarb said. "It was stuff like 'grab bars.' They were an inch too high, an inch too low."

The list of improvements the government wants is several hundred pages long.

One building that needs work, the government said, is the old City Hall Annex. It was built in the 1950s and hasn't been modified much since then. Another is the old Civic Theater and the Municipal Auditorium, circa 1920 -- both built before the ADA was passed.

But Ebarb said some of the government's recommendations don't make sense.

"They wanted to renovate the Elvis Presley bathroom (at Municipal Auditorium)," he said. "They wanted to make the shower (handicapped) accessible. Nobody even uses the shower."

Hightower said Washington is a lot like city hall: You can't fight it.

"When the Justice Department comes and says you must do these things, sooner or later you've got to get them done," he said.

It will be up to the City Council and the Hightower administration to find the money.

The expenditure comes just a few weeks after the council cut the money from a $10 million sales tax windfall that would have gone to work making Shreveport ADA compliant.

The city has three years from the time the agreement is signed to make improvements to the buildings. The timetable for individual projects ranges from a few days to several years, depending on size, cost and need.

If the projects aren't done in the three years, the Justice Department could file suit against the city to get them done.

Senator Wants IRS To Chase After Pimps (USAT)

USA Today, June 28, 2006

Pimps and sex traffickers could soon find themselves being chased by tax collectors, not just the vice squad.

Sen. Charles Grassley, chairman of the tax-writing Senate Finance Committee, wants the Internal Revenue Service to chase after pimps and sex traffickers with the same fervor it stalked gangster Al Capone for tax evasion.

Grassley, R-Iowa, would hit pimps with fines and lengthy prison sentences for failing to file employment forms and withhold taxes for the women and girls under their command.

The proposal would make certain tax crimes a felony when the money comes from a criminal activity. A one-year prison sentence and $25,000 fine would become a 10-year sentence and $50,000 fine for each employment form that a pimp or sex trafficker fails to file.

Grassley planned to propose the penalties when his panel meets Wednesday.

"The thugs who run these trafficking rings are exploiting society's poorest girls and women for personal gain," Grassley said. "The IRS goes after drug traffickers. It can go after sex traffickers."

Michael Horowitz, a senior fellow at the Hudson Institute, said the change has the potential to put pimps out of business without difficult trials that require women to testify to abuse and mistreatment.

"We need to simply treat the pimps and massage parlor operators the way we would treat anybody who takes the proceeds of a customer transaction from somebody and then gives a fraction of it back," he said.

Under tax law, that relationship makes the pimp an employer, requiring the filing of a wage statement and the withholding of payroll taxes, including Social Security.

Grassley envisions creating an office inside the Internal Revenue Service to prosecute sex traffickers for violating tax laws. The office would get $2 million to get started, and it would be allowed to keep a portion of the taxes it collects.

DOJ_NMG_0036996

The IRS work is intended to build on efforts underway to curb worldwide trafficking. The Justice Department, collaborating with U.S. attorneys offices nationwide, would identify pimps and sex traffickers and refer them to the IRS.

Grassley also wants to change the IRS whistle-blower program to allow the girls and women to participate.

If the IRS goes after pimps and sex traffickers for tax offenses now, it conducts lengthy audits of their lifestyles in order to estimate their incomes from illegal activities and determine taxes due.

In Senate, It's Déjà Vu All Over Again On Voting Rights Act Extension (HILL)

By Jonathan Allen

The Hill, June 28, 2006

An extension of the Voting Rights Act is running into some of the same objections in the Senate that it faces in the House, where the bill was pulled from the floor schedule last week after rank-and-file Republicans rebelled against their leadership.

Southern Senate conservatives are raising concerns about reauthorizing Section 5 of the law, which requires jurisdictions with a history of racial discrimination to pre-clear voting-law changes with the Justice Department. Some Southerners argue that the requirement is unnecessarily onerous and that their states should not be singled out in perpetuity.

"Our part of the country, no matter how good we do, we're going to be treated differently than the rest of the country," said Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.).

Lott, one of two current senators who cast a vote against the 1982 extension of the original 1965 law, said he would most likely support the bill but did not commit to doing so.

"I want to see what it is first," said Lott, who was House Republican whip when he voted against the last reauthorization.

"I haven't focused on it," said Sen. Richard Shelby (R-Ala.), who also voted against the initial House version of the 1982 bill before the House cleared the Senate's measure by voice vote.

Shelby referred questions to fellow Alabama Republican Jeff Sessions, who is a member of the Judiciary Committee. That panel is expected to include its voting-rights legislation, which is identical to the House bill, on its markup agenda for tomorrow. The bill was placed on last week's agenda, but the committee was unable to muster a quorum for consideration.

More than half of the committee's 18 members are co-sponsors of the legislation, but it is not clear whether senators who dislike certain provisions could cobble together enough votes to alter it.

"I think it needs to be studied, and I think there are certainly some improvements that can be made," Sessions said. "I think we may improve it and pass it."

Sessions declined to say which parts he would change or how he would change them.

Many of the law's provisions are permanent, but several are due to expire next year. Democrats and some centrist Republicans are eager to win reauthorization of those provisions before GOP term limits force Sensenbrenner to hand his gavel to a more conservative lawmaker.

Lawmakers and aides say privately that the political sensitivity of the landmark civil-rights law makes it difficult for them to challenge its composition for fear of being branded racist.

Lott, who is considering a leadership bid, was pushed out of the majority leader's job in late 2002 after he suggested the country would have been better off had Sen. Strom Thurmond (S.C.) won his 1948 segregationist bid for the presidency.

"I think the Voting Rights Act is the most important civil-rights bill in history," said Sen. Orrin Hatch (R-Utah), a Judiciary Committee member who is not a co-sponsor of the legislation. But, he said, "There are some real questions about whether we're being fair to some states."

In the House, a bloc of Georgia and Texas Republicans banded together with lawmakers opposed to provisions allowing for multilingual ballots to avert a floor vote last week. House Republican leaders have yet to reschedule it.

"We are continuing to have conversations with members … about some provisions in the bill, and those conversations will continue this week," House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) said yesterday.

Leaders in both parties and members of the Congressional Black Caucus have signed off on the Sensenbrenner-Specter bill. But Reps. Lynn Westmoreland and Charlie Norwood, both Georgia Republicans, wanted to amend Section 5.

DOJ_NMG_0036997

The Norwood amendment would expand its requirements to the entire country, and Westmoreland's amendment would have created an expedited procedure for states to get off of the pre-clearance list.

Section 5 covers Virginia, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, Arizona and parts of several other states, including California, New York and North Carolina.

Rep. Steve King (R-Iowa) and dozens of others objected to language reauthorizing multilingual ballots.

Many of the same concerns are being echoed, if softly, on the Senate side, where an effort to control expectations is beginning to take shape.

"It has a year to go, and clearly the Democrats are trying to make it an election-year issue," Hatch said.

Rank And File Cut Out Of VRA Talks (RC)

By Jennifer Yachnin

Roll Call, June 28, 2006

Even while Republican House leaders work to quell internal divides that derailed consideration of the Voting Rights Act last week, some rank-and-file Members complained Tuesday that they remain shut out of discussions regarding the law's reauthorization.

"We are continuing to have conversations with Members, and [with] lawyers, about some provisions in the bill; and those conversations will continue this week," Majority Leader John Boehner (Ohio) said during a Tuesday press conference.

But several rank-and-file Republicans said House leaders remain unwilling to discuss any aspect of reauthorization of the landmark 1965 law.

One among those Members, Rep. Steve King (R-Iowa), asserted that his efforts to meet with GOP leadership in recent days have yet to elicit any response.

"It's not due to lack of effort on my part," said King, who is seeking consideration of an amendment that would end mandates under the VRA that require jurisdictions to provide multilingual ballots to voters.

The exclusion of King's proposal, as well as a half-dozen other amendments targeting language provisions in the law, from consideration on the House floor sparked an internal revolt that prompted leaders to pull the measure from last Wednesday's schedule.

"I care about the policy," King added, stating that he is seeking not only debate on his amendment, but also support from leadership. "It would not satisfy me to [only] have an opportunity to speak my piece on the floor and get a vote in the record."

Rep. Lynn Westmoreland (R-Ga.) said he similarly has received little feedback from House leaders in recent days as he has sought support for the language amendments.

"I don't know who's been talking, but it's not us," he said.

Georgia Republicans earlier won concessions from House leaders to allow consideration of amendments to the voting rights law — GOP leadership initially had hoped to pass the bill under suspension, which would have prohibited amendments and severely limited debate on the measure — and the Rules Committee approved consideration of two measures last week.

Both of those amendments, sponsored by Westmoreland and Rep. Charlie Norwood (R-Ga.), are directed at the VRA's Section 5, which requires the Justice Department to approve any changes to voting practices in states with a documented history of discrimination.

Norwood's amendment would modify the formula used to apply that section of the law, known as pre-clearance, which some Southern lawmakers have argued is outdated.

The Westmoreland proposal would address a related section of the VRA that provides a mechanism for jurisdictions to "bailout" or be relieved from those regulations if officials can prove no discriminatory voting practices have occurred in a 10-year period.

Under that amendment the Justice Department would be required to assemble a list of those jurisdictions eligible for the bailout and then issue notifications to those groups.

DOJ_NMG_0036998

Despite the lack of communication, Westmoreland said he does not expect today's weekly Republican Conference meeting to be as contentious as last week's, during which some lawmakers chanted for the legislation to be dropped from the schedule.

Norwood said he expects any decision will be delayed until after a Supreme Court ruling is issued in the Texas redistricting case. "We'll look at it again," he said.

Plaintiffs in the Texas lawsuit, League of United Latin American Citizens v. Perry, are challenging the Texas map put into place in 2003 by arguing not only that it was devised to maximize GOP gains but also that it diluted minority voting power and violated the principle of "one person, one vote" by revising districts mid-decade.

A senior GOP leadership aide said leaders are "hopeful" that the measure could be cleared the week after the July Fourth recess and that they were enlisting ex-Rep. J.C. Watts (R-Okla.) to help allay lawmakers' concerns about the bill.

"Having him around is going to be helpful," the aide said.

Osceola To Take Hispanic Voting Rights Issue To Court (ORS)

The Orlando Sentinel, June 28, 2006

KISSIMMEE -- A day after a federal judge put county commission elections on hold, Osceola County said it will not settle a case filed by the Justice Department over Hispanic voting rights.

"The county intends to proceed with the defense of this case. As publicly elected officials, the board must uphold and defend the last expression of the voters in 1996 -- that every precinct voted to return to at-large elections," read Vincent Fontana, the county's attorney, this afternoon. "Also the 2003-2004 charter review advisory commission -- that reflected the entire ethnic makeup of the county -- voted not to recommend that the board put the issue on the ballot again."

Commissioners met with Fontana for about an hour and a half to review Judge Gregory A. Prensell's order stopping this fall's elections.

"It is important for the citizens to have direct political access to all public officials who have the power to tax their homes and property. This is among the many rights and freedoms for which our armed forces continue to fight," Fontana concluded.

It is not clear what the next step will be. Presnell, a judge in the Middle District in Orlando, wanted a status report on July 12 and scheduled a trial for July 18.

The county could appeal the injunction.

Two county commissioners contacted would not comment on the decision.

A Single Person Could Swing An Election (WP)

By Zachary A. Goldfarb

The Washington Post, June 28, 2006

To determine what it would take to hack a U.S. election, a team of cybersecurity experts turned to a fictional battleground state called Pennasota and a fictional gubernatorial race between Tom Jefferson and Johnny Adams. It's the year 2007, and the state uses electronic voting machines.

Jefferson was forecast to win the race by about 80,000 votes, or 2.3 percent of the vote. Adams's conspirators thought, "How easily can we manipulate the election results?"

The experts thought about all the ways to do it. And they concluded in a report issued yesterday that it would take only one person, with a sophisticated technical knowledge and timely access to the software that runs the voting machines, to change the outcome.

The report, which was unveiled at a Capitol Hill news conference by New York University's Brennan Center for Justice and billed as the most authoritative to date, tackles some of the most contentious questions about the security of electronic voting.

The report concluded that the three major electronic voting systems in use have significant security and reliability vulnerabilities. But it added that most of these vulnerabilities can be overcome by auditing printed voting records to spot irregularities. And while 26 states require paper records of votes, fewer than half of those require regular audits.

"With electronic voting systems, there are certain attacks that can reach enough voting machines . . . that you could affect the outcome of the statewide election," said Lawrence D. Norden, associate counsel of the Brennan Center.

With billions of dollars of support from the federal government, states have replaced outdated voting machines in recent years with optical scan ballot and touch-screen machines. Activists, including prominent computer scientists, have complained for years that these machines are not secure against tampering. But electronic voting machines are also much easier to use for disabled people and those who do not speak English.

Voting machine vendors have dismissed many of the concerns, saying they are theoretical and do not reflect the real-life experience of running elections, such as how machines are kept in a secure environment.

"It just isn't the piece of equipment," said David Bear, a spokesman for Diebold Election Systems, one of the country's largest vendors. "It's all the elements of an election environment that make for a secure election."

"This report is based on speculation rather than an examination of the record. To date, voting systems have not been successfully attacked in a live election," said Bob Cohen, a spokesman for the Election Technology Council, a voting machine vendors' trade group. "The purported vulnerabilities presented in this study, while interesting in theory, would be extremely difficult to exploit."

At yesterday's news conference, the push for more secure electronic voting machines, which has been popular largely on the left side of the political spectrum since the contested outcome of the 2000 presidential election in Florida, picked up some high-profile support from the other side.

Republican Reps. Tom Cole (Okla.) and Thomas M. Davis III (Va.), chairman of the House Government Reform Committee, joined Rep. Rush D. Holt (D-N.J.) in calling for a law that would set strict requirements for electronic voting machines. Howard Schmidt, former chief of security at Microsoft and President Bush's former cybersecurity adviser, also endorsed the Brennan report.

"It's not a question of 'if,' it's a question of 'when,' " Davis said of an attempt to manipulate election results.

Appeals Court Upholds Little Rock Order (FINDLAW/AP)

By Noah Trister, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 28, 2006

(AP) - LITTLE ROCK, Ark.-A federal appeals court on Monday upheld a decision keeping the Little Rock School District under federal desegregation monitoring, which has been in effect since 1965.

A three-member panel of the 8th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals at St. Louis agreed with a 2004 ruling by U.S. District William R. Wilson in the long-running desegregation case involving the Little Rock district, the North Little Rock District and the Pulaski County Special School District.

Wilson had ruled that the Little Rock district did not successfully evaluate its academic programs for how well they helped black students. Otherwise, the district would have been released from the remaining desegregation monitoring it has faced since 1965.

The district had been released in 2002 from all aspects of its monitoring except those relating to program evaluations.

In his opinion, Wilson said the district would remain under court order through the 2005-06 school year. Wilson said the district must hire outside experts and design a program assessment process.

While upholding Wilson's decision, the appeals court also signaled its willingness to review the case again if the federal monitoring is not lifted in October.

The court said it was concerned about the "ever-heightened requirements that the district is being asked to satisfy."

Chris Heller, a lawyer for the Little Rock district, called the ruling "a great disappointment." But he also said he was encouraged by the court's willingness to look at the case again if federal monitoring remains in place after this year.

"Perhaps part of the rationale was that the case should be almost over anyway," Heller said of the ruling.

Senate Bars Constitutional Amendment On Flag Burning (Update1) (BLOOM)

By James Rowley

Bloomberg, June 28, 2006

June 27 (Bloomberg) -- The U.S. Senate rejected a proposed constitutional amendment to empower Congress to outlaw flag burning, falling one vote short of the two-thirds majority required to send the measure to the states for ratification.

The vote was 66-34 in favor of the amendment. Sixty-seven votes are required to approve a constitutional amendment.

To become part of the Constitution, an amendment must also be ratified by 38 state legislatures. Republicans argued that 48 states had outlawed flag desecration before a Supreme Court decision in 1989 invalidated a Texas law. They noted that all 50 state legislatures have passed resolutions urging Congress to approve a constitutional amendment.

Democrats accused the Republicans of ignoring more pressing issues, such as spiraling health-care costs, to score election- year points over flag burning. Democrats made the same charge earlier this month when Senate Republicans unsuccessfully sought a vote on a constitutional amendment to ban same-sex marriage.

``Why are we here? Because the White House and the congressional Republican leadership are nervous about the upcoming election," Dick Durbin of Illinois, the Senate's No. 2 Democrat, said during today's debate in Washington. ``We are not setting out to protect Old Glory. We are setting out to protect old politicians."

Republicans said the issue is above politics, citing bipartisan support in the House of Representatives, which has passed a flag-burning amendment six times in the last 12 years.

``Bringing it up at this time is certainly not an election- year ploy," said Utah Republican Orrin Hatch, the measure's prime sponsor. ``We have Democrats and Republicans who feel deeply about this."

Vote Breakdown

Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada and 13 other Democrats voted in favor of the proposed amendment.

Kentucky Senator Mitch McConnell, the deputy Republican leader, voted against the amendment. McConnell has said he favors upholding First Amendment values. Two other Republicans, Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island and Robert Bennett of Utah, also opposed the amendment.

Proponents argued that the amendment was needed to reverse the 5-4 Supreme Court ruling that they argued usurped legislative powers to outlaw flag burning. Hatch called the proposal ``a simple little constitutional amendment" to restore that power. ``Who could be against that?"

Democratic Proposal

Earlier, the Senate defeated narrower legislation proposed by Durbin. His measure would outlaw flag burning with the intent of inciting violence or desecration or theft of a flag on U.S. government property. Durbin said his bill would protect the flag ``without defiling our Constitution."

West Virginia Senator Robert Byrd, acknowledging that many voters in his home state where he is seeking re-election will disagree with him, said amending the Constitution to protect the flag would undermine the charter of democracy.

``Old Glory lives because the Constitution lives," he said. ``We love that flag, but we love the guarantees of the Constitution more."

The Senate last voted in 2000 on the proposed amendment when supporters fell four votes short of the required two-thirds support.

Flag Amendment Narrowly Fails In Senate Vote (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, June 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 27 — A proposed Constitutional amendment to allow Congress to prohibit desecration of the flag fell a single vote short of approval by the Senate on Tuesday, an excruciatingly close vote that left unresolved a long-running debate over whether the flag is a unique national symbol deserving of special legal standing.

The 66-to-34 vote on the amendment was one vote short of the 67 required to send the amendment to the states for potential ratification as the 28th Amendment. It was the closest proponents of the initiative have come in four Senate votes since the Supreme Court first ruled in 1989 that flag burning was a protected form of free speech.

The opponents — 30 Democrats, 3 Republicans and an independent — asserted that the amendment would amount to tampering with the Bill of Rights in an effort to eliminate relatively rare incidents of burning the flag. They said it violated the very freedoms guaranteed by the symbolism of the flag.

DOJ_NMG_0037001

"This objectionable expression is obscene, it is painful, it is unpatriotic," said Senator Daniel Inouye, a Hawaii Democrat who won the Medal of Honor for his service in World War II. "But I believe Americans gave their lives in many wars to make certain all Americans have a right to express themselves, even those who harbor hateful thoughts."

Proponents of the amendment, which was backed by 52 Republicans and 14 Democrats, disputed the assertion that burning the flag was a form of speech. They said the amendment was simply an effort to reassert Congressional authority after a misguided court ruling. They said it was particularly appropriate to act now when American troops are at risk.

"Old Glory lost today," said Senator Bill Frist, the majority leader, who scheduled the debate and vote in the week before Congress broke for its Fourth of July recess.

The full text of the proposed amendment is, "The Congress shall have power to prohibit the physical desecration of the flag of the United States."

The vote is likely to be an issue in the Congressional elections in November, and Senator Orrin G. Hatch, the Utah Republican who was the chief sponsor of the amendment, predicted the minority who opposed it would be held accountable by the voters.

"I think this is getting to where they are not going to be able to escape the wrath of the voters," Mr. Hatch said.

Eleven senators facing re-election this year opposed the amendment and several are facing potentially difficult races, including Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island, a Republican, and the Democrats Daniel K. Akaka of Hawaii, Robert C. Byrd of West Virginia, Maria Cantwell of Washington and Joseph I. Lieberman of Connecticut.

The leader of the Citizens Flag Alliance, which had been running newspaper advertisements on the issue in selected states, said it would continue to press the issue and make sure voters know where their senators stand on the amendment.

"I think this is the right thing to do, and I am going to keep at it until we run out of money or they tell me to stop," said Daniel S. Wheeler, an American Legion official who leads the advocacy group.

Prior to the vote on the amendment itself, the Senate voted 64 to 36 against a proposed bill that would have criminalized flag desecration. Senator Richard J. Durbin of Illinois, the second ranking Senate Democrat, said his plan had been written to avoid Supreme Court objections, but backers of the constitutional approach dismissed that idea.

President Bush, whose father was president when the flag fight initially erupted in the aftermath of two high court rulings, said he was disappointed in the outcome. "I commend the senators from both parties who voted to allow the amendment ratification process to protect our flag to go forward, and continue to believe that the American people deserve the opportunity to express their views on this important issue."

The House has routinely approved the flag amendment on bipartisan votes and did so last year. Had the Senate passed the amendment, it would have been likely to win ratification from the required 38 states since, supporters say, all states have endorsed the amendment in some form.

While the amendment gained three votes since it was last considered in 2000, its future prospects are uncertain. Senator Mitch McConnell, Republican of Kentucky, is in line to become the Republican leader in the next Congress, and he opposes the initiative on free speech grounds. In addition, most analysts expect Republicans to lose Senate seats in the November election.

"This would have been the easiest time to get it through," said Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, who opposed it.

The vote, which came after the Senate earlier this month defeated a proposed constitutional amendment to ban same-sex marriage, will not be the last ideologically charged vote in the run-up to the midterm elections. The House Republican leadership announced Tuesday that it plans votes this summer on social issues, including a same-sex marriage amendment, abortion rights, Internet gambling, property rights and the Pledge of Allegiance.

"The American Values Agenda will defend America's founding principles," Speaker J. Dennis Hastert said. "Through this agenda, we will work to protect the faith of our people, the sanctity of life and freedoms outlined by our founding fathers."

And the House on Tuesday approved on a voice vote a proposal that would prohibit condominium associations and other homeowner groups from preventing residents from displaying the flag.

The American Civil Liberties Union, which has been deeply involved in opposing the amendment for years, credited the senators who took a potentially politically tough vote to block it.

DOJ_NMG_0037002

"The Senate came close to torching our Constitution, but luckily it came through unscathed," said Caroline Fredrickson, director of the organization's Washington legislative office. "We applaud those brave senators who stood up for the First Amendment and rejected this damaging and needless amendment."

Besides senators up for re-election, the issue also divided lawmakers considered possible presidential candidates in 2008. Those voting yes included Mr. Frist, George Allen of Virginia, John McCain of Arizona, Sam Brownback of Kansas and Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, all Republicans, and Evan Bayh of Indiana, a Democrat. Voting no on the Democratic side were Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut, Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware, Russell D. Feingold of Wisconsin and John Kerry of Massachusetts.

Flag-Burning Amendment Fails In Senate By 1 Vote (WSJ)

By Sarah Lueck

The Wall Street Journal, June 28, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Senate narrowly failed to approve a proposed constitutional amendment to ban burning the American flag, as supporters fell just one vote short of the 67 needed for passage.

Fourteen Democrats were among the 66 senators voting for the proposal, which would have been a crucial step toward giving Congress the authority to prohibit "physical desecration" of the flag, just before the Fourth of July recess, when many lawmakers will return home to campaign for re-election. Three Republicans and 31 Democrats voted against it.

Opponents said they didn't want to change the Constitution to prevent an action that rarely occurs. They proposed a substitute, a statute that would have prohibited damaging the flag in narrow circumstances, such as when it belongs to the federal government or is destroyed on federal land or to incite violence. "There are ways we can deal with this" without an amendment, said Sen. Richard Durbin (D., Ill.). "We feel we should not desecrate the Constitution."

Supporters said they wanted to protect an important symbol. "Destroying the very emblem of that freedom is just plain wrong," said Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R., Tenn.).

Daniel Wheeler, the president of the Citizens Flag Alliance, a coalition led by the American Legion that has been lobbying hard to win Senate passage, said he was disappointed by the vote.

Underscoring the politics behind the measure, Mr. Wheeler said his group will work to publicize the votes of amendment opponents. The coalition plans to highlight the "no" votes of Democratic Sens. Kent Conrad and Byron Dorgan, both of North Dakota, as well as Maria Cantwell of Washington, among others. Mr. Wheeler said Sen. Mitch McConnell, the Kentucky Republican and majority whip who voted against the amendment, also would be a target.

Flag Amendment Rejected By One Vote In Senate (LAT)

By Johanna Neuman And Faye Fiore

The Los Angeles Times, June 28, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Senate today rejected by only one vote a constitutional amendment that would have given Congress the power to ban flag burning.

The tally was a blow to supporters who thought their time had come after 16 years of trying to overcome a Supreme Court ruling that held that legislative bans on flag burning violated the Constitution's free speech provisions.

"It's not a question of if, but when," said Marty Justis, executive director of the Citizens Flag Alliance, a coalition of 147 organizations, including the American Legion, that has spent about $25 million since 1989 to back an amendment. "We will be back."

The vote capped two days of debate, during which opponents charged that the push for an amendment was driven more by politics than patriotism. They argued that the main aim of Republican sponsors was to rally conservatives in an election year even if that meant trampling on the Constitution to do it.

In addition to urging that the flag be protected, proponents argued that the Supreme Court in its 5-4 ruling had usurped the will of the people.

DOJ_NMG_0037003

More than a dozen Democrats supported the amendment, disputing charges that it would trample on free speech rights. In an emotional speech, Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) talked about picking up a newspaper in February 1945 to see Joe Rosenthal's iconic photograph of U.S. Marines struggling to raise the flag on Iwo Jima.

"For me, at that time as a 12-year-old, and for the nation, the photo was a bolt of electricity that boosted morale," Feinstein said. "Its symbolism of everything courageous about my country was etched into my mind for all time."

She said that "protecting the flag will not prevent anyone from expressing his or her point of view."

Opponents countered that amending the Constitution to ban the desecration of the flag would violate the principle of free speech that allows protesters to burn or stomp on the flag as part of their demonstration.

"We must also defend the right of all Americans to express their views about their government, however hateful or spiteful or disrespectful those views may be," Sen. Russ Feingold (D-Wis.) said. "America is not simply a nation of symbols, it is a nation of principles."

Proponents argued that the Supreme Court had overreached.

"Who gets the final word -- five Justices on the Supreme Court or we the people?" asked Sen. John Cornyn (R-Texas). "The flag is the symbol of our freedom. Why in the world would we refuse to protect it?"

Countering arguments that the constitutional amendment would amend the Bill of Rights and curb free speech, Cornyn added: "This is not about speech, it's about behavior."

Sen. Orrin Hatch (R-Utah), chief sponsor of the effort, blasted those who suggested, as Sen. Dick Durbin (D-Ill.) had, that the flag amendment would for the first time amend the Bill of Rights.

"This doesn't have anything about the Bill of Rights in it," he said. "All it says is we're going to give power back to the people."

Critics argued that the effort to amend the Constitution was a solution in search of a problem because an unofficial collection of desecrations posted on the Citizens Flag Alliance website lists four events this year and about 50 in the past five years.

Unlike flag burning in the 1960s -- a powerful symbol of opposition to the Vietnam War -- these days flag burners are prosecuted for other crimes, such as public drunkenness, theft, vandalism or setting a dangerous fire.

"What is amazing is that even in a time of war and discontent, patriotism and great respect for the flag exists without a constitutional amendment. We don't need to force Americans to love the flag, they just do," said Terri Ann Schroeder, senior lobbyist for the American Civil Liberties Union, which worked against the amendment.

If the constitutional amendment eventually passes Congress, it would be sent to the states for ratification. At least 38 states would have to ratify the language within seven years before it would become the 28th amendment to the Constitution.

A recent CNN poll showed 56% of Americans favor a flag-burning amendment, and all 50 states have asked Congress to send them the amendment for ratification.

Senate Rejects Flag Desecration Amendment (WP)

By Charles Babington

The Washington Post, June 28, 2006

The Senate rejected by a single vote yesterday an effort to amend the Constitution to allow Congress to ban desecration of the American flag, after a two-day debate freighted with political calculations and sharp disputes over the limits of free speech.

The 66 to 34 vote fell just short of the two-thirds majority required to approve a constitutional amendment and submit it to the states for ratification. It marked the latest setback for congressional attempts to supersede Supreme Court decisions in 1989 and 1990. Justices narrowly ruled that burning and other desecrations of the flag are protected as free speech under the First Amendment.

As expected, three Republicans -- Robert F. Bennett (Utah), Lincoln D. Chafee (R.I.) and Mitch McConnell (Ky.) -- voted against the amendment. Fourteen Democrats voted for it. The House approved the measure 286 to 130 last year.

GOP congressional leaders have offered up several measures in recent weeks that are important to their conservative political base -- including an amendment banning same-sex marriage and further cuts in the estate tax -- culminating with yesterday's vote on flag burning.

DOJ_NMG_0037004

Polls show that most Americans want flag desecration outlawed, and the amendment's proponents said they were trying to stop justices from thwarting the public's will. They said that burning a U.S. flag in public -- while rare these days -- is a reprehensible insult to the nation's founders and a dishonor to the Americans who died fighting tyranny.

The amendment's opponents agreed that flag burning is repugnant, but argued that U.S. troops died to preserve freedoms that include controversial political statements.

Flag burning "is obscene, painful and unpatriotic," Sen. Daniel K. Inouye (D-Hawaii), who lost an arm in World War II, said in a floor speech yesterday. "But I believe Americans gave their lives in the many wars to make certain that all Americans have a right to express themselves -- even those who harbor hateful thoughts."

Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) summarized the proponents' views. The flag's special symbolic status, she said, makes its desecration different from holding a sign denouncing the president. Burning an American flag in anger, she said, is "conduct, not speech" because the flag is "the symbol of our democracy, our shared values, our commitment to justice, our remembrance to those who have sacrificed to defend these principles."

Behind the constitutional rhetoric were cold political considerations. Republicans are eager to energize conservative voters this fall, and the flag initiative -- even if doomed to fail -- is seen as a sure-fire way to inspire them, especially a week before Independence Day.

The vote is the closest that advocates have come to banning flag desecration in many years of trying. In 2000, the Senate fell four votes short, and supporters had hoped the GOP's 55 to 44 majority -- there is one independent, James M. Jeffords (Vt.) -- would put them over the top this year.

The GOP-controlled House has repeatedly approved the amendment by wide margins, and advocates say they could have handily obtained ratification by three-quarters of the states if the Senate had followed suit.

The debate divided senators along unusual lines. Opposing the amendment was McConnell, the Senate's second-ranking GOP leader, and Bennett, a quiet, mainstream Republican. Democratic supporters included Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (Nev.) and Sen. Evan Bayh (Ind.), a presidential hopeful. Maryland's Democratic senators voted against the amendment and Virginia's Republican senators voted for it.

The amendment's chief sponsor, Sen. Orrin G. Hatch (R-Utah), disputed assertions that the measure was politically motivated and was an unwise use of the Senate's time in the face of war in Iraq, high gasoline prices and a growing federal deficit.

"Fifty state legislatures have called on us to pass this amendment," Hatch told colleagues.

He and his allies had tried for days to pick up one more vote. But virtually all senators had stated their positions publicly, making efforts at negotiation or persuasion fruitless.

The Constitution was last amended -- for the 27th time -- in 1992, when the states belatedly ratified a 1789 bid by Congress to regulate lawmakers' pay increases.

Overturning a Texas law in 1989, the Supreme Court ruled 5 to 4 that burning an American flag in protest is a form of political speech protected under the First Amendment. Congress later passed a federal anti-flag-desecration law, and the high court invalidated it on the same grounds.

Ever since, lawmakers have debated whether flag burning is an unsavory cost of political freedom or something more akin to intolerable hate speech or monument defacement.

"All rights enshrined in the Constitution have certain limits," said Sen. Mel Martinez (R-Fla.). "There is no such thing as unlimited rights. Although we treasure and value our right of free speech . . . we protect our national monuments," including the flag.

But Russell Feingold (D-Wis.) said Congress must "defend the right of all Americans to express their views about their government, however hateful or spiteful or disrespectful those views may be."

The proposed amendment said simply: "The Congress shall have power to prohibit the physical desecration of the flag of the United States."

Before the final tally, the Senate voted 64 to 36 to reject an alternative measure designed to provide political cover for those who opposed Hatch's legislation. The measure -- a proposed statute, rather than constitutional amendment -- was offered by

DOJ_NMG_0037005

Sen. Richard J. Durbin (D-Ill.) and was strongly endorsed by Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), a possible presidential candidate who has sought a middle ground in the flag-burning debate.

The proposal would have outlawed flag desecration if the perpetrators were also damaging federal property, trying to incite violence or trying to intimidate someone. Opponents called Durbin's measure a political fig leaf that the Supreme Court would rule unconstitutional.

Hours before the votes were taken, Sen. George Allen (R-Va.) thrust the issue into his reelection campaign. Noting that Democratic challenger James Webb had said he opposed the amendment, Allen's campaign issued a press release linking Webb to Sens. John F. Kerry and Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts, who voted against the amendment. The release said Webb is "totally beholden to the liberal Washington senators" who backed him in this month's primary.

Senate Rejects Flag Desecration Amendment (AP-Y2)

By Laurie Kellman

AP2, June 27, 2006

A constitutional amendment to ban flag desecration died in a Senate cliffhanger Tuesday, a single vote short of the support needed to send it to the states for ratification and four months before voters elect a new Congress.

The 66-34 tally in favor of the amendment was one less than the two-thirds required. The House surpassed that threshold last year, 286-130.

The proposed amendment, sponsored by Sen. Orrin Hatch (news, bio, voting record), R-Utah, read: "The Congress shall have power to prohibit the physical desecration of the flag of the United States."

It represented Congress' response to Supreme Court rulings in 1989 and 1990 that burning and other desecrations of the flag are protected as free speech by the First Amendment to the Constitution.

Senate supporters said the flag amounts to a national monument in cloth that represents freedom and the sacrifice of American troops.

"Countless men and women have died defending that flag," said Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., closing two days of debate. "It is but a small humble act for us to defend it."

Opponents said the amendment would violate the First Amendment right to free speech. And some Democrats complained that majority Republicans were exploiting people's patriotism for political advantage in the midterm elections.

"Our country's unique because our dissidents have a voice," said Sen. Daniel Inouye (news, bio, voting record), D-Hawaii, a World War II veteran who lost an arm in the war and was decorated with the Medal of Honor.

"While I take offense at disrespect to the flag," he said, "I nonetheless believe it is my continued duty as a veteran, as an American citizen, and as a United States senator to defend the constitutional right of protesters to use the flag in nonviolent speech."

Among possible presidential contenders in 2008, six voted yes: Democrat Evan Bayh of Indiana and Republicans George Allen of Virginia, Sam Brownback of Kansas, Frist, Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, and John McCain of Arizona. Five, all Democrats, voted no: Joseph Biden of Delaware, Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, Christopher Dodd of Connecticut, Russell Feingold of Wisconsin, John Kerry of Massachusetts.

The Senate also rejected an alternative put forward by assistant Democratic leader Dick Durbin of Illinois. It would have made it against the law to damage the flag on federal land or with the intent of breaching the peace or intimidation. It also would have prohibited unapproved demonstrations at military funerals.

The last time the Senate considered the amendment, in 2000, it fell four votes short of what was needed. Both sides predicted rightly before Tuesday's vote that it would get more support.

The last proposed constitutional amendment that Congress sent to the states for ratification was the Equal Rights Amendment in 1972. The normal seven-year deadline for state ratification was extended to 1982, but the ERA couldn't muster the approval of more than 35 state legislatures, three short of the three-fourths of states required under the Constitution.

The 26th Amendment, guaranteeing 18-year-olds the right to vote, was approved by Congress in March 1971 and was ratified by the states less than four months later.

DOJ_NMG_0037006

The 27th Amendment, ratified in 1992, was first proposed in 1789. It says pay raises that Congress votes for itself can't take effect until after the next election for members of the House.

The House also got into the July Fourth spirit Tuesday by passing on a voice vote a measure that would bar condominium and homeowner associations from restricting how the flag can be displayed.

Sponsored by Rep. Roscoe Bartlett (news, bio, voting record), R-Md., the resolution would prohibit those groups from preventing residents from displaying an American flag on their own property. The Senate is considering whether to bring up the measure this year.

___

The proposed flag amendment is S.J. Res. 12.

Senate Nixes Old Glory Amendment (HILL)

By Jonathan Allen

The Hill, June 28, 2006

The Senate last night rejected a constitutional amendment that would allow Congress to ban flag desecration. The 66-34 tally fell one vote short of the two-thirds support necessary to send the measure to the states.

Just before the vote, the Senate also defeated, 36-64, a substitute amendment combining a statutory desecration ban and a bill that would prohibit demonstrations at military funerals.

Invoking the American flag that flew over Iwo Jima during World War II and the one raised at the site of the World Trade Center after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) said the stars and stripes inspire acts of heroism, courage and strength in the name of freedom.

"Destroying the very emblem of that freedom is just flat wrong," Frist said.

Sen. Russ Feingold (D-Wis.), like Frist a possible 2008 presidential candidate, argued that free expression is more important than a symbol of that freedom.

"America is not simply a nation of symbols; it is a nation of principles," Feingold said. "And the most important principle of all, the principle that has made this country a beacon of hope and inspiration for oppressed people throughout the world, is the right of free expression."

All but three Republicans, Sens. Mitch McConnell (Ky.), Bob Bennett (Utah) and Lincoln Chafee (R.I.), voted for the constitutional amendment, and 14 Democrats supported it. Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) and freshman Sen. Robert Menendez (D-N.J.) voted for both proposals.

Amendment supporters, including sponsor Sen. Orrin Hatch (R-Utah), said a change to the Constitution is necessary because the courts have invalidated statutory flag-desecration bans. The amendment, they noted, would not actually prohibit flag desecration.

"Why wouldn't we want to restore power back to the people?" Hatch said.

California Democrat Sen. Dianne Feinstein took a similar tack.

"In honor of this emblem of America, I ask that this body permit us to give the American people the opportunity to decide if the Constitution should be amended," Feinstein said. "It is time to let the people decide."

Critics argued that few American flags are burned, that an amendment to the Constitution would be the wrong fix for such a problem and that the nation has more pressing business.

"I completely agree that flag burning is a contemptible act, calculated to outrage rather than persuade. But even if there was a nationwide epidemic of flag burning, it would not begin to rival the problems we have faced without amending the Bill of Rights," said Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.).

Proponents sought to draw a distinction between speech and physical acts.

"This amendment seeks to prevent the physical abuse of a symbol that has served our country in many valuable ways through its history," said Sen. Mel Martinez (R-Fla.). "It does not do so by restricting anyone's speech, but by addressing their physical conduct."

DOJ_NMG_0037007

Sen. Frank Lautenberg (D-N.J.) brought a picture of singer Kid Rock to the floor of the Senate to argue that one man's act of patriotism is another man's act of desecration.

"Here he is, Kid Rock, with his head through the flag. Is that a desecration? It was such a desecration that he was invited to address the Republican convention, and they partied with him and they loved him," Lautenberg said.

The two sides bantered all day over the urgency and propriety of the amendment.

"The timing of this consideration, four months before the mid-term election, raises concerns, again, that the Constitution is being misused for partisan purposes," said Vermont Sen. Patrick Leahy, the leading Democrat on the Judiciary Committee. "That is wrong."

Even some who supported the amendment suggested it was not the most pressing business before the Senate.

"It's not a burning issue in the grand scheme of things" said Sen. Gordon Smith (R-Ore.).

Not Quite The Banner Day One Might Have Hoped For (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, June 28, 2006

As the Senate's flag-desecration debate heated up yesterday and the sparks began to fly -- but before the smoke cleared -- the amendment's backers were asked a burning question: Is this the most important issue facing the nation?

The senators rushed to extinguish the very thought.

"I don't think anybody would say it's the most important," said Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.).

"No, no, not even close," said Sen. John Ensign (R-Nev.), who, like Lott and 57 other senators, nevertheless signed on as a co-sponsor of the amendment.

"Ha, ha, ha," Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison (R-Tex.), another co-sponsor, replied, before disappearing through an unmarked doorway.

In fact, when the question was put to 19 Senate supporters of the amendment yesterday in the Capitol corridors off of the Senate chamber, only one -- amendment author Orrin Hatch (R-Utah) -- asserted that this was indeed the nation's No. 1 priority. And that was only after some serious goading.

So why is the Senate, which came within one vote of approving the amendment yesterday, giving the matter such prominence?

Backers of the flag amendment had planned to make the issue the highlight of their last week in town before the July 4 recess. But by midday yesterday, they were flagging. Originally planning to spend as many as four days of debate on the amendment, they decided to get rid of it before sunset. "This is the day we're dealing with it," Sen. Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.) vowed as he made his way to the chamber.

Out on a lethargic Senate floor, both sides were struggling to find speakers to fill the time for debate. Starting at 11 a.m., the lawmakers killed time with five quorum calls as they hunted for somebody to take the floor; one quorum call ended only when the senators decided it was time for lunch.

After a two-hour party lunch, Republican senators went to the microphone to talk about national security, not flag security. By late afternoon, Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) gave up the flag talk entirely and gave a speech instead about a judicial nominee.

"It's not a burning issue," a wry Sen. Gordon Smith (R-Ore.) told The Hill newspaper's Jonathan Allen off the Senate floor. Smith, a backer of the amendment, betrayed no hint that his wordplay was intentional.

Nearby, Sen. John Sununu (R-N.H.) was practically running from the debate. Would he take a question about flag burning? "Uh, no," he said. He paused to reconsider, then walked away briskly. "No, sorry," he reaffirmed.

If wrapping oneself in the flag were a form of desecration, senators on both sides of the issue would have been in some trouble yesterday. Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) called a midday news conference outside his office with two colleagues. They stood in front of three gold-trimmed flags, eagles atop each.

"The American flag represents everything this country stands for," Sen. Jim Bunning (R-Ky.) told the assembled. "I am ready to go on this amendment!"

DOJ_NMG_0037008

But is this the most important issue facing the nation? Frist was uneasy. "You know, it's interesting, in terms of the question of why, why, why now," he began, then decided to rephrase the question. "Is it important?" he asked. "You bet it's important."

Fortunately for Frist, his Democratic counterpart was struggling on another flag-bedecked stage. "I think we have some misplaced priorities," Sen. Harry Reid (Nev.) said, condemning the amendment at a news conference. "I don't think it's the right time to bring up the issue." Reid seemed a bit sheepish as he acknowledged, "I'll vote for it."

So if he thinks bringing it up is such a bad idea, why is he voting for it? "I'm confident it won't pass," Reid explained.

Hatch alone seemed unburdened of doubt. "This sends a message to the [Supreme] Court like it's never been sent before!" he said. "In my opinion, there's nothing that would supersede this in importance."

Nobody would join Hatch in assigning the "most important" label.

"I know how y'all use those questions," said a suspicious George Allen (R-Va.).

"I'm not going to put it 'the most important,' " said Norm Coleman (R-Minn.).

"I wouldn't call it the most pressing," demurred John Cornyn (R-Tex.) How about top 10? "I can't give you a top 10," Cornyn again dodged.

Out on the floor, the debate was getting sloppy. Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.), a supporter, displayed a poster of Iwo Jima. Sen. Frank Lautenberg (D-N.J.), an opponent, countered with a poster of Kid Rock wearing a flag.

Was this any way to amend the Constitution? Hatch went to the floor to steel the chamber's resolve. "I was asked this afternoon by a large body of media: Is this the most important thing the Senate could be doing at this time?" he told his colleagues, answering the question, "I can tell you: You're darned right it is."

An hour later, Hatch fell a vote short of his goal. But there was no time to wallow: Oregon's Smith was already on the floor, hailing Oregon State University's college baseball World Series victory.

"Mr. President," Smith announced with an enthusiasm that eluded him during the flag-burning debate, "I stand before you a Beaver believer."

US Senate Turns Down Constitutional Ban On Flag Burning (AFP)

AFP, June 27, 2006

The Republican majority in the US Senate failed by just one vote Tuesday to amend the US Constitution to ban desecration of the American flag.

The motion, backed by 66 votes, fell one vote short of the two-thirds majority needed to pass a constitutional amendment. Thirty-four senators voted against it.

Backed by President George W. Bush, the measure had been promoted by the Republican majority as it tries to rally its conservative base ahead of key congressional elections in November.

Opponents of the measure said flag burning is an expression of free speech that is guaranteed by the US Bill of Rights, and which must be protected.

But the leader of Senate Republicans, Bill Frist, said the vote was a defeat for the US flag itself and the patriotic American spirit it represents.

"'Old Glory' lost today," Frist said after the vote.

And like other supporters of the amendment, he said especially at a time of war, it was important to protect the flag as a symbol of freedom and national unity.

"At a time when our armed services are defending America's freedom in the war on terror, it's unfortunate that a minority of my colleagues blocked this amendment," he said.

The Republican leader also suggested that a future vote on a similar amendment could be in the offing.

"I hope the amendment's support in the Senate will continue to grow," he said. "In the meantime, I hope America rededicates itself to respecting the flag, our symbol of national unity, especially when our troops are wearing that flag as they risk their lives for this great country every day."

Votes on outlawing desecration of the flag have become a perennial feature of the Republican-led Congress, with each succeeding vote getting a little closer to passage.

DOJ_NMG_0037009

The measure voted on Tuesday, a one sentence bill, read simply: "The Congress shall have the power to prohibit the physical desecration of the flag of the United States."

Had the measure prevailed, the vote could have been an initial step in what would have been the first congressionally mandated change to the Constitution in 35 years.

In order to change the Constitution, at least 38 of 50 states would have to accept a proposed amendment within seven years of the congressional vote.

Over the past decade and a half, since the US Supreme Court ruled that flag desecration, including burning, was a protected form of speech, Congress repeatedly has attempted to approve a ban on flag desecration.

Those bills have been approved various times in the House of Representatives, only to go down in defeat in the Senate. The House most recently passed an effort to insert a flag burning ban into the Constitution last year.

Some lawmakers, including US Senator Hillary Clinton and the Senate's Deputy Democratic leader, Richard Durbin, took a middle ground on the measure, saying they are opposed to flag desecration, but also against revising the Constitution.

They co-authored a separate bill, which was also defeated Tuesday, which would have made flag desecration a crime, but without amending the Constitution.

Flag Amendment Fails In Senate (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, June 28, 2006

The Senate last night fell one vote shy of passing a constitutional amendment against flag burning, with supporters calling the vote a blow to the American flag.

"Old Glory lost today," said Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, Tennessee Republican. "Protecting the symbol of our nation's freedom is important, and I hope the amendment's support in the Senate will continue to grow."

The American Civil Liberties Union countered by calling the vote a "victory for the First Amendment."

Senators voted 66-34 in favor of the amendment, an increase of three lawmakers since the last Senate vote in March 2000 but short of the 67 needed. Senate leaders were not certain up to the last minute whether the measure would pass. They initially thought they would fall a vote short, but they hoped to persuade a final senator.

The amendment would have granted Congress the authority to write laws banning the physical desecration of the American flag.

Over two days of debate, supporters argued that the American flag must be protected because it "represents everything this country stands for," said Sen. Jim Bunning, Kentucky Republican.

They said the amendment would "send a message to the Supreme Court," which struck down state flag-protection laws in 1989 and a federal law intended to reverse that ruling.

"The Supreme Court should not be deciding difficult social issues," said Sen. Orrin G. Hatch, Utah Republican.

President Bush last night issued a statement saying that he thinks respect for the flag shows "reverence for the ideals that guide our nation."

"The American people deserve the opportunity to express their views on this important issue," he said.

Supporters noted that all 50 state legislatures have supported flag protection, and said the House of Representatives has passed such an amendment six times.

Opponents agreed that desecrating the flag is "disgusting," "abhorrent" and "offensive," but said changing the Constitution would be a violation of free speech.

"I love the flag; we all love the flag and all that it represents," said Sen. Robert C. Byrd, West Virginia Democrat, clutching a copy of the Constitution.

"While I agree that desecration of the flag is abhorrent, repugnant, amending the Constitution flies in the very face of the First Amendment right of freedom of speech," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0037010

Burning a flag is "obscene, painful, unpatriotic," said Sen. Daniel K. Inouye, Hawaii Democrat and a World War II veteran. "But I believe Americans gave their lives in many wars to make sure that all Americans have the right to express themselves, even those who express painful thoughts."

Opponents of the amendment also argued that the concept of "desecration" was vague. They showed images of Mr. Bush using a marker to autograph a U.S. flag and of musician Kid Rock wearing a shirt made out of the flag.

They noted that only a few incidents of flag burning have occurred since the Supreme Court decision, and said the Senate has more important issues to debate before the weeklong Independence Day recess.

Sen. Patrick J. Leahy, Vermont Democrat, said Republicans had "turned the flag into a partisan political weapon."

However, 14 Democrats joined all but three of the chamber's 55 Republicans in favor of the amendment.

Meanwhile yesterday, the House unanimously passed by voice vote a bill that said condominium associations cannot prohibit residents from flying the American flag at their homes.

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, Illinois Republican, praised his chamber's resolution, calling the flag the nation's "most vivid and sacred symbol of freedom."

Senate Rejects Flag Bill By 1 Vote (USAT)

By Andrea Stone

USA Today, June 28, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Senate fell one vote short Tuesday of passing a constitutional amendment that would have allowed Congress to ban desecration of the U.S. flag.

Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah, and other supporters vowed to try again next year, after a new Congress is elected in November. Since 1990, the measure has failed five times in the Senate to get the two-thirds vote needed to move to the states for ratification. The House of Representatives has approved the amendment seven times, most recently last year.

Hatch says the measure is needed to protect a symbol of freedom and counteract U.S. Supreme Court decisions in 1989 and 1990 that struck down state and federal laws. He cites polls showing public support and non-binding resolutions by 50 state legislatures endorsing the amendment.

“This is a setback, but it's not a final defeat,” he said. “For protecting the Stars and Stripes, I will not give up.”

Opponents said the measure would have curtailed First Amendment rights on speech for the first time since the Bill of Rights was adopted in 1791.

“While I take offense at disrespect to the flag,” said Sen. Daniel Inouye, D-Hawaii, “I nonetheless believe it is my continued duty as a veteran, as an American citizen and as a United States senator to defend the constitutional right of protesters to use the flag in non-violent speech.”

The amendment reads, “The Congress shall have power to prohibit the physical desecration of the flag of the United States.” According to the pro-amendment Citizens Flag Alliance, there were four cases of flag desecration in 2006.

The vote came a week before Independence Day and about five months before the fall elections, prompting both sides to charge the other with playing election-year politics. It was the second time this month the Senate failed to pass a constitutional amendment. The other was a ban on gay marriage.

“The Constitution has survived yet another round of election-year politicking,” said Terri Ann Schroeder of the ACLU, which opposed the flag amendment.

Still, supporters were encouraged. In 2000, the Senate came up four votes short.

Senators also rejected a statute to ban flag desecration. The narrowly worded legislation would have made it a crime to desecrate the flag under certain circumstances, such as when trying to incite violence.

Sen. Dick Durbin, D-Ill., called it a “reasonable alternative that would protect the flag without infringing on our Bill of Rights.” Hatch said the statute was an attempt by some “to cover their backsides.”

Senator Clinton And Liberals Split Over Flag Desecration (NYT)

By Anne E. Kornblut

The New York Times, June 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0037011

WASHINGTON, June 27 — Perhaps even more than her stance on the war in Iraq, it is Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton's position on flag desecration that has drawn the scorn of the liberal Democratic base.

When Mrs. Clinton took a stand on the matter last year — co-sponsoring legislation that would have criminalized the desecration of the American flag even as she opposed a constitutional amendment that sought to achieve the same end — she was pilloried from the left. Editorial boards criticized her for political maneuvering, the political commentator Arianna Huffington attacked her for "stars, stripes and triangulation" and even some of her supporters quietly wondered why she had gone out on a limb on such a controversial issue.

On Tuesday, Mrs. Clinton played a leading role in the flag-burning debate once again, co-sponsoring a measure similar to her previous one as an alternative to the constitutional amendment that was about to come up for a vote in the Senate.

"Fortunately, we have an opportunity to protect our flag in a bipartisan and constitutional way," Mrs. Clinton said in her floor speech.

The measure, brought to the floor by Senator Richard J. Durbin, Democrat of Illinois, failed, 64 to 36, minutes before the proposed amendment fell short of the 67 votes it needed.

With more than half of Democrats supporting the measure, the outcome suggested that Mrs. Clinton's approach had plenty of adherents within her party, and that while she might have tried the patience of her core liberal supporters, she remained within the Democratic fold as she prepared for a possible presidential race.

The divergent views of her position reflect a broader rift in the Democratic Party over whether the key to electoral success rests in winning over centrists or by drawing clear distinctions with Republicans by staking out unapologetically liberal positions.

"What's politically pragmatic isn't always what's pleasing to the left," said Steve McMahon, a Democratic consultant. "But pragmatism is what wins elections for Democrats."

Representative Barney Frank, Democrat of Massachusetts, gave Mrs. Clinton credit for trying to give Democrats a viable alternative to amending the Constitution to ban flag desecration.

"This is an effort to try to take into account the people on the left by narrowing" the proposal, Mr. Frank said. "I still disagree with it. But it's clearly a move away from the constitutional amendment, rather than toward it."

Senator John Kerry, Democrat of Massachusetts and a former presidential nominee, voted for the measure, which closely resembled past efforts to pre-empt an amendment to the Constitution. Democrats who voted for the measure in effect bought themselves the right to claim that they had voted against flag desecration, potentially inoculating themselves against possible charges of lacking patriotism in a general election campaign. The broader measure to amend the Constitution failed by a single vote, 66 to 34.

Ms. Huffington was not mollified.

"It seems in line with her stance on so many issues — trying to strike right in the middle and triangulate, by not supporting the amendment because that would upset the base too much and at the same time supporting a legislative proposal that will appeal to the center," she said of Mrs. Clinton. "It's a truly tragic way of leading."

Arresting Prison Reform (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, June 28, 2006

GOV. ARNOLD SCHWARZENEGGER'S collapse on prison reform is one of the most disappointing failures of his tenure. Soon after taking office in 2003, he embraced initiatives to reduce the inmate population. The extent of his retreat in the face of opposition from the guards union is evident in his new four-part plan for the prisons.

The centerpiece of the governor's plan is a bill by Assembly Speaker Fabian Nuñez (D-Los Angeles) to build two prisons using lease revenue bonds, which are advantageous for politicians because they don't require voter approval. The downside is that they are horribly expensive, with higher interest rates than voter-approved bonds. The two prisons, which would cost at least $500 million each to build, could end up costing taxpayers a total of at least $2 billion.

The expense might be worth it if building new prisons were the solution to California's correctional problems. It is not, which is why voters refuse to back them. New prisons are much like new freeways, in that they don't do much to solve overcrowding problems — as soon as you build them, they fill up. Further, although overcrowding is a serious issue, the state's corrections system also is plagued by ineffective management and a dangerous shortage of guards; building more prisons alone would only exacerbate the latter two problems while doing little to solve the former.

DOJ_NMG_0037012

The governor also wants to use lease revenue bonds to build "parole reentry facilities" — secure detention centers in communities where male inmates would be released and where those near the end of their sentences could be sent for mental health counseling and job training. It's a fine idea, though politically impractical — if there is a community in California that would welcome the construction of a small prison, we'd like to see it. The costs of these facilities are unknown, but the funding mechanism guarantees that they would be steep.

Equally problematic is the governor's proposal to shift 4,500 nonviolent female inmates to community rehab centers near their homes. This might work if there were enough existing centers to house the inmates or guards to staff them, but there aren't. That means building even more expensive mini-prisons in communities that don't want them.

The governor's plan does nothing to address the concerns of a federal judge investigating abuses of inmates by guards. It doesn't address the shortage of guards nor the management problems that make California's prisons a national embarrassment. Though ostensibly aimed at overcrowding, it doesn't even propose genuine solutions to that problem, such as reforms in sentencing laws and a major boost in rehabilitation programs. If the Legislature, which met in special session Tuesday night to discuss the governor's proposals, wants to set things right, a radical shift in approach is required.

Complain Without Fear (WP)

The Washington Post, June 28, 2006

HAVING LAWS against workplace discrimination isn't much help if employees fear that they'll be punished for filing a claim. So from the start the federal employment discrimination law has offered protection against retaliation to workers who claim discrimination. What's been unclear, however, and a matter of disagreement among the lower federal courts, is precisely what treatment constitutes illegal retaliation. Specifically, is it limited to on-the-job activity or could it involve other actions outside the workplace? And if the retaliation occurs on the job, how serious must it be?

The Supreme Court resolved this issue last week in a decision that was remarkable for both its real-world sensibility and its unanimity. (All nine justices agreed that illegal retaliation had occurred in the case before the court, and all but one, Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr., agreed on a single standard to govern such cases.) The court found that illegal retaliation can take place on or off the job and that it applies to situations in which the employer's actions are "harmful to the point that they could well dissuade a reasonable worker from making or supporting a charge of discrimination." This is a sensible middle ground between extremes that had been adopted by some of the federal appeals courts that considered the issue.

The case involved Sheila White, a forklift operator and the only woman working in the "maintenance of way" department at Burlington Northern & Santa Fe Railway's Tennessee Yard in Memphis. Ms. White complained to officials that her immediate supervisor had repeatedly told her that women shouldn't be working in the department and had made insulting and inappropriate remarks to her.

While the supervisor was disciplined, Ms. White was transferred from forklift duty to the more onerous task of track laborer. In the course of a dispute over her new duties, Ms. White was suspended without pay for 37 days for insubordination. The company ultimately overturned the suspension and awarded Ms. White back pay for that period.

Writing for the eight-justice majority, Justice Stephen G. Breyer emphasized that "petty slights or minor annoyances" wouldn't rise to the level of retaliation, and that the conduct had to be objectively problematic -- enough to dissuade a "reasonable" employee. But as Justice Breyer wisely noted, "Context matters. . . . A change in an employee's work schedule may make little difference to many workers, but may matter enormously to a young mother with school age children."

Thus, in Ms. White's case, while both her forklift driving and her track-clearing duties fell within the same job description, as Justice Breyer wrote, "Common sense suggests that one good way to discourage an employee such as White from bringing discrimination charges would be to insist that she spend more time performing the more arduous duties and less time performing those that are easier or more agreeable."

DOJ_NMG_0037013

Similarly, Ms. White's suspension without pay could have been unlawful retaliation even if she was eventually compensated for the time off. "Many reasonable employees would find a month without a paycheck to be a serious hardship," and take that into account before filing a complaint, Justice Breyer noted.

For a court sometimes characterized by ivory-tower jurisprudence, this ruling was a welcome instance of common-sense judging.

ANTITRUST:

PSC Considers BellSouth-AT&T Merger (AP)

By Holbrook Mohr

AP, June 28, 2006

JACKSON, Miss. - A proposed merger between AT&T and BellSouth Corp. has no provisions that would immediately cut jobs in Mississippi, but some opponents fear smaller competitors here could suffer if they are not protected.

The $67 billion plan met opposition during a hearing before the Mississippi Public Service Commission on Tuesday from a workers' union and telecommunication companies that are concerned the massive acquisition could lead to monopolization of the market.

The Mississippi commission, the Justice Department, the Federal Communications Commission and several other states would have to sign off on the deal, which was announced in March.

Those testifying on behalf of the two companies on Tuesday played down the competition between AT&T and BellSouth, saying the companies target different customers. However, in a February filing with the Security and Exchange Commission, BellSouth said one of its most significant local competitors is AT&T Corp.

Mike Walker, a BellSouth spokesman, told The Associated Press that the February filing is related to all the states where BellSouth operates.

"But specifically when you get to Mississippi, AT&T is not a local competitor for this state," Walker said.

Joseph Gillan, testifying on behalf of NuVox Communications and Time Warner Telecom Inc., asked the commission to put a cap on rates that BellSouth would be able to charge other companies for use of its network.

"The primary concern is that this is going to form a massive incumbent monopoly," Gillan told The Associated Press.

Nationwide, the plan would call for downsizing by about 10,000 employees over three years, said James Kahan, AT&T's senior executive vice president of corporate development.

BellSouth employs about 2,500 people in Mississippi and its subsidiary, Cingular Wireless, has about 1,500 employees in the state.

Kahan said there are "no plans to reduce force (and) no plans to close facilities" in Mississippi.

But he rejected requests by the Communications Workers Association to make retention of jobs a condition of the merger.

"We're not willing to commit to not reducing employees in Mississippi even though we don't have any plans," Kahan said. "Putting conditions on one company and not the others is not pro-competetive."

Paul Kimble, an attorney representing the Communication Workers Association, suggested that about half the savings AT&T was hoping for would come from cutting jobs.

Kahan responded that the larger proportion of the jobs that would be lost are management positions. He said some jobs would be cut initially but the hope is that the combined company would ultimately grow.

And he said most of the savings would come through reduced advertising costs and restructuring the companies' assets, including Atlanta-based Cingular Wireless. AT&T owns 60 percent of the company and BellSouth holds the remainder.

BellSouth President John McCullogh praised the plan.

"I'm excited about the merger, it's in the public interest," he said.

AT&T officials said the merger would bring new technology to Mississippi and help protect against the major communications failures the state experienced in the wake of Hurricane Katrina.

DOJ_NMG_0037014

Chris Rice, AT&T's executive vice president of network planning and engineering, testified that the telecommunication giant has invested millions in storm preparation.

BellSouth also needs to merge with AT&T for both companies to remain competitive in a global market, Kahan said.

The merger would also allow for more research and development by spreading the cost to more customers, Kahan testified.

A hearing was set for Tuesday in Tennessee.

McClatchy Closes Deal For Knight Ridder (AP)

By Seth Sutel, AP Business Writer

AP, June 28, 2006

McClatchy Closes Deal for Knight Ridder to Become Second-Largest Newspaper Publisher in U.S.

NEW YORK (AP) -- McClatchy Co. said Tuesday it had completed its acquisition of Knight Ridder Inc., making it the second-largest newspaper publisher in the country in terms of circulation.

The news came a day after Knight Ridder shareholders overwhelmingly approved the transaction in an emotional shareholders meeting in San Jose, Calif., where the company was based.

The company has received notice of regulatory approval for the deal on the condition that it completes its previously announced sale of the St. Paul Pioneer Press. McClatchy already owns the Star Tribune in neighboring Minneapolis, and owning both would have raised antitrust concerns.

McClatchy also announced Tuesday that it had completed the previously announced sales of four Knight Ridder newspapers: the Duluth News Tribune in Minnesota; the Grand Forks Herald in North Dakota; the Aberdeen American News in South Dakota; and the Ft. Wayne News-Sentinel in Indiana and a 75 percent interest in the Fort Wayne Joint Operating Agency.

In all, McClatchy has reached deals to sell 12 of Knight Ridder's 32 papers, which it has said previously it wanted to sell largely because they did not fit McClatchy's criteria of being located in rapidly growing markets.

McClatchy plans to use the roughly $2.1 billion in proceeds from the divestitures to reduce debt taken on to complete the acquisition.

McClatchy already owned 12 newspapers, so with the 20 it is keeping from Knight Ridder it will now have 32. The company said Tuesday that it would have a combined circulation of 3.3 million.

As a result of the closing of the deal, Knight Ridder's stock will no longer be traded. Under the previously announced terms of the transaction, the shares will be converted into the right to receive $40 in cash and .5118 of a Class A McClatchy share.

In trading on the New York Stock Exchange Tuesday, Knight Ridder's shares ended down 62 cents at $60, while McClatchy's fell $1.42 to $39.03, making the deal worth $59.98 per share of Knight Ridder.

Knight Ridder's Chairman P. Anthony Ridder will join the board of McClatchy. Knight Ridder traced its roots back to 1892, when Ridder's great-grandfather Herman Ridder bought a German-language newspaper in New York.

McClatchy Completes Knight Ridder Purchase (MRKTWTCH)

By David B. Wilkerson, MarketWatch

MarketWatch, June 28, 2006

CHICAGO (MarketWatch) -- McClatchy Co. said after Tuesday's closing bell that it has completed its $6.5 billion purchase of fellow newspaper publisher Knight Ridder Inc.

The close came as expected after a legal formality in which McClatchy said it signed an agreement sought by the U.S. Department of Justice to sell the St. Paul, Minn., Pioneer Press, one of the 32 papers it bought from Knight Ridder.

The department's antitrust division earlier in the day filed a U.S. District Court suit and a proposed consent decree allowing the deal to go forward if McClatchy agreed to sell the Pioneer Press.

McClatchy, which owns the neighboring Minneapolis Star Tribune, previously had announced plans to sell the Pioneer Press to the Hearst Corp. to avoid potential antitrust problems.

McClatchy is selling 11 other Knight Ridder properties to reduce debt.

DOJ_NMG_0037015

Following the close of the deal, Knight Ridder shares, which were converted into the right to receive $40 in cash and a fraction of a McClatchy share, will no longer be traded.

McClatchy said it also completed the sales of the Duluth News Tribune; the Grand Forks Herald; the Aberdeen American News; the Ft. Wayne News-Sentinel and a 75% interest in the Fort Wayne Joint Operating Agency.

Along with the proceeds of those sales, McClatchy said it borrowed $3.08 billion under a new bank credit facility to pay for the Knight Ridder purchase.

Last November, Knight Ridder put itself on the block after two of its biggest institutional shareholders demanded that the company pursue a sale to lift its stock price.

McClatchy shares closed Tuesday at $39.03, down $1.42 or 3.51%. David B. Wilkerson is a reporter for MarketWatch in Chicago.

Op-Ed: Are Employees' Statements Their Company's As Well? (LAW)

By Howard E. Heiss And Mark A. Racanelli, New York Law Journal

New York Law Journal, June 28, 2006

Recent federal case finds employee statements made during proffer sessions with the government can be attributed to employers

In a recent criminal case, the antitrust division of the Department of Justice took the position -- and a federal court agreed -- that statements employees make during proffer sessions with the government can be used against their employer at trial, even though the company was not a party to the proffer agreement and was represented by separate counsel.

The government argued that it was permitted to use employees' statements in this way because they are vicarious admissions by the company itself. As far as the government and the court were concerned in that case, the only facts that mattered were that the employee worked at the company at the time of the proffer and made statements about things he did as part of his job.

Whether an aberration or a sign of new thinking at the Justice Department, the case is a cautionary tale for defense lawyers representing companies whose employees have spoken to the government.

But the case also appears to rest on shaky legal ground. It is one thing to say that an employee speaks for the company when talking to coworkers, competitors or investors in a job-related setting. It is something else entirely when employees make statements in a prosecutor's office in an effort to avoid or deflect criminal liability for their business conduct, and when their interests might conflict with those of the company.

JUSTICE DEPARTMENT POSITION: PROFFER AS VICARIOUS ADMISSION

The case, United States v. Alaska Brokerage Int'l, Inc.,1 filed in January 2006 in the U.S. District Court for the Western District of Washington -- involves an indictment against a company (Alaska Brokerage) and its principal (David Karsch) for bid-rigging in the market for animal pelts sold at auction. Karsch, who was the sole employee and officer of Alaska Brokerage, submitted to an interview with the government in an attempt to avoid indictment.2 He signed a proffer agreement acknowledging that the government could "use your statements to impeach your testimony ... or to rebut evidence offered on your behalf."3 During the proffer, Karsch admitted that, on behalf of the company, he entered into agreements with competitors not to bid, or to bid at certain prices, for products at auction.

Alaska Brokerage had notified Karsch a week before the interview that it was terminating his employment, though the effective date of the termination was after the proffer.4 The company was not represented at Karsch's proffer and did not sign the proffer agreement.5

Before trial, prosecutors filed an in limine motion to permit them to use Karsch's proffer statements against the company. The government relied principally on Federal Rule of Evidence 801(d)(2)(D), which allows for the admission of statements by a party's agent (1) "concerning a matter within the scope of the agency or employment," and (2) "made during the existence of the relationship."

The Justice Department maintained that Karsch's statements met both criteria and, thus, should be deemed admissions of the company. The statements concerned a "matter within the scope" of Karsch's employment, the prosecutors argued, because they described actions he took on behalf of the company.6 Ignoring the fact that Karsch had been handed his termination papers at the time of the proffer, the government also took the position that his statements were "made during the existence of the relationship" because Karsch's firing had not yet become effective.7

DOJ_NMG_0037016

According to the government, that Karsch's statements were attributable to Alaska Brokerage as corporate admissions also closed the books on any constitutional right the company had to confront him about the statements under Crawford v. Washington.8 As the government pointed out, "a criminal defendant's right to confrontation is ... limited to confronting 'witnesses' against him and does not include the right of a criminal defendant to confront his own admissions."9

The Justice Department gave no real consideration to the possibility that Karsch might have been looking after interests that diverged from, or conflicted with, those of his employer at the time of the proffer. To be sure, those concerns were mitigated in the unique circumstances of that case because Karsch was the sole employee and officer of Alaska Brokerage. But the company reasonably argued that there nonetheless was a conflict: Karsch had been told at the time of the interview that he was being fired, the government issued separate target letters to Karsch and the company, and the company, with its own counsel, was separately pursuing plea negotiations.

Moreover, there was no indication that the prosecutors intended to limit their theory to situations where the employee is the company's alter ego. Indeed, the government's papers drew no distinction between the use of proffer statements made by an employee in a one-person "mom and pop" or a Fortune 500 company. In the government's view, either could constitute a vicarious corporate admission.

In a two-page order, the district court agreed with the government that Karsch's proffer statements could be introduced against the company.10 Both Karsch and the company later pleaded guilty.

RULE 801(D)(2)(D)

The key to the Justice Department's position in Alaska Brokerage is its view of the scope of Rule 801(d)(2)(D). The test for determining whether a statement qualifies as a vicarious admission under that rule is well-established. First, an agency relationship must exist at the time of the statement. "The authority granted in the agency relationship need not include authority to make damaging statements, but simply the authority to take action about which the statements relate."11 Thus, courts have commonly found agency relationships based on the fact that an employee was hired to conduct an aspect of the company's business.12

Second, the statement must concern "a matter within the scope" of the declarant's employment. Statements made about matters beyond an employee's job responsibilities are not admissible under 801(d)(2)(D).13But statements arising out of an employee's official duties -- including, most typically, statements about a job while doing that job -- have been deemed vicarious admissions.14 An easy case would be a CEO's statements during an analyst conference call about the company's earnings.

BEYOND THE RULE'S LIMITS

The prosecutors in Alaska Brokerage stretched each of these elements of Rule 801(d)(2)(D) beyond recognized limits. With regard to the first prong, it is difficult to imagine how an employee can be said to be truly acting for the company when he or she is handed a termination notice a week before the proffer, regardless of whether as a matter of pure formality the person is still an employee during the interview. Courts have held that what is important is not whether the employee is technically still on the company's payroll, but whether the facts show that the employee is really speaking as an employee.

In Young v. Green Mgmt, Inc., for instance, the 7th Circuit refused to admit as an agency statement an employee's resignation letter which complained of discriminatory practices by the company. Although the employee still worked for the company when he sent the letter, the circumstances demonstrated the employee was really acting as the company's adversary; thus "the justification for Rule 801(d)(2)(D) does not exist because [the employee] was no longer 'inhibited by his relationship with the principal from making erroneous or underhanded comments which could harm the principal.'"15

The government's analysis of the second prong of the 801(d)(2)(D) test is also faulty. The prosecutors argued that an employee's description of something he or she did on the job -- no matter the circumstances in which the statement was made and to whom -- necessarily concerns "matters within the scope" of the employment. But that position strips of all meaning the setting of the employee's statement. And the setting is important.

DOJ_NMG_0037017

There is a world of difference between statements made by an employee at an analyst conference call and statements made to a room full of federal agents and prosecutors intent on indicting the employee. It hardly follows that an employee is speaking for the company equally when explaining to the public why revenues will meet expectations and when trying to convince a prosecutor -- who may also be investigating other employees or the company itself -- not to press criminal charges.

Let's assume the government is conducting a criminal investigation of a company and its executives for accounting fraud, and prosecutors invite the chief accounting officer in for an interview. Also assume that that employee would say that she saw pervasive fraud at the company and that the CEO and the CFO were in on it. The potential conflict between the accounting officer's interests and those of the corporation is clear. Indeed, under these facts the witness would need separate counsel from the company. But the prosecutors in Alaska Brokerage would say that the employee's proffer statements could be used against the company as long as she was describing things that she saw, heard and did as part of her job.

2NDCIRCUIT BATTLE

We have found no case other than Alaska Brokerage where a court has ruled that the government can use an employee's statements made at a government interview against the company under Rule 801(d)(2)(D). Other authority suggests that the government's Alaska Brokerage argument would face an uphill battle at least in the 2nd Circuit.

In SEC v. Geon Indus., Inc.,16 the SEC brought a complaint against a number of defendants for insider trading, including the firm that employed a broker who traded on inside information. The broker invoked his Fifth Amendment rights at trial and the SEC offered against the brokerage firm the broker's testimony to the SEC during the investigation. No authorized representative of the firm was present for the SEC testimony. The district court refused to admit the broker's testimony as a vicarious admission under 801(d)(2)(D), and the 2nd Circuit affirmed.

Judge Henry J. Friendly, writing for the Court, focused on the conflict between the broker's interests and those of his firm as a basis for excluding the statement. The court noted that while the broker was still an employee of the firm at the time of his testimony, he had been placed on suspension. The SEC had not filed a complaint when the broker testified, and both he and the firm were "potential defendants." As the court explained, "it was clear that [the broker and the firm] might have conflicting positions" when the broker appeared before the SEC.17 The court held this conflict alone rendered the statements inadmissible as vicarious admissions, and there was no need to even analyze whether the statements fell within the scope of the broker's agency.18

CONCLUSION

While any attempt by the government to use an employee's proffer statement against a company is legally vulnerable, defense counsel -- whether for the corporation or an individual employee -- should be alert to this issue. Counsel for employees should not assume that proffer statements will not find their way into the government's trial arsenal. And counsel for corporations should be ready to prevent the government from introducing such statements as agency admissions.

Howard E. Heiss is a partner and Mark A. Racanelli is counsel, with O'Melveny & Myers. They are former federal prosecutors in the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of New York. Joseph Keller, an associate with O'Melveny, assisted in the preparation of this article.

::::FOOTNOTES::::

FN1 No. CR06-11 (JLR) (W.D. Wash.).

FN2 Memorandum in Support of Government's Motion In Limine to Permit Use of Admissions Made by David Karsch at 1, 3, United States v. Alaska Brokerage Int'l, Inc. (No. CR06-11 (JLR)).

FN3 Id. at 2.

FN4 Alaska Brokerage's Motion to Suppress Statements by David Karsch, at 2, United States v. Alaska Brokerage Int'l, Inc. (No. CR06-11 (JLR)).

FN5 Id. at 3.

FN6 Government Memorandum, supra note 2, at 4.

FN7 Id. at 3, 5.

FN8 541 U.S. 36 (2004).

FN9 Government Memorandum, supra note 2, at 6.

DOJ_NMG_0037018

FN10 Minute Order, United States v. Alaska Brokerage Int'l, Inc., (No. CR06-11 (JLR)) (April 19, 2006).

FN11 Pappas v. Middle Earth Condominium Assoc., 963 F.2d 534, 538 (2d Cir. 1992).

FN12 Id.

FN13 Williams v. Pharmacia, Inc., 137 F.3d 944, 950-51 (7th Cir. 1998) (employee complaints about their supervisors not admissible under 801(d)(2)(D)).

FN14 Buscemi v. Pepsico, Inc., 736 FSupp 1267, 1270 (SDNY 1990) (statements by vice-president of personnel on corporation's hiring practices, printed in a magazine, were 801(d)(2)(D) admissions of company).

FN15 327 F.3d 616, 622-23 (7th Cir. 2003) (citation omitted).

FN16 531 F.2d 39 (2nd Cir. 1976).

FN17 Id. at 43 n. 3.

FN18 Id.

Proposal Would Reduce Companies' Civil Damages (BLOOM)

By James Rowley, BLOOMBERG NEWS

Bloomberg News, June 28, 2006

Effort to rein in lawsuits would help Microsoft

A congressionally created commission is considering a proposal to let U.S. judges reduce the billions of dollars in civil damages that companies such as Microsoft Corp. would have to pay victims for thwarting competition.

In some cases, violators would be spared triple damages and only forced to reimburse consumers for actual financial losses.

A companion proposal would give the government a two-thirds share of triple damages and consumers the rest in criminal price-fixing conspiracies such as the government's prosecution of a global vitamin cartel led by Roche Holding AG and BASF AG.

The proposals are the latest effort to rein in suits against corporations and, if approved by the commission and sent to Congress, are sure to stir opposition.

Richard Grossman, a San Francisco lawyer who sued Microsoft on behalf of consumers, says it is vital to retain the threat of triple damages.

"If you rob a bank and you are only required when you are caught to return the money that you obtained in the bank robbery, then there is no economic incentive not to keep trying," he said.

The 12-member federal commission was created at the prodding of Rep. James Sensenbrenner, 63, a Wisconsin Republican who heads the House Judiciary Committee. The commission has asked for public comment on its proposals by July 10 and is due to send a package of recommendations to Congress by April.

Among the commission members is New York antitrust lawyer John Warden, 64, who headed Microsoft's defense team when the government successfully sued the world's largest software company. Federal courts ruled that the Redmond-based company illegally protected its monopoly for the Windows operating software that runs 95 percent of the world's personal computers.

The government's suit spawned 130 consumer class-action claims that Microsoft settled by agreeing to pay more than $2.2 billion, mostly in the form of rebates on future computer or software purchases. It also paid $4.66 billion to resolve competitors' suits, including $1.5 billion to Santa Clara, Calif.-based Sun Microsystems Inc., $850 million to Armonk, N.Y.-based International Business Machines Corp. and $750 million to Time Warner Inc., based in New York City.

The commission is "kind of an apology to Microsoft," said Lloyd Constantine, a plaintiff's attorney at Constantine Cannon in New York. "The deck was really stacked" through the appointments of Warden and Deborah Garza, the commission's chairwoman, a partner at the Fried, Frank law firm in Washington that also represents Microsoft, he said.

Warden defends the commission's work and said his role on the panel isn't representing Microsoft's interests. "I don't know why anyone would pick Microsoft as somebody who would be uniquely benefited" by the proposed changes, he said in an interview, adding that it is "ridiculous" to infer he was appointed to the panel to help Microsoft. "My views are my own," said Warden, a partner in the New York law firm of Sullivan & Cromwell.

DOJ_NMG_0037019

Garza, 49, said that, while she did work for Microsoft, she wasn't involved in the government's antitrust case. "I don't talk to anyone at Microsoft about the commission's activity," Garza said. "I don't think that's why I am on the commission."

Microsoft spokesman Jack Evans said in an e-mail that "Microsoft neither lobbied Congress" to create the Antitrust Modernization Commission "nor advocated the appointment of any of its members."

Investor Group Snags Univision; Televisa Fumes (WSJ)

By Miriam Jordan, Dennis K. Berman And John Lyons

The Wall Street Journal, June 28, 2006

The chaotic auction of Spanish-language broadcaster Univision Communications Inc. has resulted in an equally tumultuous outcome.

Univision yesterday confirmed its planned sale to a consortium of private-equity investors who will pay $12.3 billion and assume $1.4 billion in debt. But in doing so, Los Angeles-based Univision appears to have further rankled an important business partner it had already been feuding with: Mexico's Grupo Televisa SA, the company that provides much of the popular programming that has made Univision the dominant Spanish-language TV network in the U.S.

Televisa, which already owns 11% of Univision, led a group that made a competing bid for Univision. For weeks, it was expected to win the deal, fulfilling Televisa Chief Executive Emilio Azcarraga Jean's dream of controlling the U.S. media asset. After losing the deal early yesterday, people close to Televisa complained bitterly that Univision and its controlling shareholder -- billionaire A. Jerrold Perenchio -- had ignored its bid, failing to discuss it even though the bid was very close in value to the winning offer.

A person in the Univision camp said that the auction was conducted on a level playing field, and that the board used its business judgment to secure what this person described as the best price and the only reliable offer.

In any event, the result is that Univision's relationship with Televisa -- already badly ruptured because of a series of disagreements over the past year -- may now grow even more difficult. Patching up the frayed partnership will likely be the first and most important item on the agenda of Univision's new owners.

The winning bid came from a private-equity group made up of Texas Pacific Group Inc., Thomas H. Lee Partners, Madison Dearborn Partners LLC, Providence Equity Partners Inc. and media mogul Haim Saban. The private-equity partners are contributing $900 million, with $250 million coming from Mr. Saban, and financing the remainder. The consortium didn't speak publicly about how it plans to operate Univision, which consists not just of the highly rated broadcast network, but also sister network TeleFutura, 73 radio stations and several record labels.

The acquiring group's winning bid of $36.25 per share came after an earlier offer of $35.50 was rejected. Televisa and partners Bain Capital and Cascade Investment late last week offered $35.75, but in a prepared statement Televisa said, "repeated offers to discuss all aspects of our proposal including price" were disregarded.

People close to Univision said the Televisa group was disorganized and that its offer was less desirable because of potentially messy regulatory obstacles involving foreign-ownership limits. As the auction approached its zenith late last week -- and the Televisa bid was jeopardized by various partners that pulled out -- Mr. Azcarraga flew to Germany to watch the Mexican soccer team's World Cup match on Saturday.

The Televisa spokesman called untrue the suggestion that the Televisa team was disorganized.

Televisa backers counter that the winning bidders have regulatory issues of their own, as some members are partial owners of other media assets, such as radio stations and newspapers, that could draw scrutiny. The winning deal includes a breakup fee of around $300 million.

Both offers were well below the $40 per share Mr. Perenchio initially sought when he put the company on the auction block in February. Nonetheless, the press-shy Mr. Perenchio in a written statement characterized it as a "blockbuster transaction." Mr. Perenchio himself stands to reap $1.4 billion in the transaction, a giant windfall from the $33 million he invested in the company 14 years ago.

DOJ_NMG_0037020

This blockbuster immediately faces complex problems, however. Televisa said it has "a number of options it is considering." Those could include taking legal action against Univision, presenting a new bid or somehow moving its programming to new broadcasting venues. People close to the matter said the winning bidders left room in their final documents to bring Televisa into the deal, but Televisa was steadfastly opposed.

"We've made a decision, and we're not going to join the winning bidder. We're not going to bail that consortium out of the deal that it made," the Televisa spokesman said.

Univision and Televisa have a fractious history together. Mr. Azcarraga's grandfather, who got his start buying radio stations, started assembling the network of U.S. TV stations that eventually became Univision in the 1970s after being surprised by the almost total lack of Spanish-language programming in the states at the time. Mr. Azcarraga's father, a flamboyant man who went by the nickname El Tigre, was forced to sell the network in the late 1980s after a fight with U.S. regulators who charged that he was in violation of foreign-ownership limits of media companies.

But the Azcarraga family didn't give up easily. In 1992, Televisa teamed with Mr. Perenchio and Gustavo Cisneros to repurchase Univision. The deal was highly criticized by other potential bidders and in news reports as an attempt by the Azcarraga family to retake control of Univision using Mr. Perenchio as a front man to get around U.S. foreign-ownership limits. The structure of the deal was unusual: Mr. Perenchio got 75% control but put up less than 10% of capital to buy Univision. Mr. Perenchio always denied that he was a front man for the Azcarraga family.

The relationship between Mr. Perenchio and the Azcarraga family soured greatly after the death of El Tigre in 1999. Mr. Azcarraga, who inherited the company from his father, quit the board when Mr. Perenchio named one of his protégés, Ray Rodriguez, as president; Mr. Azcarraga wanted an independent search. Televisa is suing Univision over a programming contract that gives Univision exclusive rights to Televisa programming through 2017.

Mr. Rodriguez could become a further lightning rod if the acquiring group retains the current management of the company. People close to the acquiring group say it plans to meet with Univision's management over the next few months to learn about the company and the industry. The acquiring group expects the transaction to close in spring 2007 and will decide about management later.

Televisa and another foreign-owned program supplier, Venezuela's Venevision, both own stakes in Univision that together total 25% -- the maximum foreign ownership allowed under U.S. law. Both companies have board seats and voted against accepting the winning bid at Monday evening's Univision board meeting. The acquiring team needs shareholder approval of 60% for the deal, making it impossible for Televisa and Venevision to derail the deal on their own. Venevision dropped out of Televisa's bidding group last week; it's unclear how closely aligned the two company's interests are.

Credit Suisse Group, Deutsche Bank AG, Bank of America Corp. and Wachovia Corp.'s Wachovia Securities advised the bidding group, with legal advice from Weil Gotshal & Manges and Hogan & Hartson. UBS AG and Skadden Arps Slate Meagher & Flom advised Univision.

Consortium Buys Univision For $12.3bn (FT)

By James Politi

Financial Times, June 28, 2006

A consortium of private equity groups on Tuesday agreed to buy Univision Communications, the US Spanish-language broadcasting company, for $12.3bn in cash, in a buy-out structured with an aggressive financing package and one of the biggest equity cheques on record.

The deal capped a five-month auction for Univision and was seen as a sign of the growth of the Hispanic media market in the US.

However, many of the biggest US media groups – such as Walt Disney and CBS – failed to play meaningful roles in the auction, leaving Mexico's Televisa and a handful of buy-out firms to battle it out in the final bidding.

The deal involves Texas Pacific Group, Thomas H. Lee Partners, Providence Equity Partners, Madison Dearborn Partners and Saban Capital paying $36.25 a share.

DOJ_NMG_0037021

The equity portion is worth $3.85bn, making it one of the biggest, while the remaining $8.45bn will be financed by issuing debt valued at about 11.5 times earnings before interest, tax, depreciation and amortisation. This is one of the highest multiples in recent memory, aggressive even for a fast-growing company.

These terms highlight the growing ability of private equity groups to make big acquisitions but will raise questions about the prospects of the businesses they acquire to withstand the rise in interest rates and any downturn in the economic cycle.

Televisa, which was widely seen as the frontrunner to acquire Univision, last week lost an edge in the auction after some of its private equity partners, Carlyle, Blackstone and Kohlberg Kravis Roberts, stepped away because of concerns about overpayment.

In the end, Televisa offered $35.75 a share, along with its remaining partners Bain Capital and Cascade, Bill Gates' investment vehicle.

Televisa on Tuesday criticised Univision's good faith in handling the auction. "Notwithstanding our repeated offers to discuss all aspects of our proposal including price, Univision and its advisers refused to enter into any discussions with us," Televisa said in a statement.

Although Televisa has a contract to supply Univision with some of its most valuable content until 2017, relations between the two companies have been sour for several years.

Televisa could still attempt a fresh bid for Univision but it would have to pay an additional break-up fee.

The Mexican group has also been considering a plan to launch its own Spanish-language network in the US to compete with Univision.

This could involve an alliance with US broadcasters such as Paxson Communications, NBC's Telemundo unit, and McGraw Hill.

In morning trading, Univision shares, which had fallen recently over concerns that the auction would fail, rose 7 per cent to $34.30.

Credit Suisse, Deutsche Bank, Bank of America and Wachovia advised the consortium, along with lawyers at Weil Gotshal and Hogan & Hartson. UBS and Skadden Arps advised Univision.

Univision Agrees To Buyout Offer Of $12.3 Billion (WP)

By Alex Veiga

The Washington Post, June 28, 2006

LOS ANGELES, June 27 -- Univision Communications Inc.'s board has agreed to sell the company, the nation's largest Spanish-language broadcaster, for $12.3 billion in cash to a consortium of investors, the parties involved in the sale announced Tuesday.

The figure agreed upon late Monday equals $36.25 a share, a 13 percent premium to Univision's closing stock price on Monday. The group of investors will also assume about $1.4 billion in debt.

The consortium, led by private equity firms Texas Pacific Group and Thomas H. Lee Partners LP, also includes Madison Dearborn Partners LLC, Providence Equity Partners Inc. and billionaire investor Haim Saban.

"Univision is truly a one-of-a-kind property," the acquiring group said in a written statement. "It is an outstanding media brand with exceptional positions in the fastest growing markets in the country, world-class assets, strong management, popular programming and unmatched ratings."

Grupo Televisa SA, a Mexican broadcaster that had led a rival consortium of investors, said it was disappointed with the outcome of the Univision auction.

Univision's bylaws allow Grupo Televisa, which owns an 11 percent stake in Univision and supplies it with much of its programming, to veto a sale of the company, but that could be defeated by a 60 percent approval from Univision shareholders.

The consortium led by the Texas Pacific Group initially bid $35.50 a share, or just under $11 billion, last week. But Univision, which had reportedly been seeking an offer of $40 a share, rejected it.

The investor group's offer remained on the table until Friday, when it expired. Both sides talked over the weekend and came to terms, a person familiar with the deal told the Associated Press.

DOJ_NMG_0037022

The deal, if approved by Univision shareholders and regulators, is expected to close in the fourth quarter of this year or first quarter of 2007, according to a news release on the sale.

Univision dominates the U.S. Hispanic media market through its three television networks (Univision, TeleFutura and Galavision), more than two dozen television stations, a recorded music division, an Internet portal and Spanish-language radio stations.

Univision Accepts $12.3B Cash Offer (USAT)

By David Lieberman And Laura Petrecca

USA Today, June 28, 2006

NEW YORK — A consortium of private investors including Mighty Morphin Power Rangers producer Haim Saban is set to become the USA's top Spanish-language broadcaster after Univision agreed Tuesday to accept its $12.3 billion cash offer.

The $36.25-a-share deal with Madison Dearborn Partners, Providence Equity Partners, Texas Pacific Group, Thomas H. Lee Partners and Saban Capital Group sent shares soaring 6.2% to $34.

"The outstanding cash flow multiple our shareholders will receive reflects the extraordinary growth of the Hispanic population, Univision's unique bond with its community and our ability to deliver tremendous audiences to our mainstream advertising partners," Univision CEO A. Jerrold Perenchio said in a statement.

In addition to the Univision network, the company includes broadcast network TeleFutura, cable network Galavision, 62 TV stations in the USA and Puerto Rico, Univision Radio, Univision Music Group and Univision Online.

But the deal left a sour taste with rival bidder Mexico-based Grupo Televisa, which supplies most of Univision's prime-time programming and holds an 11.4% stake.

"Notwithstanding our repeated offers to discuss all aspects of our proposal, including price, Univision and its advisers refused to enter into any discussions with us after we submitted our initial bid," the company said in a statement. It said it will "vigorously pursue" ways "to build its potential in the growing U.S. Hispanic marketplace."

It's unclear what options Televisa has. Federal law bars foreign companies from owning more than a 25% stake in TV stations. To have big U.S. impact, Televisa "can't be on cable, since many Hispanic Americans don't have cable," says Sanders Morris Harris analyst David Miller. What's more, Univision has a long-term deal that enables it to cherry-pick Televisa's programming. As a result, Miller says, Televisa will be "left with all this junky material that they're going to use to start a new network? No way."

Still, some analysts question whether Univision's buyers can make the big investment pay off.

"Spanish-language broadcast is not immune to the migration of ad dollars from broadcast to the Internet," says Guzman & Co.'s Philip Remek. "While Univision's revenues have continued to grow, the growth rate has really slowed in the last year and a half. I don't expect it to re-accelerate."

Univision's net income fell 26.9% in 2005, to $187 million, on revenue of nearly $2 billion, up 9.3%.

While advertisers are keen to reach the fast-growing Latino population, Univision has struggled to convince Madison Avenue that it appeals to young Latinos, including second-generation immigrants who are comfortable with English.

Judge Clears Way For Adelphia Sale (WSJ/AP)

By Associated Press

The Wall Street Journal, June 28, 2006

A bankruptcy judge granted permission to Adelphia Communications Corp. to sell its assets to Time Warner Inc. and Comcast Corp. in deal estimated to net about $17 billion.

Judge Robert Gerber of the Southern District of New York said he would approve an order to be submitted later Tuesday that would detach the asset sale from the rest of the company's bankruptcy process. Adelphia sought the separation to bypass creditor disputes that have slowed the company in its filing of a final reorganization plan.

The sale agreement with Time Warner and Comcast had been put in jeopardy because of a July 31 deadline at which the buyers could end their offer. Once complete, it would secure their status as the two biggest cable operators in the nation.

In its motion, filed late last month, Adelphia had said, "Time is running out."

DOJ_NMG_0037023

"The sale represents an extraordinary achievement for the debtors, as it includes a substantial control premium, and it promises to translate into significant recoveries for all the debtor's principal stakeholders," the filing read.

Adelphia remains in bankruptcy protection and last week filed an amended version of its restructuring plan. The company, the country's fifth-largest cable operator, filed for bankruptcy protection four years ago, on June 25, 2002.

The acquisition strengthens Time Warner's positions in New York, Texas, California, Ohio and the Carolinas. Comcast boosts its presence in Pennsylvania, Washington, D.C., Florida and Massachusetts.

Comcast is expected to end up with over 23 million subscribers, up from its current 21.7 million, while Time Warner would have a total of over 14 million, up from 11 million. Comcast and Time Warner also would swap certain cable systems to consolidate market positions.

Citizens Banking Buys Midwest Rival For About $1 Billion (WSJ)

By A Wall Street Journal News Roundup

The Wall Street Journal, June 28, 2006

DETROIT -- Citizens Banking Corp. agreed to buy Republic Bancorp Inc. for about $1.05 billion in cash and stock to form a Midwestern regional bank called Citizens Republic Bancorp.

The combined bank would be the 45th-largest headquartered in the U.S., with assets of $13.9 billion and $8.6 billion in deposits, the two Michigan banks said.

Citizens, based in Flint, Mich., expects the purchase to add to earnings per share in 2007, and result in $28 million of annual cost savings by 2008.

In 4 p.m. Nasdaq Stock Market trading yesterday Citizens' shares were down $2.37, or 8.8%, to $24.66, while Republic's shares were up $1.88, or 18%, to $12.45.

Citizens Chief Executive William R. Hartman will be chief executive of the combined company, while Jerry D. Campbell, chairman and founder of Republic, will serve as chairman.

The terms value Republic, based in Owosso, Mich., at $13.86 a share. Shareholders will receive the equivalent of 0.4378 of a Citizens share plus $2.08 in cash for each of their shares. Of the purchase price, 85% will be paid in stock.

The combined bank will operate 275 branches and loan offices in Michigan, Wisconsin, Ohio, Indiana and Iowa.

The companies said they expect to close the deal in the fourth quarter.

Steeled For Growth (WSJ)

By Peter M. Fish

The Wall Street Journal, June 28, 2006

It finally looks as though Mittal Steel will win its bid for Arcelor. Shareholders still have to reject, this Friday, the merger with Russian steelmaker Severstal that Arcelor management tabled when trying to elude Mittal's grasp -- and then approve the new tie-up with Mittal. So anything can happen. But it's been clear for some time now that something, in the way of consolidation, was due to happen, and not only at the top of this industry.

Assuming the Arcelor-Mittal marriage goes through, it will have far-reaching consequences for the global steel industry. The new company would produce approximately 10% of world-wide output. Its nearest rival would be Nippon Steel, with less than 3% of the market. To gauge the importance of the deal, consider that the nine biggest steelmakers after Arcelor-Mittal would account for just above 20% of the world's supply. The new company is slated to be a giant with production well in excess of 100 million tons per annum -- almost equivalent to the combined U.S. and Canadian output. It will have 60 plants in 27 countries.

It is clear that the global steel industry will remain fragmented even after the Mittal-Arcelor merger goes through. More consolidation is inevitable. Other steelmakers will be frantically looking for partners to counter the new grouping. Moreover, the merged entity will probably maintain its passion for acquisitions.

Consolidation in the future will be more internationally focused. Outside of Arcelor and Mittal, most steelmakers have sought to acquire other firms in their domestic or regional markets. Significant rationalization of the U.S. sector has already taken place -- mainly by Nucor and U.S. Steel. More could follow if Mittal is required to sell off some of its U.S. assets to satisfy antitrust authorities after the new deal.

DOJ_NMG_0037024

In Europe, Arcelor was formed by the union of the main steel producers in France, Spain and the Benelux countries. After its privatization, British Steel merged with Dutch company Hoogovens to form Corus in a cross-border deal. Nevertheless, there is room for much more consolidation within Europe.

We should not be surprised if Russian steelmakers play a leading role in steel rationalization on the Continent. Severstal made a bold attempt to join up with Arcelor. Evraz Holding has recently obtained a new large minority shareholder in Roman Abramovich. This cash infusion could spark new deals. Russian enterprises already have steel assets in the U.S., and Eastern and Western Europe.

So far, consolidation in Asia has been sparse. A few years ago, JFE in Japan was formed by the merger of NKK and Kawasaki. There is now the prospect of more deals in that country. Moreover, at the very least we can expect closer cooperation between major producers in Japan, South Korea and Taiwan in the near future.

The rationalization of the Chinese steel industry -- which already produces 30% of world output -- is progressing. Larger companies are merging with smaller ones within their geographic area. This will intensify, particularly since limits on foreign ownership will delay any significant cross-border activity in China. In India, we have seen few moves toward consolidation, a situation that is unlikely to change anytime soon. However, in Latin America, two groups have emerged in the last 12 months: Ternium and Arcelor Brazil. These regional powers are likely to expand in the future.

And why wouldn't large steelmakers go shopping? The prospects for the industry are now better than they have been for a quarter-century. Five years ago the value of world steel production was $280 billion. This year the figure will be close to $1 trillion. In 2002, the MEPS average world steel price for hot rolled coil (the benchmark product) was $230 per ton. It peaked in January 2005 at $653 per ton and, after dropping to $493 in July 2005, is now moving back toward that level.

Part of this increase in value is attributable to an increase in demand. At the start of this decade, global output of crude steel was 848 million tons. This year, the figure will be more than 40% higher: 1.2 billion tons and rising. Demand and production are growing fast in the developing nations as their industries pick up steam and spending on infrastructure and housing soars. Raw material supply is expected to remain tight because investments in new mines take several years to come onstream. This should obviate any serious oversupply in the market over the next few years. * * *

One question being asked is, What will be the impact of the Mittal-Arcelor merger on steel buyers? The proposed link-up of the two majors creates little increase in the concentration of supply to most large consuming sectors. This is because the two enterprises have minimal overlap in the markets they supply. As such, the market power of the new entity would not increase significantly and the impact on prices is likely to be relatively modest.

This feature has been reinforced in both the U.S. and Europe by the fact that a consolidated industry is much more capable of reducing output when the need arises. As inventories in the market start to expand and oversupply begins to develop, the mills are better able to respond quickly by curtailing supplies. This happened in many parts of the world, including Russia and China, when the market turned down last year.

Even with consolidation, cheap steel is a thing of the past. Raw material costs are unlikely to drop significantly in the near term. Energy costs are expected to remain high. Demand from the developing nations of the world will, almost certainly, continue to rise. But higher input costs have not damaged the steel companies. The industry is more profitable now than ever. The limited consolidation so far has been beneficial. Further rationalization can only help.

Mr. Fish is chairman and managing director of MEPS (International) Ltd.

EU May Fine Microsoft €2 Million A Day (IDG)

By Paul Meller, IDG News Service

IDG News Service, June 28, 2006

The European Commission is about to propose a new fine of up to €460 million ($577 million) against Microsoft for failing to honor the antitrust ruling imposed on the company in 2004, according to people close to the case Tuesday.

The Commission ruled two years ago that Microsoft was abusing its dominant position in the market by denying competitors access to documentation about its Windows operating system.

DOJ_NMG_0037025

The imminent threat of a fine comes as Microsoft continues to submit new information to the regulator, with the aim of complying with the ruling. The final instalment of documentation is due on July 18 -- a deadline Microsoft said it agreed with the monitoring trustee in charge of overseeing Microsoft's compliance with the ruling, Neil Barrett.

On Monday the Commission, Europe's top antitrust regulator, will propose a new negative ruling and a new fine against Microsoft to national competition regulators from the 25 countries in the European Union, the people close to the case said.

A final decision could be taken by the Commission as soon as July 12, if the national regulators support the Commission's draft ruling.

Commission spokesman Jonathan Todd declined to comment on the content of the draft decision but confirmed that it was imminent.

"We have said for some time we would decide whether or not to impose daily fines on Microsoft before the end of this month," he said.

If the Commission sets the fine at €2 million a day, as it has threatened to in recent months, the fine would reach €460 million by July 18, the date Microsoft submits the final instalment. The calculation counts all seven days of the week and dates back to December 15 when the Commission found Microsoft in breach of its 2004 antitrust ruling,

This would be nearly as much as the record €497 million fine the Commission imposed on Microsoft in the first place.

"Any fine would be unjustified and unnecessary," said Horacio Gutierrez, associate general counsel of Microsoft Europe in a statement Tuesday.

"The Commission's process calls for an advisory committee meeting, so this comes as no surprise," Gutierrez said.

But he added that Microsoft has committed "massive resources" to providing the technical documentation required in the 2004 ruling.

Microsoft "has already delivered five of seven instalments of technical documentation developed to the agreed specification and according to the agreed work plan," Gutierrez said.

The sixth is due at the end of this month and the final submission will be handed over on July 18, he said.

"Microsoft is working hard to also meet those deadlines," Gutierrez said.

Microsoft could be fined even if the seven instalments of documentation do satisfy the regulator, one person close to the case said. "Even if they change their ways in the future that doesn't get them off the hook for the period starting last December," the person said.

Cartels Face Bigger Fines From Brussels (FT)

By Tobias Buck

Financial Times, June 28, 2006

A huge increase in fines for companies that operate cartels or break European Union competition law will be announced on Wednesday by the European Commission.

Brussels has already imposed some of the toughest fines in recent history, including a record €497m ($626m, £350m) penalty against Microsoft in 2004 and one of €462m against Roche in 2001. Over the past few months the Brussels regulator has again ratcheted up the fines, especially in cartel cases.

Officials believe that only higher fines will deter companies from operating price-fixing cartels or abusing dominant market positions.

They are particularly keen to increase the fines for repeat offenders and large groups with significant financial fire-power.

The new guidelines, which have been seen by the Financial Times, reflect the Commission's belief that the rules are too rigid and lack transparency – a view shared by many competition lawyers and most companies targeted by the Brussels trust-busters.

The new regime will apply to all companies found guilty of participating in a cartel or that abuse their dominant market position. It will almost certainly mean that more companies will be fined the maximum amount allowed under EU law, which is 10 per cent of global annual turnover. Up to now, only a handful of companies have been punished that severely.

DOJ_NMG_0037026

The new regime will be especially tough on repeat offenders. At present, fines are usually raised by 50 per cent for companies that have previous convictions for antitrust abuses. Now the Commission can double the punishment in cases where there is one earlier ruling against the group, and may go even higher for "multi-recidivists".

Companies will in future be treated as repeat offenders by the Commission if they have previously been convicted by national competition authorities.

Fines will be calculated by fixing a basic amount – up to 30 per cent of a company's sales of the relevant product in the market where the abuse has taken place – and then multiplying it by the number of years during which the abuse continued. To this may be added an "entrance fee", equivalent to 15-25 per cent of the company's yearly sales of the product in question.

"The mere fact that a company enters into a cartel will cost it at least 15-25 per cent of its yearly turnover," the Commission paper says.

Stephen Kinsella, a Brussels-based partner at law firm Sidley Austin, said changes to the current fining practices would be welcome, especially if they introduced greater predictability and transparency. "At present it is almost impossible to foresee whether a company will be fined €25m or €100m. Greater clarity would also help the Commission, because it would be harder for companies to challenge the fines in court."

The Commission declined to comment. However, Neelie Kroes, the competition commissioner, has made clear in her most recent rulings against cartels that she is keen to intensify the crackdown on abusive companies.

She said earlier this month that she was "shocked" that chemicals groups such as ICI had broken cartel rules repeatedly.

EU Beefs Up Fines On Antitrust Activity (WSJ)

By Mary Jacoby And Adam Cohen

The Wall Street Journal, June 28, 2006

BRUSSELS -- European Union regulators will announce new guidelines today to increase fines for antitrust violations, aiming to more severely punish repeat offenders, cartel ringleaders and companies whose deep pockets can cushion them from the impact of fines.

The changes to the 1998 guidelines will be most relevant to price-fixing cases because such investigations most often lead to fines, according to two European Commission officials. They can also be used to increase financial penalties for companies found to have illegally used monopoly power to elbow rivals out of a market.

If the new guidelines had been in effect in 2004, one official said, a €497 million ($625.3 million) fine to Microsoft Corp. would have been much larger. Microsoft was fined for using its dominant Windows computer-operating system to shut out competition in related software markets. Although the Microsoft fine was the largest ever leveled by the commission, it was much less than the $3 billion that the Redmond, Wash., company paid to various rivals to settle antitrust lawsuits against it in the U.S. EU officials see that disparity as evidence that their fine wasn't big enough to have a deterrent effect.

In separate deliberations, antitrust authorities from the EU's 25 member states will meet in Brussels Monday and again July 10 to review EU Antitrust Commissioner Neelie Kroes's proposal to impose additional fines on Microsoft. Ms. Kroes has concluded that Microsoft hasn't moved quickly enough to comply with the commission's 2004 orders to change its business practices, people familiar with the case said.

A second EU fine against Microsoft could total more than €400 million. Ms. Kroes hopes to obtain approval for a fine from the full European Commission in a July 12 meeting, EU officials said.

Horacio Gutierrez, Microsoft's associate general counsel for Europe, said the company has put "massive resources" into helping competitors make Windows-compatible software, as the EU has ordered. "Any fine would be unjustified and unnecessary," he said in a statement.

The guidelines to be announced today, however, will not affect the current Microsoft matter. That is because the new guidelines won't take effect for several months and also because they won't apply to the more narrow question of how to punish a company for flouting EU orders.

Under current EU rules, the most serious antitrust offenses are punished with at least a €20 million fine and up to a maximum of 10% of annual global sales. The new guidelines will give regulators more flexibility to lighten fines on smaller companies that might otherwise go out of business if forced to pay €20 million, while increasing fines on big multinational companies for which only a very large fine would act as a deterrent.

DOJ_NMG_0037027

Fines will now be calculated as a percentage of a company's sales -- up to 30% -- in whatever market regulators find was illegally manipulated. The fines will increase for each year anticompetitive behavior took place, and repeat offenders will see steep increases in penalties.

Previously the amount of any fine was set by regulators according to how serious they judged the illegal activity.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Calls Grow Louder In Congress To Revamp US Energy Policy (CSM)

By Brad Knickerbocker

The Christian Science Monitor, June 28, 2006

Everybody, it seems, is scrambling to remake America's energy policy - proposing ways to reduce US dependence on foreign oil while addressing the environmental aspects of energy production, distribution, and use.

Lawmakers on Capitol Hill, touting a raft of proposals, have declared this to be "energy week." Governors around the country have entered the fray, some with suits against the government for energy-related pollution. The Nuclear Regulatory Commission has just approved what will be the first license for a commercial nuclear facility in 30 years.

But the real push for revamping energy policy - just a year after the US enacted its first major energy bill in more than a decade - is coming from the grass-roots and lobbyists. Citizen groups and special interests are pushing for solutions as fuel prices remain high and turmoil continues in oil-rich parts of the world.

"There's tremendous pressure to do something," says Sierra Club energy specialist Melinda Pierce.

In all, 477 energy-related bills have been introduced in this Congress, according to a New York Times report. But many of those proposals involve increasing domestic energy production rather than the conservation and renewables that environmentalists prefer.

For example: The Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee this week is hearing testimony on oil and gas drilling in the Rocky Mountain region and on the permitting process for new refineries.

In the House of Representatives, legislation lifting the 25-year moratorium on off-shore drilling passed the resources committee 29-9 last week, and is expected to face a full House vote Thursday.

"Studies indicate that natural gas from the Outer Continental Shelf [OCS] could provide the US with about 25 years of natural gas supply," says Bob Slaughter, president of the National Petrochemical & Refiners Association.

Environmentalists say the industry already has access to most OCS gas resources. They warn of erosion of state jurisdiction and pollution disasters.

"We're going to do everything we can to stop it," says Ms. Pierce of the Sierra Club.

Other legislation is meant to fill in the blanks or change certain features of the heavily compromised bill enacted last year.

The recently proposed bipartisan "Enhanced Energy Security Act" would speed up the development of new vehicle technologies such as plug-in hybrids; provide loan guarantees and grants to auto and parts manufacturers converting to fuel-efficient vehicles; increase funding for gas stations that sell alternatives such as E85 (which is 85 percent ethanol and 15 percent gasoline); and provide incentives for production of cellulosic ethanol, which is made from agricultural plant waste, sawdust, switch grass, and other substances, rather than corn or other grains.

Other lawmakers are pushing a different kind of energy future.

Sen. John Kerry (D) of Massachusetts outlined in Boston Monday what he called "the three big steps that are imperative to addressing global warming and transitioning to dependence on homegrown sources of energy."

Mr. Kerry's plan includes freezing greenhouse gas emissions in 2010, then reducing those to 65 percent below 2000 levels by 2050; mandatory reductions in US oil consumption by 2.5 million barrels a day by 2015 (the amount currently imported from the Persian Gulf); and "immediately" expanding the production of renewable vehicle fuel.

DOJ_NMG_0037028

In the states, some governors are coming up with their own plans, banding together to promote more energy conservation and efficiency than the federal government requires. In the West especially, governors of both parties are pushing wind energy.

The Nuclear Regulatory Commission has granted a license for construction of the $1.5 billion enriched uranium manufacturing facility. It "will mean ... the renaissance of nuclear energy in this country," says Sen. Pete Domenici (R) of New Mexico.

Even the US Supreme Court has jumped on the issue, agreeing this week to consider a case involving greenhouse gases (most of which come from motor vehicles and power plants).

In a way, the story is not new. "As national policy obsessions go, America's oil dependence has been one of our most enduring," Jason Grumet, executive director of the National Commission on Energy Policy, told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee last month.

How many of those 477 energy-related bills introduced in this Congress get serious consideration is another matter.

"Time is running out in this Congress to take action on energy," Sen. Jeff Bingaman (D) of New Mexico said in introducing the Enhanced Energy Security Act. The summer break looms, then campaigning for the November election.

Ending Energy Dependence (WT)

By Richard W. Pombo

The Washington Times, June 28, 2006

When the House of Representatives votes tomorrow on the bipartisan Domestic Ocean Energy Resources (DOER) Act, it will be considering one of the nation's most meaningful energy-policy reforms in history.

Decades of "just say 'no'" energy policy has turned America into a country too dependent on foreign, and often unstable, sources of energy. We send $300 billion a year overseas for energy we can produce at home, a figure that represents one-third of the current trade deficit. We have lost millions of manufacturing jobs over the past two decades because of high energy prices. We should be investing that $300 billion in America to create our own good jobs and provide our own energy security.

The DOER Act does just that. America is the only developed nation that forbids safe energy production on its Outer Continental Shelf (OCS), a fact that puts us at an economic and strategic disadvantage with other countries in a highly competitive global economy.

It just doesn't make any sense.

The DOER Act represents a balanced, commonsense compromise to deliver desperately needed energy supplies to the American people, which in turn will lower prices for consumer wallets and create hundreds of thousands of family-wage jobs. It will spur production of an untapped energy resource and correct federal government policies that have led to our dangerous dependence on foreign energy. And, just as importantly, it champions states' rights by protecting those not interested in producing energy off their shores.

Currently, two federal moratoria prevent energy production beyond state waters or three miles from the coastline, neither of which have the force of permanent law. Many have called for the complete repeal of the moratoria for full access to available resources, of which there are plenty. According to the U.S. Minerals Management Service, America's OCS contains 420 trillion cubic feet of natural gas (America consumes 23 trillion cubic feet per year) and 86 billion barrels of oil (America imports 4.5 billion barrels per year).

But that would leave coastal states without any power over their coastlines beyond three miles, a possibility unacceptable to many states.

Under the DOER Act, states like California and Florida would have the authority to ban energy production up to 100 miles off their shores. States that choose to allow production, however, would benefit from increased revenue from energy royalties -- some of which would also be routed to three separate funds for environmental protection and enhancement, renewable energy development, job training and research. Meanwhile, domestic energy production would be allowed in the deep waters beyond 100 miles.

This innovative and bipartisan compromise -- the result of work between Reps. Neil Abercrombie, Hawaii Democrat; Bobby Jindal, Louisiana Republican; Charlie Melancon, Louisiana Democrat and John Peterson, Pennsylvania Republican -- passed the House Resources Committee with 29-9 support. Labor unions, which appreciate how many jobs the bill would create, fully support it.

DOJ_NMG_0037029

Nonetheless, special-interest groups will go to great lengths to block its passage, conjuring images of massive oil spills to scare up opposition. This is pure bunk. Today's advanced ocean energy exploration technologies were given the ultimate test last summer when hurricanes Katrina and Rita roared through nearly 3,000 offshore platforms in the Gulf of Mexico.

Despite the typical fearmongering of so-called environmental groups, no major spills were reported during one of America's worst natural disasters. In fact, according to a National Academies report, 63 percent of the petroleum found in North American waters comes from natural seeps through the ocean floor.

The bottom line is that our domestic energy policy has long stimulated jobs and economies overseas, but not at home. Enough is enough. It's time to put Americans to work for American energy.

Rep. Richard W. Pombo, California Republican, is Chairman of the House Resources Committee.

An Outdated Ban (WP)

The Washington Post, June 28, 2006

FOR THE PAST quarter of a century, the federal government has banned oil and gas drilling in most U.S. coastal waters. Efforts to relax the ban have been repelled on environmental grounds, but it is time to revisit this policy. Canada and Norway, two countries that care about the environment, have allowed offshore drilling for years and do not regret it. Offshore oil rigs in the western Gulf of Mexico, one of the exceptions to the ban imposed by Congress, endured Hurricane Katrina without spills. The industry's safety record is impressive, and it's even possible that the drilling ban increases the danger of oil spills in coastal waters: Less local drilling means more incoming traffic from oil tankers, which by some reckonings are riskier. Although balancing energy needs with the environment is always hard, the prohibition on offshore extraction cannot be justified.

The House of Representatives is about to vote on this question, probably tomorrow. A bipartisan bill would maintain a ban on drilling within 50 miles of the shoreline and allow states to extend that to 100 miles. But it would lift the congressional restriction on drilling beyond that perimeter. This compromise would give states that are unwilling to countenance the perceived environmental risks a reasonable measure of control over their coasts. But it would also open the way to more drilling.

The economic benefit of that drilling would be especially pronounced if it were aimed at natural gas extraction. Despite all the rhetoric about energy independence, it doesn't make much difference whether the United States gets its oil from its own coastal waters or whether it buys it on world markets. There is one global price for oil; producing more from U.S. waters will bring down that global price, benefiting all consuming countries rather than just U.S. consumers. But natural gas is traded globally only in small quantities, in liquefied form; nearly all of the gas consumed in the United States is produced domestically or in Canada. So producing more natural gas in U.S. coastal waters would bring down U.S. natural gas prices rather than world prices. Because natural gas is much cleaner than its main alternative, coal, this would have environmental as well as economic benefits.

Unfortunately, the House legislation is flawed. It diverts billions of dollars' worth of oil and gas royalties from the federal government to the states, even though the waters from which the resources will come are federal. The states nearest to the oil rigs may feel they carry most of the perceived environmental risks, and some sharing of revenue may be justified to bring them along, but the House bill leans too far in that direction. We hope the bill passes tomorrow, but we also hope this flaw is fixed before it becomes law.

Domenici Offers Nuclear Waste Proposal (AP-Y2)

By H. Josef Hebert

AP2, June 27, 2006

The government would store civilian nuclear waste for up to 25 years at federal sites across the country under a proposal in the Senate to deal with growing volumes of used reactor fuel at power plants.

The waste sites could be built to accommodate plants in a region or individual state, said Sen. Pete Domenici (news, bio, voting record), R-N.M., who included the provision in a $30.7 billion spending bill that advanced out of his Appropriations subcommittee on Tuesday.

DOJ_NMG_0037030

The interim storage approach is aimed at addressing increasing concern about thousands of tons of used reactor fuel accumulating at power plants, waiting to be shipped to an oft-delayed central government repository in Nevada. Industry officials have said the failure to address the waste problem will inhibit investment in new nuclear reactors.

The proposed Yucca Mountain waste site in Nevada — where the used fuel would be kept deep beneath the Earth — has yet to receive a license from the Nuclear Regulatory Commission. It is not expected to open, even if a license is approved, before 2018, Energy Department officials have told Domenici's staff.

"I think we've begun to resolve the nuclear waste problem," said Domenici of the interim storage idea. "This is an orderly way to do it."

The Energy Department maintains that it is currently barred from creating temporary storage facilities for civilian reactor waste.

The proposal received the support of Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada, who strongly opposes the Yucca Mountain project in his state and who has said the used reactor fuel should be kept where it is, at power plants in 31 states.

Reid called interim storage on federal land "Yucca neutral" but he also clearly views the Domenici proposal as a way to have the government take the waste — as it is obligated under contracts with utilities — and keep it out of Nevada.

The bill also would include nearly $500 million for the Yucca Mountain project and $270 million for a first installment on a Bush administration proposal for reprocessing nuclear fuel as part of an international program to boost use of nuclear energy.

The House has slashed the reprocessing funds to $120 million, about half of what the administration had sought for the fiscal year beginning in October.

Currently there are more than 50,000 tons of highly radioactive nuclear waste in form of spent reactor fuel rods at nuclear power plants in 31 states. The government under contracts is obligated to take the waste off the utilities' hands, but has not done so because it has no place to put it, pending completion of the Yucca facility.

Domenici's proposal would give the Energy Department authority to build temporary storage facilities on federal land, or purchase private land for such a facility with a license to keep the waste for up to 25 years.

Some utilities already have filed lawsuits — and won favorable rulings in the courts — claiming the government owes them millions of dollars for failing to take the waste by a 1998 deadline.

Domenici's proposal is likely to be controversial because it would give the Energy Department authority to build a waste facility within a state even if a state or local authorities objected.

The department would only have to consult with a state's governor. It would require a license from the federal Nuclear Regulatory Commission including compliance with various security, safety and environmental regulations.

Under the proposal, any federal land would be eligible except national parks, wilderness areas and wildlife refuges. Or, the government could purchase private land from any willing seller for the facility. A site may not be located in either Nevada, the site of the Yucca project, or Utah, where a private nuclear waste facility is being proposed on the Goshute Indian reservation.

Reactor waste now kept at closed power plants could be kept on site, but waste on any operating reactor sites must be moved, under terms of the proposal, after the government takes title.

Plan For Nuclear-Waste Storage Is Cleared By Senate Subcommittee (WSJ)

By John J. Fialka

Wall Street Journal, June 28, 2006

WASHINGTON -- A Senate subcommittee approved a plan to require the U.S. to set up temporary nuclear-waste storage facilities in states or regions that have nuclear-power plants, a move that could renew a 30-year-old fight over where to store radioactive waste.

The committee's action would give the Department of Energy the authority to store waste for as long as 25 years at "consolidation and preparation" sites; from there, the waste would be shipped to Nevada's Yucca Mountain for permanent storage.

DOJ_NMG_0037031

The plan is intended to help carry out the Energy Department's contractual obligation to take custody and store the waste. Because of delays in completing and licensing a permanent storage facility in Nevada, federal courts have ruled that the department has breached its contracts with power-plant owners to remove the radioactive waste from power-plant sites.

Energy Department spokesman Craig Stevens said it is studying the measure as part of its effort to work out a solution with Congress on interim storage.

Frank L. Bowman, president of the Nuclear Energy Institute, which represents nuclear-power-plant owners, commended members of the Senate Appropriations subcommittee that passed the measure. "The sooner that the federal government begins meeting its obligations" to take custody of the waste, he said, "the greater the prospects" of nuclear power will be in the U.S.

Under the measure, any site that is owned or can be purchased by the federal government can be designated a temporary waste-storage site, with the exception of national parks, wildlife refuges or wilderness areas. The secretary can designate a site within each of the 31 states that have nuclear plants, or can pick regional sites to be shared by states.

Some utilities have filed lawsuits against the department for its failure to remove the radioactive waste, which is stored at the power-plant sites where it is generated. According to industry estimates, the U.S. could be liable for as much as $50 billion in damages if the wastes aren't moved. If the temporary-storage measure passes, the most likely wastes to be shipped would be in dry concrete casks that can be stored at remote sites for years. Under the proposal, the new federal storage sites would have to be picked in consultation with governors of the states involved.

Pollution In Overdrive (WP)

By Sholnn Freeman

The Washington Post, June 28, 2006

When it comes to greenhouse gases, U.S. drivers are getting more of the blame.

Americans represent 5 percent of the world's population but contribute 45 percent of the world's emission of carbon dioxide, the main pollutant that causes global warming, according to a report by the nonprofit group Environmental Defense.

Americans own 30 percent of the world's vehicles, drive farther each year than the international average and burn more fuel per mile, the report says. Additionally, the sport-utility boom of the past decade put vehicles on the road that could be spewing carbon dioxide for years to come.

General Motors Corp. and Ford Motor Co. have long been the targets of environmentalists and other groups concerned with global warming. Vehicles made by GM, the No. 1 U.S. automaker, produced as much carbon dioxide in 2004 as American Electric Power Co., the nation's largest operator of coal-fired power plants, the report says.

Auto industry representatives declined to comment on the report, saying they had yet to see it. Most auto companies have been working to reduce emissions by designing more-efficient engines and vehicles capable of running on alternative fuels.

Automakers, though, have generally resisted government restrictions on carbon dioxide emissions, saying such limits would force extensive design changes and drive up prices for consumers.

Environmental Defense, which plans to release the report publicly today, attempted to quantify how much carbon dioxide is produced by vehicles sold by various automakers. But the group said auto companies should not be singled out for blame, because consumer choices also play a role.

"What we are trying to do is make the connections for people," said John DeCicco, a senior fellow at Environmental Defense and an author of the report.

He said consumers could buy gas-electric hybrids or cars with smaller engines that burn less fuel and they could be more aware of how much they are driving, no matter the gas mileage of their cars. The report points out, for example, that although SUVs may be known as gas guzzlers, smaller cars cause more pollution because there are many more of them on the road. The authors also suggest that communities reconsider land use policies because Americans are taking more and longer trips, often to shop.

With the report, the group is trying to build support for government policies aiming at curbing greenhouse gases, including a system that would cap carbon dioxide emissions but allow companies and utilities to trade credits, mirroring Clean Air Act rules that govern sulfur dioxide, which causes acid rain. Under such a system, a company would get an allowance for carbon dioxide emissions each year, and if it did not reach that limit, it could sell off the remaining allotment to others.

DOJ_NMG_0037032

The group's report is the latest effort by environmentalists to draw attention to global warming. Former vice president Al Gore also addresses the issue in his documentary "An Inconvenient Truth," which presents climate change from global warming as a fact he says is no longer debatable.

For years, though, environmental groups have run into resistance in Washington. The Bush administration has questioned the science behind global warming, and environmentalists complain that congressional leaders are ignoring proposals to raise fuel economy standards while pushing to expand offshore drilling.

On Monday, the Supreme Court agreed to hear arguments on whether the federal government has the authority to regulate carbon dioxide. The Bush administration is seeking to convince the court that the federal government has no obligation to restrict greenhouse gases.

Carbon dioxide is a byproduct of burning gasoline in vehicles. Scientists say the atmosphere can absorb a great deal of it, but many worry that people are adding more than nature can handle. They say the gases are building up around the Earth, trapping heat and raising the planet's temperature.

The report considered national statistics on how long vehicles are used and how far they are driven as they age. New and used vehicles were examined.

Carbon dioxide emissions from vehicles are disproportionately high in the United States for two primary reasons, the report says: U.S. drivers average 11,000 miles per year, 29 percent above the global average, and U.S. autos consume more fuel, emitting 15 percent more carbon dioxide per mile than the average vehicle in the rest of the world.

The Environmental Defense report found that in 2004, U.S. cars and light trucks emitted 314 metric tons of carbon dioxide, the equivalent of a coal train 50,000 miles long.

Greg Martin, a GM spokesman, said the automaker was working to reduce emissions. It will continue to focus on developing technologies to improve fuel efficiency. He said the automaker also plans to build more vehicles capable of burning alternative fuels, as well as more hybrids.

Gore's 'Truth' Largely Factual, Scientists Say (USAT)

USA Today, June 28, 2006

Al Gore's documentary on global warming, An Inconvenient Truth, earns five stars for accuracy, according to an Associated Press survey of top climate scientists. The former vice president's movie mostly got the science right, said all 19 climate scientists who had seen the movie or read the book. The AP says it contacted more than 100 top climate researchers, including vocal skeptics of climate change theory. Most had not yet seen the movie or read the book. But those who had had the same general impression: Gore conveyed the science correctly, and the world is getting hotter and is a man-made catastrophe in the making caused by the burning of fossil fuels. One scientist criticized the depiction of the connection between hurricanes and global warming. "I thought the use of imagery from Hurricane Katrina was inappropriate and unnecessary. … There are plenty of disturbing impacts associated with global warming for which there is much greater scientific consensus," said Brian Soden, a University of Miami professor of meteorology and oceanography. And the majority arm of the Senate Committee on Environment and Public Works issued a statement denouncing the AP story as biased.

A pair of whooping cranes has hatched two chicks in central Wisconsin, marking the first young of the species to be hatched in the wild in the eastern USA in more than 100 years. That makes about two dozen young cranes that will be added this year to an effort to establish only the second migratory flock of wild whooping cranes in North America. The flock now numbers about 60 birds. This fall, Operation Migration, the non-profit group coordinating the reintroduction project, will lead its sixth group of cranes by ultralight aircraft during their fall migration from the Necedah National Wildlife Refuge in Wisconsin to the Chassahowitzka National Wildlife Refuge near Crystal River, Fla. The birds migrate north on their own in the spring.

Researchers working in the swamps of Borneo have discovered a venomous species of snake that can change its skin color from reddish-brown to white, the conservation group WWF announced Tuesday. The ability to change skin color is known in some reptiles, such as the chameleon, but scientists have seen it rarely with snakes, the WWF says. Reptiles typically change color to camouflage themselves from predators. The 1.6-foot-long snake was discovered last year in wetlands and swamp forests around the Kapuas River in the Betung Kerihun National Park in the Indonesian part of the island of Borneo.

DOJ_NMG_0037033

A drug already sold to treat mild to moderate dementia in Alzheimer's patients won federal approval Tuesday to treat the same condition in Parkinson's patients. It makes Exelon the first drug for the treatment of the chronic loss or impairment of intellectual capacity in Parkinson's disease patients, the Food and Drug Administration said. The drug, also called rivastigmine tartrate, is made by Novartis AG. In a 24-week trial, Parkinson's patients treated with the drug scored higher on a scale that measures mental processes than did those given a placebo, the FDA said. Side effects include gastrointestinal reactions and weight loss.

A Warning On Hazards Of Secondhand Smoke (NYT)

By John O'Neil

The New York Times, June 28, 2006

The evidence is now "indisputable" that secondhand smoke is an "alarming" public health hazard, responsible for tens of thousands of premature deaths among nonsmokers each year, Surgeon General Richard H. Carmona said yesterday.

Dr. Carmona warned that measures like no-smoking sections did not provide adequate protection, adding, "Smoke-free environments are the only approach that protects nonsmokers from the dangers of secondhand smoke."

He did not call for a federal ban on smoking in workplaces, bars or restaurants, a step that has been taken by a growing number of cities and states over the objections of business owners and of groups skeptical about the dangers of secondhand smoke. He said he saw his role as providing the public and Congress with definitive information on the subject.

"I am here to say the debate is over: the science is clear," Dr. Carmona said at a televised news conference, where he released a report updating the original surgeon general's study of secondhand smoke in 1986. Since then, hundreds of studies have indicated that the harm caused by secondhand smoke is far greater than earlier believed, he said. The report includes these findings:

¶There is no safe level of secondhand smoke, and even brief exposure can cause harm, especially for people suffering from heart or respiratory diseases.

¶For nonsmoking adults, exposure raises the risk of heart disease by 25 percent to 30 percent and of cancer by 20 percent to 30 percent. It accounted for 46,000 premature deaths from heart disease and 3,000 premature deaths from cancer last year.

¶Secondhand smoke is a cause of sudden infant death syndrome, or SIDS, accounting for 430 deaths last year. The risk is elevated for children whose mothers were exposed during pregnancy and for children exposed in their homes after birth.

¶The impact on the health and development of children is more severe than previously thought. "Children are especially vulnerable to the poisons in secondhand smoke," Dr. Carmona said.

¶Efforts to minimize the effect of secondhand smoke by separating smokers and nonsmokers are ineffective, as are ventilation systems in a shared space.

¶While exposure has declined, as many as 60 percent of nonsmokers show biological evidence of encountering secondhand smoke, and 22 percent of children are exposed to secondhand smoke in their homes.

Studies conducted by the Centers for Disease Control show that great progress has been made in reducing exposure, Dr. Carmona said. The amount of cotinine — the form nicotine takes after being metabolized — in blood samples fell by 75 percent among adults, according to specimens taken from 1999 to 2002 that were compared with samples taken a decade earlier.

But Dr. Carmona said more needed to be done, particularly to protect children. He urged parents who smoke not only to quit, but also to move their smoking outside while trying to quit. "Make the home a smoke-free environment," he said.

Tobacco companies say the risks of secondhand smoke are unproved and overstated. In a statement on its Web site, R. J. Reynolds says, "It seems unlikely that secondhand smoke presents any significant harm to otherwise healthy nonsmoking adults; and, given the extensive smoking bans and restrictions that have already been enacted, nonsmokers can easily avoid exposure to secondhand smoke."

A spokesman for the company, David Howard, said yesterday, "Bottom line, we believe adults should be able to patronize establishments that permit smoking if they choose to do so," according to The Associated Press.

DOJ_NMG_0037034

Dr. Cheryl G. Healton, the president and chief executive of the American Legacy Foundation, a nonprofit group created to use settlement money from tobacco companies to educate young people about the dangers of tobacco, called the surgeon general's report "groundbreaking" even though much of its information had already been published in journal articles. Bringing it all together creates a persuasive case for smoking bans, Dr. Healton said.

The report is online at surgeongeneral.gov/library/secondhandsmoke/.

Sioux Tribal Leaders Plan Beer Blockade (USAT/AP)

By Carson Walker, The Associated Press

USA Today, June 28, 2006

SIOUX FALLS, S.D. — In an effort to fight alcoholism on the Pine Ridge Indian Reservation, leaders of the Oglala Sioux tribe plan to set up roadblocks today and stop members from bringing in beer bought at four outlying stores.

Alcohol has long been banned on the 16,500-member reservation, where drinking has been a scourge for generations. But four stores in Whiteclay, Neb., a village a few hundred feet outside the reservation, sell about 4 million cans of beer every year, mostly to Indians.

Tribal members say that from now on, they will confiscate beer bought in Whiteclay.

"We are the last line of defense when it comes to protecting our people," says Duane Martin of the reservation's Strong Heart Civil Rights Movement.

The effects of alcoholism can be seen in nearly every family, in accidents, violence, sexual abuse and suicide, says Terryl Blue-White Eyes, director of the alcohol and drug program for the reservation.

The youth suicide rate on the reservation is the highest in the nation, and most of the suicides involve alcohol, she says.

Shannon County, where most Pine Ridge residents live, is home to less than 2% of South Dakota's population but had 19% of the fatalities caused by drunken driving in 2005 — 14 of the 74 deaths statewide, according to the South Dakota Department of Public Safety.

Beer cans litter reservation roads and the streets of Whiteclay, a village of roughly a dozen people. People loiter outside the stores. Some try to trade tools, electronics and other items for beer.

The stores have been a source of tension for years, and tribal members have tried to stop alcohol sales in Whiteclay through the courts, the county and the state licensing board.

Mark Vasina, president of Nebraskans for Peace, a mostly non-Indian activist group that tried to end alcohol sales in the border town, says the blockade is the only option left.

Lance Lintt, who works at the Jumping Eagle Inn, one of the four stores in Whiteclay, says of the blockade, "I just don't know how it's going to work or how they have any legal grounds to confiscate any beer. I just don't think they'll get anyone to stop for them."

The plan is to set up checkpoints just inside the reservation's boundaries.

Volunteers in Whiteclay will use radios to tell workers at the checkpoints which vehicles should be stopped and searched.

Tribal police will not enforce the blockade but will maintain order, says Alex White Plume, vice president of the tribal council.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Mistrial Declared In Shooting Of Officer (BOS)

The Boston Globe, June 28, 2006

A Quincy man, accused of shooting a Boston police officer, was convicted of two firearms violations yesterday, but a Norfolk jury deadlocked on charges that he tried to kill the officer, prosecutors said. The judge declared a mistrial on the shooting charges yesterday because the 12-member jury failed to reach a verdict after deliberating for three days , said David Traub, a spokesman for the Norfolk district attorney's office. Traub said a hearing would be held Friday at Norfolk Superior Court to consider whether to retry Horacio Mays in the shooting of officer Scott W. O'Brien in the jaw and the right forearm in 2004. In

DOJ_NMG_0037035

January 2004, police went to Mays' Quincy home to arrest him on a default warrant for missing a probation surrender hearing. A standoff began after police arrived about 6 a.m., and Mays allegedly shot O'Brien, then 27, as he tried to enter the attic where Mays was hiding, police said.

Former gang leader sentenced to 21 years A former leader of the Latin King gang was sentenced to more than 21 years in federal prison for drug trafficking offenses, the US attorney's office said yesterday. Edwin Serrano, 29, of Lawrence was sentenced Friday after he was found guilty of selling cocaine and crack cocaine to a ``cooperating witness" working with a federal-state task force investigating gang activity throughout the state. Authorities say Serrano, who was minister of defense for the Lawrence chapter of the Almighty Latin King and Queen Nation, also offered to sell the witness a firearm and attempted to recruit the witness to go to New York to kidnap someone. Serrano was sentenced by Chief US District Judge Mark L. Wolf to 21 years and 10 months in prison, followed by 8 years of supervised release.

Barrios ends effort to limit Fluff State Senator Jarrett T. Barrios is abandoning his push to limit the serving of Fluff, the marshmallow concoction, in public schools. Barrios, a Cambridge Democrat, proposed an amendment to a school-nutrition bill last week that sought to restrict the sale of marshmallow spreads to once a week. But the proposal drew scorn from fans of the Fluffernutter, the sandwich made from fluff and peanut butter. After his proposal became national news and the butt of jokes on talk radio, Barrios decided to drop the effort, said spokesman Colin Durrant.

Trial set for accused Bosnian war criminal An alleged Bosnian Serb Army war criminal will go on trial in US District Court in Boston today on charges that he lied on immigration paperwork he used to enter the United States. Marko Boskic, a Croat, has told federal investigators he was forced to participate in the mass killings of 1,200 Muslim men and boys in Srebrenica in 1995 in the former Yugoslavia. The Justice Department earlier this year decided not to prosecute Boskic under American anti torture laws for his alleged role in the mass killings. Boskic, who was living in Peabody when taken into custody by immigration officials in 2004, now will be tried only on immigration charges for saying he had not served in Bosnian military.

Police identify stabbing victim in Roxbury

Police yesterday identified a man found fatally stabbed in a Roxbury home Thursday as Ronald Perry , 37, of Waltham. Police said they discovered Perry about 7 a.m. in a home on Cheney Street after a request from a friend to check on Perry. Police are investigating .

Man struck, killed by MBTA train The MBTA is trying to identify a man killed yesterday when he was struck by an Orange Line train while walking along the tracks south of the Green Street station in Jamaica Plain, said MBTA spokesman Joseph Pesaturo . The man, who Pesaturo said was not carrying identification, apparently walked off the station platform and was struck by a northbound train at about 6 a.m. Orange Line service was shut down for more than two hours and buses shuttled passengers, he said. The operator, as required, is undergoing drug and alcohol testing, Pesaturo said.

NEWTON

Two are indicted in Newton slaying Two men were indicted yesterday in the slaying of Edward Schiller, 39, during the morning of Jan. 13. James Brescia, 46, of Waltham and Scott Foxworth, 52, of Dracut are both charged with murder and conspiracy in Schiller's fatal shooting in a Newton parking garage. Schiller was found in his car with a single gunshot to the head and was pronounced dead on the scene. Authorities believe that Brescia agreed to pay Foxworth to kill Schiller and that Foxworth shot Schiller in the garage. Both men were arraigned on April 4 and pleaded not guilty.

Police: Lethal Drug Fentanyl Hitting Twin Cities Streets (AP)

AP, June 28, 2006

MINNEAPOLIS - A lethal mixture of heroin laced with fentanyl, a synthetic painkiller blamed in the deaths of more than 200 people in Chicago and Detroit, is working its way into the Twin Cities, authorities said.

"It's the beginning of an issue, and how far-reaching it becomes we'll have to see," said Thomas Kelly, agent-in-charge of the federal Drug Enforcement Administration office here.

Fentanyl can kill in tiny doses, either by stopping a user's breathing or making them so unresponsive that they choke on their own vomit, said Matt Morgan, a toxicology fellow at Hennepin County Medical Center.

DOJ_NMG_0037036

Three St. Paul men arrested Friday have been charged with conspiring to distribute fentanyl and crack cocaine. Kevin Joseph Fenner and Eric Dion Davis, both 38, and Eric Robert Hargrove are scheduled to appear Wednesday in U.S. District Court in Minneapolis.

According to a criminal complaint, Fenner sold 5 grams of a substance that tested positive for fentanyl to a police informant last week. And Hargrove possessed 6 grams of suspected fentanyl when he and Davis were arrested Friday night while driving to a drug buy set up by an informant.

Davis was identified as a Vice Lord gang member three years ago, said Ron Ryan, commander of the Metro Gang Strike Force.

Officers later recovered 1 1/2 ounces of suspected fentanyl when they searched Hargrove's bedroom in a house on Germain Avenue in St. Paul, where he lived with Fenner, the complaint states.

Authorities in Minneapolis and St. Paul are reviewing heroin-related deaths to determine if fentanyl was involved.

Though he did not have specifics, St. Paul police spokesman Pete Crum said Tuesday that "we're aware of an increase nationwide of heroin overdoses, and that includes the metro region here."

Minneapolis police Capt. Rich Stanek said the department has seized only "very small" amounts of heroin mixed with fentanyl.

Kelly said one of the three men arrested has connections to Chicago and that drug agents were trying to determine whether that's the source of the fentanyl seized in St. Paul.

Nearly 100 fentanyl-related deaths have been confirmed in the Chicago area this year, according to the Cook County medical examiner's office.

By Ken Little (SN)

By Guidelines On Health Information

Star News, June 27, 2006

Federal guidelines in place to keep personal health information confidential create a roadblock for police who want to speak with victims of overdoses about the source of the drugs that hospitalized them.

The issue was discussed last week at a meeting of about 30 law enforcement officials and medical community representatives. The task force, formed by New Hanover County District Attorney Ben David, is talking about ways to coordinate the response to a recent surge of suspected heroin overdoses that have claimed at least four lives in Wilmington.

Strides were made to ensure cooperation between the law enforcement and medical communities, David said Monday.

"The goal is to recognize that the interests of medical professionals and those of us in law enforcement are united in determining the source of the illegal drugs," David said. "The goal is to treat patients and catch dealers who are making these patients victims."

Preliminary test results from the federal Drug Enforcement Administration shows the heroin that killed two men earlier this month in Wilmington was high in purity and not cut with the powerful synthetic narcotic fentanyl, as was suspected.

Whatever its composition, the heroin poses a lethal threat to users, Wilmington-based DEA Special Agent Eric Savitts said.

"Generally speaking, if (regular users) find out there is a potent batch out there, they will gravitate towards it," Savitts said.

Further testing will help determine the specific content of the heroin, Savitts said.

Meanwhile, representatives of New Hanover Regional Medical Center and the city of Wilmington are exploring the nuances of the 1996 Health Insurance Portability and Accountability Act to see how much wiggle room institutions like hospitals and counseling centers have in providing client information to police.

"We have a lot of common goals, like making sure the community is safe, but at the same time we have a lot of privacy constraints we have to comply with," said Lori Feezor, hospital vice president of legal affairs.

Feezor and city privacy officer William Wolak are exploring ways to cooperate with police while adhering to the HIPAA law.

"We need to be mindful and protect the confidentiality of patient information. That said, we are also mindful of our dual responsibility to the community and the health of all people in the region," Feezor said.

Police Community Affairs Officer Linda Rawley suggested that something has to give for the partnership to be effective.

"The hospital has not released any information to us because of HIPAA. The only way we know about the (overdoses) is from officers who are at the scene," she said.

Investigators "want to be able to begin tracking these cases to look at the pattern," Rawley said.

"At the federal level, it looks like lawmakers and legislators should make some addendums to HIPAA," she said.

Feezor said the hospital can currently provide information to police about a patient if the individual consents to it. Medical officials can also release "aggregate data" reflecting, for instance, the total of suspected overdose victims treated with the drug Narcan over a given time frame, but can not get into specific cases. Narcan is commonly administered to people who overdose on narcotics.

"It is a difficult issue and it is an issue health care providers struggle with nationwide," Feezor said. "Generally, we have tried to collaborate where possible."

Friday's meeting "laid the foundation for examining some of those processes. We are waiting to see more hypotheticals," Feezor said.

Law enforcement and supporting agencies are gearing up for a full-scale assault on the local heroin trade, David said.

"Our primary concern is quickly locating the source of the illegal drugs," he said. "We are stepping up the pressure on drug dealers in this community and this is just one of the phases it is taking."

Man's Death Possibly Linked To Heroin (WOOD)

WOOD-TV, June 27, 2006

PORTAGE -- The Portage Police Department continues to investigate the death of a 34-year-old man.

Officers found the victim dead inside his home Thursday night.

An autopsy could not reveal what caused the man's death.

Portage police think he died of a mix of heroin and the prescription pain reliever fentanyl. Such a combination is blamed for nearly 200 deaths in the Detroit and Chicago areas.

Investigators hope a toxicology report on the Portage man's body will help their case.

Officials Investigate Limbaugh After Finding Viagra In His Bag (AP)

AP, June 27, 2006

WEST PALM BEACH, Fla. (AP) — Rush Limbaugh will likely have to wait several days to find out if he violated his deal with prosecutors in a prescription fraud case when authorities found him in possession of a bottle of Viagra that was apparently prescribed to someone else, a spokesman for the state attorney's office said Tuesday.

Limbaugh, 55, was detained for more than three hours Monday at Palm Beach International Airport after he returned on his private plane from a vacation in the Dominican Republic. Customs officials found Viagra in his bag, but his name wasn't on the prescription, Palm Beach County sheriff's spokesman Paul Miller said.

Limbaugh's lawyer, Roy Black, said the prescription was written in his doctor's name "for privacy purposes." The conservative radio host was released without being charged and investigators confiscated the Viagra, which treats erectile dysfunction.

Limbaugh joked about the search on his radio show Tuesday, saying Customs officials didn't believe him when he said he got the pills at the Clinton Library and he was told they were blue M&Ms. He later added, chuckling: "I had a great time in the Dominican Republic. Wish I could tell you about it."

It is generally not illegal under Florida law for a physician to prescribe medication in a third party's name if all parties are aware and the doctor documents it correctly, said Mike Edmondson, a spokesman for the state attorney in Palm Beach County. He would not discuss specifics in the Limbaugh case Tuesday.

The sheriff's office was continuing its investigation and would turn the case over to prosecutors in several days, Edmondson said. The alleged violation could be a second-degree misdemeanor if Limbaugh's doctor doesn't confirm the prescription.

Under last month's deal with prosecutors, authorities will dismiss a "doctor shopping" charge if Limbaugh doesn't get arrested for 18 months, among other terms. Prosecutors had said he illegally deceived multiple doctors to get overlapping painkiller prescriptions. Limbaugh denied the charges but admitted he was addicted to painkillers.

This latest case may simply be dismissed if prosecutors can confirm with Limbaugh's doctor that the prescription was indeed for Limbaugh, said Kendall Coffey, a former U.S. attorney in Florida.

"It's perhaps a little embarrassing but not highly incriminating," Coffey said.

In addition, possession of Viagra is in a "completely different universe than a matter that would involve Schedule Two (controlled) substances such as OxyContin" Coffey added.

According to the Drug Enforcement Administration, Viagra is not considered a controlled substance because "it's not something you can be addicted to," said DEA Investigator Maria Gilbert.

The Food and Drug Administration oversees regulations concerning non-addictive drugs that are not considered controlled substances, Gilbert said. A telephone call to the FDA was not immediately returned Tuesday.

Limbaugh Case Alerts Travelers To Rules For Prescriptions (USAT)

By Kitty Bean Yancey, Usa Today

USA Today, June 28, 2006

Carrying a vial of Viagra without his name on it got talk-show host Rush Limbaugh in hot water with U.S. customs officers Monday.

And his detention at Florida's Palm Beach airport raises questions for U.S. travelers who routinely fly with drugs that they can't show were prescribed to them.

Limbaugh was stopped after flying in from the Dominican Republic on a private jet. In a bag search, customs officers found a bottle of Viagra without his name on it. Limbaugh lawyer Roy Black said in a statement that the erectile-dysfunction drug was "prescribed by Mr. Limbaugh's treating physician but labeled as being issued to the physician rather than Mr. Limbaugh for privacy purposes."

VIDEO: Radio host detained for 3 hours

That violated customs rules, says Jennifer Connors, a U.S. Customs and Border Protection spokeswoman. Names on prescription drug bottles must "match the name on the travel document," she says.

Passengers flying domestically don't have to carry a prescription or have a labeled bottle, although the Transportation Security Administration website encourages labeled medications. Spokesman Darrin Kayser says, "Our focus is security; we're not as enforcement-focused as (customs), looking at 'whose drugs are those?' But it's good to have a prescription label, so it's clear."

Meanwhile, travelers often fly without prescriptions or the containers drugs came in.

Jean Mothena, 59, of Aldie, Va., takes seven pills daily (two prescription) and for ease keeps them in a sectioned pillbox. "I don't carry copies of my prescriptions. I've never thought there might be a problem."

Art Van Bodegraven, 66, of Alpharetta, Ga., flies overseas with unmarked pill containers. "I have never been asked about them."

Ditto, says Leonard Dinnerstein, 72, of Tucson. "I always dump them all in a big ol' Ziploc, throw it into the carry-on and go."

Ken Kushnir, 59, of Healdsburg, Calif., recalls being "hassled" when he lacked prescriptions or the bottles they came in. One customs agent "said he could arrest me on the spot," Kushnir says. He didn't.

Limbaugh, 55, went free after being detained. He was not targeted, Connors says: "We go through most people's bags" on private aircraft coming in from overseas.

The case went to the Palm Beach County Sheriff's Office; its report will go to the state attorney's office. Mike Edmondson, an attorney's office spokesman, says that, generally, if a doctor didn't act fraudulently and a prescription was for the patient, "that wouldn't be a violation of Florida statute."

Two months ago, Limbaugh struck a deal with prosecutors on a charge of fraudulently obtaining painkiller prescriptions. The case was to be dismissed in 18 months if he continued drug treatment and exhibited "model-citizen behavior," he told listeners.

2 More Sentenced For Role In Danbury-area Drug Ring (DNT)

Danbury (CT) News Times, June 27, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0037039

Two more Danbury men have been sentenced to prison terms for their involvement in a Danbury-area cocaine and crack distribution ring that was broken up by law enforcement last year, federal authorities said Monday

Edward Toney, 22, of Westville Avenue, Danbury, was sentenced to five years in prison and four years of supervised release for conspiring to distribute 500 grams or more of cocaine, U.S. Attorney Kevin O'Connor said.

Timothy Eberly, 22, of Davis Street, was sentenced to 27 months behind bars, and six years of supervised release. Eberle faces an additional term of imprisonment for a probation violation stemming from a previous drug-trafficking conviction.

The two were among 24 people from Danbury and New York City who were arrested last year during a crackdown by Danbury police and the federal Drug Enforcement Administration on a drug ring operated by Alex Luna of Danbury. The ring imported large quantities of powdered and crack cocaine into the area for several years, investigators said.

A large quantity of narcotics, along with packaging material, cash, firearms and ammunition, were also seized by police.

Luna, who already has pleaded guilty, and several other defendants are still awaiting sentencing, O'Connor said.

N.F.L. Strengthens Drug Policy (AP)

AP, June 28, 2006

The N.F.L. has toughened its drug policy, adding amphetamines to the list of banned performance-enhancers starting in 2007. Amphetamines were previously listed as a "substance-abuse drug," but are now in the same category as steroids and other enhancers that carry stronger penalties. Next year will serve as a transition year, when a first positive test will bring a warning and put a player into the drug program. But in 2007, testing will cover amphetamines on a regular basis. A first positive will result in a four-game suspension.

NFL Cracking Down On Amphetamines (USAT)

By Skip Wood, Usa Today

USA Today, June 28, 2006

As far as the National Football League is concerned, amphetamines and methamphetamines aren't just harmful drugs but substances that fall under the performance-enhancement category.

Thus, beginning in 2007, positive tests from the drugs will result in the same penalties carried for steroids — sanctions which have recently been increased in an agreement between the league and the union as part of the revamped collective bargaining agreement.

The changes were announced this week at the NFL's annual rookie symposium in San Diego. Players were told of the changes by Harold Henderson, the NFL's executive vice president of labor relations.

For the upcoming 2006 season, the penalty for a second violation for performance-enhancing drugs such as steroids will be increased from six games to eight games. First-time violators will continue to face an automatic suspension of four games. A third positive test still carries a one-year suspension.

According to Henderson, amphetamines and their derivatives have become a growing concern for the NFL, especially since the 2005 Congressional hearings explored performance-enhancing drug use in pro sports and the testing policies the major leagues utilize.

"Until then, we frankly didn't have a strong indication or belief they might be a problem for us," Henderson said. "But when we started talking to people in other sports, and saw what went on on the Hill, we started to re-evaluate our position."

The switch in classification for amphetamines and methamphetamines will not take affect until the 2007 season to make certain all players know of the new rules. A first positive test in 2006 would bring a warning and put a player into the drug program. A positive test next year will initially result in a four-game suspension

"We wanted this year," Henderson said, "to be less punitive and use it as a period of education and awareness."

Amphetamines previously fell under the category of harmful drugs such as cocaine and marijuana; a player wasn't suspended until his third positive test for such substances.

NFL players association president Gene Upshaw was unavailable for comment. Henderson said the union was in full agreement regarding the changes.

DOJ_NMG_0037040

Amphetamines and methamphetamines affect the central nervous system and are considered stimulants. They are known to cause euphoric feelings and temporary boosts in energy but can also cause hypertension, among other health problems. Both drugs are addictive. Methamphetamines are considered stronger than amphetamines.

"We don't think they necessarily present the same types of competitive issues as steroids but there are serious health issues," Henderson said.

"But (we) realized the possibility that some players would use it for a gameday edge," he told the Associated Press in a phone interview. "The union quickly agreed with us."

"We were all working together during the Congressional investigation," Henderson said. "We learned about it, we wondered with each other whether this was an issue to be concerned about. In the abundance of caution, we probably should be. We all understood we needed to do something here."

Major League Baseball didn't begin testing for amphetamines until this season. An initial positive test results in evaluation and follow-up testing. Further positive tests result in suspensions of 25 games, 80 games and then a lifetime ban.

The NFL rookie symposium, which began Sunday and ends Wednesday, is a mandatory affair at which rookies are prepped on off-field issues in the league — including behavior and the importance of staying out of trouble and avoiding risky activities.

Several 2006 draft picks already have run afoul of the law, a fact Henderson acknowledges concerns him.

"It does," he said, "and that's one of the things we've been talking about here."

Henderson added there has been preliminary talk about holding the symposium either in late May or early June.

The Associated Press contributed to this report

Bonds Says He Hasn't Heard From Mitchell (AP)

AP, June 27, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) -- Barry Bonds said Tuesday he hasn't heard yet from former Sen. George Mitchell in his independent investigation of steroids in baseball.

Mitchell, the former Senate majority leader, was appointed in March by commissioner Bud Selig to head the league's investigation into steroids. He has already contacted some members of the San Francisco Giants' coaching staff.

Bonds, who has always denied using performance-enhancing drugs to fuel his home run chase, said he is determined to stay upbeat despite his decreased production this season, a sore, tired body, and his off-the-field issues.

"I'm doing good, ain't I? I'm going to be a positive person no matter what," Bonds said. "As long as my health is good and my family's happy, I'm going to be happy."

Bonds returned to the Giants' lineup for Tuesday night's interleague series opener against the Texas Rangers after he left Sunday's game against the Oakland Athletics following the second inning with irritation in his left knee.

Bonds, who turns 42 on July 24, is batting .252 with 11 home runs and 34 RBIs this season and has drawn 62 walks -- 26 intentional. With 719 career homers, he is second on the career list behind Hank Aaron (755).

"I'm loving life," Bonds said. "I'm just going to roll with it and have fun."

What is he struggling with?

"Everything," Bonds said, chuckling. "But I'm happy. I'm enjoying myself. I wave to the people outside, cheery."

Bonds said he hurt his left knee -- he had three operations on the right one in 2005 -- stealing a base Friday night for the first time in nearly two years after team broadcaster Mike Krukow challenged the seven-time NL MVP's speed. Bonds acknowledged his competitive nature took over and he might have pushed his body too hard to prove Krukow wrong.

"I can only do it once. I need a break after that," Bonds said. "I'm not slow. I've played like this most of my career."

Bonds also reiterated that he doesn't plan to be in Pittsburgh for next month's All-Star game. He wants ace Jason Schmidt, another former Pirates player, to represent the Giants.

"Been there, done that," he said of returning to the city where he started his career. "Schmitty deserves it. He should represent this team. He's pitched well all year."

DOJ_NMG_0037041

While Bonds was ready to play again, right fielder Moises Alou missed another day after receiving a cortisone injection in his troublesome lower back on Monday's off day. He has missed eight games with back spasms.

Bonds and Alou have played only 30 games together dating to last season, and the Giants are 13-8 with both of them in the lineup this year.

"Me and Mo are just trying to figure out what somebody has with us being on the field at the same time," Bonds said. "Somebody has a hex on us. We need to figure out what it is and kill it."

Armstrong Goes On The Offensive To State His Case (LAT)

By Alan Abrahamson, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, June 27, 2006

In numerous television interviews, he challenges the testimony by an ex-teammate's wife that he admitted using drugs to aid his performance.

Lance Armstrong mounted a public-relations offensive Monday, seeking to discount sworn testimony alleging that he had, nearly 10 years ago in an Indiana hospital room, acknowledged use of an array of performance-enhancing substances.

Appearing on a number of shows on ABC or ESPN, Armstrong sought to undercut testimony offered by Betsy Andreu, a former teammate's wife. She testified Armstrong was asked by doctors on Oct. 27, 1996, if he had used performance-enhancing drugs and said, "EPO, growth hormone, cortisone, steroid, testosterone."

"... The proof is in the pudding," Armstrong, appearing on ESPN's "Outside the Lines," said. "The pudding's not a bunch of people that are bitter and angry. The proof of the results, not just the race results but the drug-testing results, the investigations, the inquiries, the court cases — haven't lost one of them."

Andreu's testimony, corroborated by her husband, Frankie, a former Armstrong teammate who rode in the first two of Armstrong's history-making Tour de France wins from 1999 through 2005, came in a confidential arbitration. The case ended in February with a $7.5-million settlement in Armstrong's favor.

The Times reported Saturday about Betsy Andreu's testimony. The French newspaper Le Monde on Friday had printed portions of her testimony.

Armstrong said Monday on "The View," on ABC: "... The things they don't report is what happened under cross-examination when the person who made the accusation couldn't remember anything about the room. Couldn't remember if the doctor was a man or a woman, couldn't remember if they had a lab coat on or not, couldn't remember if they had a clipboard, couldn't remember anything.

"No facts, no figures, no evidence — just a mouth," one of the hosts, Star Jones, interjected.

Barbara Walters, another host, chimed in to ask Armstrong, "Aren't you sick of it?"

Under cross-examination, Betsy Andreu testified Jan. 17 that two doctors came into the room with white coats; one was tall with brown hair and glasses, she said. She further testified that there was a bathroom on the left, a big table on the right, a television against the wall, Armstrong was sitting in a chair by the table, a football game was on TV and one of the others who was there — Armstrong's then-girlfriend — was studying.

Betsy and Frankie Andreu issued a statement Monday through their attorney that said, "My clients remain steadfast in the truthfulness of their testimony."

Hamilton Faces New Doping Allegations (LAT)

By Alan Abrahamson, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, June 27, 2006

Report details billing for performance-enhancing treatment U.S. cyclist is said to have received.

A Spanish newspaper reported Monday that U.S. cyclist Tyler Hamilton, an Olympic gold medalist serving a two-year suspension for blood doping, was billed by a doctor for treatment that allegedly included blood transfusions and banned performance-enhancing drugs, including steroids, human growth hormone and the synthetic blood booster EPO.

Hamilton, in a statement issued by his attorney, Howard Jacobs of Los Angeles, said, "I have not done what the article alleges."

DOJ_NMG_0037042

The report in El Pais, a national circulation paper published in Madrid, is part of a series sparked by a review of confidential judicial documents tied to a raid in May by police in Madrid. El Pais said Sunday that 58 riders in recent years might have received blood and banned substances.

Monday, the paper reported that among the documents it had reviewed was a fax, allegedly sent to Hamilton's wife, detailing a doctor bill for 43,040 euros, about $53,850 at Monday's exchange rate. The report said Hamilton also had been sent two pages of doctors' files purportedly detailing calendars noted with medications to be taken in advance of the 2003 season.

For instance, the paper reported, EPO was to be taken daily from Dec. 21 until Christmas Eve, and then on alternate days until Jan. 9. On Jan. 14, blood was to be withdrawn. On Jan. 24, anabolic steroids were to be started. Then in March, growth hormone and insulin were to be taken, as well as HMG, a hormone used by menopausal women, to mask anabolic steroid use, the paper said.

In the final lead-up to the Tour de France, cycling's premiere event, more growth hormone was to be taken and blood was to be reinfused, according to El Pais. Hamilton took fourth in the 2003 Tour despite breaking a collarbone in the first stage.

Hamilton won gold at the 2004 Athens Olympics in the time trial, then failed a test for blood doping. The backup test proved inconclusive, authorities acknowledging that the sample had mistakenly been frozen, and Hamilton kept his medal.

The month after the Olympics, in September 2004, Hamilton tested positive again for blood doping.

The test turned up markers for someone else's blood in his system.

In February, the Swiss-based Court of Arbitration for Sport, rejected Hamilton's appeal and barred him from competition through Sept. 22, 2006.

U.S. Cyclist Hamilton Keeps Gold Medal (AP)

AP, June 28, 2006

LAUSANNE, Switzerland (AP) -- American cyclist Tyler Hamilton will keep his gold medal from the 2004 Athens Olympics.

The Court of Arbitration for Sport rejected an appeal Tuesday by the Russian Olympic Committee to strip Hamilton of his time-trial gold medal due to a doping controversy and give it to silver medalist Vyacheslav Ekimov.

Hamilton currently is serving a two-year ban for testing positive for blood doping at the Spanish Vuelta in September 2004. CAS, world sport's highest tribunal, upheld the two-year ban in February.

That ban came into effect one month after an initial doping test in Athens in August 2004 led to suspicions Hamilton had used a blood transfusion to boost his endurance.

But the International Olympic Committee abandoned its probe because the American's backup specimen was mistakenly frozen, leaving too few red blood cells to analyze.

"Tyler Hamilton can retain the gold medal he won at the time-trial event in Athens and the ranking of this race is definitively confirmed," CAS said in its ruling Tuesday.

On Monday, Spanish daily El Pais reported that Hamilton was a client of Dr. Eufemiano Fuentes, one of the doctors arrested and charged in connection with the blood-doping scandal in Spain.

El Pais reported that Civil Guard investigations -- called "Operation Door" in Spanish -- show that Hamilton was among 58 pro cyclists who may have received prohibited substances and blood transfusions in recent years.

The article showed a copy of a fax, allegedly sent to Hamilton's wife -- Haven Parchinski -- detailing a doctor's bill for $54,060. The report said Hamilton had also had been sent two pages of doctors' files detailing calendars with medications to be taken in advance of the 2003 season.

Hamilton was not only engaged in banned blood transfusion practices, but also used EPO, anabolic steroids and human growth hormones during his treatment by Fuentes, the El Pais article said.

"I was very upset to read the accusations against me and to see my name associated with the 'Operacion Puerto' investigation in Spain," Hamilton said Monday in an e-mail message sent by his foundation. "I have not been treated by Dr. Fuentes. I have not done what the article alleges.

"In addition, I have never been contacted by authorities in Spain regarding these allegations. Therefore, it is impossible to comment on a situation I have no knowledge of."

DOJ_NMG_0037043

Amid Doping Scandal, Ullrich Is Cleared To Ride In Tour De France (NYT)

By Nathaniel Vinton

The New York Times, June 28, 2006

The Tour de France has been enveloped by the turmoil of a doping investigation less than a week before it is scheduled to begin. Race officials asked the team of a top contender to withdraw Monday, and yesterday they cleared another contender, Jan Ullrich of Germany, after a Spanish newspaper linked him to the blood-doping inquiry that has shaken cycling for the past month.

Tour officials asked the Astana-Würth team to withdraw after deciding it was implicated too heavily in the scandal. Alexander Vinokourov of Kazakhstan, who finished fifth in last year's Tour and third in 2003, rides for Astana-Würth.

The team appealed to the Court of Arbitration for Sport, and a ruling was expected as early as today.

"We expect to receive a request for formal arbitration tonight or tomorrow early," Matthieu Reeb, the secretary general for the C.A.S., said in a telephone interview from the court's headquarters in Lausanne, Switzerland. "We are ready to conduct an expedited procedure, to make sure that a final decision can be made before the Tour de France begins on Saturday."

Reeb said he expected the case to be considered by one court-appointed arbiter.

While the court is deliberating, uncertainty hangs over the Tour de France; teams are expected to arrive today in Strasbourg, where the competition will begin with a 7.1-kilometer prologue race (about 4.4 miles).

Astana-Würth has been involved in the doping investigation since last month, when the Guardia Civil, a military and civilian police force in Spain, raided several apartments in Madrid and seized steroids, hormones, the endurance-boosting hormone EPO, nearly 100 bags of frozen blood and equipment for treating blood. The evidence was said to have implicated dozens of cyclists and other athletes.

At the time, the team was named Liberty Seguros-Würth, but Liberty Seguros (part of Liberty Mutual, an insurance company based in Boston) demanded that its name be removed from the team's uniforms and vehicles. Astana is a collection of Kazakh businesses that came together in support of Vinokourov.

The Spanish newspaper El País reported that Ullrich, the Tour champion in 1997 and one of the favorites this year, could be implicated in the investigation. No riders have been charged in the investigation, and Ullrich has denied the accusations.

Tour de France officials said yesterday that Ullrich had been cleared to race. "For the Tour de France, for now, there is no problem with Ullrich," the race spokesman Philippe Sudres told The Associated Press.

Ullrich's team, T-Mobile, contacted the Spanish authorities yesterday and requested to see the secret evidence that El País cited in its report. But the Guardia Civil said no to the request, according to the team's spokesman, Luuc Eisenga.

Ullrich was not available for comment yesterday; he and his coach denied the blood-doping allegations Monday on the team's Web site. Ullrich, a favorite to challenge Ivan Basso of Italy for the Tour title this season, has been training in Switzerland, where he has a home.

"Obviously, we as a team cannot let Jan get stuck at home because there is a speculation in a newspaper," Eisenga said. "We have requested more information from the Guardia Civil, but they told us this information is top secret."

Eisenga said that he had spoken with the two top officials of the Tour — Christian Prudhomme, the race director, and Jean-Marie Leblanc, the deputy director — and that they were also pressing the Guardia Civil to share evidence obtained in its investigation.

"We share the same interests, and that is in having more information in order so we can make a decision," Eisenga said. "What we need for all decisions is proof, or evidence. There is no evidence. There is only speculation."

Details of the substances and documents gathered in the raid have been leaked to Spanish newspapers over the past month, creating an air of paranoia around the sport. Last week, Ullrich won the Tour de Suisse, a nine-stage race considered an indicator for Tour de France success.

RULING ALLOWS HAMILTON TO KEEP MEDAL Tyler Hamilton of the United States will keep his gold medal from the 2004 Athens Olympics. The Court of Arbitration for Sport rejected an appeal yesterday by the Russian Olympic Committee to strip Hamilton of his gold medal in the time trial because of a doping controversy and give it to the silver medalist, Vyacheslav Ekimov. Hamilton is serving a two-year suspension for testing positive for blood doping at the Spanish Vuelta in September 2004. (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0037044

Cycling Suffers Toll For Role In Drug Testing (USAT)

USA Today, June 28, 2006

The Super Bowl of cycling starts this weekend in France, sans Lance. Even without the presence of the American legend named Armstrong, the famous two-wheel marathon of mystery and misery is enough to bring a smile and a grimace to the face of one of his former teammates.

As the same clouds of suspicion gather overhead regarding new allegations of illegal doping by some of the world's top cyclists, Jonathan Vaughters is in Boulder, Colo., trying to teach the next generation of young riders a better way — the right way — to spare them from confronting a moral dilemma.

That would be the drug-free way.

The French way.

"In some ways, this pain (of scandal) is good," he says. "These kids never will have to face the decision of whether to do drugs and win or be mediocre and be able to sleep at night. Everyone in my generation faced it; it's what I went through. What a horrible choice. I don't want my guys to walk through a store and someone say, 'There goes a professional cyclist — he's a doper.' "

He insists it can be done as older riders, accustomed to the benefits of pharmacological cheating, fade. The climb up an Alps-high mountain of skepticism is long and steep. The sport is badly stigmatized because doping has been the fire under the seat for many cyclists for years. You can argue the merits of cyclists using alcohol, cocaine and amphetamines in decades past, but you cannot debate the effectiveness of EPO, a synthetic hormone that stimulates production of red blood cells and increases endurance.

Cycling is paying a hefty price because of its leadership in testing, even as most pro sports fly under the drug performance-enhancement radar because of union dissent regarding perimeters for testing.

"Cycling clearly is the divorced family," says Vaughters, 33, now retired and CEO of Slipstream Sports. "The furniture is in the front yard, the dog is running around without a leash — everyone in the neighborhood knows what's going on. Neighbors are looking out their windows and down their noses while at the same time lining up dates for the weekend on their spouses.

"Obviously, cycling has a problem with doping. But it is reduced. It was much worse in the '90s. It shows up on the radar often because the sport chose to pursue the problem. Any major team sport — baseball, the NFL, NHL — would come up with a whole lot more stuff than they did in the Spanish police raid (implicating former Tour winner Jan Ullrich). Fifteen years ago, cycling was where baseball is today."

If Vaughters is right, hold your breath regarding drugs and sports. Tuesday, the NFL toughened penalties for amphetamines. But when was the last time a pro football star not named Bill Romanowski tested positive for steroids and you heard about it? (Hint: Begins with "never.")

"The next 10 years is going to be one of the cleanest ever in professional cycling — and it will be one of the most painful eras for a lot of pro sports," Vaughters says.

Cycling remains synonymous with deception. Every day there seems to be a different allegation or re-cycling of news and old, festering personal wounds. In the case of Armstrong and adversaries such as international drug czar Dick Pound and former cyclist Greg LeMond, the rehashing of rumored treachery by the seven-time Tour kingpin is as tawdry as it is useless.

Last week it was revealed that a former Armstrong teammate, and the man's wife, swore under oath the inspirational cancer survivor admitted to a doctor (in their presence) that he doped.

Tyler Hamilton, the U.S. Olympic gold medalist suspended two years for doping, denied a report this week that a doctor billed him for blood-boosting work, including allegations he used steroids.

"Lance is extremely talented. Whether he doped or not, I have no idea," Vaughters says. "Here is a guy who, if everyone showed up clean, would win. I could've turned myself into a human chemistry lab and I still would not have been as good as Lance Armstrong."

Because the French were disgraced by a major doping scandal on their soil in the late 1990s, their attitude toward the sport was profoundly modified (some might suggest decades of not winning their own race made a difference, too). Testing of French cyclists is far more stringent, "10 times more than whatever I was subjected to when I was on the U.S. Postal Service team," says Vaughters, who also competed for a French contingent during his career.

DOJ_NMG_0037045

It was in France where he culled the mandate he gives to young U.S. cyclists: "Do your best — don't take it beyond. We'd rather have you lose clean than win dirty."

IMMIGRATION:

Senate Warms To 'Border First' (WT)

By Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, June 28, 2006

Key backers of the Senate immigration bill said yesterday they are willing to consider a compromise that would delay the guest-worker program and "amnesty" portions until the borders have been secured.

The proposal was floated by Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter in an interview Monday with editors and reporters at The Washington Times.

"I think it's worth discussing," said Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican. "Many of us have said we could work on border enforcement and, at the same time, work on other aspects that would take more time."

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat, said a delay will occur anyway because it will take a few years to set up the guest-worker program and the structure to process millions of illegal aliens onto a pathway to citizenship.

"We've always understood that," he said, adding that the final bill must be "comprehensive" and include all provisions.

"That's the key," he said, after he, Mr. McCain and others hosted a broad coalition of outside groups demanding a comprehensive bill.

Reaction at the other end of the Capitol was more muted, with at least one key House leader continuing yesterday to point out flaws in the Senate bill.

The House and Senate approved very different immigration bills, with the House focusing on building 700 miles of fence on the U.S.-Mexico border, boosting enforcement and requiring employers to verify that their workers are here legally. The Senate bill boosts enforcement, too, but also creates a program for future immigrant workers and a path to citizenship for many current illegal aliens.

On Monday, Mr. Specter, the Pennsylvania Republican who will lead House and Senate negotiators in the conference committee, told The Times that border security should be the top priority in the final bill and that he is open to a compromise that would make the guest-worker program and path to citizenship for illegal aliens contingent on first ensuring a secure border and improved interior enforcement.

Sen. Lindsey Graham, South Carolina Republican and key backer of the Senate bill, said yesterday he could see that as a possibility.

"I'm open to the idea that you'd have ... border-security benchmarks, interior-enforcement benchmarks, and once that's fulfilled, you start assimilating people," he said.

But just a month ago, many of these same senators -- including Mr. Specter, Mr. Graham and Mr. Kennedy -- voted against a proposal that would have set out a similar timeline requiring border security and improved enforcement before the rest of the Senate bill could proceed.

Mr. McCain, who wasn't present for the vote last month, said that approach was different from Mr. Specter's because it would have required the government to certify the border is "sealed" before the rest of the Senate bill could go forward -- a standard that he said could "never" be met.

While Mr. Specter's idea was received in the Senate with cautious optimism, House Republican leaders remained entrenched in their opposition to the Senate bill and stuck by their plans to hold hearings next month pointing out its shortfalls.

The office of House Judiciary Committee Chairman F. James Sensenbrenner Jr., Wisconsin Republican -- a staunch critic of the Senate bill -- had no comment yesterday on Mr. Specter's statements.

DOJ_NMG_0037046

Meanwhile, the office of House Majority Leader John A. Boehner, Ohio Republican, pointed out yet another flaw in the Senate bill, saying it would actually weaken enforcement of immigration law by only permitting local law enforcement to assist federal agents in enforcing criminal violations of immigration law, not civil violations.

Many lawmakers say a final bill including any form of "amnesty" would never pass the House, whether those provisions are delayed or not.

"I don't think the House will go for anything that puts citizenship in the bill," said Sen. John Ensign, Nevada Republican, who thinks a compromise bill with a guest-worker program could work, as long as it didn't include citizenship for the millions of illegals already here, as the Senate bill would do.

In his comments Monday, Mr. Specter said that the Senate would insist that the final bill include a guest-worker program and a path to citizenship for many illegal aliens, but that he is also open to setting goals for border and interior enforcement ahead of those provisions.

Rep. Mike Pence, Indiana Republican, said it's a "very big deal" that Mr. Specter is willing to put border security first in the final bill. He also said he has a bill that may bridge the "amnesty" divide between the two chambers because he thinks many House Republicans could accept a guest-worker program that requires illegal aliens to return to their home country before they can apply for it.

He has a proposal that would set up a privately run system to do this, and he thinks this "no-amnesty guest-worker" program could work.

"I think the majority of House conservatives would be open to a no-amnesty guest-worker program," he said.

His bill also would set up a time frame, dedicating two years exclusively to border security before progressing to the rest of the bill.

Mr. Specter told The Times on Monday that his staff is reviewing Mr. Pence's proposal.

Mr. Pence said the Senate bill's citizenship approach is a "non-starter" in the House because it would let illegal aliens remain in the U.S. and eventually become legal, which most Republicans reject as amnesty.

Mr. McCain, Mr. Kennedy and others insist that it's not amnesty because the illegal aliens would have to fulfill a long list of demands and pay a fine before they can get in line for citizenship.

Meanwhile, Sen. Jeff Sessions, Alabama Republican, said that although he is "encouraged" by Mr. Specter's recent comments, he is concerned that such a compromise could allow "amnesty" without truly ensuring the borders are secure and immigration law is being properly enforced.

He said lawmakers shouldn't accept the Senate's contentious proposals "with nothing more than a promise for enforcement."

Senate May Budge On Immigration (LAT)

By Nicole Gaouette

The Los Angeles Times, June 28, 2006

WASHINGTON — With the House and Senate stalemated over how to overhaul immigration law, the contours of one potential path to an agreement have begun to emerge.

The House has approved a bill that focuses on improving border security and cracking down on illegal hiring. Many of the conservative Republicans who are dominant in the House have said that these security measures must be firmly in place before the House begins discussions about elements of a Senate-passed bill that would create a guest worker program and offer steps to citizenship for most illegal immigrants now in the U.S.

Now some Republican senators are suggesting — though gingerly — that they would be willing to agree to some kind of timetable in which goals related to border security and law enforcement must be met before the guest worker and citizenship programs that the senators favor could begin.

"The idea that we'll look at some sort of trigger before we implement everything else is worth some discussion," said Sen. Mel Martinez (R-Fla.), who wrote part of the Senate plan that would offer legal status to many illegal immigrants.

DOJ_NMG_0037047

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), an architect of the Senate legislation, said that the Senate bill, in practice, would put border security ahead of other new immigration measures.

"Interior enforcement and border enforcement will go first.... It's going to take 18 months to two years to put the infrastructure in place to deal with guest workers," McCain said. He added that the same was true of the proposed Senate program to create a path to citizenship for most of the nation's estimated 12 million illegal immigrants.

Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), who would lead any negotiations with the House, was quoted even more directly by the Washington Times newspaper on the idea of putting in place border security and law enforcement measures before other elements of an immigration package.

"It may be down the line that we will come to some terms on a timetable, with border security first and employment verification first," Specter was quoted as saying in the newspaper's Tuesday editions. Specter, who is chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, could not be reached for comment Tuesday.

Left unclear in the still-emerging conversation is whether senators would agree that specific border security and law enforcement goals or targets would have to be met before a guest worker or legalization program could begin.

It is also unclear whether the House would accept a step-by-step approach. Many House members say they oppose any citizenship program as an unwelcome "amnesty" for people who broke the law by crossing the border. Others say that guest worker programs undermine wages and job availability for native workers.

Still, some senators appealed Tuesday for House members to join them in negotiations to resolve the significant differences in the House and Senate visions of immigration policy. Those negotiations were expected to begin, but the House said last week that it wanted to hold a new round of hearings across the country on immigration before starting talks with the Senate.

"We are willing to negotiate with those who have specific disagreements with the Senate bill," McCain said Tuesday.

The senators' appeal to the House came as the Senate Appropriations Committee approved $31.7 billion for the Department of Homeland Security and its efforts to strengthen the borders in the fiscal year starting in October.

The funding is almost 5% more than last year's levels, with border protection allocated $65 million more than President Bush had requested.

"We focused aggressively on border protection," said committee chairman Judd Gregg (R-N.H.).

As GOP Bickers Over Immigration, Boehner Criticizes Dem 'silence' (HILL)

By Patrick O'Connor And Josephine Hearn

The Hill, June 28, 2006

As Republicans continue to bicker among themselves on immigration reform, House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) ripped congressional Democrats yesterday for refusing to adopt a unified position on the controversial legislation.

The prospects for a bill's being signed into law this year dimmed significantly last week after House Republican leaders announced a series of hearings to examine a comprehensive Senate package that would allow undocumented workers already in this country a path to legal status.

"I think a feeble response from House Democrats on border security makes clear they have no coherent policy on this issue," Boehner said during his regular press briefing yesterday. "The stone silence from them is deafening."

Democratic leaders have spent much of this debate on the sidelines while Republicans in the House have sparred openly with their GOP colleagues in the Senate over the politically perilous question of what to do with those workers already in this country.

Thirty-six Democrats broke with their leadership and voted to approve a House package late last year drafted by Judiciary Committee Chairman James Sensenbrenner (R-Wis.) that would increase border protection and impose stiffer sanctions on companies that employ illegal immigrants. That included all 10 members of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee's (DCCC) Frontline program for the most vulnerable incumbents.

Boehner voted against the Sensenbrenner bill, saying earlier this year that he saw some of the provisions as an unfunded mandate on employers.

DOJ_NMG_0037048

Democratic leaders insist their members remain largely unified on immigration reform.

"Frankly, I think this is not particularly a problem for us Democrats because Democrats are pretty well united," House Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (Md.) said during a recent press briefing. Hoyer said Republicans have a problem because GOP lawmakers in the House disagree with the White House while the Senate is somewhere in the middle. Most immigration experts say the Senate version is more to the administration's liking because it calls for a guest-worker program.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) criticized President Bush last week for not intervening more with his fellow Republicans to push "comprehensive bipartisan immigration reform."

"I said all along that it wouldn't happen unless the president used his leadership and intervened into this discussion to reject the Sensenbrenner Republican House bill," Pelosi told reporters during her regular briefing Thursday.

The minority leader said House Democrats would appear at a number of the upcoming field hearings to question Republican lawmakers for failing to protect the border and American workers.

Asked if Democrats would participate in the hearings or if they would hold competing hearings, Pelosi replied, "I'm just saying we won't be missing in the debate."

The issue does not divide easily along partisan lines, but it has become increasingly difficult for the GOP, pitting Republican House leaders against Bush and a large bloc of GOP senators. In fact, Republicans in the House are not universally opposed to the White House-backed Senate plan.

Immigration reform has become a major campaign test for select congressional Republicans, most recently for Utah Rep. Chris Cannon in that state's primary yesterday, which was undecided as of press time.

A political action committee affiliated with Rep. Tom Tancredo (R-Colo.), who has maintained a long and steady drumbeat opposing illegal immigration or undocumented workers already in this country, has contributed significant funds to Cannon's Republican opponent, John Jacob, a wealthy developer.

Boehner's criticism of Democrats comes as House Republicans are attempting to blame Democrats for the immigration bill that passed in the GOP-led Senate.

In addition to calling the Senate bill the "Reid-Kennedy bill," in a nod to Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) and Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.), Boehner spokesman Kevin Madden is pushing members and staff to criticize Democrats for not taking a harder stance on immigration, leadership aides said.

The Republican Conference office is also expected to make immigration reform a major component of its member-outreach kits for the Fourth of July recess, one leadership aide said. Those kits will include talking points on the House-passed bill as well as the five statements of principle on the reform issue.

A Pelosi aide said immigration reform is crumbling because House Republicans did not work closely with Democrats in the House.

"The Speaker and Congressman Boehner believe in the principle of the majority of the majority," Pelosi spokeswoman Jennifer Crider said. "They only care about House Democrats when they're in a political box and can't think their way out."

Senate Republicans were able to craft a bipartisan compromise because they worked more closely with the minority party, Crider said. More Democrats than Republicans voted for the Senate bill.

"Had the Republicans approached immigration reform in the way it should be, in a bipartisan, bicameral way … the House Republicans wouldn't be in this position," Crider said.

With the elections approaching, members from both parties are expected to shift the blame to their counterparts in the other party.

"If [Democrats] have to take a position it will rip their party apart," one senior House GOP leadership aide said. "It's going to put them in a position of backing an open border policy and weakened enforcement."

TAX:

Court Says Prosecutors Pressure White-Collar Defendants Unfairly (WSJ)

By Laurie P. Cohen And Paul Davies

DOJ_NMG_0037049

The Wall Street Journal, June 28, 2006

In a decision that bolsters white-collar defendants facing criminal investigations, a federal judge said prosecutors can't pressure companies to stop paying legal bills for indicted employees.

The ruling, by a judge overseeing the KPMG LLP accounting fraud case in a New York federal court, concluded that federal prosecutors gain an unfair advantage and violate the due process of indicted employees by pressuring their employers to refuse to pay their legal costs. The decision strikes down a key lever used by the government in several recent criminal investigations. (Read the ruling.1)

Defense lawyers argue that by pressuring companies to withhold fees for their employees' legal costs, the government is really pressuring defendants to plead guilty -- or face enormous legal bills from drawn-out cases. The government denies pressuring companies to halt payments.

In recent years, companies including KPMG and HealthSouth Corp. have refused to pay legal fees for some indicted executives after being warned that payment could be viewed as a sign of non-cooperation, according to lawyers. In March, a federal judge in New Hampshire voiced concern that Enterasys Networks Inc., a maker of wireless products, was wrongly pressured by the government to cut off funding of legal fees for employees charged in an alleged fraud.

"This is a big decision and it affects the broad assault on white-collar crime and accounting fraud," said William McLucas, a defense lawyer and former enforcement chief of the Securities and Exchange Commission who conducts internal investigations for companies facing potential fraud charges.

At issue is a 2003 memorandum that advised U.S. attorneys to "scrutinize the authenticity of a corporation's cooperation" when considering whether to seek criminal charges. Known as the "Thompson memo," for former Deputy Attorney General Larry D. Thompson, its author, the memo stated that prosecutors could take a company's willingness to advance legal fees to employees as a sign of lack of cooperation.

Yesterday's ruling concerned 16 former KPMG executives who face trial later this year for marketing allegedly fraudulent tax shelters. They have refused to cooperate with federal prosecutors and have pleaded not guilty. Though KPMG had said it would pay up to $400,000 in legal fees for employees who cooperated in the fraud case, the accounting firm fired the 16 for refusing to cooperate and denied them any fees.

"KPMG refused to pay because the government held the proverbial gun to its head," wrote U.S. District Judge Lewis A. Kaplan in his 83-page decision. "Had that pressure not been brought to bear, KPMG would have paid these defendants' legal expenses."

While declining to toss out the charges of conspiracy and accounting fraud against the defendants, Judge Kaplan said the 16 can challenge the accounting firm's refusal to pay their legal bills, and gave them two weeks to file civil suits.

A spokesman for KPMG, which wasn't a party to the fee dispute, said the firm is "reviewing the opinion."

The government is expected to appeal. "We are disappointed" by the decision, "which we respectfully believe is unsupported by the factual record and the applicable law," said Michael J. Garcia, U.S. Attorney for the Southern District of New York, which is overseeing the KPMG prosecution. "The actions of the government were entirely consistent with appropriate Department of Justice policy, and we believe that the prosecutors acted ethically and properly throughout this case."

The dispute has its roots in sentencing guidelines enacted by Congress in 1991, which said companies could get lenient treatment only if they cooperated with investigators. In 1999, the Justice Department advised prosecutors to consider companies' willingness to waive attorney-client privilege and "identify the culprits within the corporation" in judging cooperation. In 2003, the Justice Department codified "cooperation" in white-collar cases with the Thompson memo.

For many defendants, legal fees can play a big role in deciding whether to plead guilty or fight, some lawyers said. "For once, we're getting a judge who realizes how much it costs to defend someone in a white-collar case and that something needs to be done to assist people if there is going to be a presumption of innocence," said Ellen Podgor, a professor at Stetson University's law school.

In the fraud case at Enron Corp., for instance, lawyers for onetime top accountant Richard Causey said their client lacked the estimated $20 million he would need to defend himself. Mr. Causey later pleaded guilty, and some observers said he may have felt that was his best choice given the legal costs.

By contrast, former Enron Chief Executive Jeffrey Skilling, who had a sizable personal fortune, pleaded not guilty. In his unsuccessful defense against fraud and conspiracy charges, he ultimately wracked up legal costs of more than $40 million, only $17 million of which was picked up by Enron's insurance.

The government hasn't always invoked the 2003 guidance. For instance, prosecutors didn't challenge the cooperation of Computer Associates in the fraud case there even though it covered the legal costs for some employees charged in the case.

Now, some lawyers said, they expect the government to standardize its approach in all cases. "You'll see a uniform position now with careful documentation," predicts Steven Peikin, a partner at Sullivan & Cromwell in New York and a former federal prosecutor.

People with knowledge of the KPMG case said the company is expected to argue that its own bylaws don't require the covering of legal bills -- or indemnification -- and that any challenge must first be arbitrated. But Judge Kaplan, anticipating that claim, signaled that he likely wouldn't support arbitration in the case.

If the decision stands, "there's no question it will affect future thinking by companies and the government about the whole indemnification issue," said Charles Stillman, an attorney for KPMG. However, he said, "A company has a right to make its own decisions, and the right to indemnification isn't constitutional."

KPMG reached a deferred-prosecution agreement with the government on tax-shelter charges last August, agreeing to pay $456 million. A trial in the case against the former KPMG executives is scheduled for autumn.

Judge Kaplan, himself a former corporate lawyer in Manhattan, took the prosecutors who testified in his courtroom about the fee dispute to task for denying that the government pressured KPMG not to pay employee legal fees.

"The government was economical with the truth in its early responses to this motion," he wrote. "KPMG's decision on payment of attorneys' fees was influenced by its interaction with the" U.S. Attorney's office in Manhattan "and thus cannot fairly be said to have been a decision 'made by KPMG alone,' as the government represented."

Judge Blasts Pressure Put On KPMG Over Legal Fees (USAT)

By Greg Farrell

USA Today, June 28, 2006

NEW YORK — A federal judge ruled Tuesday that the U.S. Attorney's office unfairly pressured the KPMG accounting firm not to pay the legal expenses of former partners who have been charged with selling abusive tax shelters. It marked a stinging rebuke to federal prosecutors here and the Justice Department's approach to corporate prosecutions as a whole.

In a narrow sense, the ruling means that more than a dozen former KPMG partners and employees under indictment can now have their legal costs paid upfront by the accounting firm.

But more broadly, the ruling strikes at the Justice Department's policy for determining whether to bring charges against corporations. That policy, known as the Thompson Memorandum, was written after the indictment and collapse of the Arthur Andersen auditing firm. It sets out the conditions prosecutors should take under advisement when deciding whether to bring criminal charges against a corporation.

In order to avoid prosecution for suspected criminal wrongdoing, the memorandum states, a corporation has to show that it is cooperating fully with the Justice Department's investigation. If the corporation is paying the legal fees of employees under investigation, prosecutors could view that as being less than fully cooperative.

U.S. District Judge Lewis Kaplan blasted that viewpoint in his 83-page decision. Under the Sixth Amendment of the U.S. Constitution, he wrote, every employee of a corporation, from hourly workers to top-ranked managers, has the right "to have their employers pay their legal expenses if they are sued as a result of their doing their jobs. This right is as much a part of the bargain between employer and employee as salary or wages."

Legal experts hailed the ruling as a restoration of balance between the government's interest in prosecuting bad behavior and defendants' rights to adequate counsel:

•"The court is evening the playing field and making the government play fair," says Jacob Frenkel, an attorney at Shulman Rogers in Rockville, Md. "The constitution still carries more weight than Justice Department guidance."

DOJ_NMG_0037051

•"The government is violating constitutional rights when it pressures corporations not to pay legal expenses," says John Coffee, an expert in securities law at Columbia University.

•"It's a public smackdown," says former prosecutor David Gourevitch, a Manhattan attorney.

In response to the ruling, U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia said he was "disappointed."

"The actions of the government were entirely consistent with appropriate Department of Justice policy, and we believe that the prosecutors acted ethically and properly throughout this case," Garcia said.

In August, KPMG admitted selling abusive tax shelters and agreed to pay $456 million in fines.

Policy On Legal Fees Excessive, Judge Says (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, June 28, 2006

A Justice Department policy that warns companies against paying legal bills for employees under investigation violated the workers' constitutional rights, a federal judge ruled, as he blasted the government for letting "its zeal get in the way of its judgment."

U.S. District Judge Lewis A. Kaplan criticized the federal government for holding "the proverbial gun" to the head of accounting firm KPMG LLP and advising the firm not to pay full fees to lawyers defending more than a dozen former partners on fraud charges.

The policy "interfered" with the executives' ability to fight criminal charges in a case that has been called the largest tax fraud in history, the judge wrote. He said the government "evidenced a desire to minimize the involvement of the defense attorneys" and added that "the government's proper concern is not with obtaining convictions."

Kaplan's harshly worded 83-page decision handed a potent symbolic victory to defense lawyers and business groups, who have for years complained that the government is overreaching in its attempt to weed out fraud after the Enron Corp. and WorldCom Inc. scandals.

An unusual coalition of trade organizations, including the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, the Securities Industry Association and the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers, banded together to fight the policy and submitted court briefs in the KPMG case.

"This decision is a big step in curbing abuse of the significant power that prosecutors enjoy," said Michael J. Madigan, a lawyer at Akin Gump LLP in the District who is defending John Lanning, one of the former KPMG executives. "Hopefully, the decision will be read carefully by U.S. attorneys around the country."

E. Lawrence Barcella Jr., a lawyer at Paul Hastings LLP in the District who represents former KPMG partner Larry DeLap, said he hoped the decision would signal an end to prosecutors using a "litmus test for cooperation that undermined employees' constitutional rights."

Michael J. Garcia, the U.S. Attorney for the Southern District of New York, said he was "disappointed by the ruling . . . which we respectfully believe is unsupported by the factual record and the applicable law."

The prosecutor added, in a prepared statement: "The actions of the Government were entirely consistent with appropriate Department of Justice policy, and we believe that the prosecutors acted ethically and properly throughout this case."

At issue is a three-year-old document known as the Thompson memo, named after former U.S. deputy attorney general Larry D. Thompson. The memo, which binds federal prosecutors across the nation, sets out factors for the government to consider when deciding whether to indict a corporation. Central to the analysis is how much companies have cooperated with prosecutors, including such things as handing over documents, making available witnesses, waiving attorney-client privilege and not aiding employees who are suspected of wrongdoing by paying severance or their legal bills.

Last month, prosecutors in California indicted the law firm Milberg Weiss LLP, in part based on the argument that the firm had failed to waive its legal privilege and help the government investigate payments to third parties in exchange for serving as plaintiffs in securities cases.

DOJ_NMG_0037052

The government policy has long vexed defense lawyers, who claim it violates clients' rights to a fair trial and to be represented by attorneys, a position with which Kaplan agreed after holding an unusual three-day hearing where prosecutors testified under oath about their conversations with KPMG.

But the immediate practical implications of the decision are less clear.

The judge rejected outright a bid by defense lawyers to dismiss the criminal charges against their clients. He did, however, invite them to file a related lawsuit against KPMG for the fees within two weeks' time. He also urged KPMG to pay the fees of its own accord and encouraged prosecutors to lean on the accounting firm to do so.

George Ledwith, a spokesman for KPMG, said the firm was reviewing the decision. But in court papers lodged this year, KPMG said the former executives could not sue because they were subject to mandatory arbitration clauses in their partnership agreements. Kaplan said in a footnote to his opinion that if such arguments are raised in front of him, he will consider whether they stand in the face of "public policy."

KPMG of New York already has paid $456 million under an August deal with federal prosecutors that allowed the firm to survive and avoid criminal charges over its sale and marketing of abusive tax shelters in the 1990s. A similar indictment killed rival Arthur Andersen LLP four years ago.

Eager to cooperate with the government and avoid Andersen's fate, KPMG capped lawyer fees at $400,000 per employee and required employees to pick up any additional fees. The firm has advanced more than $10 million in fees for its current and former partners.

The criminal case against the former partners and other advisers, set for trial Sept., 11, could yet be postponed. Kaplan has called for a hearing next month on another defense motion, this one related to a dispute over the exchange of more than 6 million documents in the complex case. In one exhibit, defense lawyers offered a picture of documents nibbled by rats in a Queens, N.Y., warehouse.

Judge Faults U.S. In Tax Case (LAT)

By Kathy M. Kristof And Walter Hamilton, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, June 28, 2006

Prosecutors erred in forcing KPMG to stop paying employees' legal bills, a ruling says.

In a ruling that could force the government to change its tactics in some corporate fraud cases, a federal judge said Tuesday that the Justice Department violated the rights of 16 former KPMG executives by coercing the accounting firm to cut off funds for their defense.

In a harshly written opinion, U.S. District Judge Lewis Kaplan said the government "let its zeal get in the way of its judgment" and "violated the Constitution it is sworn to defend."

In a statement, U.S. Atty. Michael Garcia countered that "the actions of the government were entirely consistent with appropriate Department of Justice policy, and we believe that the prosecutors acted ethically and properly throughout this case."

At issue was a Justice Department practice in which prosecutors ask companies whether they are paying the legal bills for employees charged with corporate crimes. The tactic derived from a 2003 memo from former Deputy Atty. Gen. Larry Thompson, which said prosecutors may weigh a company's legal defense of its employees in deciding whether the company itself should be prosecuted.

In a hearing on the issue a month ago, Kaplan likened the Thompson memo to "the barrel of a rifle."

KPMG agreed last year to pay $456 million to settle charges that it promoted fraudulent tax shelters to wealthy investors, including Global Crossing Ltd. founder Gary Winnick, Guess Inc. co-Chairmen Paul and Maurice Marciano and former California Republican gubernatorial candidate Bill Simon Jr.

But the firm — unlike the 16 former employees — was not indicted.

In court papers, KPMG acknowledged that it had departed from a longtime policy to pay its employees' legal bills. Instead, the accounting firm decided in the tax fraud case that it would pay bills only for those who cooperated with the government and agreed to a $400,000 cap on fees, and that payments would cease for workers who were criminally charged.

"If those whom the government suspects are culpable in fact are guilty, they should pay the price," Kaplan ruled. "But determination of guilt or innocence must be made fairly — not in a proceeding in which the government has obtained an unfair advantage long before the trial even has begun."

Legal experts said Kaplan's ruling would probably force the government to reexamine its use of the Thompson memo.

"It's going to chill the government's willingness" to use this tactic, said Steven Peikin, a partner at Sullivan & Cromwell in New York and former chief of the securities fraud division at the U.S. attorney's office in Manhattan.

The ruling also could affect scores of other corporate fraud cases being prosecuted in cities all over the country, experts said.

"The implications for the criminal defense bar nationwide are huge," said Joseph Price, a partner at law firm Arent Fox in New York. "If this stands up on appeal, it could affect hundreds of cases."

Justice Department officials did not say whether they would appeal.

John Coffee, a Columbia University law professor, said a legal challenge would be risky because an opinion upholding Kaplan could further restrict the ability of prosecutors to apply pressure in white-collar cases.

"I think [the judge] is dead right, and he's going to stop this practice dead in its tracks," Coffee said.

Charles Rettig, a partner at Hochman, Salkin, Rettig, Toscher & Perez in Beverly Hills, speculated that Kaplan's ruling alone might be sufficient to make the government's tactic obsolete.

"It will likely cause the government to back away from any discussion regarding an entity paying defense costs of current or former employees," he said.

The defendants in the KPMG case include Jeffrey Stein, the firm's former deputy chairman, and Gregg Ritchie, a former tax partner in KPMG's Woodland Hills office.

Business groups including the Securities Industry Assn. and the U.S. Chamber of Commerce had filed friend-of-the-court briefs on behalf of the defense because they were concerned about the Justice Department in effect taking away the employer's discretion to defend workers for "acts committed in the course of employment," Rettig said.

Times wire services were used in compiling this report.

Federal Judge Blasts U.S. Pressure On KPMG Case Fees (LAW)

By Mark Hamblett, New York Law Journal

New York Law Journal, June 28, 2006

Southern District of New York Judge Lewis Kaplan delivered a harsh rebuke to prosecutors Tuesday for pressuring KPMG to cut off legal fees for employees unwilling to cooperate in the largest tax fraud investigation in the nation's history.

Saying the government "let its zeal get in the way of its judgment" and "violated the Constitution it is sworn to defend," Kaplan in United States v. Stein, S1 05 Crim. 0888, found that prosecutors had violated the Fifth and Sixth amendments by "causing KPMG to cut off legal fees and other defense costs upon indictment."

The decision has been eagerly anticipated by defense groups and business organizations such as the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and the Association of Corporate Counsel, who have become increasingly concerned at prosecutorial tactics they believe are eroding defendants' rights to counsel and a fair trial.

Kaplan said KPMG should consider paying the fees of 16 former employees now under indictment. He invited the former partners and employees of the accounting company to sue for fees if need be. And he urged the government to use its influence with the company to persuade it to pay the fees.

For the moment, Kaplan declined defense requests to dismiss the indictments although he held open that possibility.

KPMG had long made it a practice to pay the fees of its employees, the judge found, but it changed its policies in the hopes of obtaining the deferred prosecution agreement it ultimately signed in August 2004.

In an 83-page opinion that was unsparing in its criticism of the government, Kaplan said KPMG was so intent on staving off indictment and surviving as an entity that it told its employees it would no longer pay their fees if they refused to cooperate with the government and that it would cut off fees for those who were indicted.

"KPMG refused to pay because the government held the proverbial gun to its head," the judge said.

David Spears of Richards Spears Kibbe & Orbe, one of the attorneys for lead defendant Jeffrey Stein, said he was "floating on air" after reading the judge's opinion.

"This decision will change the way the government does business in the investigation and prosecution of entities," Spears said.

Southern District U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia issued a statement saying, "We are disappointed in Judge Kaplan's opinion today ... which we respectfully believe is unsupported by the factual record and the applicable law. The actions of the government were entirely consistent with appropriate Department of Justice policy, and we believe that the prosecutors acted ethically and properly throughout this case."

While the judge said that monetary relief against the government for the violations is precluded by sovereign immunity, and KPMG is technically not a party to the case, he said he had ancillary jurisdiction to resolve the issue of whether KPMG can be forced to pay the legal fees and costs of those under indictment. He directed the clerk to open a civil docket number for the claims of defendants against KPMG and gave them 14 days to do so.

But the judge also said dismissal of the indictment ("or other unpalatable relief") is still a possibility if the legal fees of those under indictment are not paid.

"The government has substantial influence and almost certainly, power over KPMG by virtue of the cooperation clauses in the [deferred prosecution agreement]," the judge said. "It may well be in its interest to use that influence or power to cause KPMG to advance the defense costs."

Charles Stillman of Stillman Friedman & Schechtman, who represents KPMG, said the company was reviewing its options.

"If the defendants are going to consider any possibility of action against [KPMG], they will have to pay attention to their contractual relationship with the firm, including whether or not they have the right to go to court or arbitration," Stillman said.

GOVERNMENT PRESSURE

The judge's opinion comes on the heels of a May hearing he held to explore improper government influence over KPMG fee policy and its impact on the due process rights and the right to counsel of the defendants.

The hearing focused on meetings and communications between prosecutors and KPMG attorneys in early 2004, shortly after it was blistered by a Senate subcommittee investigating tax shelters for the wealthy. The shelters, prosecutors ultimately contended, were nothing but paper transactions that cost the government more than $2 billion in tax revenue.

With the heat on KPMG, the company hired Robert Bennett of Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom to try a fresh approach to dealing with the government. It also dismissed Stein, the firm's deputy chairman, who left with a generous severance agreement that included the advancement of legal fees.

KPMG, Stein's lawyers said, later reneged on the fee obligation because it feared the government would discover the arrangement and indict the firm.

At a Feb. 25 meeting, prosecutors asked Bennett and other representatives of KPMG about the firm's policy on fees for employees under investigation and whether or not the firm had "discretion" to pay the fees.

The question was an important one, given the Thompson Memorandum, a 2003 Justice Department policy statement on measuring the cooperation of entities as a factor in determining whether the government would offer a deferred prosecution agreement.

The Thompson Memo instructs prosecutors to consider several factors in deciding whether to charge a company criminally, including whether it waives the attorney-client privilege, whether it protects culpable employees by letting them keep their jobs and whether it advances them legal fees, and whether they share information about the investigation.

According to the government, the payment, or withholding, of legal fees was not the determining factor in its decision to ultimately reach a deferred prosecution agreement with KPMG. The firm avoided indictment, otherwise known as the corporate death penalty, by pledging cooperation with the government and agreeing to pay $456 million.

But defense lawyers for the 17 former KPMG employees (one pleaded guilty) cried foul, saying that two prosecutors essentially threatened the company to use its fee policy to force employees to cooperate.

At closing argument in May, Assistant U.S. Attorney Marc A. Weinstein insisted that the Thompson Memo could not, "in and of itself," have dictated KPMG's decision to change its fee policy. The issue of fees, Weinstein insisted, is only explored by the government when it suspects a company of "circling the wagons" and offering sham cooperation -- pretending to cooperate in an investigation while shielding individual wrongdoers and offering them support, sometimes through the advancement of legal expenses.

Kaplan shot back on the Thompson Memo.

"If that is true," he said, then the people at the Justice Department were "lousy drafters" and they should "start all over again."

And if that was true, he said, then "that is certainly not what they have said to the defense bar of America."

INTERSECTION OF PRINCIPLES

In Tuesday's opinion, Kaplan said the Stein case and the Thompson Memo presented an intersection of three principles -- the due process guarantee of a fair trial, the Sixth Amendment right to the assistance of competent counsel and a third principle, "not of constitutional dimension" but important nonetheless, "an employer often must reimburse an employee for legal expenses when the employee is sued, or even charged with a crime, as a result of doing his or her job."

The judge explored the 1999 Holder Memorandum, a Justice Department policy statement that said the government might view the advancement of fees to personnel of a business entity under investigation as "protection of culpable individuals."

The Thompson Memo took the fee statement in the Holder Memo one step further by making it mandatory for all federal prosecutors to consider an entity's legal fee policy.

Shirah Neiman, chief counsel to Garcia, was asked at the May hearing whether her reference to "federal guidelines" on corporation cooperation agreements at the February 2004 meeting specifically concerned the fee issue. Neiman pointedly told the KPMG legal team that "misconduct" would not be "rewarded."

She testified that her statement was not a reference to fees but was instead addressed to any severance arrangements between KPMG and other top executives during its attempt to clean house.

But defense lawyers argued that the reference to the Thompson Memo in tandem with a discussion on KPMG's fee policy proved their point -- that the government was trying to muscle the company on fees.

FIRM 'GOT THE MESSAGE'

Kaplan said he found it "unnecessary to decide Neiman's subjective purpose in making the remark because what is more important is how her comment was understood."

KPMG's actions in the aftermath of the February 2004 meeting, he said, made it clear that the company got "the message."

After reviewing the facts, Kaplan found that the government "conducted itself in a manner that evidenced a desire to minimize the involvement of defense attorneys."

In March 2004, the firm sent out a form letter to employees who might become subjects of the investigation or might otherwise be considered under suspicion. The letter said the firm would pay fees up to $400,000 as long as the individuals cooperated with the government promptly, completely and truthfully and that monies for fees and expenses would cease if the person was charged with criminal wrongdoing.

The firm then drafted an advisory memorandum that urged employees to cooperate but also said they had the right to be represented by counsel, referred to some of the advantages of having counsel, and said KPMG had arranged for independent counsel for employees who wanted to consult with them.

After two government prosecutors expressed disappointment with the "tone" of the letter, Kaplan said, KPMG "capitulated" to their "demand" that new language be added, including one line that advises employees "you may deal directly with government representatives without counsel."

Kaplan said "it is entirely plain that the government's purpose in demanding the supplement was to increase the chances that KPMG employees would agree to interviews without consulting or being represented by counsel."

"From that point forward," he said, "the government took full advantage."

In the end, the judge found that "[a]bsent the Thompson Memorandum and the actions of the U.S. Attorney's Office, KPMG would have paid the legal fees and expenses of all of its partners and employees both prior to and after indictment, without regard to cost."

FUNDAMENTAL RIGHT

DOJ_NMG_0037056

The judge said those actions diminished the fairness of a criminal proceeding, a principle that "not only prevents the prosecution from interfering actively with the defense, but also from passively hampering the defendant's efforts."

He said the right to fairness in the criminal process is a "fundamental liberty interest entitled to substantive due process protection."

Kaplan said that a defendant's "right to prepare defense resources lawfully available to him or her, free of knowing or reckless government interference" was "basic to our concepts of justice and fair play. It is fundamental."

He concluded that the Thompson Memorandum "is not narrowly tailored to achieve a compelling" governmental objective and therefore fails examination under the strict scrutiny standard.

The government's argument on the Sixth Amendment, that the right to counsel could not have been implicated in many of its actions because the right does not attach until indictment, did not convince the judge.

The KPMG defendants were also not obliged to show that they were prejudiced by the violation, the judge found, because, under the circumstances, "prejudice must be presumed."

He said it was premature to consider the remedy sought by the defendants, dismissal of the indictment, "prior to the exhaustion of all possible courses that could lead to that outcome."

The defendants had argued that, despite sovereign immunity, the judge still had the power to award attorney fees in the form of monetary sanctions for prosecutorial misconduct. The judge rejected the argument, as he did an argument that the Federal Tort Claims Act and the Administrative Procedure Act waived sovereign immunity.

The defendants' complaints against KPMG for fees, he said, may contain a prayer for declaratory relief. The judge promised to grant a speedy hearing on such a request.

The ruling came just three days after the New York State Bar Association passed a resolution condemning what it views as pervasive interference by the federal government into the right to counsel.

"The resolution that we passed states, as a matter of policy, that the government should not, must not, pressure corporations to breach their obligation to indemnify employees and thereby prevent their employees from having counsel," said state bar President Mark H. Alcott of Paul Weiss Rifkind Wharton & Garrison, who welcomed Kaplan's ruling. "It's really a pretty simple concept, but these days the government doesn't seem to get it. People have a right to an attorney, and the government has no business interfering with that."

Judge: U.S. Acted Unconstitutionally In Pressuring KPMG (AP)

By David B. Caruso, Associated Press

AP, June 28, 2006

NEW YORK – A federal judge accused the Justice Department on Tuesday of trying to gain an unfair advantage in white-collar criminal cases by making it tougher for defendants to get a high-priced legal team.

Since at least 2003, federal prosecutors have been warning scandal-plagued companies that the government might consider them “uncooperative” if they pay the legal bills of employees accused of wrongdoing – a serious threat to a company trying to avoid an indictment.

U.S. District Judge Lewis A. Kaplan ruled Tuesday that federal prosecutors made just such a threat to the accounting firm KPMG in 2004, and as a result, the company cut off legal aid to 16 employees charged with setting up illegal tax shelters.

In a harshly worded opinion, Kaplan said prosecutors had interfered with the defendants' right to a fair trial.

“Justice is not done when the government uses the threat of indictment ... to coerce companies into depriving their present and even former employees of the means of defending themselves against criminal charges in a court of law,” he wrote.

“If those whom the government suspects are culpable in fact are guilty, they should pay the price. But the determination of guilt or innocence must be made fairly – not in a proceeding in which the government has obtained an unfair advantage long before the trial even has begun.”

U.S. Attorney Michael J. Garcia said in a written statement that he was disappointed in the opinion, which he called “unsupported by the factual record.”

DOJ_NMG_0037057

"The actions of the government were entirely consistent with appropriate Department of Justice policy, and we believe that the prosecutors acted ethically and properly throughout this case," he said.

Previously, prosecutors insisted they hadn't intentionally pressured KPMG into any action regarding legal fees. They also said the government would not seek to punish the company if it resumed paying its employees' bills.

Kaplan did not reach a final decision Tuesday on how to remedy things for the KPMG defendants, who are accused of developing questionable tax shelters that allowed some wealthy clients to dodge $2.5 billion in taxes.

He declined a defense motion to immediately dismiss the charges, saying to do so would be extreme.

U.S. law prevents the judge from ordering the government to pay the defendants' legal expenses, so Kaplan suggested that the defendants sue KPMG for the money instead. He ordered a civil docket opened to ease their path if they wish to do so.

It isn't clear what would happen if KPMG were to resist paying those bills, which could amount to hundreds of thousands or even millions of dollars. Kaplan would say in his decision only that the court might step in if "KPMG does not, for one reason or another, advance defense costs."

A spokesman for KPMG, George Ledwith, declined to comment, other than to say that the company was reviewing the opinion.

KPMG LLP has signed a deal admitting its role in the tax shelter scheme. It avoided criminal prosecution by agreeing to pay a $456 million penalty, including $128 million in forfeited fees from sales of the shelters.

Thompson Memo, R.I.P.? (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, June 28, 2006

Something remarkable and salutary happened in a Manhattan courtroom this week: U.S. District Court Judge Lewis A. Kaplan upheld the logic and meaning of the Constitution's Due Process Clause and the Sixth Amendment.

The case involves the Justice Department's prosecution of 16 former KPMG executives, accused of having engineered fraudulent tax shelters for their clients. We have our doubts about just how "fraudulent" those shelters were, seeing that they were never banned by the IRS, their legality was never tested in court, and KPMG stopped marketing them long before the IRS listed them as suspect. The criminal trial will be no slam dunk.

But the real whopper was the decision by KPMG to stop paying the legal fees of its former executives, largely to satisfy the requirements of the so-called Thompson memo. That 2002 document, written by then-Deputy Attorney General Larry Thompson amid corporate scandal fever, laid out the measures that companies facing prosecution could take to demonstrate cooperation and thereby avoid firm-wide indictment. Not wishing to share the fate of bankrupted Arthur Andersen, KPMG complied with the Thompson diktat and hung its executives out to dry while negotiating a deferred prosecution accord.

Enter Judge Kaplan, who on Monday delivered a scathing 83-page rebuke of the government's case. Noting that Constitutional rights to a fair trial and competent counsel were at stake here, he went on to limn a third principle, "not of constitutional dimension," but "very much a part of American life." To wit:

"Bus drivers sued for accidents, cops sued for allegedly wrongful arrests, nurses named in malpractice cases, news reporters sued in libel cases, and corporate chieftains embroiled in securities litigation generally have [the right] to have their employers pay their legal expenses." By holding "the proverbial gun to [KPMG's] head" with the threat of a company-wide indictment, the Judge wrote, the government had used the company as a proxy to violate the defendants' rights.

The 16 defendants must still contend with the charges of the indictment. But with KPMG now required to foot their legal bills, at least they don't face the bleak choice between financial ruin or copping a plea. As for the Justice Department, now is the time for Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to reinterpret, or better yet rewrite, those parts of the Thompson memo that his too-zealous prosecutors have been using in violation of defendants' due process rights.

IRS Employees Caught Peeking At Confidential Taxpayer Files (WSJ)

By Tom Herman

The Wall Street Journal, June 28, 2006

Confidential taxpayer records may not always be quite as confidential as they're supposed to be.

DOJ_NMG_0037058

A new Treasury report says many Internal Revenue Service employees have been caught illegally browsing through taxpayer files in recent years. In some cases, IRS employees have lost their jobs. In other cases, they have even gone to prison.

Treasury agents have investigated more than 3,700 cases of potential violations in the past eight years, resulting in more than 1,600 "adverse personnel actions" by the IRS, including firings and suspensions, the report says. In addition, 126 IRS employees have been criminally prosecuted for such violations.

The Treasury's findings come despite stronger taxpayer-privacy legislation and tighter IRS internal controls since the 1990s, when Congress and IRS officials became deeply concerned about highly publicized reports of unauthorized browsing by IRS workers. Senior IRS officials say they long have taken the problem seriously and have intensified efforts to train workers about the importance of safeguarding taxpayer records. "This is a very high-priority area for us," says Daniel Galik, IRS chief of security services.

Even so, "there has not been a noticeable decrease" in the number of violations over the past eight years, says a report to Congress by the Treasury Inspector General for Tax Administration.

At issue is what's known in Washington jargon as UNAX -- or "unauthorized access to taxpayer information" -- by IRS employees, as well as other federal and state employees and private contractors. Violations can include a wide range of wrongdoing. Some offenders have merely been curious voyeurs about the lives of the rich and famous. Others have been more interested in spying on friends, neighbors and enemies. Some have tried to use illegally gleaned information for financial gain, court records show.

During the six months ended March 31, the Treasury unit says its UNAX program identified and analyzed 247 leads of potential "unauthorized access" and referred 152 criminal cases to agents for investigation. The results included nine criminal prosecutions and 79 "adverse administrative actions" against IRS employees.

Consider the case of Janine Turner, a former IRS official (and not the actress). Just last month, Ms. Turner was sentenced to federal prison for a year and a day. Ironically, her job at the IRS was senior supervisory official in New Jersey responsible for overseeing access to restricted taxpayer information on the IRS's computers.

Ms. Turner admitted to unlawfully tapping into IRS computers on more than 150 occasions, getting confidential information, court records show. Her lawyer, William F. Lang III of Cedar Knolls, N.J., declined to elaborate on the case, as did a federal prosecutor. But Mr. Lang did confirm Ms. Turner has begun serving her sentence.

In another case, a former IRS employee in California agreed to plead guilty to "unauthorized access." She received a year of "supervised probation," was fined $1,000 and ordered to do 75 hours of community service, according to the Treasury report.

IRS officials point out that the number of violations is tiny compared with the total number of tax returns that pour in to the IRS each year and the number of IRS employees. (The IRS has roughly 100,000 workers, a spokesman says.) Moreover, Mr. Galik says the number of cases involving wrongdoing is significantly less than it was in the early to mid-1990s.

Even so, the problem's persistence troubles tax lawyers. "If there is only one violation, that's more than enough to be concerned about" because "the confidentiality of taxpayer information is so important to the proper functioning of the tax system," says Greg Jenner, a former Treasury official and now executive vice president of the American Council of Life Insurers in Washington.

It's unclear whether legislation will ever be able to overcome the foibles of human nature. "So long as income-tax returns are filed, with all the inviting details they provide, some curious people -- and some with worse motives -- are going to try to look at them," says Donald Alexander, a former IRS commissioner and now a lawyer at Akin Gump in Washington. * * *

Paulson vows to continue crackdown on bogus tax shelters.

Henry M. Paulson Jr., President Bush's nominee to be Treasury secretary, told senators yesterday that "I feel very strongly" about the need to continue the Treasury's efforts to combat "abusive" tax shelters.

During Mr. Paulson's confirmation hearing, Senate Finance Committee Chairman Chuck Grassley (R., Iowa) said committee tax staffers had reviewed Mr. Paulson's tax returns. Staffers found that "you did not participate in tax-shelter activities," Sen. Grassley said. Staffers also concluded "that, in your role as a senior executive at Goldman Sachs, you were not active in aggressive tax planning" or shelter activities.

"Let me say, I'm very pleased at that outcome," Sen. Grassley said. * * *

DOJ_NMG_0037059

Thousands of people get a chance to sound off on IRS service.

The IRS says it's surveying nearly 50,000 people this month to help it improve taxpayer services. Taxpayers are being chosen at random. The survey doesn't ask for any financial or personal information, "nor should any be divulged," the IRS says.

Individual responses "will remain confidential," the IRS says. * * *

BRIEFS: Rain-damage update: The IRS's headquarters in Washington, will remain closed at least through Friday, a spokesman said. ... The Senate Finance Committee today plans to consider taxpayer-protection legislation that includes expanded regulation of paid tax preparers. For more details, see the Web site of Congress's Joint Committee on Taxation (www.house.gov/jct1).

• Email me at taxreport@wsj.com2.

Diaz Tax Ordeal Is Over (BSH)

By Anita Lee

Biloxi Sun Herald, June 28, 2006

GULFPORT - A legal nightmare that began almost four years ago for state Supreme Court Justice Oliver Diaz Jr. and his former wife, Jennifer, ended quietly Tuesday after a 10-minute appearance in U.S. District Court, when Jennifer Diaz was sentenced to two years of supervised probation for income tax evasion.

Judge Walter J. Gex III ordered her to pay $58,500 in restitution, but then Assistant U.S. Attorney Don Burkhalter and Diaz's attorney, James Kitchens of Jackson, told Gex the amount should be left blank until the IRS sorts out the figures.

"I promised Jennifer early on that if she cooperated with us, I would do what I could to get her a favorable sentence," Assistant U.S. Attorney Don Burkhalter said after the proceedings. "As far as what I could determine, she told the truth, so I had an obligation to do what I said I would do.

"I don't have any regrets about indicting them on the tax case. I just wish it had turned out better for the government."

The U.S. Justice Department began investigating campaign contributions to judges in 2002, turning up suspicious loans from Coast attorneys to a Biloxi bed and breakfast the Diazes bought while married.

A year later, the investigation turned into judicial bribery and fraud charges against the Diazes, Biloxi attorney Paul Minor and two former trial court judges, John Whitfield and Wes Teel. Headlines played across the pages of Mississippi newspapers for several years as the case wound its way to a three-month trial last summer.

Before the trial started, Jennifer Diaz pleaded guilty to a separate charge of tax evasion. Attorneys had repaid campaign loans for them, which they had failed to report as income.

In exchange for her cooperation, the government dropped all judicial bribery charges against her. Even if a jury convicted her husband, she reasoned at the time, she would be home to raise their two young children.

Prosecutors never called her to testify against her ex-husband during the judicial bribery trial. A jury acquitted him of charges at the trial's conclusion.

A second jury acquitted Oliver Diaz Jr., who had been suspended from the bench after his 2003 indictment, on the tax evasion charges in April. He was reinstated to the Supreme Court bench in May.

"Jennifer thanks her many, many friends for their support and prayers through this long ordeal," said Kitchens. "She will always be remembered by me as a very courageous woman who decided to do what was best for her family."

Family spokesman Gerald Maples said the Diazes are living together with their children in Jackson.

Oliver Diaz Jr. and his parents attended her sentencing. He said they have not discussed marrying again, although Maples said it might happen.

"It's over now," Maples said. "This incredibly difficult experience is finally over for the Diaz family."

Republicans Lack Votes In Senate To Cut Estate Tax (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, June 28, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Senate Republicans pulled back from a vote this week on the federal estate tax, admitting they still lack the needed support for a House-passed measure that would exempt all but the wealthiest Americans.

DOJ_NMG_0037060

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R., Tenn.) pledged to return to the issue after the July Fourth recess, but his announcement captured the increased frustration among Republicans in advancing their legislative agenda before the November elections.

As talks continued last evening, the leadership held out hope for agreement this week on the outlines of major pension legislation but admitted there is no chance of floor action until next month. A long promised lobbying-overhaul bill remains stymied, and instead of the usual rush before the holiday recess, lawmakers settled into a slow pace leading up to the annual Congressional Republican-Democrat baseball game tomorrow night.

Hispanic supporters of a Senate immigration bill announced their own voter registration drive beginning this weekend in hopes of stimulating action in Congress. Even hard-edged conservative activist Grover Norquist had to struggle to control his emotions at a news conference calling for comprehensive legislation, a top priority for President Bush.

But House Majority Leader John Boehner (R., Ohio) was dry-eyed and cautious. "If we can get a good bill before the election, I'd take it," he said. "But a good bill is a bill that's strong on border security and on enforcing our immigration laws."

Asked if he was still confident he can get a bill before the elections, he said, "I think we can get a bill. I didn't say when."

Given the impasse, a $32.8 billion Homeland Security bill, which won initial approval yesterday in the Senate Appropriations Committee, could become a magnet for immigration-related provisions. The measure also shows the pressures on Republicans as they struggle to deal with border security in the confines of a tight budget.

With the Customs and Border Patrol, more than $225 million is added to the president's budget for improved aircraft and detention facilities. But the committee can't keep pace with Mr. Bush's pressure for more border agents and prison beds, and the bill assumes a $200 million cut from science and technology funds that will be controversial.

Mindful of the Republican troubles, Democrats have sought to ratchet up pressure for their own agenda, including a proposed $2.10-an-hour increase in the federal minimum wage.

The hourly wage has remained at $5.15 for nine years, and breaking with his custom, Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D., Nev.) said he and fellow Democrats would now oppose any adjustment in congressional pay until the minimum wage also is increased. He declined to spell out how he will block the next $3,300 increase, due to take effect Jan. 1. But even Mr. Boehner, an opponent of raising the minimum wage, has begun to acknowledge that Republicans must deal with the issue before November.

Democrats also believe they are helped now by the juxtaposition of the minimum wage, for low income workers, with the Republican drive to lower estate taxes, for often wealthy households. The two issues may yet be joined in an election-year deal, but the huge future cost of the proposed estate-tax reductions will make it difficult for Democrats to easily accept.

Republicans, who have long sought outright repeal of the estate tax, have shifted focus to a more incremental approach exempting the first $5 million of any individual's estate, $10 million for a married couple. Above this point, the House bill, for example, would tax as much as $25 million at the current capital gains rate of 15%, which is scheduled to rise to 20% in 2011. Above $25 million, the rate would be double: 30% at first, then 40% if the capital gains rate rises as scheduled.

Conservative Republicans have grumbled about these terms, but the greater focus has been on winning a handful of Democrats to give Mr. Frist the 60 votes he needs to avoid a filibuster. Before passage last week, the House added tax breaks for the timber industry to try to win over Southern and Western Democrats.

A major question is whether Mr. Frist will add more provisions or make side deals as part of a tax package that will be included in the final pension bill. Sen. Mark Pryor (D., Ark.), one of those being courted, acknowledged he has had discussions related to tax legislation he champions to spur investment in poor rural areas. But Mr. Pryor said he was still concerned by the costs of the House package, more than $280 billion over 10 years.

Senate GOP Leader Delays Estate Tax Vote (AP-Y2)

By Mary Dalrymple

AP2, June 27, 2006

Despite a pledge to cut estate taxes by Independence Day, the Senate's Republican leader on Tuesday postponed action on a bill to reduce taxes for heirs.

DOJ_NMG_0037061

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., said he did not yet have enough votes to pass a bill, already approved by the House, that would eliminate taxes on the first $5 million of an individual's estate and cut taxes for others.

Most Republicans support the tax reduction, but they need support from a few more Democrats.

"The vast majority of my Democratic colleagues have so far refused to address this issue," Frist said in a statement. "It's my hope that their constituents will use the upcoming recess to explain the importance of supporting a reasonable and permanent solution to this unfair tax."

Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada contended that Frist recognized that "the phony House 'compromise'" would be turned down by senators.

"The Senate has repeatedly rejected repeal of the estate tax because it recognized that giving away hundreds of billions in tax breaks to the wealthiest among us was the wrong priority for America," Reid said in a statement.

Frist lost one vote on the estate tax already this summer when opponents — most Democrats and a pair of Republicans — blocked debate on a bill repealing estate taxes after 2010.

Frist then turned to the House for help, asking GOP leaders for a bill that might attract enough support to pass this year, before a fall election with control of Congress at stake.

House tax-writers responded with a bill eliminating taxes for virtually all inherited estates, those worth up to $5 million for an individual and $10 million for a couple.

After those exemptions, estates worth up to $25 million would be taxed at rates equal to those on capital gains, currently 15 percent but scheduled to rise to 20 percent in 2011.

The remainder of any larger estates would be taxed at rates twice that of capital gains, or 30 percent at first and 40 percent when the scheduled capital gains tax increase takes effect.

The bill also would cut taxes for companies on certain timber gains.

The estate tax debate is made necessary because of a quirky law that eliminates the levy in 2010 but revives it a year later.

Frist said senators also must decide whether to make changes to the bill passed in the House. The House's most conservative Republicans have already signaled they could not accept any Senate attempt to negotiate for higher estate taxes.

Senate Delays Vote On Estate Tax Reduction, Timber (Update2) (BLOOM)

By Ryan Donmoyer

Bloomberg, June 28, 2006

June 27 (Bloomberg) -- Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist postponed a vote on a measure to exempt most multimillionaires from federal estate taxes after conceding Republicans lack the votes to pass legislation adopted by the House last week.

The delay is the third since Frist began his quest to repeal or reduce the tax last year and the second time this month his ambitions were thwarted by Democrats who say the government needs the revenue generated by the tax. The House passed the legislation 269-156 on June 22 after Frist urged it to act before the Independence Day recess next week.

``The Senate will vote on a permanent reduction to this tax," Frist said in a statement. ``The vast majority of my Democratic colleagues have so far refused to address this issue; it's my hope that their constituents will use the upcoming recess to explain the importance of supporting a reasonable and permanent solution to this unfair tax."

The delay allows Frist to avoid a repeat of a Senate vote on a procedural motion on June 8, when Republicans fell three votes shy of allowing a vote on outright repeal of the tax on estates valued at more than $2 million.

``Obviously, we're trying to make sure we got 60 votes," said Senator Jon Kyl, an Arizona Republican who has sought a compromise with Democrats such as Senator Max Baucus of Montana to reduce the tax instead of repealing it.

Kyl said Senate Republicans are determined to pass the legislation this year, though they want to ensure they have the 60 votes needed to withstand a challenge by Democrats. Republicans control 55 seats in the chamber; 60 votes are required to overcome filibusters, the legislative maneuvers that can kill legislation.

House Measure

DOJ_NMG_0037062

The House legislation would spare all but about 2,800 multimillion-dollar estates from federal tax by exempting the first $10 million of a couple's estate from any tax. Estates valued between $10 million and $25 million would be taxed at the capital-gains rate, while estates of more than $25 million would be taxed at top rates of 30 percent to 40 percent.

The measure, which would take effect in 2010, also includes a tax break for timber companies intended to lure Senate Democrats from timber-producing states such as Washington, Arkansas, and Louisiana.

The measure, characterized as a take-it-or-leave-it offer by House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Bill Thomas, a California Republican, has had a lukewarm reception in the Senate.

Timber-State Lawmakers

Some Senate Republicans who favor full repeal of the estate tax said the new version doesn't go far enough to help small-business owners and farmers. Timber-state Democrats such as Maria Cantwell and Patty Murray of Washington, Mark Pryor of Arkansas, and Mary Landrieu of Louisiana haven't said they would back the House legislation after voting against full repeal June 8.

Thomas said today that any modification by the Senate would kill the legislation. ``If they decide to amend it in some small way and send it back to the House, it's over," Thomas said in an interview.

For Frist, it would mark the third significant delay for Senate action on the estate tax. His original plan to hold a vote in July 2005 was scuttled by the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, when Republicans said they were wary of voting on a measure cast by critics as only helping millionaire families after thousands of poor people lost their homes to the storm.

A second vote promised for May was delayed until June as Frist searched for support for full repeal.

The federal estate tax currently assesses rates of up to 46 percent on estates valued at more than $2 million per individual The exemption amount is scheduled to increase under current law to $3.5 million per individual or $7 million per couple by 2009. A top rate of 45 percent would apply to estates exceeding that value at that time.

2,800 Estates

Under current law, 12,600 estates -- or less than 1 percent of all people who die -- will be subject to the tax this year, according to estimates by the Tax Policy Center, a non-partisan research institution in Washington. The center estimated that a plan similar to Thomas's would reduce the number of taxable estates to 2,800 and would cut their tax rate to as low as 15 percent from about 45 percent.

The legislation also repeals a federal deduction for tax payments to the 23 states that retain their own estate or inheritance taxes, including Washington, Tennessee, Ohio, New York, New Jersey and Connecticut. That would subject residents of those states with large estates to double taxation, said Harley Duncan, executive director of the Federation of Tax Administrators, a Washington-based association of state tax officials.

Letters (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, June 28, 2006

Our Estate Tax Reform Is Fair and Pro-Growth

While the June 22 editorial "Doubting Thomas" misinterprets the intent of my proposed reform of the estate tax, it does elevate this important debate. Though the House has voted five times to permanently repeal the estate tax in recent years, the Senate has been unable to follow through. Faced with this deadlock, Congress has a choice: make yet another political statement or make law.

With a bipartisan vote, last week the House chose the latter -- approving compromise legislation to permanently reform the estate tax.

The House bill is a vast improvement over the only other option -- do nothing and allow the death tax to revert to a punitive 55% top rate in 2011 and beyond. The compromise bill exempts the first $5 million of every estate ($10 million per couple), establishes significantly lower rates for the few families who will still have to pay the tax, and eliminates the estate tax for 99.7% of all Americans on a permanent basis.

DOJ_NMG_0037063

This is the opportunity to provide meaningful estate tax reform that is permanent, fair and pro-growth. The House has voted; now it's up to the Senate. It is my hope that the spirit of compromise prevails and permanent estate tax relief can become law in the near future.

Bill Thomas (R., Calif.)

Chairman

Committee on Ways and Means

Washington

Please, Let's Clear the Air About the Bridge in Alaska

In regard to your June 15 editorial "Earmarker in Chief": Knowing Sen. Lisa Murkowski's clear position on the issue of earmarks, I think there is little disagreement over the fact that Congress must take steps to bring earmarks out of the shadows and into the light of public disclosure. However, I take great umbrage at your assertion that somehow the senator is an active participant in what you describe as a connection between the process of earmarking and the "opportunity for corruption." Including her in a list of convicted felons who have sought to use their positions of power for illegal activities, simply because she has openly advocated a longstanding effort to improve the infrastructure of an Alaska community, is more than perplexing.

You state that "one of the major beneficiaries" from an earmark for a bridge in Alaska is one of Sen. Murkowski's relatives. The senator's mother did indeed inherit, in 1965, one-quarter interest in a tract of land that has no structures, road access, power, water, sewer or fire service. And as a matter of factual context, this piece of property is situated on an island that totals 71,932 acres -- of which the senator's mother has roughly 8.25 acres of interest. The current owners have tried repeatedly to sell the property over the years, with no success. A simple comparison of the size of the island vs. the miniscule property interest the senator's mother owns clearly shows that she is far from being a major beneficiary.

The notion that Sen. Murkowski would have sought to advance the prospects of the bridge project, which has been advocated by the community of Ketchikan for 30 years, for some kind of family benefit is preposterous. In fact, at her request, the Senate Select Committee on Ethics reviewed the situation to determine whether her advocacy of the bridge project constituted a conflict of interest. The committee found no conflict.

Danielle Holland

Communications Director

Sen. Lisa Murkowski

Washington

See the Real Burma

U.S. Undersecretary of State Paula J. Dobriansky's June 19 editorial-page article, "Press for Change in Burma," is based on exaggerated and fabricated reports. It also makes the groundless assertion that, in addition to Aung San Suu Kyi, 50 million people are living without basic freedoms and human rights in Burma.

I would like to invite Ms. Dobriansky to pay a visit to Myanmar to see the reality of the situation for herself. She will find that, far from suffering in this way, our 50 million people are working hand in hand to develop the country in a harmonious way. She can also see for herself whether or not such violation of human rights and suppression of minority rights are really taking place.

Whether or not to release Ms. Aung San Suu Kyi and other so-called political prisoners is purely a domestic affair of our country, and none of the business of outsiders. Contrary to Ms. Dobriansky's assertions, our internal situation poses no threat to peace and security in the region. Those who make such claims should consider the disastrous situation in Iraq where the U.S. tried to justify its democracy adventure by ignoring the U.N. and taking unilateral military action based on unfounded accusations that Saddam Hussein possessed weapons of mass destruction.

Instead of taking such an aggressive approach and making such provocations, those who truly want to support democracy and prosperity in Myanmar should cooperate with its government to achieve the goal of implementing the Seven-Step Road Map for Democratic Transition in Myanmar.

Chan Kyaw Aung

Consulate General of the Union of Myanmar

DOJ_NMG_0037064

Hong Kong

Our Taxed Expats (WSJ)

By Newt Gingrich And Ken Kies

The Wall Street Journal, June 28, 2006

Suppose you are trying to come up with ways to change U.S. tax law to make American business less competitive in the global economy. Your list of ideas would likely include raising the U.S. corporate tax rate even higher than its current 35% rate, already tops in the OECD. You would try to make sure that U.S. companies are subject to higher taxes than foreign-based competitors when they do business abroad. And of course, you would attempt to change our tax system to discourage the hiring of Americans overseas. Americans working overseas might actually help promote the export of U.S. goods and services abroad.

Sadly, Congress has latched on to this last idea as part of the ironically titled "Tax Increase Prevention and Reconciliation Act," signed into law by President Bush on May 17. A provision inserted in the conference agreement dramatically rewrites the rules under section 911 that limit U.S. taxation of American citizens working abroad. Specifically, the proposal would tax U.S. citizens working overseas at higher marginal rates and subject their housing to higher taxes. Adding insult to injury, these changes were drafted to take effect retroactively, back to the beginning of this year.

Reading the newspapers in the days following the enactment of this legislation would have given you a sense of the shocked, and unhappy, reactions of Americans working overseas. But the larger issue is that section 911 rules are of great importance for American competitiveness, which is why Congress needs to revisit the new law's changes as soon as possible. * * *

The United States is the only major industrialized country in the world that taxes its citizens without regard to where they reside or work. Accordingly, if we are transferred abroad by our employer, we are subject to tax on our salary and on "stranger in a strange land" assistance that our employer may provide (e.g., the cost of sending our kids to an English-speaking school, or airfare for an annual trip home). We are subject not only to U.S. tax on these amounts, but also to taxes imposed by the foreign country.

All things being equal, it is cheaper for our employer to hire a non-American for a foreign position. If our employer moves us, it likely will have to raise our pay to cover these additional tax costs to get us to agree to the assignment. If our employer hires a foreign national, already onsite, it simply pays a base foreign salary.

Section 911 has long helped to mitigate this disincentive to hire Americans. In 2006, the provision allows U.S. citizens to exclude $82,400 from income. Prior to the new legislation, income in excess of that amount was subject to U.S. tax at standard income-tax rates. Also prior to the new legislation, a U.S. citizen could deduct the cost of foreign housing above a base amount; alternatively, if our employer picked up this cost, the benefit was excludable.

The new changes enacted by Congress provide that any income above and beyond the exclusion cap is taxed at rates that "pretend" that the exclusion does not exist. That is, the first dollar of income above the $82,400 cap is taxed at a 25% rate, not at the 10% rate that previously applied. The new legislation also caps the foreign housing deduction/exclusion at $11,536 (or $961 a month). Congress did give Treasury the authority to adjust this amount for high-cost locations, but the extent to which meaningful relief will be provided is uncertain at best.

What is undeniable is that U.S. workers abroad face a massive tax increase -- $2.1 billion over the next 10 years to be precise, according to Congress. U.S. workers in places like Hong Kong or Dubai may see tax increases in the tens of thousands of dollars. In the near term, some employers may respond by raising a worker's pay. If employers do nothing, a worker will be left to pick up the cost. And since the tax applies retroactively back to the beginning of the year, and since employees can't typically move back to the U.S. on a week's notice, this unfortunate person may be stuck with a salary structure he or she would never have agreed to had there been knowledge of the change to section 911.

So, you might say, maybe some U.S. employers pay more and some individuals get hurt. What's the big deal? First, the new tax increases can only mean that there will be fewer "Americans on the ground" in overseas markets going forward. Studies have shown a direct correlation between employment of Americans overseas and U.S. exports. These studies confirm what one might assume -- that Americans are best at selling America. That is, U.S. workers are most likely to specify and purchase U.S. goods and services where opportunities arise in foreign projects. A 1980 study by the Chase Econometrics Group found that a 10% drop in Americans overseas would result in a 5% drop in U.S. exports. A 1995 Price Waterhouse study found that repeal of section 911 would result in an $8.7 billion reduction in U.S. exports, which would translate into the loss of approximately 143,000 U.S.-based jobs.

DOJ_NMG_0037065

Second, where U.S. companies bid on overseas projects against foreign companies, they may have to bid, for a variety of reasons, on the assumption that they will employ U.S. citizens. Americans already are more expensive to employ in overseas locales. The added cost of the new section 911 tax increases will only raise the pricing of U.S. bids, and therefore mean U.S. companies get less work.

Third, the section 911 changes will hurt small- and medium-sized businesses. Smaller firms are more likely than larger firms to use U.S. citizens when they first seek penetration of foreign markets. A 1995 study by professors at the Johns Hopkins University of Advanced International Studies found that 82% of surveyed small- and medium-sized businesses said loss of the section 911 exclusion would have a substantial impact on their ability to secure projects or compete overseas. These firms also are far less likely to be able to absorb the cost of adjusting employees' pay to offset the impact of the section 911 tax increases. Thus, the first and harshest effects of the legislation may be felt by these smaller companies.

We hope that a critical mass can drive corrective action. We would propose something radical. Why not follow the lead of our trading partners and exempt foreign-earned income completely? If that is too far-reaching, we should repeal the tax increase, effective back to its January start date, and restore the intended utility of section 911 by increasing the exemption amount to $117,000, which would take into account inflation since the amount was originally set (at $70,000) in 1982.

Either of those approaches would mean more U.S. players out on the field. Global business competition is already fierce enough. We shouldn't sabotage ourselves.

Mr. Gingrich, a senior fellow at the American Enterprise Institute, is former speaker of the House of Representatives. Mr. Kies, a managing director at Clark Consulting, served as chief of staff of the Joint Committee on Taxation 1995-98.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Ignores Laws He Inks, Vexing Congress (AP-Y2)

By Laurie Kellman

AP2, June 27, 2006

The White House on Tuesday defended President Bush's frequent use of special statements that claim authority to limit the effects of bills he signs, saying the statements help him uphold the Constitution and defend national security.

Senators weren't so sure.

"It's a challenge to the plain language of the Constitution," said Arlen Specter, a Republican whose Senate Judiciary Committee opened hearings on the issue. "There is a sense that the president has taken signing statements far beyond the customary purview."

At the White House, Press Secretary Tony Snow said, "There's this notion that the president is committing acts of civil disobedience, and he's not. It's important for the president at least to express reservations about the constitutionality of certain provisions."

The bill-signing statements say Bush reserves a right to revise, interpret or disregard measures on national security and constitutional grounds. Some 110 statements have challenged about 750 statutes passed by Congress, according to numbers combined from White House and the Senate committee. They include documents revising or disregarding parts of legislation to ban torture of detainees and to renew the Patriot Act.

Snow said presidents from Dwight Eisenhower to Bill Clinton have issued such statements.

"The president has done the same thing that his predecessors have," he told reporters. "Presidents generally had the same concerns about defending the presidential prerogatives when it comes to national security."

In addition to Specter's objections, Democrats called the signing statements an example of the administration trying to expand executive power.

DOJ_NMG_0037066

"I believe that this new use of signing statements is a means to undermine and weaken the law," said Sen. Dianne Feinstein (news, bio, voting record) of California. "If the president is going to have the power to nullify all or part of a statute, it should only be through veto authority that the president has authorized and can reject — rather than through a unilateral action taken outside the structures of our democracy."

Defending Bush, a Justice Department lawyer said the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks had made it prudent for the president to protect his powers with signing statements more than did his predecessors.

"Even if there is modest increase, let me just suggest that it be viewed in light of current events and Congress' response to those events," said lawyer Michelle Boardman. "The significance of legislation affecting national security has increased markedly since Sept. 11."

"Congress has been more active, the president has been more active," she added. "The separation of powers is working when we have this kind of dispute."

The exchange came during a midterm election year in which Specter, some fellow Republicans and many Democrats are highlighting concerns about the administration's use of executive power. Specter's personal list includes Bush's warrantless domestic wiretapping program, the administration's checking of phone records and the sending of officials to hearings but saying they cannot answer lawmakers' questions on national security grounds.

The session also was aimed at countering any influence Bush's signing statements may have on court decisions regarding the new laws. Courts can be expected to look to the legislature for intent, not the executive, said Sen. John Cornyn (news, bio, voting record), R-Texas., a former state judge.

"The president is entitled to express his opinion. It's the courts that determine what the law is," he said. "I don't know why the issue of presidents issuing signing statements is controversial at all."

Specter and his allies maintain that Bush is trying an end-run around the veto process. In his presidency's sixth year, Bush has yet to issue a single veto, which could be overridden with a two-thirds majority in each house.

"The president is not required to," Boardman said.

"Of course he's not if he signs the bill," Specter snapped back.

Other presidents have used signing statements for administrative reasons, such as instructing an agency how to put a certain law into effect. They usually are inserted quietly into the federal record.

White House Defends Bush's Limits On Bills (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, June 28, 2006

The White House yesterday defended President Bush's right to set limits on the scope of congressional bills he signs into law, saying the Constitution grants the executive broad powers and requires the president to uphold the law.

"The president does not, and the administration does not, refuse to carry out the laws that have been passed by Congress and signed into law by the president," White House press secretary Tony Snow said.

"In the context of trying to preserve and protect and defend the Constitution, there will be times, there will be places within signing statements, caveats, where he has reservations about" a bill he is signing into law, he said.

Mr. Snow said it is not unusual for presidents "to list those reservations, if nothing else, as markers, for issues that may later rise to be points of controversy."

Mr. Bush has used the constitutional statements -- about 110 in all, Mr. Snow said -- to interpret bills passed by Congress. The statements have no power in courts, which are the final arbiters on issues that arise between the interpretation offered by Congress and the interpretation of the executive branch.

Shortly after Mr. Snow defended the practice, Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter held a hearing on Mr. Bush's use of signing statements.

"There is a sense that the president has taken signing statements far beyond the customary purview," said Mr. Specter, Pennsylvania Republican. "It's a challenge to the plain language of the Constitution."

DOJ_NMG_0037067

Democrats at the hearing sought to broaden the issue, complaining that Mr. Bush's signing statements are just the latest example of the administration's expansion of executive power.

"I believe that this new use of signing statements is a means to undermine and weaken the law," said Sen. Dianne Feinstein of California. "If the president is going to have the power to nullify all or part of a statute, it should only be through veto authority that the president has authorized and can reject -- rather than through a unilateral action taken outside the structures of our democracy."

But Sen. John Cornyn, Texas Republican, said courts routinely look to the legislature for its intent, not to the executive branch. "The president is entitled to express his opinion. It's the courts that determine what the law is," he said. "I don't know why the issue of presidents issuing signing statements is controversial at all."

Mr. Snow said yesterday that former President Bill Clinton employed the tactic 105 times during his two terms.

Deputy Assistant Attorney General Michelle Boardman said in yesterday's hearing that "presidents are sworn to 'preserve, protect and defend the Constitution,' and thus are responsible for ensuring that the manner in which they enforce acts of Congress is consistent with America's founding document."

Sometimes, that includes the president telling Congress that a facet of a statute appears unconstitutional and that he will avoid possible constitutional conflicts, she said. In addition, the statements are not attempts to "cherry pick" among the parts of an enacted law that the president will choose to follow, she said.

"Presidential signing statements are, rather, a statement by the president explaining his interpretation of and responsibilities under the law, and they are therefore an essential part of the constitutional dialogue between the branches," Miss Boardman said.

Democrats Accuse Bush Of Power Grab (FT)

By Caroline Daniel

Financial Times, June 28, 2006

The expansion of presidential powers by the Bush administration came under strong criticism on Tuesday from Democratic senators, who during a Senate hearing accused George W. Bush of “making unprecedented claims for unchecked power”.

Senator Arlen Specter, chairman of the Senate judiciary committee, who has been at the forefront of raising questions on presidential power, held hearings on Tuesday for the first time on the use of presidential “signing statements”. These attachments to the bill contain instructions on how the executive branch intends to carry out legislation, and often provide a way for the executive to ignore congressional intent.

The issue has attracted scrutiny following a study by the Boston Globe this year that found that Mr Bush had employed signing statements for more than 750 laws enacted by the Republican Congress. “That’s far more than all the signing statements signed by every single president from George Washington to Bill Clinton, put together,” said Patrick Leahy, a Democratic senator, during the hearing.

Concern has focused on whether Mr Bush has used the low-profile statements to side-step congressional authority, rather than publicly issue a presidential veto of legislation.

Mr Bush has never issued a formal veto. “Basically, the president signs laws enacted by people’s representatives in Congress but he’s crossing his fingers behind his back. And when he says he never had to make a veto, heck, why? He just signs laws saying he is not going to follow them,” Mr Leahy added.

The most controversial use of a signing statement came this year after the Senate voted to pass a prohibition on certain kinds of interrogation procedures. After lengthy negotiations with Senator John McCain agreeing the terms of an amendment, the administration “issued a signing statement which appeared to undercut what had been negotiated”, said Mr Specter.

Mr Leahy also offered the example of how Mr Bush had used a signing statement to narrow a provision protecting corporate whistle-blowers in the Sarbanes-Oxley law. That effort, however, was later overturned after congressional pressure.

DOJ_NMG_0037068

Dick Durbin, a Democratic senator for Illinois, said: “I’m afraid this is part of a much larger pattern which we’ve seen in the last several years, at least since 9/11, where this Congress continues to cede its authority and power to the executive branch.” He accused Republicans of being “complicit in ceding this power”.

Senator John Cornyn, a Republican, defended use of the statements, calling them “helpful to understand the rationale of the executive branch”. That point was echoed by Michelle Boardman, the deputy assistant attorney-general, who said that every president since Dwight D. Eisenhower had issued a signing statement.

Democrats have been seeking to make executive power a theme in mid-term elections. Dianne Feinstein, a Democratic senator, said the “calculated expansion of executive power was one of the lasting legacies of this administration, which could have a more lasting impact on this country than any other issue”.

Debate On Hill Over Power Of The President (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, June 28, 2006

WASHINGTON

What should Congress do if the president refuses to enforce a law - or some part of it he deems unconstitutional?

It's a question that has simmered in the GOP-controlled Congress over issues ranging from post-9/11 national security to the use of torture in the war on terror.

But it resurfaced on Capitol Hill this week, as lawmakers consider giving President Bush line-item veto authority and, behind the scenes, negotiate with the White House over Mr. Bush's claim that he has authority to conduct domestic wiretapping without a warrant, despite a 1978 law that says otherwise.

"The real issue here is whether the president can cherry-pick what he likes," said Sen. Arlen Specter (R) of Pennsylvania, chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, as he opened a hearing Tuesday on presidential signing statements.

Such statements - issued when presidents sign bills into law - are a long White House tradition. Bush has produced a record total - more than 750 of them - that lay out his interpretation of the new law to Congress, the courts, and the public.

"The president hasn't vetoed any bills, but basically he has done a personal veto. He has said which laws he will not follow and ... put himself above the law, even the same law he has signed," said Sen. Patrick Leahy of Vermont, the ranking Democrat on the Judiciary panel.

Not all Republicans are as enthused as chairman Specter and Senate Democrats over this line of questioning, especially as lawmakers head into fall elections that could change control of both houses of Congress.

"This is a fascinating topic, mainly something law students and lawyers can love," said Sen. John Cornyn (R) of Texas, a member of the Judiciary Committee, who notes that the practice of presidents issuing signing statements goes back to 1821.

"As a practical matter, I don't know what impact it has.... It promotes public discourse and discussion about what the roles of the legislative branch and the executive branch are," he added.

Testifying for the Bush administration, Michelle Boardman, deputy assistant attorney general in the Office of Legal Counsel at the US Department of Justice, said that signing statements serve a "legitimate and important function" and are not an abuse of power.

"Congress should not fear signing statements, but welcome the openness they provide," she said. "The president must execute the law faithfully, but the Constitution is the highest law of the land. If the Constitution and the law conflict, the president must choose," she said.

Also testifying before the committee, Nicholas Rosenkranz, a law professor at Georgetown University Law Center in Washington, called the "recent brouhaha" over presidential signing statements "largely unwarranted."

But for Chairman Specter, who helped the White House move new powers under the USA Patriot Act through the Senate, the issue comes down to basic respect for balance of powers - and for the Congress. After personally negotiating with the White House over issues such as the Patriot Act and the torture ban, he questioned why objections would not have been raised at that time.

DOJ_NMG_0037069

"Wouldn't it be better as a matter [of] comity for the president to come to the Congress and say: I want these exceptions in the bill," rather than asserting them in a presidential signing statement, Specter asked.

When the question was not answered to his satisfaction, he called for answers in writing. ("My office in the Justice Department is flooded," Ms. Boardman said. "It will take a week.")

For Specter and some other Senate Republicans, what tipped the issue was the president's signing statement of the fiscal 2006 Defense authorization bill, which included a ban on torture that had passed the Senate by a wide margin. That statement claimed the right to make exceptions to that ban.

Pressing the issue, Sen. Edward Kennedy (D) of Massachusetts asked Boardman to provide a list of laws that President Bush has decided not to enforce.

"I cannot give you that list," Boardman said.

"No, then who can? Is there any way for the public to know the president has made a judgment that he is not going to enforce a law?" he asked.

It's an issue that Democrats in both the Senate and House are developing for fall elections. Last week. House Democrats introduced a resolution requiring the president to notify Congress if the president "makes a determination to ignore a duly enacted provision of law."

"For far too long, Congress has stood by and watched while President Bush has slowly expanded the unilateral powers of the presidency at the expense of the rest of the government and the people," said Senator Kennedy at Tuesday's hearing.

"This administration has issued signing statements at an astonishing rate to express the view that it does not have to comply with the laws that Congress has passed," added Sen. Russ Feingold (D) of Wisconsin, who has called for a censure of President Bush. "I believe that is dangerous to our system of government."

However arcane, the debate is "part of a much broader spectrum of issues that has to do with separation of powers," says Carl Tobias, a law professor at the University of Richmond in Virginia.

The American Civil Liberties Union welcomed the Senate Judiciary Committee's hearing as an opportunity to "highlight this administration's disregard for the law," said Caroline Fredrickson, director of the ACLU Washington Legislative office.

Bush's Challenges Of Laws He Signed Is Criticized (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, June 28, 2006

A bipartisan group of senators and scholars denounced President Bush yesterday for using scores of "signing statements" to reserve the right to ignore or reinterpret provisions of measures that he has signed into law.

Bush's statements have challenged, for instance, a congressional ban on torture, a request for data on the administration of the USA Patriot Act and even a legislative demand for suggestions on the digital mapping of coastal resources.

The Senate Judiciary Committee's hearing marked the latest effort by Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) and panel Democrats to reclaim authority that they say the president has usurped as he has expanded the power of the executive branch. It came on the same day Bush gave a speech pushing for a line-item veto that would allow him to strike spending and tax provisions from legislation without vetoing the bill.

Other presidents have used signing statements to clarify their interpretation of laws, but no president has used such statements instead of ever using the veto authority spelled out in the Constitution, said Harvard University law professor Charles J. Ogletree Jr., who is serving on a new American Bar Association task force examining Bush's signing statements. Bush has never used his veto power in his presidency.

"There is a sense that the president has taken the signing statements far beyond the customary purviews," Specter told the administration's representative, Michelle E. Boardman, deputy assistant attorney general in the Justice Department's Office of Legal Counsel. "There's a real issue here as to whether the president may, in effect, cherry-pick the provisions he likes and exclude the ones he doesn't like."

Democrats were more blunt, blasting such statements, which are estimated to number more than 750 on 110 laws -- more than all the statements issued by other presidents.

DOJ_NMG_0037070

"I've never seen anything like it," said Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (Vt.), the committee's ranking Democrat, calling the practice "a grave threat to our constitutional system of checks and balances."

Specter has been more aggressive than any other Republican in challenging Bush's expanding authority. He has pushed the president to reshape his warrantless wiretapping efforts to comply with existing law; threatened to summon telecommunications executives who have given the government access to customer phone records; and challenged the White House's legal arguments for indefinite detentions at the U.S. military base at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

But yesterday, Judiciary Committee members appealed to their fellow lawmakers, who Sen. Richard J. Durbin (D-Ill.) said have been "complicit as so many of our precious rights under the Constitution have been ceded away."

Boardman countered that presidents since James Monroe have issued statements of interpretation to accompany laws, and that every president since Dwight D. Eisenhower has issued statements reserving the right not to execute sections of laws that may contradict the Constitution. By her accounting, Bush has issued such statements on 110 laws, compared with 80 from Bill Clinton, as many as 105 from Ronald Reagan and 147 from George H.W. Bush in a single term. But President Bush issued multiple statements on many of those laws for a total of 750, and it is unclear how many statements the other presidents issued.

"Even if there has been a modest increase, let me just suggest that it be viewed in light of current events and Congress's response to those events," she said. "The significance of legislation affecting national security has increased markedly since September 11."

The statements related to national security have caused the most controversy.

Last year, after months of difficult negotiations, Bush withdrew a veto threat and signed a defense policy bill that included a provision by Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) banning cruel, inhumane or degrading treatment of prisoners at U.S. detention centers. But Bush's signing statement on Dec. 30, 2005, reserved the right to waive the torture ban if he concluded that some harsh interrogation techniques could advance anti-terrorism efforts.

This year, after Congress reached a hard-fought agreement to extend the USA Patriot Act, expanding the power of federal law enforcement, the president questioned a provision calling for the administration to furnish Congress with detailed audits on the issuance of secret business-record searches and "national security letters."

"He's crossing his fingers behind his back," Leahy said.

White House officials and their allies tried to reassure lawmakers that they have nothing to fear from such statements.

"There's this notion that the president is committing acts of civil disobedience, and he's not," White House spokesman Tony Snow said.

Bush's Use Of Authority Riles Senator (NYT)

By Kate Zernike

The New York Times, June 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 27 — Senators on the Judiciary Committee accused President Bush of an "unprecedented" and "astonishing" power grab on Tuesday for making use of a device that gave him the authority to revise or ignore more than 750 laws enacted since he became president.

By using what are known as signing statements, memorandums issued with legislation as he signs it, the president has reserved the right to not enforce any laws he thinks violate the Constitution or national security, or that impair foreign relations.

A lawyer for the White House said that Mr. Bush was only doing his duty to uphold the Constitution. But Senator Arlen Specter, Republican of Pennsylvania and chairman of the Judiciary Committee, characterized the president's actions as a declaration that he "will do as he pleases," without regard to the laws passed by Congress.

"There's a real issue here as to whether the president may, in effect, cherry-pick the provisions he likes and exclude the ones he doesn't like," Mr. Specter said at a hearing.

"Wouldn't it be better, as a matter of comity," he said, "for the president to have come to the Congress and said, 'I'd like to have this in the bill; I'd like to have these exceptions in the bill,' so that we could have considered that?"

Mr. Specter and others are particularly upset that Mr. Bush reserved the right to interpret the torture ban passed overwhelmingly by Congress, as well as Congressional oversight powers in the renewal of the Patriot Act.

DOJ_NMG_0037071

Michelle Boardman, a deputy assistant attorney general, said the statements were "not an abuse of power."

Rather, Ms. Boardman said, the president has the responsibility to make sure the Constitution is upheld. He uses signing statements, she argued, to "save" statutes from being found unconstitutional. And he reserves the right, she said, only to raise questions about a law "that could in some unknown future application" be declared unconstitutional.

"It is often not at all the situation that the president doesn't intend to enact the bill," Ms. Boardman said.

The fight over signing statements is part of a continuing battle between Congress and the White House. Mr. Specter and many Democrats have raised objections to the administration's wiretapping of phones without warrants from the court set up to oversee surveillance.

Last month, Mr. Specter accused Vice President Dick Cheney of going behind his back to avoid the Judiciary Committee's oversight of surveillance programs.

"Where will it end?" asked Senator Edward M. Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts. "Where does it stop?"

The bills Mr. Bush has reserved the right to revise or ignore include provisions that govern affirmative action programs, protect corporate whistle-blowers, require executive agencies to collect certain statistics, and establish qualifications for executive appointees.

Senators and two law professors before the panel said that if the president objected to a bill, he should use his power to veto it — something he has not done in his six years in office.

Senator Dianne Feinstein, Democrat of California, said the expansion of executive power would be the "lasting legacy" of the Bush administration. "This new use of signing statements is a means to undermine and weaken the law," she said.

What the president is saying, she added, is "Congress, what you do isn't really important; I'm going to do what I want to do."

Ms. Boardman said the president had inserted 110 statements, which senators said applied to 750 statutes, compared with 30 by President Jimmy Carter. The number has increased, she said, but only marginally, and only because national security concerns have increased since the attacks of Sept. 11 and more laws have been passed. She acknowledged that the increase might be construed as "a lack of good communication" with Congress.

But Senator John Cornyn, Republican of Texas, said the committee was making too much of the statements. "It is precedented," he said, "and it's not new."

Senators said they had been expecting a higher-ranking official from the office of legal policy, and Senator Patrick J. Leahy of Vermont, the senior Democrat on the committee, chastised the White House for not sending "anybody who would have authority to speak on this."

"But then, considering the fact that they're using basically an extra-constitutional, extra-judicial step to enhance the power of the president, it's not unusual," he said.

Bush Urges Senate To Pass Line-item Veto (AP-Y2)

By Deb Riechmann

AP2, June 27, 2006

President Bush, urging the Senate to pass the line-item veto, on Tuesday criticized House Democrats who didn't back the measure even though they've called for federal spending restraint.

A line-item veto would allow the president to cut certain provisions in spending bills without vetoing the entire measure. The House passed such legislation last week 247-172. Thirty-five Democrats joined with most Republicans in voting for the bill.

"I was disappointed, frankly, though that more Democrats didn't vote for the bill, especially those that are calling for fiscal discipline in Washington, D.C.," Bush said in a speech to members of the Manhattan Institute, a conservative think tank based in New York. "I mean, you can't call for fiscal discipline on the one hand and then not pass a tool to enhance fiscal discipline on the other hand. You can't have it both ways, it seems like to me."

The bill faces an uncertain future in the Senate. Democrats generally oppose the measure, and not all Republicans are excited about the idea. "We need to set politics aside" and pass a line-item veto, Bush said about the measure that the GOP embraces as a way to demonstrate election-year resolve to rein in federal spending.

DOJ_NMG_0037072

Lawmakers from both parties who have reservations about the line-item veto contend it would shift too much power to the president, allowing him to try to cut projects proposed by his political enemies, or to use the threat of cutting projects in exchange for favorable votes on legislation the White House desires.

The bill that passed the House is a watered-down version of a more sweeping law that the Supreme Court struck down in 1998, saying it took too much spending authority away from Congress. Bush said the new legislation would meet the court's constitutional requirements.

The new version would let the president try to kill individual items contained in spending or tax bills that he otherwise signs into law. Congress would be required to vote on those specific items again. A simple majority in both the House and the Senate could override the president's objections.

"When the president sees an earmark or a spending provision that is wasteful or unnecessary, he can send it back to the Congress," Bush said. "And Congress is then required to hold a prompt up-or-down vote on whether to retain the targeted spending. In other words, the Congress is still in the process."

Earlier, Bush met with senators at the White House to discuss the line-item veto. The group included Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., and Sens. Judd Gregg, R-N.H., Thad Cochran, R-Miss., Susan M. Collins, R-Maine, Kit Bond, R-Mo., John McCain, R-Ariz., and Ben Nelson, D-Neb.

Nelson said he told the president that he used the line-item veto to rein in irresponsible spending when he was governor of Nebraska. "It works," said Nelson, governor from 1991 to 1999.

___

On the Net:

http://www.whitehouse.gov

Bush Calls On Senate To Pass Line-Item Veto (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, June 28, 2006

President Bush pushed the Senate yesterday to give him and his successors the power to strip special projects out of spending bills, part of a broader political effort to assuage disaffected supporters that he really is a fiscal conservative despite the growth of government on his watch.

The president summoned key senators to the White House and later gave a speech promoting a line-item veto to fight earmarks, or spending requests that members of Congress slip into larger bills without going through the normal budget process. The House has passed one version of the proposal and another is waiting for a vote on the Senate floor.

Bush said he needs the power to have more influence over lawmakers as they spend taxpayer money. "I want to be a part of the budgetary process," he said in an address sponsored by the Manhattan Institute for Policy Research. "It's an important part of the president's working with Congress and I'm not going to deal myself out of the budgetary process."

Bush has never vetoed a bill in his 5 1/2 years in office and, while long on record in favor of a line-item veto, he has never made a concerted effort to win such authority from Congress until this year as polls showed increasing conservative anxiety about federal spending. Since he took office, the federal budget has grown nearly 50 percent, from $1.86 trillion to a proposed $2.77 trillion for the coming fiscal year, driven in part by the cost of wars in Afghanistan and Iraq and the rise in entitlement costs.

To demonstrate commitment to fiscal restraint, Bush forced Congress to back down after it tried to load up a $94.5 billion emergency spending bill for war operations and hurricane relief this month. He also has frozen non-security discretionary domestic spending for two years in a row and vowed to cut the deficit in half by 2009.

In seeking a line-item veto, Bush set sights on the most politically charged form of federal spending, often called pork. The number of earmarks inserted into spending bills has mushroomed from 3,055 in 1996 to 14,211 in 2004, according to the Congressional Research Service, and the overall cost has more than doubled to $52.7 billion.

But even if Bush had a line-item veto and struck every earmark, it would only carve a fraction out of a deficit projected to reach up to $350 billion this year. And as Bush said yesterday, Congress has met every overall spending target he has given it, meaning that the president and lawmakers have agreed on the broad direction of federal spending since he took office.

DOJ_NMG_0037073

"This is not a budgetary issue. It's an issue of separation or overlap of power," said Richard Kogan, a senior fellow at the Center for Budget and Policy Priorities, which focuses on issues affecting low-income Americans. "It's primarily or exclusively a question of increasing the president's leverage over legislation."

A president could hold up a highway project in a lawmaker's district to win a vote on another priority, Kogan noted. "His threats and promises will be more forceful than they were in the past."

Some supporters of the president agreed the proposal would do little to fight deficit spending. The "line-item veto is a whiff," Sen. Christopher S. Bond (R-Mo.) told reporters after meeting with Bush yesterday. "You know, all our budgets are within the president's request for appropriated spending -- the discretionary spending. And that's not busting the budget." The real problem, he said, is entitlement spending.

Bush agreed that the government needs to get control over programs such as Social Security and Medicare and he vowed to keep trying as long as he is in office. "If we can't get it done this year, I'm going to try next year," he said. "And if we can't get it done next year, I'm going to try the year after that, because it is the right thing to do."

Yet he emphasized that he would not trim military spending, which has been a large part of the growth of government. "We will not shortchange the people who wear the uniform of the United States military," Bush said.

Congress passed a line-item veto in 1996, but the Supreme Court struck it down as unconstitutional. The new version is constructed in a different way intended to address the court's concerns. While the old version functioned like a traditional veto in requiring two-thirds majorities in both houses to overturn the president's decision, the new version allows Congress to restore targeted spending items on simple majority votes.

The Senate version, crafted by Budget Committee Chairman Judd Gregg (R-N.H.), includes other budget process changes not in the House legislation. Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) did not commit yesterday to a date for a floor vote.

President To Press For Line-Item Veto Power (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, June 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 27 — With his proposed overhaul of the nation's immigration laws now in legislative limbo, President Bush focused on another priority on Tuesday, to secure Congressional approval of a presidential line-item veto.

Speaking to a conservative group here in the morning, Mr. Bush said he would use a line-item veto to eliminate spending on the pet projects called earmarks that lawmakers attach to spending bills.

"A line-item veto would be a vital tool that a president could use to target spending that lawmakers tack on to the large spending bills," Mr. Bush said before a gathering held by the Manhattan Institute, a conservative group that advocates fiscal restraint.

The president said he very much needed the power to control spending. The number of earmarks each year has grown to 13,000 per budget from 3,000 over the last decade, he said.

Mr. Bush also met on Tuesday at the White House with senators to discuss his proposal, including the majority leader, Senator Bill Frist of Tennessee, and the president's 2000 Republican primary rival, Senator John McCain of Arizona. In his address, Mr. Bush also cited a more recent rival from the other side of the aisle, Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts, the Democratic presidential nominee in 2004, as a supporter of a line-item veto.

"I remember campaigning against him in 2004, and I remember him talking about the line-item veto," Mr. Bush said of Mr. Kerry, "and I appreciate the fact that he's living up to the political promises he made."

Mr. Bush urged Mr. Kerry's Democratic colleagues to approve the veto just as they had done in 1996 for the last Democratic president, Bill Clinton. Mr. Clinton's success in obtaining line-item veto power, delivered with help from Congressional Republicans, was a victory in a decades-long struggle by the executive branch to gain a stronger hand in budget negotiations with Congress.

But the Supreme Court struck that line-item veto down in 1998, ruling that it allowed a president "to effect the repeal of laws, for his own policy reasons."

DOJ_NMG_0037074

Administration officials say the form of the veto sought by Mr. Bush would stand up to constitutional scrutiny by creating a process in which the president proposes items to strike but Congress ultimately decides whether to go along with him in a fast-tracked vote. The House passed a version of the veto with such a process last week.

Mr. Frist has told administration officials he will try to bring a similar version of the bill to a vote in mid-July. But even White House officials acknowledged that the proposal would face a tough fight. Democrats have been reluctant to give the president any sort of victory, and lawmakers in charge of the Senate Appropriations Committee are not eager to cede any control.

Senator Judd Gregg, Republican of New Hampshire and chairman of the Appropriations Committee, is pushing a version of the bill that would allow the president to strike no more than four items in a year. In addition, a core group of lawmakers is highly protective of Congressional power in general, but especially with Mr. Bush in the White House. His office has been open in its efforts to build executive power.

Winning a line-item veto would give Mr. Bush a much-needed Congressional victory. He had been trying to push through new immigration laws, but last week the House decided to have a series of national hearings before taking action. Mr. Bush said Tuesday that he was not giving up on that fight.

But he said that in the meantime he had asked his new budget director, Rob Portman, to make securing the line-item veto a top priority. Mr. Portman, a former Republican congressman with strong ties on Capitol Hill, has discussed the veto with lawmakers in the last week. "It's important that the Republican Party continue to let people know that the Republicans are the party of fiscal discipline," Mr. Portman said, adding that he was also trying to bring along Democrats.

But Jim Manley, a spokesman for Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic leader, said his boss was working to gather enough votes to defeat the line-item veto. "It's a significant shift in authority to the executive branch," Mr. Manley said.

Bush Presses For Line-item Veto (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, June 28, 2006

President Bush yesterday called the line-item veto the next "crucial test" for Congress on spending restraint, and said he was "disappointed" in House Democrats who claimed they were for fiscal discipline but voted against the plan last week.

"You can't call for fiscal discipline on the one hand and then not pass a tool to enhance fiscal discipline on the other hand," he said, referring to the 156 Democrats in the House who voted against a line-item proposal.

Mr. Bush also promised, using the strongest language he's used in months, to take another stab at controlling the growth of Social Security, saying he will try every year for the rest of his administration.

"If we can't get it done this year, I'm going to try next year. And if we can't get it done next year, I'm going to try the year after that," he said at a speech in Washington, sponsored by the Manhattan Institute.

The president claimed a victory by keeping the recent emergency spending bill to $94.5 billion, and said the line-item veto vote in the Senate later this year is the next big test. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist hopes for a vote this summer, according to a spokeswoman.

A line-item veto passed the House last week, 247-172, with 212 Republicans and 35 Democrats supporting it.

Office of Management and Budget Director Rob Portman, a former member of Congress who is now the administration's point-man on the issue, said at least 60 senators are already on record supporting a line-item veto.

"You start with a base of 50 who supported a much more executive branch-tilted line-item veto [in 1996], and then you add to that the co-sponsors of the legislation now, and you get over 60," Mr. Portman said.

Mr. Bush yesterday said those who supported the 1996 law, later struck down by the Supreme Court, should be on board again.

"It was good enough 10 years ago, it's good enough today, for those who voted for the line-item veto," he said.

This year's bill does have some strong Democratic supporters, including Rep. Mark Udall, Colorado Democrat, who worked hard to win over Democrats. And in the Senate, Sen. John Kerry, Massachusetts Democrat, has taken a prominent public role in pushing for what he said is a "no-brainer" bill.

DOJ_NMG_0037075

"With record deficits and bridges being built to nowhere, we've got to stop the incomprehensible waste coming out of Washington," said Mr. Kerry, Mr. Bush's 2004 opponent in the presidential election. Mr. Kerry won special praise from Mr. Bush yesterday for his consistent support.

But Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada said Republicans could expect little support from Democrats if the line-item proposal is part of a broader budget package Sen. Judd Gregg, New Hampshire Republican, is working on.

"I can't imagine there would be any support for this," he said, adding that Mr. Bush and Republicans continue to focus on spending cuts without looking at revenue or tax increases as well.

Unlike the 1996 line-item veto, the new proposal isn't exactly a veto. Called the "legislative line-item veto," it would allow the president to send a new bill back to Congress pointing out projects that should be cut. Congress would then have a set period of time to vote to accept or reject his recommendations.

The Supreme Court deemed the 1996 version unconstitutional, saying Congress did not have the authority to give the president the power to change legislation it had already passed. The court said the president can either sign legislation into law or send it back to Congress.

Mr. Portman said the new version will provide a spotlight to scare off some lawmakers from adding questionable projects, and that could give extra muscle to key subcommittee chairmen looking to keep extraneous spending out of their bills.

Misunderestimated (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, June 28, 2006

When it comes to tax policy these days, the most powerful branch of government seems to be the unelected computers at the Joint Tax Committee and Congressional Budget Office. Those are the agencies that tell Congress how much tax cuts will "cost" the Treasury in lost revenue. And what's standing in the way of the Senate repealing the death tax this year, for example, is their $600 billion boogeyman estimate of lost federal revenues to the Treasury over 10 years.

But what happens when the computers go haywire? A new study from the American Shareholders Association examined the 10-year forecast for economic growth and federal revenue collections for the period 1997-2006. And over these years, it found, the CBO underestimated tax revenue collections by a cumulative $800 billion. To paraphrase President Bush: That's a pretty severe misunderestimation.

The forecasting faux pas is actually larger because those estimates excluded the impact of at least three major tax cuts (in 1997, 2001 and 2003) that subsequently passed Congress. These tax cuts were estimated by the wizards at Joint Tax to deplete federal tax collections by an additional $1.24 trillion through 2006, according to the Shareholders Association study.

So if you add those together, CBO and JTC have managed to underestimate revenues by $2.04 trillion over the past decade. Here's one way to appreciate how large this error is: It would be as if CBO forgot to count all the federal income tax payments made by every resident of Florida for an entire decade. Tied to their outdated forecasting models, these agencies refuse to acknowledge that there is any Laffer Curve effect from changes in tax rates that help the economy grow and revenues increase. Thus CBO also managed to project a decade ago that the U.S. economy would be $1.3 trillion smaller today than it actually is.

Forecasting future growth is never easy, but that's all the more reason for Members of Congress not to make themselves policy slaves to these estimates. Republicans have promised time and again to fix the models, but they always flinch when the Democrats who first sponsored these models object. So after 12 years of GOP control of Congress, our nation's tax policy is still dominated by computer models that never get it right.

Manhattan: A Call For An Investigation (NYT)

By Jonathan P. Hicks

The New York Times, June 28, 2006

The chairman of the State Democratic Party called on the Federal Election Commission and the Justice Department yesterday to investigate allegations that Representative Vito J. Fossella Jr. violated campaign finance regulations. Mr. Fossella is the only Republican member of Congress from New York City. In a statement, the chairman, Assemblyman Herman D. Farrell Jr., said that the allegations, if true, "would constitute a major breach of the public trust." Mr. Farrell was referring to a report in The

DOJ_NMG_0037076

Daily News that Mr. Fossella, who represents Staten Island and parts of Brooklyn, took trips with his family to ski resorts and other destinations that were financed by donors and corporate sponsors. Craig Donner, a Fossella spokesman, acknowledged that Mr. Fossella had taken several trips over the years, but he said they violated no laws. "The expenses are legal and allowable under federal regulations," Mr. Donner said.

Paulson Defends Tax Cuts At Hearing (FT)

By Krishna Guha

Financial Times, June 28, 2006

Hank Paulson made a robust defence of President George W. Bush's tax cuts at the Senate committee overseeing his nomination as US Treasury secretary on Tuesday, and hinted at a possible shift in emphasis in Washington's China policy.

The former chairman and chief executive of Goldman Sachs stressed the importance of US pressure on Beijing to reform and open up its domestic financial system. He told senators this would allow China to move to a market-determined exchange rate.

Setting out an ambitious agenda for the remainder of Mr Bush's second term in office, Mr Paulson also raised the possibility of a renewed push on reform of entitlement programmes Medicare, Medicaid and Social Security.

The nominee kept up pressure on China to allow greater currency flexibility in the short term, telling senators "we need to encourage them to move quicker there and show more flexibility." But he added that "until they have a fully functioning financial system, a modern financial system which they don't have now, they are not going to be able to have a currency that trades in the competitive marketplace."

The former Goldman Sachs chief, who has visited China more than 70 times since 1990, said Washington should be prepared to push "aggressively" for further finanical sector liberalisation. Mr Paulson's remarks build on, rather than contradict, the stance taken by his predecessor John Snow, who also talked about the importance of banking reform in China.

They suggest that as Treasury Secretary Mr Paulson will put a lot of emphasis on this subject. Speaking more broadly, Mr Paulson also told the Senate finance committee: "If confirmed, I will focus intensely on how the US United States can maintain and strengthen our competitive position."

The nominee said "deficits do matter" and added that he hoped it would be possible to make progress on entitlement reform during the remainder of the Bush second term. On taxation, Mr Paulson said "I watched the role the tax cuts played in getting this economy to where it now is and I think we should all feel very fortunate the economy is growing." He said the tax cuts should be made permanent, saying "tax increases would be counter-productive."

Treasury Nominee Gives Few Specifics On Bush Priorities (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

The New York Times, June 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 24 — Henry M. Paulson Jr., President Bush's nominee for Treasury secretary, cautiously avoided any hints on Tuesday about the administration's economic priorities for the remainder of Mr. Bush's term.

Testifying at his confirmation hearing before the Senate Finance Committee, Mr. Paulson reiterated Mr. Bush's general views on the need for low taxes, budget restraint, increased American competitiveness and the use of persuasion rather than threats in dealing with China on economic issues.

But Mr. Paulson, the chairman of Goldman Sachs, carefully avoided specifics on most policy issues or any mention of prospects for reviving some of Mr. Bush's economic goals — like overhauling the income tax — that have languished for the last two years.

"Having good ideas is one thing," Mr. Paulson said in response to questions about a tax overhaul. "Having good ideas that are doable is another thing."

Though lawmakers in both parties said Mr. Paulson was all but assured of being confirmed, perhaps later this week, his tentative performance on Tuesday seemed in contrast with his build-up by administration officials as a major power player in an arena where White House officials have dominated all the crucial decisions.

DOJ_NMG_0037077

Administration officials wooed Mr. Paulson, who earned $35 million at Goldman last year, in part with assurances that he would play a more central role than either of his two predecessors — Paul H. O'Neill, who was fired in part for his headstrong attitudes; and John W. Snow, who spent most of his time as a salesman rather than architect of Mr. Bush's policies.

Mr. Paulson, 60, rejected some of the White House's initial overtures to become Treasury secretary. When Mr. Bush announced his choice of Mr. Paulson on May 31, the president described him as his "principal adviser on the broad range of domestic and international economic issues."

But on Tuesday, Mr. Paulson stuck to generalities: keeping taxes low, maintaining flexibility in the capital markets, fighting a "creeping regulatory expansion," addressing an anticipated surge of spending on Social Security and Medicare as the nation's baby boomers enter retirement, and improving competitiveness in world markets.

He also alluded at least twice to the limited time left — two and a half years — in Mr. Bush's presidency.

Much like his predecessor, Mr. Paulson rebuffed calls for trimming some of Mr. Bush's tax cuts to reduce the deficit.

"I think it would be a big mistake to increase taxes," he told Senator Olympia J. Snowe, Republican of Maine, adding that the deficit, which is hovering around $300 billion a year, is "within the realm of historical norms" as a share of the gross domestic product.

Mr. Paulson faced sharp questioning from both Republicans and Democrats about the administration's efforts to stop abusive tax shelters and to reduce the so-called tax gap — as much as $350 billion a year, according to Congressional estimates — in taxes that are owed but not paid.

Senator Charles E. Grassley, Republican of Iowa and chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, complained that the Internal Revenue Service, which is part of Treasury, had "fallen down on the job" in offering incentives to whistle-blowers who could expose tax cheating.

Mr. Paulson is reported to have a net worth of about $700 million, including about $470 million in Goldman Sachs shares. He has said he will sell his holdings in Goldman Sachs to comply with the government's conflict-of-interest rules.

Mr. Grassley said his staff, which scrutinized Mr. Paulson's tax returns, had found no evidence that he had used tax shelters.

In response to questions from Senator Max Baucus, Democrat of Montana, Mr. Paulson promised to review a secret program to investigate and track terrorists that relies on an international database that includes Americans' banking transactions.

If confirmed, Mr. Paulson said that he would make sure he thoroughly understood the law covering the program.

One of the few moments of direct personal conflict between lawmakers and Mr. Paulson was not about policy but about Mr. Paulson's role as chairman of the Nature Conservancy, an environmental organization that buys land to prevent it from being developed.

The Nature Conservancy came under heavy criticism several years ago, because some of its deals allowed people to take big tax deductions for contributions of land and yet also allowed significant development projects.

Mr. Paulson pushed through major changes at the Nature Conservancy as well as a settlement of disputes with the Internal Revenue Service.

But on Tuesday, Mr. Grassley complained that the Nature Conservancy had refused to release the details of the I.R.S. settlement.

Mr. Paulson said he was "only one member" of the board, and that the chief executive of the Nature Conservancy wanted to keep the settlement out of the public eye by having the Internal Revenue Service give the Senate Finance Committee details under the cloak of confidentiality.

Paulson Sticks To The Script (WP)

By Paul Blustein

The Washington Post, June 28, 2006

Treasury secretary-designate Henry M. Paulson Jr. hewed firmly to Bush administration positions at his Senate confirmation hearing yesterday, saying that he "very strongly" opposes tax increases, hopes to begin tackling the long-term obligations of Social Security and Medicare, and wants China to move more quickly toward changing its currency policy.

DOJ_NMG_0037078

Appearing before the Senate Finance Committee, Paulson repeatedly praised President Bush's tax cuts and rebuffed suggestions by committee members that tax increases ought to be included in a package of measures to shrink the federal budget deficit.

"Would I like spending to be less? Yes. Would I like the deficit to be less? Yes," said Paulson, who has been chairman and chief executive of Goldman Sachs Group since 1999. "But it's manageable . . . and we can attack it best with a strong and growing economy." Raising taxes, he said, "would be counterproductive" by hurting growth.

Again echoing long-standing views expressed by Bush and other administration officials, Paulson said the nation should put a high priority on reducing the costs of Social Security and Medicare as the baby-boom generation retires. The sooner the retirement and health-care issues are tackled, "the less costly will be the ultimate solution," he said.

But he tacitly acknowledged that, with the administration in its sixth year, political constraints will limit how much he can accomplish.

"It would be naive to think all these things can be solved in a 2 1/2-year period," he said, although he added that he hopes "at least to begin to address" the issues.

Those and other comments indicated that Paulson will continue the approach of the outgoing Treasury secretary, John W. Snow, in faithfully backing the president's policies. Snow suffered from being widely perceived as a cheerleader for the White House, and the appointment of a Wall Street titan was aimed at giving luster to a post that has declined in influence during Bush's presidency.

Paulson was asked deferential questions by senators who lauded his grasp of financial issues, but he skirted several controversial issues by pleading ignorance on technical and legal matters.

When a couple of Democratic senators raised privacy concerns about a recently disclosed program run by the Treasury Department that monitors a large international financial database to track down terrorists, Paulson said he has to "make sure I understand the law thoroughly" before stating an opinion.

On China, he promised to continue the administration's policy of prodding Beijing to let the yuan rise in value. Many U.S. and labor unions accuse China of keeping the yuan fixed at an artificially low exchange rate against the U.S. dollar, giving Chinese businesses an unfair advantage in world markets and costing the United States jobs.

"I would give the administration and Secretary Snow a lot more credit than they are given by some people" on the China currency issue, Paulson said, noting that China has "moved to accept the principle . . . of a flexible currency. That was a very big step for China," even though the exchange rate of the yuan has barely budged.

But he declined to pass judgment on legislation proposed by Sen. Max Baucus (D-Mont.) and the Finance Committee chairman, Sen. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa), that would make it easier for the Treasury to impose sanctions on China for having a "misaligned" currency. "I need to learn more, and look forward to learning more, about the legal framework," he said.

Such comments were generally praised by committee members, even Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.), one of the Senate's sharpest critics of China's policy. Schumer said he had known Paulson for 15 years and indicated that he will cooperate closely with him on the China issue.

At the end of the hearing, Grassley said he hoped that Paulson's nomination could sail through the Senate before the July 4 recess, when Snow has said he plans to leave office. "Our goal is to report the nomination as quickly as possible," he said.

Treasury Nominee Urges Pressing China On Yuan (WSJ)

By Deborah Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, June 28, 2006

WASHINGTON -- President Bush's Treasury secretary nominee told a Senate panel that the U.S. has to "fairly aggressively" encourage China to make its currency more flexible and continue to prod the country toward economic overhauls.

Henry M. Paulson Jr., chief executive of Goldman Sachs Group Inc., who has visited China about 70 times in the past 15 years, said he hoped to be "quite active" in international issues, including China. Mr. Paulson said while there is a "strong protectionist sentiment in China," the U.S. must encourage Chinese leaders to embrace a competitive marketplace "and encourage them to move quickly."

DOJ_NMG_0037079

At a three-hour confirmation hearing before the Senate Finance Committee, Mr. Paulson, who is expected to be confirmed, didn't signal that any major changes in economic policy are on the horizon. He defended the Bush administration's recent tax cuts, saying they were helping to expand the economy. He played down concerns over the budget deficit, saying it was "manageable and within the realm of historic norms."

"Like all of us, I wish our deficit was lower. But I'm actually encouraged that despite the bursting of the [stock market] bubble and the recession and the war on terror...we're in a situation right now where our economy has been growing," he said. Asked whether, given the strong economy, it was time to raise taxes to help deal with the deficit, Mr. Paulson said it "would be a big mistake to increase taxes."

Several senators detailed fiscal problems that Mr. Paulson will have to tackle. Sen. Max Baucus, (D., Mont.), cautioned Mr. Paulson that he "will have much work to do. The government has run $300 billion budget deficits for four years in a row. The balance of trade has been on a roller-coaster ride to extremes. America faces new economic competition from China and India. And the Treasury Department has suffered depressed morale and a diminished policy role. Good luck."

Mr. Paulson told senators he would take steps to simplify taxes and overhaul entitlement programs such as Social Security and Medicare, but said it would be "naive" to think those issues could be "addressed and solved in a two-and-a-half-year period."

WALL STREET JOURNAL VIDEO

Treasury Secretary nominee Henry Paulson1 says "it would be a big mistake to increase taxes," in his testimony before the Senate Finance Committee.

A notable omission in Mr. Paulson's remarks was mention of a strong dollar -- nor was he asked about it by the senators. That stands in contrast to departing Secretary John Snow, who backed a strong-dollar policy in his confirmation hearing in 2003.

Under questioning by several senators, including Republican Sen. Charles Grassley of Iowa, chairman of the committee, Mr. Paulson said he would review a newly disclosed Treasury Department program to track suspected terrorists by examining financial transactions. "I am going to, if confirmed, be all over it," he said.

A London-based civil liberties group is asking governments to block the release of confidential financial records to U.S. authorities as part of U.S. antiterrorist probes. Privacy International said it filed complaints with data protection and privacy regulators in 17 countries, arguing that disclosures of financial transactions "were made without any legal basis or authority whatsoever."

Several senators pressed Mr. Paulson about why the Bush administration's economic policies weren't leading to faster wage growth for many Americans. "The average wage-earner is losing purchasing power and they are feeling it mightily. Exactly when do their wages grow?" asked Sen. Olympia Snowe, (R., Maine). Mr. Paulson said he cares "deeply about the economic well-being of the middle class" and said recent job growth and productivity growth "will hopefully be followed by an increase in wage income."

Mr. Paulson said he wants to be active in targeting those who abuse charitable donations to pay less in taxes. Mr. Paulson said he is concerned about instances where donors make "in kind" gifts to charities, such as art, and "take an inflated appraisal" so they can claim a higher deduction on taxes.

Treasury Nominee Paulson Sounds A Lot Like Outgoing Snow (USAT)

By David J. Lynch

USA Today, June 28, 2006

WASHINGTON — If Treasury Secretary-designate Henry Paulson is going to differ dramatically from outgoing John Snow, there wasn't much evidence of it Tuesday during his Senate confirmation hearing.

President Bush nominated Paulson to become Treasury secretary as part of a second-term shake-up aimed at reinvigorating the president's sagging public approval ratings. The chairman and chief executive of investment banking powerhouse Goldman Sachs brings to the post a reputation for financial acumen as well as deeply held views on issues such as global warming that differ from administration policy.

But under generally friendly questioning by lawmakers, the prospective Treasury boss sounded a lot like the old boss. On issues from taxes to trade with China, Paulson echoed Snow's stance, telling members of the Senate Finance Committee:

DOJ_NMG_0037080

•Federal tax cuts slated to expire in coming years should be extended and efforts to cut the deficit limited to spending reductions. “I feel very strongly we should not be increasing taxes,” Paulson said.

•China is moving toward a market-based currency, but the U.S. should urge Beijing to go faster.

•Continued economic growth, which has boosted corporate profits, eventually will pay off for middle-income workers with fatter paychecks.

Paulson also said the current government deficit is “manageable,” but he called for early action on a looming crisis over Medicare and Social Security costs as millions of baby boomers retire.

Lawmakers hope to confirm Paulson before leaving for the July Fourth holiday. The nomination faces no major obstacles, with even committee Democrats praising Paulson as a welcome addition to the administration.

With many members of Congress chafing over administration efforts to strengthen executive power, several lawmakers urged Paulson to keep them better informed. Sen. Max Baucus, D-Mont., complained that Treasury officials had not briefed the committee on the government's use of international bank records to combat terrorism, which was disclosed by The New York Times.

Paulson promised to personally review the program, which he said he had not yet been briefed on.

Paulson, 60, long has been active in environmental matters and has warned publicly that the time needed to address climate change is running out. But replying to a question from Sen. Ron Wyden, D-Ore., Paulson played down suggestions his views could modify administration policy.

“The president of the United States has nominated me to be secretary of the Treasury. He hasn't nominated me to be secretary of the Interior. He hasn't nominated me to be head of the Environmental Protection Agency.”

Reading The Classifieds (WP)

The Washington Post, June 28, 2006

The State Department's Information Systems and Services office reminded everyone last week that putting SBU (Sensitive But Unclassified) on cables and e-mails is useless in terms of actually keeping the information from the public.

Worse yet, the folks at ISS said in a June 22 announcement, putting SBU on a document "DOES NOT by itself" protect the information from release under the dread Freedom of Information Act.

So if you want to keep it from getting to the public, you need to classify it as secret, top secret, eyes only, and so on. (Another problem with using SBU is that passing such information on is not a security violation, so the divulgers can't be punished.)

This useful reminder was issued only five days after The Washington Post published a cable from the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad recounting the daily hardships and dangers confronting Iraqi embassy employees. Every paragraph of that cable was marked SBU.

ISS assures us the new guidance had nothing to do with the publication of that cable, which apparently caused a bit of a fuss at Foggy Bottom. ISS says it periodically reissues such guidance.

We certainly believe them, though we hear no one at the State Department does. The new guidance almost surely means more secrecy.

"From their point of view, SBU is an informal 'we don't want to tell you' designation," said Steven Aftergood , a secrecy specialist at the Federation of American Scientists. The State Department apparently thinks "too much information is getting out."

Well, an informed public can be a real pain.They're Baaaaaack . . .

This just in from Arab News, an English-language daily in the Middle East: "Saudis Offered Scholarships for Aviation Courses in US," says the headline.

"The Ministry of Higher Education and the General Authority of Civil Aviation are offering scholarships to Saudi men and women to study majors related to civil aviation in the United States," according to a bylined article from Jeddah, and application forms are on the ministry's Web site.

"The scholarships are available in majors such as communications, electrical and computer engineering . . . air traffic control, flight safety, and other majors related to the airline transport industry," we're told.

DOJ_NMG_0037081

The Saudis are offering scholarships this year for study in Australia, China, India, Japan, Malaysia, New Zealand, Singapore, South Korea and the United States.

Hurry on down. Deadline's July 12.It's Official: Langley Opens a Honey Pot

Great news for the new, leaner and meaner CIA. A Dunkin' Donuts has recently opened at headquarters. Nothing like one of those tasty, glazed beauties each day to keep that waistline under control.

The power outage Thursday morning in parts of McLean also hit the CIA, but we're told backup systems kept essential networks going. Some lights, desktop computers and the like were affected during the three-hour outage, forcing some employees to have doughnuts in the dark.

No connection found between the outage and the reappearance that day at the agency of legendary operative Stephen R. Kappes , who headed the clandestine service but resigned in 2004 during the 18-month reign of director Porter J. Goss .

Kappes hasn't formally come on as the agency's No. 2. He awaits Senate action on the reappointment of the current deputy director, Adm. Albert M. Calland III , to his three-star rank, at which point Calland is to move over to be deputy director of strategic planning of the National Counterterrorism Center.

Kappes, a spokesman said, "has used his time in the building . . . to read in and to reach out to agency personnel."

Speaking of the new old guy, Kappes, what about the old new guys, otherwise known as the Gosslings? The big question is whether the new regime is going to do a wholesale purge or surgical removal.

Some division chiefs and others are said to have put in a good word with new CIA Director Michael V. Hayden for Michael V. Kostiw . Kostiw, who left the agency in 1981 after some unpleasantness involving a package of bacon, was thought to have done well when he returned as Goss's special assistant for operations in Afghanistan and Iraq.An Eye for an Eye -- Belarus Sanctions Bush

Meanwhile, those lovable unreconstructed commies in Belarus have vowed to retaliate for the administration's decision to freeze the U.S. bank accounts of Belarusan President Alexander Lukashenko and other high-ranking officials.

The sanctions, which also bar U.S. citizens from doing business with the Belarusans, were imposed for that government's human rights abuses, general corruption and thuggery, repression, election fraud and the disappearances of four regime critics.

"We'll apply appropriately symmetrical measures to George W. Bush and Condoleezza Rice ," Belarusan Security Council Secretary Viktor Sheiman vowed in a state television interview. "We'll freeze their accounts and seize their assets" in Belarus.

"It's clear to everyone that neither Lukashenko, nor I have or can have any bank accounts in the U.S. The U.S. administration has been looking for these accounts for 10 years now," Sheiman said. He described the U.S. action as "diehard and ugly."

Based on their financial disclosure forms, it does not appear that Bush and Rice have extensive holdings in Belarus.On the Move?

Word is that Jim Wilkinson, formerly at the White House and more recently burnishing Rice's image, will be chief of staff to Henry M. Paulson Jr ., once he's confirmed by the Senate as Treasury secretary.

Bush's Communications Director Leaves (AP-Y2)

AP2, June 27, 2006

President Bush's communications director is stepping down to move to New York City with her husband, the White House announced Tuesday.

Nicolle Wallace has been in a long-distance marriage ever since her husband, Mark, became United Nations ambassador for management and reform this spring. Wallace decided to stay temporarily in Washington, but this Friday she is leaving her job overseeing White House press strategy.

"I've never stopped feeling amazed when the West Wing gate swings open each morning when I show my badge," Wallace said. She said she doesn't have her next job lined up yet.

The couple worked on Bush's 2004 campaign before they married — Mark Wallace as deputy campaign manager and Nicolle Devenish as communications director. She moved to the White House after Bush's re-election, and the couple married in September in Greece. Bush nominated Mark Wallace to be ambassador in January.

DOJ_NMG_0037082

W. BENCH PRESS (NYPOST)

By Deborah Orin

The New York Post, June 28, 2006

WASHINGTON - President Bush today will nominate Gov. Pataki's lieutenant governor, Mary Donohue, for a federal judgeship in upstate New York, The Post has learned.

Sen. Chuck Schumer (D-N.Y.), who serves on the Senate Judiciary Committee which would consider her nomination, has been informed and "is keeping an open mind," aides said.

Donohue is a former state Supreme Court justice who has been seen as a product of New York's Republican political machine with close ties to former Sen. Al D'Amato. Pataki submitted her name to Bush last March.

Connaughton Named To Lead U.S. Maritime Agency (WP)

By Stephanie McCrummen And Nikita Stewart

The Washington Post, June 28, 2006

Prince William Board of County Supervisors Chairman Sean T. Connaughton, who presided over a period of unprecedented growth in one of the nation's most diverse and dynamic suburban areas, was nominated yesterday by President Bush to be the head of the U.S. Maritime Administration.

If confirmed by the Senate, Connaughton, a maritime lawyer, would resign the post he has held nearly seven years to be the administrator of an agency with an annual budget of more than $500 million and a staff of 1,000, whose primary job is to ensure safe and efficient access for commercial and military ships through U.S. waterways.

"We are a dramatically different county and for the better. . . ," said Connaughton, a moderate Republican whose term as head of the supervisors expires at the end of next year. "We've been able to make growth pay for growth."

Connaughton, 45, said the presidential nomination represents the "highest honor" of his professional career as a maritime lawyer and one that he could not turn down. He is with Troutman Sanders LLP.

His decision leaves in question the leadership of a county that has changed in recent years from a quiet, semi-suburban, semi-rural area into a bona fide part of Northern Virginia, complete with $800,000 homes, fancy golf courses and epic traffic jams.

Depending on the timing of Connaughton's resignation, a special election could be called or a successor could be chosen on Election Day next year -- Nov. 6.

There are many rumored candidates. Supervisor Martin E. Nohe (R-Coles) said that it's premature for him to make a decision but that the new chairman should be "someone who follows Sean's footsteps." Only Supervisor Corey A. Stewart (R-Occoquan) has announced that he'll run.

Connaughton was almost unknown when he ran for county supervisor in 1999 against Democratic incumbent Kathleen K. Seefeldt, whom he accused of failing to foresee the effects of growth -- high taxes, inadequate roads and crowded schools -- and of being too close to developers.

He promised not to stop development but to manage it better, and voters took him up on the pledge, choosing a Republican supervisor for the first time in the county's history. Last year, he lost a bid to be the GOP candidate for lieutenant governor.

When he became a supervisor, the county had 280,000 people, an annual budget of about $400 million and one of the highest tax rates in the region.

He leaves an increasingly diverse county of about 364,000 people, a budget of $857 million and Northern Virginia's lowest tax rate, which he and his board colleagues accomplished by cutting the tax rate as property values soared. The county also earned a AAA bond rating during Connaughton's tenure, a gold star for local governments.

Developers are now paying more in proffers, voluntary funds used to offset the costs of schools, roads and other public services. Rather than wait for state transportation money to trickle down, the county used its money to build hundreds of miles of roads. And Prince William recently became one of a handful of municipalities in the state to propose creating a transportation department.

DOJ_NMG_0037083

Since Connaughton took office, the county has built 21 schools and hired several hundred police and fire personnel to keep up with growth.

And, to the consternation of some longtime residents, he initiated smaller programs aimed at changing the county's good-old-boy image.

For some accustomed to living as they please, Connaughton will be remembered as the man who banished motorboats and RVs from residential streets and who hired a "neighborhood coordinator" to point out property code violations such as derelict cars parked in front yards.

But to Connaughton, those sorts of community maintenance programs, along with the county's new emphasis on historic preservation, represent a turning point for an area once considered where the "real" Virginia began.

As the county has become more tethered to Northern Virginia, the distinction has moved a few exits south.

"I'm extremely proud of what's happened in Prince William in the last seven years," Connaughton said, adding that his nomination is only the "the first step in a long process."

Chief Seeks $160.5M For VA Data Security (USAT)

USA Today, June 28, 2006

Veterans Affairs Secretary Jim Nicholson told a House Appropriations subcommittee Tuesday that he can turn his agency into a "model for information security" but said he needs at least $160.5 million to do it. The request includes funding for at least one year of government-paid credit monitoring for the 26.5 million veterans and active-duty military personnel whose private personal information was stolen May 3 in a burglary at the home of a VA analyst. There have been no reports of identity theft in connection with the incident. The VA proposes to pay out-of-pocket expenses ranging from $10,000 to $20,000 for those whose identities are stolen. He said more money may be needed to revamp information security at the VA.

Senate Intelligence Chairman Pat Roberts, R-Kan., asked National Intelligence Director John Negroponte to order an assessment of damage caused by the disclosure of secret intelligence programs aimed at stopping terrorists. "We cannot continue to operate in a system where the government takes steps to counter terrorism while the media actively works to disclose those operations without any regard for protection of lives, sources and legal methods," Roberts said.

The latest disclosures last week reported on a secret financial-monitoring program used to trace terrorists. President Bush on Monday called the disclosures "disgraceful" and said it "does great harm to the United States" by making it "harder to win this war on terror."

The House International Relations Committee approved President Bush's plan to share civilian nuclear technology with India, a first step toward approval of the unprecedented deal. The vote was 37-5.

India would allow international inspections and safeguards at 14 reactors it has designated as civilian. Eight military facilities would remain off-limits. In return, the United States would ship nuclear technology and fuel to India. Rep. Jim Leach, R-Iowa, said the deal "knifed" the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty, which limits the spread of nuclear technology. He called it a sad day for efforts to stop the spread of nuclear arms. India developed its nuclear bombs outside the treaty.

Government-owned land would be used to store nuclear waste temporarily pending completion of a long-delayed permanent facility, under a proposal by Senate Energy and Natural Resources Chairman Pete Domenici, R-N.M. His proposal would give the Energy Department authority to build storage facilities on federal land or purchase private land for storage, for up to 25 years, even if state or local authorities objected. A facility would have to get a license from the Nuclear Regulatory Commission and comply with various security, safety and environmental regulations.

Funding was included in a $30.7 billion spending bill an Appropriations subcommittee approved Tuesday. The plan deals with the more than 50,000 tons of used reactor fuel at power plants in 31 states.

The government is obligated to take the waste but has no place to put it because the permanent underground storage site to be built at Yucca Mountain in Nevada cannot open until at least 2018.

$160 Million To Be Sought For VA's Credit-Monitoring Program (WP)

By Zachary A. Goldfarb And Josh White

The Washington Post, June 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0037084

Veterans Affairs Secretary Jim Nicholson said yesterday that the Bush administration will seek $160.5 million to pay for free credit monitoring for veterans and military personnel whose personal information was stolen last month, and he hinted that more money may be necessary.

"If a year expires, we have a responsibility to determine whether to renew based on what we know at the time," he said.

Congress may face requests for spending to cover potential data losses at other agencies -- such as those that were announced recently at the Agriculture Department, the Pentagon and the Federal Trade Commission.

Meanwhile, Navy officials announced this week that they believe the number of sailors and their family members whose personal data were posted on a civilian Web site was larger than first suspected last week.

In a news release Monday, the Navy said that the birthdates, Social Security numbers and other personal information of more than 30,618 people were compromised when five spreadsheet files appeared on the Internet. On Friday, it had said that 28,000 people were affected.

Officials said the spreadsheets appeared to have data on personnel who were stationed in areas affected by Hurricane Katrina last year. The Naval Criminal Investigative Service is looking into how the information ended up on a public Web site.

Navy spokesmen said there is no indication that the data have been used illegally, but the service has sent letters to all sailors whose personal data were compromised to encourage them to monitor their financial accounts.

The theft of Department of Veterans Affairs data occurred at a VA data analyst's home in early May and was announced to the public three weeks later, prompting outrage among veterans. Several veterans groups have filed class-action lawsuits in Kentucky and in Washington, D.C., against the federal government, seeking $1,000 in damages per affected veteran.

A judge in Kentucky has scheduled a hearing for Friday to determine whether the VA must offer affected people more expansive services and has prohibited the VA from publicizing the credit monitoring to veterans until then.

The VA plans to send letters to eligible people in August and is receiving bids for the service from potential contractors.

Authorities have said that they do not believe the data, stored on a laptop and an external hard drive, were targeted by the thief. They said there have been no signs that the information has been misused. The data files contained information on 26.5 million people.

Nicholson said that $29 million of the $160.5 million will be taken from VA funds budgeted for 2006 to cover personnel costs at the Veterans Benefits Administration, where hiring planned for this year has been postponed until next. He said the rest will come from other areas of the fiscal 2006 budget.

"It will take some belt tightening. It will not come out of veterans' benefits," he said.

The VA has already budgeted about $25 million to set up a call center for responding to veterans' questions -- which costs about $200,000 per day -- and to send mailings to veterans alerting them about the data loss and the credit-monitoring program.

New Rules Force States To Curb Welfare Rolls (NYT)

By Robert Pear

The New York Times, June 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 27 — The Bush administration plans to issue sweeping new rules on Wednesday that will require states to move much larger numbers of poor people from welfare to work.

The rules, drafted in response to a budget signed into law by President Bush in February, represent the biggest changes in welfare policy since 1996, when Congress abolished the federal guarantee of cash assistance for the nation's poorest children.

Since then, the number of welfare recipients has plunged more than 60 percent, to 4.4 million people, from 12.2 million. Most of the decline occurred in the first years, before the 2001 recession. Federal and state officials say they expect the new rules to speed the decline in welfare rolls, which has slowed in recent years.

The rules are far more than a bureaucratic application of the new law, passed after four years of partisan deadlock. For the first time, they set a uniform definition for permissible work activities and require states to verify and document the number of hours worked by welfare recipients.

Nationally, in 2004, the last year for which official figures are available, about 32 percent of adults on welfare were working. Under the new rules, 50 percent of adult welfare recipients must be engaged in work or training in the fiscal year that starts Oct.

DOJ_NMG_0037085

1, or states will face financial penalties. The penalties can reduce a state's federal welfare grant by 5 percent in the first year and by two additional percentage points for each subsequent year of noncompliance, up to a maximum penalty of 21 percent.

Some state officials and antipoverty groups, including many who opposed the 1996 law, say the new work requirements are unrealistic. But Bush administration officials point to Georgia as evidence that the goals are achievable.

Gov. Sonny Perdue of Georgia, a Republican, said 69 percent of his state's adult welfare recipients were either working or in work-training programs, up from 8 percent four years ago. Moreover, Mr. Perdue said, the number of adult welfare cases has declined to 8,100, from 30,590 in 2002. In 32 of Georgia's 159 counties, he said, all the adults on welfare are employed or in training programs.

Members of Congress thought they were setting stringent work requirements when they created the current welfare program, Temporary Assistance for Needy Families, in 1996. But state officials quickly discovered that the requirements were much less onerous than they had thought.

Under the old law, the work requirements were reduced whenever states reduced the number of families on welfare, compared with the 1995 level. In theory, 50 percent of adult welfare recipients were supposed to be working. But if a state's caseload dropped 45 percent, the work requirement was slashed by 45 percentage points, so that only 5 percent of the state's welfare recipients had to be working.

Wade F. Horn, an assistant secretary of health and human services, said this provision of the 1996 law, known as a "caseload reduction credit," had wiped out any meaningful work requirements. Under the new rules, states will receive credit only for future reductions in their welfare rolls. The base year, for the purpose of comparison, will be 2005.

The new requirements may come as a shock to many states. In 2004, all states but Indiana and Mississippi met their work participation requirements, as calculated by the federal government. In 19 states, the required work participation rate — after taking account of steep declines in the welfare rolls — was zero.

The administration has scheduled a news conference for Wednesday to announce the rules, which, under the new law, must be issued by the end of this month.

Crystal A. Robinson, a 26-year-old mother of three in Minneapolis, said she believed that stricter work requirements could be helpful if states provided generous subsidies for child care.

Ms. Robinson received cash assistance from 2000 to 2002 and now receives help with her child care costs.

"I found a job I liked," said Ms. Robinson, who works 40 hours a week at a local hospital. "I'm a very hard worker. But the child care would be unaffordable without assistance from Hennepin County."

Another welfare recipient, Laura L. Kegerreis, 33, receives $497 a month for herself and her three children while she takes job-preparation courses at Harrisburg Area Community College in Pennsylvania. Mr. Kegerreis said the new work requirements could force her to take fewer classes, prolonging her stay on welfare and delaying her ability to get a professional credential.

The new law reauthorizes welfare programs through September 2010. The basic federal block grant remains $16.5 billion a year and is not adjusted for inflation or changes in the number of people on the rolls.

"Welfare" used to mean a monthly check that could be immediately converted to cash. But more than half of the money now goes into child care, education, training and other services — a huge shift since 1996.

Under the new rules, the federal government will spend $150 million a year on programs to help couples form "healthy marriages." Up to $50 million of this amount can be spent on activities promoting "responsible fatherhood." These activities could include seminars on the causes of domestic violence and child abuse.

After President Bill Clinton signed the 1996 welfare law, he gave states a large amount of discretion, saying he trusted them to help families become self-sufficient. The new rules limit the flexibility that states were granted in 1996. They define 12 acceptable types of work activity, including subsidized and unsubsidized employment, community service, on-the-job training, job search (usually limited to six weeks a year) and vocational education training (up to 12 months in a lifetime).

Federal officials said they were adopting uniform standards because the definition of work now varied from state to state, and even from year to year within the same state. As a result, they said, it is difficult to compare states' performance.

Today, as in 1996, many Democrats say the welfare law creates a perverse incentive. A state can comply by putting some people to work and by simply removing others from the rolls, regardless of whether they find jobs.

DOJ_NMG_0037086

In an executive order on Friday, Gov. John Lynch of New Hampshire, a Democrat, made clear that he wanted to meet the federal requirements not just by closing cases, but by moving people to "lasting employment and self-sufficiency." Mr. Lynch said he intended to increase child care, transportation, education and other services to help people stay off welfare.

States could avoid many restrictions of the 1996 law by providing assistance entirely with state money, through separate state programs.

Reid Threatens Member COLA (RC)

By Erin P. Billings

Roll Call, June 28, 2006

Seeking to leave town on a political high note, Senate Democratic leaders vowed on Tuesday to block their own annual pay raise unless Republicans also allow for a boost in the federal minimum wage.

Democrats offered few details about how they plan to carry out their promise to stop Congress' scheduled 2 percent pay hike from going into effect next January. But they said they have more than 40 Senate Democrats aligned behind them and will succeed in freezing Members' pay unless Congress approves a minimum wage increase by the end of the 109th.

"They can play all the games they want ... but we're going to do everything to stop the Congressional pay raise being put in — the right way, the wrong way or any way," said Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.).

In recent weeks, House and Senate Democrats have been increasingly vocal about raising the minimum wage from its current $5.15 an hour to $7.25 an hour. The wage hike is part of the Democrats' national platform this year, and one of several domestic priorities they plan to tout heading into November.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) already has introduced a bill in the Senate tying a COLA freeze to a minimum wage boost, and in the House, Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) successfully added an amendment to the Labor, Health and Human Services and Education appropriations bill to boost the minimum wage to $7.25 an hour.

House Republican leaders had planned a floor vote on the Labor spending bill earlier this month but pulled it from the schedule fearing a defeat on the floor. Democrats have accused the GOP of holding the bill hostage over its distaste for the minimum wage amendment.

Hoyer said on Tuesday that "Democrats have made the minimum wage a top priority and will continue to push the issue any way we can."

Reid said it is unfair for Congress to accept a COLA for itself when millions of Americans are struggling to make ends meet. "We've had enough of it, and the American people have, too."

Republicans, however, accused the Democrats of engaging in a "political stunt" in an election year and said the minority won't get far with its latest tactic.

"In a week where the Democrats' main attack against Republicans is that we are putting politics first, it's an awfully interesting move," noted one Senate GOP aide.

Some Republicans support a halt to Congressional pay increases but generally see a minimum wage increase as a burden on small businesses working to make economic headway. The minimum wage has been set at $5.15 an hour since 1997.

Sen. Jon Kyl (Ariz.), the Senate GOP's policy chairman, said he'd love to have Democrats support in his ongoing efforts to sideline next year's scheduled COLA, but he believes they have a very slim chance at getting the minimum wage increase through.

"If they're still stuck on the provision they've offered, they don't have the votes this year," Kyl said, referring to a proposal by Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) to increase the minimum wage to $7.25.

The Democratic challenge on the minimum wage comes during a week where the minority is trying to put Republicans on the defensive on a host of issues before the Senate breaks for the July Fourth recess. Democrats hope to counter Republicans attempts to frame the debate on Iraq war and immigration reform, while striking a chord of their own on those issues and others such as the minimum wage increase.

Senate Minority Whip Dick Durbin (Ill.) said Democrats clearly are trying to start a drumbeat on a long-standing priority.

DOJ_NMG_0037087

"We hope that we will not only send a message to the Republican leadership in Congress about these hardworking families, but that the voters will send a message on Nov. 7 that it's time for change," Durbin said.

While the COLA has not yet become a prominent issue in any Senate races this cycle, several Democratic challengers in the House have attempted to link Congressional pay to the minimum wage hike.

Banker Christine Jennings, a Democrat running for the open seat in Florida's 13th district, is one of the latest to do so.

Jennings will hold an event in Sarasota on Tuesday to pledge that, if elected, she will refuse a pay raise until the minimum wage is increased and will sign a copy of a written pledge to that effect.

"As your future Congresswoman, I promise to put the needs of working families ahead of fattening the salaries of members of Congress," she said in a statement.

The COLA would give House and Senate lawmakers an average $3,330 increase in their paychecks beginning in 2007, bringing rank-and-file Members' annual salary to $168,500. Elected members of the leadership are paid slightly more.

That pay raise is automatic unless lawmakers move to block it — typically through the Treasury appropriations bill, which has cleared the House and is scheduled for a Senate markup on July 20. It is unclear when that spending bill will hit the Senate floor.

On the House side, Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) said on Tuesday his chamber is "done" with the COLA this year. Rep. Jim Matheson (D-Utah) led efforts to curb the pay increase in that chamber two weeks ago.

Several Senators have long pushed to stop pay raises for Members, including Sen. Russ Feingold (D-Wis.), who last week said he once again plans to offer an amendment at some point to ensure a Senate vote on the issue.

Sen. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.) said on Tuesday that "if tying the two together is the only way to get the minimum wage, we're all for it.

"Congress shouldn't be lining its pockets while hardworking Americans are struggling just to fill theirs."

Raising Minimum Wage Will Not Hurt Jobs, Dean Says (WT)

By Josh Rutledge

The Washington Times, June 28, 2006

Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean yesterday dismissed as economic "mumbo jumbo" the argument that raising the minimum wage would cause unemployment.

The former Vermont governor made his claims during a conference of liberal Christians yesterday at National City Christian Church in Northwest, during which Mr. Dean was introduced to cheers and a standing ovation from a morning-session crowd of more than 600 people along with the Rev. Jim Wallis, the evangelical who founded the liberal religious magazine Sojourners.

"We believe that overcoming poverty must become a nonpartisan issue. We have called both Democrats and Republicans to address the issue," Mr. Wallis said.

When Mr. Wallis introduced Mr. Dean, the Democratic National Committee Chairman (DNC) chief began by saying he "felt right at home" among people praising Jesus.

"This is a moral nation, so the first thing we must do is convince people that poverty is a moral problem," Mr. Dean said. "It is a moral principle to raise the minimum wage. It is nothing but economist mumbo jumbo to say raising it will hurt jobs."

When Mr. Dean was running for the 2004 presidential nomination, he cause much skepticism about his claims to religious practice by citing Job as his favorite New Testament book and his account of leaving the Episcopal Church because of a dispute over a bike path.

The Dean speech came on the second-day of a three-day conference titled "Building a Covenant for a New America," which takes its title from an article earlier this year in Sojourners. Republican National Committee (RNC) Chairman Ken Mehlman was invited to share the stage with Mr. Dean, but organizers said yesterday that he declined.

The conference's sponsors include Sojourners and Call to Renewal, who say that its purpose is to mobilize support for a religious agenda to end poverty, both domestically and internationally. The conference's banners and handouts described raising the minimum wage as one of its three principal issues, the other two being child poverty in the United States and foreign aid.

DOJ_NMG_0037088

Christian Weller, senior economist at the Center for American Progress, said that a minimum wage increase from $5.15 to $7.25 would increase minimum wage earners' share of the nation's overall wealth.

"Profits are at their highest levels, but the purchasing power of the minimum wage is at its lowest since the 1950s. I think it is only fair to take a bit from the top and give it to the bottom," Mr. Weller said.

Adam Taylor, senior director of campaigns and organizing for Sojourners/Call to Renewal, urged his listeners to appeal to their representatives to increase this year's Foreign Operations budget to $5 billion.

After the speakers finished, the crowd gathered in the front of the Church, chanting in unison, "Hey hey, ho ho/poverty's got to go." They then proceeded down the streets, urging stalled drivers to honk if they wanted higher wages and waving signs that read, "Poverty Is Not A Family Value" and "Make Poverty History."

At a later gathering, Upper Senate Park on Capitol Hill, the Rev. Anthony Campolo said that "it's time for people of faith to stand up for what the Bible teaches."

"America will not be judged on how secure we make our people. We will be judged on how we treat the poor," he said.

Tensions Running High (RC)

By Mary Ann Akers

Roll Call, June 28, 2006

The exceedingly intense rivalry between Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.) and Charles Schumer (N.Y.) embroiled just about everybody in the Senate Democratic leadership Tuesday, including Minority Leader Harry Reid (Nev.) and his spokeswoman.

Apparently, Clinton and her staff felt snubbed when party leaders organized a news conference in which they vowed to block efforts to give Members of Congress a pay raise until Congress approves an increase in the minimum wage. Clinton has introduced legislation along those lines, but she was not involved in planning the leadership's news conference to trumpet the issue.

Although Clinton, a close adviser of Reid's, was ultimately invited to attend the news conference, she was not told about the event until just hours before it began Tuesday.

While the noon event was hastily arranged — planning for it only began Monday night — a Clinton aide was apparently so furious that the Senator seemed to be left out of the loop that she bawled out ("reamed out" was how one source put it) a spokeswoman for Reid near the entrance to the Senate Radio-Television Gallery.

The Clinton aide, Laurie Rubiner, was overheard saying to Reid spokeswoman Rebecca Kirszner, "You suck" and "How could you do this?"

Sources say Clinton looked "visibly upset" at the news conference. (Paging Ken Mehlman; didn't you label Clinton the "angry" candidate?) She did not stay for the duration of the question-and-answer session.

Whatever thoughts she or her staff may have expressed to Democratic leaders and their aides before the event, Reid did introduce Clinton and single her out as being "on top of this issue."

"And I think it would have been really unfair not to have her here today," Reid said, "as she has had the vision to look down the road on this issue before some of the others."

One reporter who attended the news conference described Reid's comments as "a little weird" and "out of context."

The Democratic leaders — Reid, plus Schumer, who chairs the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, Minority Whip Dick Durbin (Ill.) and Democratic Caucus Secretary Debbie Stabenow (Mich.) — met Monday night and decided to hold the news conference. First they scheduled it for 2:30 p.m. following the Tuesday Caucus lunches. Then they moved it up to noon.

Because the time switch threw off her schedule and she had other meetings to attend, Clinton had to leave early, her spokesman, Philippe Reines, told HOH.

He also jokingly denied that Rubiner had chewed out Kirszner, saying, "Laurie Rubiner did not say that to Rebecca. She said 'Nice work.' And she meant it."

Of the Senator, he said, "She was just very disappointed, and continues to be, that the federal minimum wage isn't higher."

DOJ_NMG_0037089

A Democratic leadership source told HOH that Rubiner later called Kirszner and apologized, and the apology was accepted. "All's well that ends well," the aide said.

Democratic sources also suggested that Clinton may be more irritated at Schumer than Reid.

One aide said that Schumer "had to have known that Hillary had a bill" on the minimum wage-pay raise issue during that planning meeting Monday night, yet he "didn't say a word" and didn't include her.

Phil Singer, Schumer's spokesman at the DSCC, rejected that notion out of hand, saying, "This issue starkly highlights the wrong priorities of Congressional Republicans, and we're all grateful for Sen. Clinton's leadership in bringing this issue to the forefront."

Rush Job. Rumors were swirling around Capitol Hill and beyond Tuesday that Rush Limbaugh is dating actress Mary Lynn Rajskub, who plays Chloe O'Brian on the Fox series "24." Though that still doesn't explain the unauthorized bottle of little blue pills (shhh, Viagra!) that customs agents found in Limbaugh's luggage at Palm Beach International Airport on Monday.

The conservative radio talk show host hinted on his show Tuesday that he went on a boys-only trip with the cast of "24." Chloe is no boy. If you saw the papers over the weekend, including The Washington Post, there were photos of Limbaugh planting a big kiss right on Rajskub's lips during a dog-and-pony event at the Heritage Foundation.

No one at Heritage seemed to know whether Limbaugh and Rajskub were more than photo-op kissing buddies. A spokeswoman for Heritage who asked not to be named told HOH, "Nobody knows. Several people have been asking today. I have no idea."

Our guess is, probably not. Though why would Rush take Viagra on a boys-only trip?

He joked about the incident on-air Tuesday, on 630 WMAL, after getting caught having apparently traded in the hard stuff for the stuff that makes one hard. (Last month Limbaugh reached a deal with prosecutors on charges involving prescription painkillers.)

Limbaugh asked, "How did Bob Dole's luggage get on my plane?" And he said, "I told my doctor I needed help with the ELECTION."

We called Julie Talbott, a spokeswoman for Premiere Radio Network, and asked her whether Rush was dating "Chloe." Shockingly she told us, "No comment."

At least Limbaugh's ex-girlfriend, CNN anchor Daryn Kagan, didn't have to break the Viagra news on air. Tuesday morning's live coverage began, "I'm Tony Harris. Daryn Kagan has the day off."

Whew!!

Here She Comes. Usually David All is earnestly flacking for his boss, House GOP Conference Vice Chairman Jack Kingston (Ga.). But lately, the ambitious young press secretary has been flacking for his No. 1 gal, Branda Napper, who this weekend — drum roll please — will compete for the title of Miss District of Columbia.

Napper, an aide in the public affairs office at the Department of Homeland Security, is slated to be one of 11 finalists vying for the Miss D.C. crown this Saturday at the University of the District of Columbia on Connecticut Avenue Northwest.

All has been rallying his friends far and wide to get out and support the lovely 24-year-old Ms. Napper this weekend. But as he told HOH, "Branda doesn't need my help to win. She could charm the likes of Simon Cowell and can dance better than Shakira. I'm most useful standing behind her and supporting her through it all."

It's a rigorous challenge, but somebody's gotta do it. As her issue, Napper is focusing on heart disease. She'll wear a two-piece in the swim suit competition and an evening gown that her beau has already seen.

Napper noted that last year's Miss D.C. had "80 friends and family in her cheering section; with that kind of support it is not surprise that she won the title and went on to place fifth at Miss America."

So, get on out there, folks! "Bran-da! Bran-da! Bran-da!"

The Reliable Source (WP)

By Amy Argetsinger And Roxanne Roberts

The Washington Post, June 28, 2006

Oh, Deer, This May Not Be the Right House

DOJ_NMG_0037090

Bambi has jumped into politics -- well, at least into Dick Cheney's yard. Last week, a fully grown deer was spotted inside the fence of the Naval Observatory grounds in a wooded area near Observatory Circle.

But how? The veep's house is surrounded by a high fence and -- we assume -- a bunch of other top-secret stuff like motion detectors and radar. In this day and age, nothing the size of a deer meanders around the 40-acre property unless the Secret Service gives it special security clearance.

"It's not uncommon for deer to be there," explained Bill Anderson of Naval District Washington. "They do kind of wander in and out the front gate area and they eat their grasses. We aren't stopping them from walking around the property."

The deer do not affect "at all" the vice president or the house, said Anderson. But he added that the Park Service is preparing an environmental impact statement to look at the "options" for dealing with the four-legged trespassers. Uh-oh! Seem to recall that someone on the premises likes to hunt.

Love, Etc.

? Disengaged: It was like a made-for-MTV movie: the congressman's daughter who melted the heart of the gangsta rapper. In March, The Game , 26, was secretly engaged to Valeisha Butterfield , 28, daughter of first-term Rep. G.K. Butterfield (D-N.C.), according to the exclusive interview the two gave to Jamie Foster Brown in the July issue of Sister 2 Sister magazine. (Other details: They didn't sleep together until after he proposed with a 19-carat diamond; Dad "gave him the third degree" when they met.) But media outlets ranging from Allhiphop.com to the Hill newspaper rushed to investigate -- didn't the drug-dealer-turned-platinum-seller just show up at the "Waist Deep" premiere with a different gal? Seems a lot can happen between press time and the newsstand. "After a long friendship and a brief engagement, they decided to continue on as friends," said Rep. Butterfield's spokesman, Ken Willis .Valeisha, who works in NYC for Russell Simmons's Hip-Hop Summit Action Network, returned the ring. What did Dad think about the whole thing? "He didn't pass on much about his meeting, to tell you the truth," said Willis.

Quoted

"Why was Bob Dole's luggage on my plane? . . . Customs just didn't believe me when I told them I got the pills at the Clinton Library Gift Shop and I was told they were just blue M&Ms. . . . I told my doctor I was worried about the next ELECTION."

-- Rush Limbaugh on his radio show yesterday, trying a little stand-up humor about customs agents finding Viagra (without a proper prescription) in his suitcase Monday.

OTHER NEWS:

Home Sales Sink; Rates, Inventory Rise (USAT)

By Noelle Knox

USA Today, June 28, 2006

Rising interest rates are making it increasingly hard to buy a home and are putting the brakes on the nation's most expensive housing markets.

The latest evidence came Tuesday from the National Association of Realtors, which said sales of existing homes fell 6% from January to May. The drop was worse for single-family homes, whose sales posted their steepest drop in 11 years. The number of homes for sale, meantime, rose sharply last month, a sign of slackening demand.

“The one thing that's changing my forecast is the Federal Reserve,” said David Lereah, the NAR's chief economist, who said he now expects home sales to fall as much as 8% this year, instead of the 5% drop he projected in January. “The market is expecting several more interest rate hikes from the Fed, and that could harm some of our nation's cooling housing markets.”

The Fed is expected to raise its target for short-term rates later this week for the 17th time in two years. Previous increases are already shutting out some buyers. Last week, the average 30-year, fixed-rate loan was at 6.7%, a four-year high, up from 5.57% a year ago. Someone who borrowed the full $230,000 for a median-priced home would have monthly principal and interest payments of $1,484 vs. $1,316 a year ago.

Rising rates are even more dangerous for people with adjustable-rate mortgages that will later reset to much higher rates. In San Diego, where the median home price is $607,000, 74% of buyers last year took out loans that let them pay only the interest or even less, according to LoanPerformance.

Thirteen major metro areas face a 50% or greater chance of declining prices in the next two years, according to PMI Mortgage Insurance, which released its latest market risk index on Tuesday.

Still, most experts see no sudden collapse of prices. “We're seeing an orderly slowdown,” says Mark Milner of PMI.

In May, the median price of a single-family home hit $229,700, up 6.4% from a year ago. Existing-home sales fell 1.2% from April. There's now a 6½-month supply, a sign of a balanced market.

Rising prices are scaring away investors in resort and second-home areas. The number of condos for sale in Las Vegas is up 67% from last year. The lack of investors is “the whole story of the (Las Vegas) market,” says Dennis Smith of Home Builders Research. “Same in California and Phoenix.”

Some areas that never saw frenzied buying still report strong markets. Texas, North Carolina and New Mexico are seeing double-digit gains in home sales. Still, the confidence index of the nation's home builders has fallen to its lowest level since 1995. Monday, Lennar became the fifth home builder in recent weeks to warn investors of lower orders and more cancellations.

Existing-Home Sales Fall 1.2% As Consumer Confidence Rises (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, June 28, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Sales of existing homes fell in May for the seventh time in nine months as interest rates rose, but the mood of the consumer brightened a bit in June.

Sales of existing homes in May were at a 6.67 million annual rate, down 1.2% from April, the National Association of Realtors said. "Although mortgage interest rates remain historically low, the uptrend in interest rates this year is affecting those buyers who are at the margins of affordability," NAR's chief economist, David Lereah, said. The average rate on a 30-year fixed-rate mortgage in May was 6.6%, up from 6.5% in April, according to Freddie Mac.

Meanwhile, the Conference Board said its consumer-confidence index, which had decreased in May, posted a slight increase in June. Consumer attitudes toward the state of the economy deteriorated, but their outlook improved.

The Realtors said the inventory of unsold homes on the market increased to 6.5 months, from April's revised 6.1 months. A rule of thumb in the industry is that there is a buyer's market any time the inventory of unsold homes exceeds six months.

The median home price increased to $230,000, up 3.6% from a revised $222,000 in April and 6% above the May 2005 level of $217,000. The median existing condo price was $229,300 in May, up 1.9% from the year-earlier level.

Sales fell 3.8% in the Midwest and 4.2% in the Northeast, and they rose 0.7% in the West and 0.4% in the South. The report came a day after the government reported that sales of newly built homes rose 4.6% in May.

The Conference Board's consumer-confidence index now stands at 105.7, up from 104.7 in May.

"The slight bounce back in confidence this month was a result of the moderate improvement in consumers' expectations," said Lynn Franco, director of the Conference Board's Consumer Research Center. "Despite the uptick, consumers remain concerned about the short-term outlook. Furthermore, the Present Situation Index lost ground for the second consecutive month, a signal that the economy is shifting into lower gear heading into the second half of this year."

Economists Expect More Rate Increases This Summer (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh

USA Today, June 28, 2006

WASHINGTON — Federal Reserve policymakers may have a busy summer ahead.

Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke and his colleagues are widely expected to raise interest rates by a quarter-percentage point for the 17th time in two years at the conclusion of their two-day meeting Thursday.

And in a bid to thwart inflation, a number of economists, including those at UBS, Lehman Bros. and Bank of America, are predicting the Fed will continue raising rates at its meeting on Aug. 8 and perhaps again later in the year.

Such expectations are a big change from just a few weeks ago, when many economists weren't sure if the Fed would raise rates this month, let alone later in the year. But since then, inflation measures have been coming in higher and a number of Fed officials, including Bernanke, have been warning that inflation is outside their comfort zones.

DOJ_NMG_0037092

"There's enough of a pickup going on (in inflation) that it's a challenge to the Fed," Lehman Bros. chief U.S. economist Ethan Harris says. He expects U.S. central bankers will raise rates twice after Thursday to send a signal that the Fed is aggressively fighting inflation.

An increase this week would bring the Fed's target for short-term interest rates, which influence borrowing costs for everything from mortgages to car loans, to 5.25%, the highest since January 2001.

Investors and economists will be closely scrutinizing the Fed's post-meeting statement Thursday to get a better idea of what the Fed will do next, Nomura Securities chief economist David Resler says. The Dow Jones industrial average fell 120.54 points Tuesday to 10,924.74 in advance of the Fed meeting.

The median answer of 20 economists surveyed by the Bond Market Association June 12-19 was that the Fed would raise rates by a quarter-percentage point once more before the end of 2006, the group said Tuesday. Some expected rates would hit 5.75%.

Fed policymakers are facing a tough balancing act, says Robert DiClemente, Citigroup chief U.S. economist and chairman of the Bond Market Association's economic advisory committee.

While the economy has been slowing to a more moderate level, as expected, there has been some "public anxiety" about inflation after reports showing a broad increase in prices in recent months, he said. Fed policymakers must address those concerns to maintain the public's confidence even though price pressures are expected to ease later in the year.

There was some good news on that front Tuesday. Consumers' inflation expectations fell in June after increasing the prior two months, the Conference Board said in a monthly report on consumer confidence.

Higher Rates Begin To Slow Growth (CSM)

By Ron Scherer

The Christian Science Monitor, June 28, 2006

NEW YORK

Starting next week, Sallie Mae will reset the interest rates on some student loans almost two full percentage points higher than last July. The change will add $5,123 in additional interest to the cost of a college education.

In August, Ty's Toy Box, a small but growing company in northern Kentucky, will renegotiate bank loans - money it needs to finance growth. In the past two years, the interest rate the company pays is already up 1-3/4 percentage points.

As for executives at the Brooklyn-based Dunn Development Corp., which builds affordable housing, they figure it will cost more to borrow money in the future. This will put pressure on the developer to raise rents on their low- and middle-income tenants.

These are just some of the ways past interest-rate increases are rippling through the economy. Economists expect yet another 0.25 percentage point hike Thursday, the Fed's 17th consecutive increase. This will boost short-term interest rates to 5.25 percent, up from 1 percent in April of 2004.

Economists believe the continual rate hikes are finally starting to act as a brake on the economy.

